Umbria, a district of Italy, "considered under the limits which were assigned to it in the reign of Augustus. It was bounded to the north by the Rubicon, which separated it from Cisalpine Gaul. The Appenines and Tiber formed its limits to the west; the Adriatic to the east. To the south it was divided from the Sabine country by the chain of mountains in which the Nar takes its rise, and by that river as far as Terni; from this point a line drawn south of Otricoli, till it meets the Tiber, will complete the demarcation of the two territories. The river Æsis to the southeast marked the frontier on the side of Picenum. The Latin writers were evidently acquainted with no people of Italy more ancient than the Umbri; and Dionysius of Halicarnassus assures us, they were one of the oldest and most numerous nations. The Umbri were already settled in that country long before the arrival of the Tyrrhenian colony. To the Greeks they were known under the name of Ὀμβρικαί, a word which they supposed to be derived from ὄμβρος, under the idea that they were people saved from a universal deluge. Dionysius has farther acquainted us with some particulars respecting the Umbri, which he derived from Zenodotus, a Greek of Trœzene, who had written a history of this people. This author appears to have considered the Umbri as an indigenous race, whose primary seat was the country around Rieti, a district which, according to Dionysius, was formerly occupied by the Aborigines. Zenodotus was also of opinion that the Sabines were descended from the Umbri; and though it is customary to regard them as belonging to the Oscan race, we see no reason why the latter people, who are very indistinctly classed and defined, should not be considered as descended from the same indigenous stock: nay rather, when we consider the analogy which is allowed to exist between the several ancient dialects of Italy, and the uniformity of topographical nomenclature, which may be traced throughout a great part of the peninsula, there seems to be a strong argument in favour of such an hypothesis. Considering therefore the Umbri as confessedly the most ancient people of Italy, we may safely ascribe to them the population of the central and mountainous parts of that country, as also the primitive form of its language, until the several communities of the Etruscans, Sabines, and Latins, successively detached themselves from the parent nation, and from a combination of different elements, adopted also different modifications of the same primeval tongue. Connected with the origin of the ancient Umbri, there still remains a question which ought not to be entirely disregarded. It was confidently stated by Cornelius Bocchus, a Roman writer quoted by Solinus and Isidorus, that the Umbri, were of the same race with the ancient Gauls. This opinion has been rejected on the one hand by Cluverius and Maffei, while it has served on the other as a foundation for the systems of Freret and Bardetti, who contend for the Celtic origin of the Umbri. Taken in a certain sense, we should consider this ancient authority certainly as curious, and not undeserving of attention; that is, if we refer it to that most distant period, when the name of Gomari, immediately derived from Gomer the son of Japhet, is said to have been applied to the descendants of that patriarch, and especially to that numerous family which was afterwards classed under the denomination of Celts. As the Etruscan name began to assume the ascendency, the Umbrian nation, on the contrary, declined. They were forced to withdraw from the right bank of the Tiber, while nearly the whole of Northern Italy fell under the power of their more enterprising and warlike neighbours: though an ancient Greek historian makes honourable mention of the valour of the Umbri. It was then, probably, that the Tuscans, as we are told, possessed themselves of 300 towns previously occupied by the Umbri. A spirit of rivalry was still kept up however between the two nations; as we are assured by Strabo, that when either made an expedition into a neighbouring district, the other immediately directed its efforts to the same quarter. Both people had, however, soon to contend with a formidable foe in the Gauls who invaded Italy; and after vanquishing and expelling the Tuscans from the Po, penetrated still farther, and drove the Umbri from the shores of the Adriatic into the mountains. These were the Senones, who afterwards defeated the Romans on the banks of Allia, and sacked their city. The Umbri, thus reduced, appear to have offered but little resistance to the Romans; nor is it improbable that this polite people took advantage of their differences with the Etruscans to induce them at least to remain neuter, while they were contending with the latter power. The submission of southern Umbria appears to have taken place A. U. C. 446. The northern and maritime parts were reduced after the total extirpation of the Senones, about twenty-five years afterwards." Cram.

Vŏgēsus mons, a mountain ridge in Gallia, stretching from the country of the Treveri to that of the Lingones, branching off among the Mediomatrici, Leuci, Sequani; and giving rise to the Matrona, Mosa, Mosella, and Arar. The modern name is Vosges, though the whole chain does not retain this appellation, which belongs to the portion separating Lotharingia from Alsatia. Lucan. 1, v. 397.—Cæs. G. 4, c. 10.

Volaterra, a town of Etruria, some distance inland, on the right bank of the river Cæcena. "Its Etruscan name, as it appears on numerous coins, was Velathri. From the monuments alone which have been discovered within its walls and in the immediate vicinity, no small idea is raised of the power, civilization, and taste, of the ancient Etruscans. Its walls were formed, as may yet be seen, of huge massive stones, piled on each other without cement; and their circuit, which is still distinctly marked, embraced a circumference of between three and four miles; and it is supposed that the Tyrrhenian city, of which Aristotle, or the author ed Mirab. (p. 1158) speaks, under the name of Œnarea, is Volterra. In the second Punic war, we find Volaterræ among the other cities of Etruria that were zealous in their offers of naval stores to the Romans. Many years afterwards, Volaterræ sustained a siege which lasted two years against Sylla; the besieged consisting chiefly of persons whom that dictator had proscribed. On its surrender, Italy is said to have enjoyed peace for the first time after so much bloodshed. In one of his letters, Cicero expresses himself in terms of the warmest regard and interest for this city. Finally, we hear of Volaterræ as a colony, somewhat prior to the reign of Augustus." Cram.

VOLCÆ, or VOLGÆ. Two people of Gallia Provincia bore this name. The one surnamed Arecomici, inhabited the part of Narbonensis between the Rhone and the Aude, and the other, called Tectosages, extended from the latter river to the borders of Novem Populana. The capital of the Arecomici was Nemausus, Nimes, and that of the latter was Tolosa, Toulouse, a still more famous city on the Garonne.

VOLSCI, or VOLCI, a people of Latium. "No notice appears to be taken by any Latin writer of the origin of this people. According to Cato, they occupied the country of the Aborigines, and were at one time subject to the Etruscans. The Volsci had a peculiar idiom, distinct from the Oscan and Latin dialects. They used the Latin characters, however, both in their inscriptions and coins. Notwithstanding the small extent of country which they occupied, reaching only from Antium to Tarracina, a line of coast of about fifty miles, and little more than half that distance from the sea to the mountains, it swarmed with cities filled with a hardy race, destined, says the Roman historian, as it were by fortune, to train the Roman soldier to arms, by their perpetual hostility. The Volsci were first attacked by the second Tarquin, and war was carried on afterwards between the two nations, with short intervals, for upwards of two hundred years; and though this account is no doubt greatly exaggerated by Livy, and the numbers much overrated, enough will remain to prove that this part of Italy was at that time far more populous and better cultivated than it is at present." Cram. Their chief cities were Antium, Circeæ, Anxur, Corioli, Fregellæ, Arpinum, &c. Ancus, king of Rome, made war against them, and in the time of the republic they became formidable enemies, till they were at last conquered with the rest of the Latins. Liv. 3 and 4.—Virg. G. 2, v. 168. Æn. 9, v. 505, l. 11, v. 546, &c.—Strab. 5.—Mela, 2, c. 4 and 5.

VOLUBILIS, a town of Africa, supposed Fez, the capital of Morocco. Plin. 5, c. 1.

VOLUMNÆ FANUM, a temple in Etruria, sacred to the goddess Volumna, who presided over the will and over complaisance, where the states of the country used to assemble. Viterbo now stands on the spot. Liv. 4, c. 23, l. 5, c. 17, l. 6, c. 2.

URBA, now Orbe, a town of the Helvetii, on a river of the same name.

URBINUM, now Urbino, a town of Umbria. Plin. 3, c. 14.

UROO, now Gorgona, an island in the bay of Pisa, 25 miles west of Leghorn, famous for anchovies. Plin. 3, c. 6.

USIPĒTES, or USIPII, a people of Germany. Cæs. Bell. G. 4, c. 1, &c.

UTENS, a river of Gaul, now Montone, falling into the Adriatic by Ravenna. Liv. 5, c. 35.

UTICA, now Salcor, a celebrated city of Africa, on the coast of the Mediterranean, on the same bay as Carthage, founded by a Tyrian colony above 287 years before Carthage. It had a large and commodious harbour, and it became the metropolis of Africa after the destruction of Carthage in the third Punic war, and the Romans granted it all the lands situate between Hippo and Carthage. It is celebrated for the death of Cato, who from thence is called Uticensis, or of Utica. Strab. 17.—Lucan. 6, v. 306.—Justin. 18, c. 4.—Plin. 16, c. 40.—Liv. 25, c. 31.—Sil. 3, v. 242.—Horat. 1, ep. 20, v. 513.

VULCĀNI INSULA, or VULCANIA, a name given to the islands between Sicily and Italy, now called Lipari. Virg. Æn. 8, v. 422. They received it because there were the subterraneous fires supposed to be excited by Vulcan, the god of fire.

VULTURNUM, a town of Campania, near the mouth of the Vulturnus. Liv. 25, c. 20.—Plin. 3, c. 5.——Also an ancient name of Capua. Liv. 4, c. 37.

VULTURNUS, a river of Campania, rising in the Appenines, and falling into the Tyrrhene Sea after passing by the town of Capua. Lucret. 5, 664.—Virg. Æn. 7, v. 729.——The god of the Tiber was also known by that name. Varro. de L. L. 4, c. 5.——The wind which received the name of Vulturnus when it blew from the side of the Vulturnus, highly incommoded the Romans at the battle of Cannæ. Liv. 22, c. 43 and 46.

VULSINUM, a town of Etruria, where Sejanus was born.

UXANTIS, now Ushant, an island on the coast of Britany.

UXELLODUNUM, a town of Gaul, defended by steep rocks, now Puech d'Issolu. Cæs. B. G. 8, c. 33.

UXENTUM, a town of Calabria, now Ugento.

X

XANTHI, I. a people of Thrace.——II. The inhabitants of Xanthus in Asia. Vid. Xanthus.

XERA, a town of Spain, now Xerez, where the Moors gained a battle over Roderic, king of the Goths.

XIPHONIA, a promontory of Sicily, at the north of Syracuse, now Cruce. Strab. 6.——Also a town near it, now Augusta.

XOIS, an island formed by the mouths of the Nile. Strab. 17.

XUTHIA, the ancient name of the plains of Leontium in Sicily. Diod. 5.

XYLENOPŌLIS, a town at the mouth of the Indus, built by Alexander, supposed to be Laheri. Plin. 6, c. 23.

Z

ZABATUS, a river of Media, falling into the Tigris, near which the ten thousand Greeks stopped in their return. Xenophon.

Zacynthus. The island of Zacynthus, now called Zante, is situate at the south of Cephalenia, and at the west of the Peloponnesus. It is about 60 miles in circumference. Liv. 26, c. 24.—Plin. 4, c. 12.—Strab. 2 and 8.—Mela, 2, c. 7.—Homer. Od. 1, v. 246, l. 9, v. 24.—Ovid. de Art. Am. 2, v. 432.—Paus. 4, c. 23.—Virg. Æn. 3, v. 270.

Zagrus, a mountain on the confines of Media and Babylonia. Strab. 11.

Zama, or Zagma, I. a town of Numidia, 300 miles from Carthage, celebrated for the victory which Scipio obtained there over the great Annibal, B. C. 202. Metellus besieged it, and was obliged to retire with great loss. After Juba's death it was destroyed by the Romans. Hirt. Af. 91.—C. Nep. in Annib.—Liv. 30, c. 29.—Sallust. de Jug.—Flor. 3, c. 1.—Ital. 3, v. 261.—Strab. 17.——II. A town of Cappadocia.——III. Of Mesopotamia.

Zanclæ, a town of Sicily, or the straits which separate that island from Italy. It received its name from its appearing like a scythe which was called ζαγκλον in the language of the country, or, as others say, because the scythe with which Saturn mutilated his father fell there, or because, as Diodorus reports, a person named Zanclus had either built or exercised its sovereignty. Zancle fell into the hands of the Samians, 497 years before the Christian era, and three years after it was recovered by Anaxilaus, the Messenian tyrant of Rhegium, who gave it the name of his native country, and called it Messana. It was founded, as most chronologists support, about 1058 years before the Christian era, by the pirates of Cumæ in Italy, and peopled by Samians, Ionians, and Chalcidians. Strab. 6.—Diod. 4.—Ital. 1, v. 662.—Ovid. Fast. 4, v. 499. Met. 14, v. 6, l. 15, v. 290.—Paus. 4, c. 23.

Zela, or Zelia, I. a town of Pontus, near the river Lycus, where Cæsar defeated Pharnaces, son of Mithridates. In expressing this victory, the general used the words veni, vidi, vici. Suet. Cæs. 37.—Hirt. Alex. 72.——II. A town of Troas, at the foot of Ida.——III. Another of Lycia.

Zephyrium, I. a promontory of Magna Græcia towards the Ionian Sea, whence, according to some, the Locrians are called Epizephirii. ——II. A town of Cilicia. Liv. 33, c. 20. ——III. A cape of Crete, now San Zuane. ——IV. Of Pontus, &c.

Zephyrum, a promontory in the island of Cyprus, where Venus had a temple built by Ptolemy Philadelphus, whence she was called Zephyria. It was in this temple that Arsinoe made an offering of her hair to the goddess of beauty.

Zerynthus, a town of Samothrace, with a cave sacred to Hecate. The epithet of Zerynthius is applied to Apollo, and also to Venus. Ovid. Trist. 1, el. 9, v. 19.—Liv. 38, c. 41.

Zimara, a town of Armenia Minor, 12 miles from the sources of the Euphrates. Plin. 5, c. 24.

Zingis, a promontory of Æthiopia, near the entrance of the Red Sea, now Cape Orfui.

Zona, a town of Thrace, on the Ægean Sea, where the woods are said to have followed the strains of Orpheus. Mela, 2, c. 2.—Herodot.

Zoroanda, a part of Taurus, between Mesopotamia and Armenia, near which the Tigris flows. Plin. 6, c. 27.

Zuchis, a lake to the east of the Syrtis Minor, with a town of the same name, famous for a purple dye and salt fish. Strab. 17.

PART II.

HISTORY, ANTIQUITIES, &c.

Abantes, a warlike people of Peloponnesus, who built a town in Phocis, called Aba, after their leader Abas, whence also their name originated; they afterwards went to Eubœa. Vid. Abantis. Herodot. 1, c. 146.

Abantias, and Abantiades, a patronymic given to the descendants of Abas, king of Argos, such as Acrisius, Danae, Perseus, Atalanta, &c. Ovid.

Abantidas, made himself master of Sicyon, after he had murdered Clinias, the father of Aratus. He was himself soon after assassinated, B. C. 251. Plut. in Arat.

Abaris. Vid. Part III.

Abarus, an Arabian prince, who perfidiously deserted Crassus in his expedition against Parthia. Appian. in Parth. He is called Mezeres by Flor. 3, c. 11, and Ariamnes by Plut. in Crass.

Abas, I. the 11th king of Argos, son of Belus, some say of Lynceus and Hypermnestra, was famous for his genius and valour. He was father to Prœtus and Acrisius, by Ocalea, and built Abæ. He reigned 23 years, B. C. 1384. Paus. 2, c. 16, l. 10, c. 35.—Hygin. 170, &c. Apollod. 2, c. 2.——II. A soothsayer, to whom the Spartans erected a statue in the temple of Apollo for his services to Lysander. Paus. 10, c. 9.——III. A sophist who wrote two treatises, one on history, the other on rhetoric: the time in which he lived is unknown.——IV. A man who wrote an account of Troy. He is quoted by Servius in Virg. Æn. 9.

Abdalonimus, one of the descendants of the kings of Sidon, so poor, that to maintain himself he worked in a garden. When Alexander took Sidon, he made him king in the room of Strato, the deposed monarch, and enlarged his possessions on account of the great disinterestedness of his conduct. Justin. 11, c. 10.—Curt. 4, c. 1.—Diod. 17.

Abelux, a noble of Saguntum, who favoured the party of the Romans against Carthage. Liv. 22, c. 22.

Abii, a nation between Scythia and Thrace. They lived upon milk, were fond of celibacy, and enemies to war. Homer. Il. 13, v. 6. According to Curt. 7, c. 6, they surrendered to Alexander, after they had been independent since the reign of Cyrus.

Abrocritus, a Bœotian general, killed with a thousand men, in a battle at Chæronea against the Ætolians. Plut. in Arat.

Aborigines, the original inhabitants of Italy; or, according to others, a nation conducted by Saturn into Latium where they taught the use of letters to Evander, the king of the country. Their posterity was called Latini, from Latinus, one of their kings. They assisted Æneas against Turnus. Rome was built in their country. The word signifies without origin, or whose origin is not known, and is generally applied to the original inhabitants of any country. Liv. 1, c. 1, &c.—Dionys. Hal. 1, c. 10.—Justin. 43, c. 1.—Plin. 3, c. 5.—Strab. 5.

Abradates, a king of Susa, who, when his wife Panthea had been taken prisoner by Cyrus, and humanely treated, surrendered himself and his troops to the conqueror. He was killed in the first battle which he undertook in the cause of Cyrus, and his wife stabbed herself on his corpse. Cyrus raised a monument on their tomb. Xenoph. Cyrop. 5, 6, &c.

Abrentius, was made governor of Tarentum by Annibal. He betrayed his trust to the enemy to gain the favours of a beautiful woman, whose brother was in the Roman army. Polyæn. 8.

Abrocomas, son of Darius, was in the army of Xerxes when he invaded Greece. He was killed at Thermopylæ. Herodot. 7, c. 224.—Plut. in Cleom.

Abrodietus, a name given to Parrhasius the painter, on account of the sumptuous manner of his living. Vid. Parrhasius.

Abron, I. an Athenian, who wrote some treatises on the religious festivals and sacrifices of the Greeks. Only the titles of his works are preserved. Suidas.——II. A grammarian of Rhodes, who taught rhetoric at Rome.——III. Another, who wrote a treatise on Theocritus.——IV. A Spartan, son of Lycurgus the orator. Plut. in 10. Orat.——V. A native of Argos, famous for his debauchery.

Abronycus, an Athenian very serviceable to Themistocles in his embassy to Sparta. Thucyd. 1, c. 91.—Herodot. 8, c. 21.

Abrypolis, an ally of Rome, driven from his possessions by Perseus, the last king of Macedonia. Liv. 42, c. 13 and 41.

Abulites, governor of Susa, betrayed his trust to Alexander, and was rewarded with a province. Curt. 5, c. 2.—Diod. 17.

Acamas. Vid. Part III.

Acca Laurentia, I. The Romans yearly celebrated certain festivals, vid. Laurentalia in honour of another prostitute of the same name, which arose from this circumstance: the keeper of the temple of Hercules, one day playing at dice, made the god one of the number, on condition that if Hercules was defeated he should make him a present, but if he conquered, he should be entertained with an elegant feast, and share his bed with a beautiful female. Hercules was victorious, and accordingly Acca was conducted to the bed of Hercules, who in reality came to see her, and told her in the morning to go into the streets, and salute with a kiss the first man she met. This was Tarrutius, an old unmarried man, who, not displeased with Acca's liberty, loved her, and made her the heiress of all his possessions. These, at her death, she gave to the Roman people, whence the honours paid to her memory. Plut. Quæst. Rom. & in Romul.——II. A companion of Camilla. Virg. Æn. 11, v. 820. Vid. Part III.

Accia, or Atia, I. a daughter of Julia and M. Atius Balbus, was the mother of Augustus, and died about 40 years B. C. Dio.—Suet. in Aug. 4.——II. Variola, an illustrious female, whose cause was elegantly pleaded by Pliny. Plin. 6, ep. 33.

Accius, (L.) I. a Roman tragic poet, whose roughness of style Quintilian has imputed to the unpolished age in which he lived. He translated some of the tragedies of Sophocles; but of his numerous pieces only some of the names are known; and among these, his Nuptiæ, Mercator, Neoptolemus, Phœnice, Medea, Atreus, &c. The great marks of honour which he received at Rome, may be collected from this circumstance, that a man was severely reprimanded by a magistrate for mentioning his name without reverence. Some few of his verses are preserved in Cicero and other writers. He died about 180 years B. C. Horat. 2, ep. 1, v. 56.—Ovid. Am. 1, el. 15, v. 19.—Quintil. 10, c. 1.—Cic. ad Att. & in Br. de Orat. 3, c. 16.——II. A famous orator of Pisaurum in Cicero's age.——III. Labeo, a foolish poet mentioned Pers. 1, v. 50.——IV. Tullius, a prince of the Volsci, very inimical to the Romans. Coriolanus, when banished by his countrymen, fled to him, and led his armies against Rome. Liv. 2, c. 37.—Plut. in Coriol.

Acco, a general of the Senones in Gaul. Cæs. Bell. Gall. 6, c. 4 and 44.

Acerătus, a soothsayer, who remained alone at Delphi when the approach of Xerxes frightened away the inhabitants. Herodot. 8, c. 37.

Acerbas, a priest of Hercules at Tyre, who married Dido. Vid. Sichæus. Justin. 18, c. 4.

Acestes, son of Crinisus and Egesta, was king of the country near Drepanum in Sicily. He assisted Priam in the Trojan war, and kindly entertained Æneas during his voyage, and helped him to bury his father on mount Eryx. In commemoration of this, Æneas built a city there, called Acesta, from Acestes. Virg. Æn. 5, v. 746.

Acestodōrus, a Greek historian, who mentions the review which Xerxes made of his forces before the battle of Salamis. Plut. in Them.

Achæi, I. the descendants of Achæus, at first inhabited the country near Argos, but, being driven out by the Heraclidæ 80 years after the Trojan war, they retired among the Ionians, whose twelve cities they seized and kept. The names of these cities are Pelena, Ægira, Æges, Bura, Tritæa, Ægion, Rhypæ, Olenos, Helice, Patræ, Dyme, and Pharæ. The inhabitants of these three last began a famous confederacy, 284 years B. C. which continued formidable upwards of 130 years, under the name of the Achæan league, and was most illustrious whilst supported by the splendid virtues and abilities of Aratus and Philopœmen. Their arms were directed against the Ætolians for three years, with the assistance of Philip of Macedon; and they grew powerful by the accession of neighbouring states, and freed their country from foreign slavery, till at last they were attacked by the Romans, and, after one year's hostilities, the Achæan league was totally destroyed, B. C. 147. The Achæans extended the borders of their country by conquest, and even planted colonies in Magna Græcia.——The name of Achæi is generally applied to all the Greeks indiscriminately by the poets. Vid. Achaia. Herodot. 1, c. 145, l. 8, c. 36.—Strab. Theb. 2, v. 164.—Polyb.—Liv. 1, 27, 32, &c.—Plut. in Philop.—Plin. 4, c. 5.—Ovid. Met. 4, v. 605.—Paus. 7, c. 1, &c.——II. Also a people of Asia, on the borders of the Euxine. Ovid. de. Pont. 4, el. 10, v. 27.

Achæmĕnes, I. a king of Persia, among the progenitors of Cyrus the Great, whose descendants were called Achæmenides, and formed a separate tribe in Persia, of which the kings were members. Cambyses, son of Cyrus, on his death-bed charged his nobles, and particularly the Achæmenides, not to suffer the Medes to recover their former power, and abolish the empire of Persia. Herodot. 1, c. 125, l. 3, c. 65, l. 7, c. 11.—Horat. 2, od. 12, v. 21.——II. A Persian, made governor of Egypt by Xerxes, B. C. 484.

Achæus, I. a king of Lydia, hung by his subjects for his extortion. Ovid. in Ib.——II. A son of Xuthus of Thessaly. He fled, after the accidental murder of a man, to Peloponnesus; where the inhabitants were called from him Achæi. He afterwards returned to Thessaly. Strab. 8.—Paus. 7, c. 1.——III. A tragic poet of Eretria, who wrote 43 tragedies, of which some of the titles are preserved, such as Adrastus, Linus, Cycnus, Eumenides, Philoctetes, Pirithous, Theseus, Œdipus, &c.; of these only one obtained the prize. He lived some time after Sophocles.——IV. Another of Syracuse, author of ten tragedies.——V. A relation of Antiochus the Great, appointed governor of all the king's provinces beyond Taurus. He aspired to sovereign power, which he disputed for 8 years with Antiochus, and was at last betrayed by a Cretan. His limbs were cut off, and his body, sewed in the skin of an ass, was exposed on a gibbet. Polyb. 8.

Achaicum bellum. Vid. Achæi.

Achātes, a friend of Æneas, whose fidelity was so exemplary, that Fidus Achates became a proverb. Virg. Æn. 1, v. 316;

Achillas, a general of Ptolemy, who murdered Pompey the Great. Plut. in Pomp.—Lucan. 8, v. 538.

Achilleus, or Aquileus, a Roman general in Egypt, in the reign of Dioclesian, who rebelled, and for five years maintained the imperial dignity at Alexandria. Dioclesian at last marched against him; and because he had supported a long siege, the emperor ordered him to be devoured by lions.

Achillēis, a poem of Statius, in which he describes the education and memorable actions of Achilles. This composition is imperfect. The poet's immature death deprived the world of a valuable history of the life and exploits of this famous hero. Vid. Statius.

Achilles, I. the son of Peleus and Thetis, was the bravest of all the Greeks in the Trojan war. During his infancy, Thetis plunged him in the Styx, and made every part of his body invulnerable, except the heel by which she held him. His education was intrusted to the centaur Chiron, who taught him the art of war, and made him master of music; and by feeding him with the marrow of wild beasts, rendered him vigorous and active. He was taught eloquence by Phœnix, whom he ever after loved and respected. Thetis to prevent him from going to the Trojan war, where she knew he was to perish, privately sent him to the court of Lycomedes, where he was disguised in a female dress, and, by his familiarity with the king's daughters made Deidamia mother of Neoptolemus. As Troy could not be taken without the aid of Achilles, Ulysses went to the court of Lycomedes in the habit of a merchant, and exposed jewels and arms to sale. Achilles, choosing the arms, discovered his sex and went to the war. Vulcan, at the entreaties of Thetis, made him a strong suit of armour, which was proof against all weapons. He was deprived by Agamemnon of his favourite mistress, Briseis, who had fallen to his lot at the division of the booty of Lyrnessus. For this affront he refused to appear in the field till the death of his friend Patroclus recalled him to action and to revenge. Vid. Patroclus. He slew Hector, the bulwark of Troy, tied the corpse by the heels to his chariot, and dragged it three times round the walls of Troy. After thus appeasing the shades of his friend, he yielded to the tears and entreaties of Priam, and permitted the aged father to ransom and carry away Hector's body. In the 10th year of the war, Achilles, was charmed with Polyexena; and as he solicited her hand in the temple of Minerva, it is said that Paris aimed an arrow at his vulnerable heel, of which wound he died. His body was buried at Sigæum, and divine honours were paid to him, and temples raised to his memory. The Thessalians yearly sacrificed a black and a white bull on his tomb. It is reported that he married Helen after the siege of Troy; but others maintain that this marriage happened after his death, in the island of Leuce, where many of the ancient heroes lived as in a separate elysium. Vid. Leuce. When Achilles was young, his mother asked him whether he preferred a long life, spent in obscurity and retirement, or a few years of military fame and glory: and that to his honour, he made choice of the latter. *Xenoph. de venat.—Plut. in Alex.—De facie in Orbe Lun. He wrote a mixed history of great men, a treatise on the sphere, tactics, a romance on the loves of Clitophon and Leucippe, &c. Some manuscripts of his works are preserved in the Vatican and Palatinate libraries. The best edition of his works is that in 12mo. L. Bat. 1640.

Achivi, the name of the inhabitants of Argos and Lacedæmon before the return of the Heraclidæ, by whom they were expelled from their possessions 80 years after the Trojan war. Being without a home, they drove the Ionians from Ægialus, seized their twelve cities, and called the country Achaia. The Ionians were received by the Athenians. The appellation of Achivi is indiscriminately applied by the ancient poets to all the Greeks. Paus. 7, c. 1, &c. Vid. Achaia.

Achladæus, a Corinthian general, killed by Aristomenes. Paus. 4, c. 19.

Acichōrius, a general with Brennus, in the expedition which the Gauls undertook against Pæonia. Paus. 10, c. 10.

Acilia, I. a plebeian family at Rome, which traced its pedigree up to the Trojans.——II. The mother of Lucan.

Acilia Lex, was enacted A.U.C. 556, by Acilius the tribune for the plantation of five colonies in Italy. Liv. 32, c. 29.——Another, called also Calpurnia, A. U. C. 684, concerning such as were guilty of extortion in the provinces.

Acilius Balbus, (M.) I. was consul with Portius Cato, A. U. C. 640. Plin. 2, c. 56.—— II. Glabrio, a tribune of the people, who with a legion quelled the insurgent slaves in Etruria. Being consul with P. Corn. Scipio Nasica, A. U. C. 563, he conquered Antiochus at Thermopylæ, for which he obtained a triumph, and three days were appointed for public thanksgiving. He stood for the censorship against Cato, but desisted on account of the false measures used by his competitor. Justin. 31, c. 6. —Liv. 30, c. 40, l. 31, c. 50, l. 35, c. 10, &c. ——III. The son of the preceding erected a temple to Piety, which his father had vowed to this goddess when fighting against Antiochus. He raised a golden statue to his father, the first that appeared in Italy. The temple of Piety was built on the spot where once a woman had fed with her milk her aged father, whom the senate had imprisoned and excluded from all aliment. Val. Max. 2, c. 5.——IV. A man accused of extortion, and twice defended by Cicero. He was proconsul of Sicily, and lieutenant to Cæsar in the civil wars. Cæs. Bell. Civ. 3, c. 15.——V. A consul, whose son was killed by Domitian because he fought with wild beasts. The true cause of this murder was, that young Glabric was stronger than the emperor and therefore envied. Juv. 4, v. 94.

Acrisius. Vid. Part III.

Acron, I. a king of Cenina, killed by Romulus in single combat, after the rape of the Sabines. His spoils were dedicated to Jupiter. Feretrius. Plut. in Romul.——II. A physician of Agrigentum, B. C. 439, educated at Athens with Empedocles. He wrote physical treatises in the Doric dialect, and cured the Athenians of a plague, by lighting fire near the houses of the infected. Plin. 29, c. 1.—Plut. in Isid.

Acropatos, one of Alexander's officers, who obtained part of Media after the king's death. Justin. 13, c. 4.

Acrotatus, I. a son of Cleomenes, king of Sparta, died before his father, leaving a son called Areus. Paus. 1, c. 13, l. 3, c. 6.——II. A son of Areus, who was greatly loved by Chelidonis, wife of Cleonymus. This amour displeased her husband, who called Pyrrhus the Epirot to avenge his wrongs. When Sparta was besieged by Pyrrhus, Acrotatus was seen bravely fighting in the middle of the enemy, and commended by the multitude, who congratulated Chelidonis on being mistress to such a warlike lover. Plut. in Pyrrh.

Actia, I. the mother of Augustus.——II. Games sacred to Apollo, in commemoration of the victory of Augustus over M. Antony at Actium. They were celebrated every third, sometimes fifth year, with great pomp, and the Lacedæmonians had the care of them. Plut in Anton.—Strab. 7.—Virg. Æn. 3, v. 280, l. 8, v. 675.——III. Aculeo, C. a Roman lawyer, celebrated as much for the extent of his understanding as for his knowledge of law. He was uncle to Cicero. Cic. in Orat. 1, c. 43.

Acusilaus, I. an historian of Argos, often quoted by Josephus. He wrote on genealogies in a style simple and destitute of all ornament. Cic. de Orat. 2, c. 29.—Suidas.——II. An Athenian who taught rhetoric at Rome under Galba.

Acuticus, M. an ancient comic writer, whose plays were known under the name of Leones, Gemini, Anus, Bœotia, &c.

Ada, a sister of queen Artemisia, who married Hidricus. After her husband's death she succeeded to the throne of Caria; but being expelled by her younger brother, she retired to Alindæ, which she delivered to Alexander after adopting him as her son. Curt. 2, c. 8.—Strab. 14.

Adæus, a native of Mitylene, who wrote a Greek treatise on statuaries. Athen. 13.

Adelphius, a friend of M. Antonius, whom he accompanied in his expedition into Parthia, of which he wrote the history. Strab. 11.

Adgandestrius, a prince of Gaul, who sent to Rome for poison to destroy Arminius, and was answered by the senate, that the Romans fought their enemies openly, and never used perfidious measures. Tac. An. 2, c. 88.

Adherbal, a son of Micipsa, and grandson of Masinissa, was besieged at Cirta, and put to death by Jugurtha, after vainly imploring the aid of Rome, B. C. 112. Sallust. in Jug.

Adiatorix, a governor of Galatia, who, to gain Antony's favour, slaughtered, in one night, all the inhabitants of the Roman colony of Heraclea in Pontus. He was taken at Actium, led in triumph by Augustus, and strangled in prison. Strab. 12.

Adimantus, I. a commander of the Athenian fleet, taken by the Spartans. All the men of the fleet were put to death, except Adimantus, because he had opposed the designs of his countrymen, who intended to mutilate all the Spartans. Xenoph. Hist. Græc. Pausanias says, 4, c. 17, l. 10, c. 9, that the Spartans had bribed him.——II. A brother of Plato. Laert. 3.——III. A Corinthian general, who reproached Themistocles with his exile.

Admetus. Vid. Part. III.

Adrastus, I. son of Talaus and Lysimache, was king of Argos. Polynices, being banished from Thebes by his brother Eteocles, fled to Argos, where he married Argia, daughter of Adrastus. The king assisted his son-in-law, and marched against Thebes with an army headed by seven of his most famous generals. All perished in the war except Adrastus, who, with a few men saved from slaughter, fled to Athens, and implored the aid of Theseus against the Thebans, who opposed the burying of the Argives slain in battle. Theseus went to his assistance, and was victorious. Adrastus, after a long reign, died through grief, occasioned by the death of his son Ægialeus. A temple was raised to his memory at Sicyon, where a solemn festival was annually celebrated. Homer. Il. 5.—Virg. Æn. 6, v. 480.—Apollod. 1, c. 9, l. 3, c. 7.—*Stat. It is supposed that a copy of his treatise on harmonics is preserved in the Vatican——III. A Phrygian prince, who, having inadvertently killed his brother, fled to Crœsus, where he was humanely received, and intrusted with the care of his son Atys. In hunting a wild boar, Adrastus slew the young prince, and in his despair killed himself on his grave. Herodot. 1, c. 35, &c.

Adrianus, or Hadrianus, I. the 15th emperor of Rome. He is represented as an active, learned, warlike, and austere general. He came to Britain, where he built a wall between the modern towns of Carlisle and Newcastle, 80 miles long to protect the Britons from the incursions of the Caledonians. He killed in battle 500,000 Jews who had rebelled, and built a city on the ruins of Jerusalem, which he called Ælia. His memory was so retentive, that he remembered every incident of his life, and knew all the soldiers of his army by name. He was the first emperor who wore a long beard, and this he did to hide the warts on his face. His successors followed his example, not through necessity, but for ornament. Adrian went always bareheaded, and in long marches generally travelled on foot. In the beginning of his reign he followed the virtues of his adopted father and predecessor Trajan; he remitted all arrears due to his treasury for 16 years, and publicly burnt the account-books, that his word might not be suspected. His peace with the Parthians proceeded from a wish of punishing the other enemies of Rome, more than from the effects of fear. The travels of Adrian were not for the display of imperial pride, but to see whether justice was distributed impartially; and public favour was courted by condescending behaviour, and the meaner familiarity of bathing with the common people. It is stated that he wished to enrol Christ among the gods of Rome; but his apparent lenity towards the Christians was disproved, by the erection of a statue to Jupiter on the spot where Jesus rose from the dead, and one to Venus on mount Calvary. The weight of diseases became intolerable. Adrian attempted to destroy himself, and when prevented, he exclaimed, that the lives of others were in his hands, but not his own. He wrote an account of his life, and published it under the name of one of his domestics. He died of a dysentery at Baiæ, July 10, A. D. 138, in the 72d year of his age, after a reign of 21 years. Dio.——II. A rhetorician of Tyre in the age of M. Antonius, who wrote seven books of metamorphoses, besides other treatises now lost.

Æacĭdas, a king of Epirus, son of Neoptolemus, and brother to Olympias. He was expelled by his subjects for his continual wars with Macedonia. He left a son, Pyrrhus, only two years old, whom Chaucus, king of Illyricum, educated. Paus. 1, c. 11.

Æăcus. Vid. Part III.

Æantĭdes, I. a tyrant of Lampsacus, intimate with Darius. He married a daughter of Hippias, tyrant of Athens. Thucyd. 6, c. 59.——II. One of the 7 poets called Pleiades.

Æĭtus, son of Philip, and brother of Polyclea, was descended from Hercules. An oracle having said that whoever of the two touched the land after crossing the Achelous should obtain the kingdom, Polyclea pretended to be lame, and prevailed upon her brother to carry her across on his shoulders. When they came near the opposite side, Polyclea leaped ashore from her brother's back, exclaiming that the kingdom was her own. Æatus joined her in her exclamation, and afterwards married her, and reigned conjointly with her. Their son Thessalus gave his name to Thessaly. Polyæn. 8.

Ædicŭla Ridiculi, a temple raised to the god of mirth from the following circumstance: after the battle of Cannæ, Hannibal marched to Rome, whence he was driven back by the inclemency of the weather; which caused so much joy in Rome, that the Romans raised a temple to the god of mirth. This deity was worshipped at Sparta. Plut. in Lyc. Agid. & Cleom. Pausanias also mentions a θεος γελωτος.

Ædiles, Roman magistrates that had the care of all buildings, baths, and aqueducts, and examined the weights and measures, that nothing might be sold without its due value. There were three different sorts: the Ædiles Plebeii, or Minores; the Majores Ædiles, and the Ædiles Cereales. The plebeian ediles were two, first created with the tribunes; they presided over the more minute affairs of the state, good order and the reparation of the streets. They procured all the provisions of the city, and executed the decrees of the people. The Majores and Cereales had greater privileges, though they at first shared in the labour of the plebeian ediles; they appeared with more pomp, and were allowed to sit publicly in ivory chairs. The office of an edile was honourable, and was always the primary step to greater honours in the republic. The ediles were chosen from the plebeians for 127 years, till A. U. C. 338. Varro de L. L. 4, c. 14.—Cic. Legib. 3.

Ædĭtuus, Val., a Roman poet before the age of Cicero, successful in amorous poetry and epigrams.

Ædui, or Hedui, a powerful nation of Celtic Gaul, known for their valour in the wars of Cæsar. When their country was invaded by this celebrated general, they were at the head of a faction in opposition to the Sequani and their partisans, and they had established their superiority in frequent battles. To support their cause, however, the Sequani obtained the assistance of Ariovistus, king of Germany, and soon defeated their opponents. The arrival of Cæsar changed the face of affairs, the Ædui were restored to the sovereignty of the country, and the artful Roman, by employing one faction against the other, was enabled to conquer them all, though the insurrection of Ambiorix, and that more powerfully supported by Vercingetorix, shook for a while the dominion of Rome in Gaul, and checked the career of the conqueror. Cæs. in Bell. G.

Ægeus. Vid. Part III.

Ægĭle, a daughter of Adrastus and wife of Diomedes.

Ægialeus. Vid. Part III.

Ægĭalus, I. son of Phoroneus, was intrusted with the kingdom of Achaia by king Apis going to Egypt. Peloponnesus was called Ægialea from him.——II. A man who founded the kingdom of Sicyon, 2091 years before the Christian era, and reigned 52 years.

Æginēta Paulus, a physician born in Ægina. He flourished in the 3d, or, according to others, the 7th century, and first deserved to be called man-midwife. He wrote De Re Medica, in seven books.

Ægĭnētes, a king of Arcadia, in whose age Lycurgus instituted his famous laws. Paus. 1, c. 5.

Ægisthus, king of Argos, was son of Thyestes by his daughter Pelopea. Thyestes being at variance with his brother Atreus, was told by the oracle, that his wrongs could be revenged only by a son born of himself and his daughter. To avoid such an incest, Pelopea had been consecrated to the service of Minerva by her father, who, some time after, met her in a wood, and ravished her without knowing who she was. Pelopea kept the sword of her ravisher, and finding it to be her father's, exposed the child she had brought forth. The child was preserved, and, when grown up, presented with the sword of his mother's ravisher. Pelopea, soon after this melancholy adventure, had married her uncle Atreus, who received into his house her natural son. As Thyestes had debauched the first wife of Atreus, Atreus sent Ægisthus to put him to death; but Thyestes, knowing the assassin's sword, discovered that he was his own son, and, fully to revenge his wrongs, sent him back to murder Atreus. After this murder, Thyestes ascended the throne, and banished Agamemnon and Menelaus, the sons, or as others say, the grandsons of Atreus. These children fled to Polyphidus of Sicyon; but as he dreaded the power of their persecutors, he remitted the protection of them to Œneus, king of Ætolia. By their marriage with the daughters of Tyndarus, king of Sparta, they were empowered to recover the kingdom of Argos, to which Agamemnon succeeded, while Menelaus reigned in his father-in-law's place. Ægisthus had been reconciled to the sons of Atreus; and when they went to the Trojan war, he was left guardian of Agamemnon's kingdoms, and of his wife Clytemnestra. Ægisthus fell in love with Clytemnestra, and lived with her. On Agamemnon's return, these two adulterers murdered him, and by a public marriage strengthened themselves on the throne of Argos. Orestes, Agamemnon's son, would have shared his father's fate, had not his sister Electra privately sent him to his uncle Strophius, king of Phocis, where he contracted the most intimate friendship with his cousin Pylades. Some time after Orestes came to Mycenæ, the residence of Ægisthus, and resolved to punish the murderers of his father, in conjunction with Electra, who lived in disguise in the tyrant's family. To effect this more effectually, Electra publicly declared that her brother Orestes was dead: upon which Ægisthus and Clytemnestra went to the temple of Apollo to return thanks to the god for his death. Orestes, who had secretly concealed himself in the temple, attacked them, and put them both to death, after a reign of seven years. They were buried without the city walls. *Vid. Cæsar Ægisthus, on account of his adultery with his wife Mutia, whom he repudiated after she had borne him three children. Suet. in Cæs. 50.

ÆGLES, a Samian wrestler, born dumb, seeing some unlawful measures pursued in a contest, he broke the string which held his tongue, through the desire of speaking, and ever after spoke with ease. Val. Max. 1, c. 8.

ÆLIA LEX, enacted by Ælius Tubero the tribune, A. U. C. 559, to send two colonies into the country of the Brutii. Liv. 34, c. 53.——Another, A. U. C. 568, ordaining, that, in public affairs, the augurs should observe the appearance of the sky, and the magistrates be empowered to postpone the business.——Another, called Ælia Sexta, by Ælius Sextus, A. U. C. 756, which enacted that all slaves who bore any marks of punishment received from their masters, or who had been imprisoned, should be set at liberty, but not rank as Roman citizens.

ÆLIA PETINA, of the family of Tubero, married Claudius Cæsar, by whom she had a son. The emperor divorced her, to marry Messalina. Sueton. in Claud. 26.

ÆLIANUS CLAUDIUS, a Roman sophist of Præneste, in the reign of Adrian. He first taught rhetoric at Rome; but being disgusted with his profession, he became author, and published treatises on animals in 17 books, on various history in 14 books, &c. in Greek, a language which he preferred to Latin. In his writings he shows himself very fond of the marvellous, and relates many stories which are often devoid of elegance and purity of style; though Philostratus has commended his language as superior to what could be expected from a person who was neither born nor educated in Greece. Ælian died in the 60th year of his age, A. D. 140. The best editions of his works collected together are that of Conrad Gesner, folio, printed Tiguri, 1556, though now seldom to be met with, and that of Kuenius, 2 vols. 8vo. Lips. 1789. Some attribute the treatise on the tactics of the Greeks to another Ælian.

ÆLIUS, and ÆLIA, a family in Rome, so poor that 16 lived in a small house, and were maintained by the produce of a little field. Their poverty continued till Paulus conquered Perseus king of Macedonia, and gave his son-in-law Æl. Tubero five pounds of gold from the booty. Val. Max. 4, c. 4.

ÆLIUS ADRIANUS, I. an African, grandfather to the emperor Adrian.——II. Gallus, a Roman knight, the first who invaded Arabia Felix. He was very intimate with Strabo the geographer, and sailed on the Nile with him to take a view of the country. Plin. 6, c. 28.——III. Publius, one of the first questors chosen from the plebeians at Rome. Liv. 4, c. 54.——IV. Q. Æ. Pætus, son of Sextus or Publius. As he sat in the senate-house, a woodpecker perched upon his head; upon which a soothsayer exclaimed, that if he preserved the bird his house would flourish and Rome decay; and if he killed it, the contrary must happen. Hearing this, Ælius, in the presence of the senate, bit off the head of the bird. All the youths of his family were killed at Cannæ, and the Roman arms were soon attended with success Val. Max. 5, c. 6.——V. Saturninus, a satirist, thrown down from the Tarpeian rock for writing verses against Tiberius.——VI. Sejanus. (Vid. Sejanus.)——VII. Sextus Catus, censor with M. Cethegus. He separated the senators from the people in the public spectacles. During his consulship the ambassadors of the Ætolians found him feasting in earthen dishes, and offered him silver vessels, which he refused, satisfied with the earthen cups, &c. which, for his virtues, he had received from his father-in-law, L. Paulus, after the conquest of Macedonia. Plin. 33, c. 11.—Cic. de Orat. 1.——VIII. Spartianus, wrote the lives of the emperors Adrian, Antoninus Pius, and M. Aurelius. He flourished A. D. 240.——IX. Tubero, grandson of L. Paulus, was austere in his morals, and a formidable enemy to the Gracchi. His grandson was accused before Cæsar, and ably defended by Cicero. Cic. ep. ad Brut.——X. Verus Cæsar, the name of L. C. Commodus Verus after Adrian had adopted him. He was made prætor, and consul by the emperor, who was soon convinced of his incapacity in the discharge of public duty. He killed himself by drinking an antidote, and Antoninus, surnamed Pius, was adopted in his place. Ælius was father to Antoninus Verus, whom Pius adopted.——XI. A physician mentioned by Galen.——XII. L. Gallus, a lawyer, who wrote 12 books concerning the signification of all law words.——XIII. Sextus Pætus, a lawyer, consul at Rome A. U. C. 566. He is greatly commended by Cicero for his learning, and called cordatus homo by Ennius for his knowledge of law. Cic. de Orat. 1, c. 48, in Brut. 20.——XIV. Stilo, a native of Lanuvium, master to N. Ter. Varro, and author of some treatises.——XV. Lamia. Vid. Lamia.

ÆMILIA LEX, was enacted by the dictator Æmilius, A. U. C. 309. It ordained that the censorship, which was before quinquennial, should be limited to one year and a half. Liv. 9, c. 33.——Another, in the second consulship of Æmilius Mamercus, A. U. C. 391. It gave power to the eldest prætor to drive a nail in the capitol on the ides of September. Liv. 7, c. 3.—The driving of a nail was a superstitious ceremony, by which the Romans supposed that a pestilence could be stopped, or an impending calamity averted.

ÆMILIÂNUS, (C. Julius,) I. a native of Mauretania, proclaimed emperor after the death of Decius. He marched against Gallus and Valerian, but was informed they had been murdered by their own troops. He soon after shared their fate.——II. one of the thirty tyrants who rebelled in the reign of Gallienus.

ÆMYLIA, I. a noble family in Rome, descended from Mamercus, son of Pythagoras, who for his humanity was called Αἱμύλος blandus.——II. a vestal, who rekindled the fire of Vesta, which was extinguished by putting her veil over it. Val. Max. 1, c. 1.—Dionys. Hal. 2.——III. The wife of Africanus the elder, famous for her behaviour to her husband when suspected of infidelity. Val. Max. 6, c. 7.——IV. Lepida, daughter of Lepidus, married Drusus the younger, whom she disgraced by her wantonness. She killed herself when accused of adultery with a slave. Tacit. 6, c. 40.

ÆMYLIÂNUS, a name of Africanus the younger, son of P. Æmylius. In him the families of the Scipios and Æmylii were united. Many of that family bore the same name. Juv. 8, v. 2.

ÆMYLII, a noble family in Rome, descended from Æmylius the son of Ascanius. Plutarch says that they are descended from Mamercus, the son of Pythagoras, surnamed Æmylius from the sweetness of his voice, in Num. and Æmyl.—The family was distinguished in the various branches of the Lepidi, Mamerci, Mamercini, Barbulæ, Pauli, and Scauri.

ÆMYLIUS, I. (Censor nus,) a cruel tyrant of Sicily, who liberally rewarded those who invented new ways of torturing. Paterculus gave him a brazen horse for this purpose, and the tyrant made the first experiment upon the donor. Plut. de Fort. Rom.——II. A triumvir with Octavius. Vid. Lepidus.——III. Macer, a poet of Verona in the Augustan age. He wrote some poems upon serpents, birds, and, as some suppose, on bees. Vid. Macer.——IV. Marcus Scaurus, a Roman who flourished about 100 years B. C. and wrote three books concerning his own life. Cic. in Brut.——V. A poet in the age of Tiberius, who wrote a tragedy called Atheus, and destroyed himself.——VI. Sura, another writer on the Roman year.——VII. Mamercus, three times dictator, conquered the Fidenates and took their city. He limited to one year and a half the censorship, which before his time was exercised during five years. Liv. 4, c. 17, 19, &c.——VIII. Papinianus, son of Hostilius Papinianus, was in favour with the emperor Severus, and was made governor to his sons Geta and Caracalla. Geta was killed by his brother, and Papinianus for upbraiding him, was murdered by his soldiers. From his school the Romans have had many able lawyers, who were called Papinianists.——IX. Pappus, a censor, who banished from the senate P. Corn. Ruffinus, who had been twice consul, because he had at his table ten pounds of silver plate, A. U. C. 478. Liv. 14.——X. Porcina, an elegant orator. Cic. in Brut.——XI. Regillus, conquered the general of Antiochus at sea, and obtained a naval triumph. Liv. 37, c. 31.——XII. Scaurus, a noble but poor citizen of Rome. His father, to maintain himself, was a coal-merchant. He was edile and afterwards prætor, and fought against Jugurtha. His son Marcus was son-in-law to Sylla, and in his edileship he built a very magnificent theatre. Plin. 36, c. 15.

ÆNÉADÆ, a name given to the friends and companions of Æneas, by Virg. Æn. 1, v. 161.

ÆNÉAS, I. a Trojan prince, son of Anchises and the goddess Venus. The opinions of authors concerning his character are different. His infancy was intrusted to the care of a nymph, and at the age of 5 he was recalled to Troy. He afterwards improved himself in Thessaly under Chiron. Soon after his return home he married Creusa, Priam's daughter, by whom he had a son called Ascanius. During the Trojan war he behaved with great valour in defence of his country, and came to an engagement with Diomedes and Achilles. Yet Strabo, Dictys of Crete, Dionysius of Halicarnassus, and Dares of Phrygia, accuse him of betraying his country to the Greeks, with Antenor, and of preserving his life and fortune by this treacherous measure. He lived at variance with Priam, because he received not sufficient marks of distinction from the king and his family, as Homer, Il. 13 says. This might have provoked him to seek revenge by perfidy. Authors of credit report, that when Troy was in flames he carried away, upon his shoulders, his father Anchises, and the statues of his household gods, leading in his hand his son Ascanius, and leaving his wife to follow behind. Some say that he retired to mount Ida, where he built a fleet of 20 ships, and set sail in quest of a settlement. Strabo and others maintain that Æneas never left his country, but rebuilt Troy, where he reigned, and his posterity after him. Even Homer says, Il. 20, v. 30, &c. that the gods destined Æneas and his posterity to reign over the Trojans. This passage Dionys. Hal. explained, by saying that Homer meant the Trojans who had gone over to Italy with Æneas, and not the actual inhabitants of Troy.

According to Virgil and other Latin authors, he with his fleet first came to the Thracian Chersonesus, where Polymnestor, one of his allies reigned. After visiting Delos, the Strophades, and Crete, he landed in Epirus and Drepanum, the court of king Acestes in Sicily, where he buried his father. From Sicily he sailed for Italy, but was driven on the coasts of Africa, and kindly received by Dido, queen of Carthage. Dido, being enamoured of him, wished to marry him; but he left Carthage by order of the gods. In his voyage he was driven to Sicily, and from thence he passed to Cumæ, where the Sybil conducted him to hell, that he might hear from his father the fates which attended him and all his posterity. After a voyage of seven years, and the loss of 13 ships, he came to the Tiber: Latinus, the king of the country, received him with hospitality, and promised him his daughter Lavinia, who had been before betrothed to king Turnus by her mother Amata. To prevent this marriage, Turnus made war against Æneas; and after many battles the war was decided by a combat between the two rivals, in which Turnus was killed. Æneas married Lavinia, in whose honour he built the town of Lavinium, and succeeded his father-in-law. After a short reign, Æneas was killed in a battle against the Etrurians. Some say that he was drowned in the Numicus, and his body weighed down by his armour; upon which the Latins, not finding their king, supposed that he had been taken up to heaven, and therefore offered him sacrifices as to a god. Dionys. Hal. fixes the arrival of Æneas in Italy in the 54th olymp. Some authors suppose that Æneas, after the siege of Troy, fell to the share of Neoptolemus, together with Andromache, and that he was carried to Thessaly, whence he escaped to Italy. Others say that after he had come to Italy, he returned to Troy, leaving Ascanius king of Latium. Æneas has been praised for his piety and submission to the will of the gods. *Homer. A son of Æneas and Lavinia, called Sylvius, because his mother retired with him into the woods after his father's death. He succeeded Ascanius in Latium, though opposed by Julius, the son of his predecessor. Virg. Æn. 6, v. 770.—Liv. 1, c. 3.——III. An ancient author who wrote on tactics, besides other treatises, which, according to Ælian, were epitomized by Cineas, the friend of Pyrrhus.——IV. A native of Gaza, who, from a platonic philosopher became a Christian, A. D. 485, and wrote a dialogue, called Theophrastus, on the immortality of the soul and the resurrection.

Æneis, a poem of Virgil, which has for its subject the settlement of Æneas in Italy. The great merit of this poem is well known. The author has imitated Homer, and, as some say, Homer is superior to him only because he is more ancient, and is an original. Virgil died before he had corrected it, and at his death desired it might be burnt. This was happily disobeyed, and Augustus saved from the flames a poem which proved his family to be descended from the kings of Troy. The Æneid had engaged the attention of the poet for 11 years, and in the first six books it seems that it was Virgil's design to imitate Homer's Odyssey, and in the last the Iliad. The action of the poet comprehends eight years, one of which only, the last, is really taken up by action, as the seven first are merely episodes, such as Juno's attempts to destroy the Trojans, the loves of Æneas and Dido, the relation of the fall of Troy, &c. In the first book of the Æneid, the hero is introduced, in the seventh year of his expedition, sailing in the Mediterranean, and shipwrecked on the African coast, where he is received by Dido. In the second, Æneas, at the desire of the Phœnician queen, relates the fall of Troy and his flight through the general conflagration to mount Ida. In the third, the hero continues his narration, by a minute account of his voyage through the Cyclades, the places where he landed, and the dreadful storm, with the description of which the poem opened. Dido, in the fourth book, makes public her partiality to Æneas, which is slighted by the sailing of the Trojans from Carthage, and the book closes with the suicide of the disappointed queen. In the fifth book, Æneas sails to Sicily, where he celebrates the anniversary of his father's death, and thence pursues his voyage to Italy. In the sixth, he visits the Elysian fields, and learns from his father the fate which attends him and his descendants the Romans. In the seventh book, the hero reaches the destined land of Latium, and concludes a treaty with the king of the country, which is soon broken by the interference of Juno, who stimulates Turnus to war. The auxiliaries of the enemy are enumerated; and in the eighth book, Æneas is assisted by Evander, and receives from Venus a shield wrought by Vulcan, on which are represented the future glory and triumphs of the Roman nation. The reader is pleased in the ninth book with the account of battles between the rival armies, and the immortal friendship of Nisus and Euryalus. Jupiter, in the tenth, attempts a reconciliation between Venus and Juno, who patronised the opposite parties; the fight is renewed, Pallas killed, and Turnus saved from the avenging hand of Æneas by the interposition of Juno. The eleventh book gives an account of the funeral of Pallas, and of the meditated reconciliation between Æneas and Latinus, which the sudden appearance of the enemy defeats. Camilla is slain, and the combatants separated by the night. In the last book Juno prevents the single combat agreed upon by Turnus and Æneas. The Trojans are defeated in the absence of their king; but, on the return of Æneas, the battle assumes a different turn, a single combat is fought by the rival leaders, and the poem is concluded by the death of king Turnus. Plin. 7, c. 30, &c.

Ænesidēmus, I. a brave general of Argos. Liv. 32, c. 25.——II. A Cretan philosopher, who wrote 8 books on the doctrine of his master Pyrrho. Diog. in Pyr.

Ænobarbus, or Ahenobarbus, the surname of Domitius. When Castor and Pollux acquainted him with a victory, he discredited them; upon which they touched his chin and beard, which instantly became of a brazen colour whence the surname given to himself and his descendants.

ÆPŪLO, a general of the Istrians, who drank to excess after he had stormed the camp of A. Manlius, the Roman general. Being attacked by a soldier, he fled to a neighbouring town which the Romans took, and killed himself for fear of being taken. Flor. 2, c. 10.

ÆPŸTUS, I. a king of Mycenæ, son of Cresphontes and Merope, was educated in Arcadia with Cypselus, his mother's father. To recover his kingdom, he killed Polyphontes, who had married his mother against her will, and usurped the crown. Apollod. 2, c. 6.—Paus. 4, c. 8.——II. A son of Hyppothous, who forcibly entered the temple of Neptune, near Mantinea, and was struck blind by the sudden eruption of salt water from the altar. He was killed by a serpent in hunting. Paus. 8, c. 4 and 5.

ÆRŌPE, I. wife of Atreus.——II. A daughter of Cepheus.

ÆSCHINES, I. an Athenian orator, who flourished about 342 B. C. and distinguished himself by his rivalship with Demosthenes. His father's name was Atrometus, and he boasted of his descent from a noble family, though Demosthenes reproached him as being the son of a courtesan. The first open signs of enmity between the rival orators appeared at the court of Philip, where they were sent as ambassadors; but the character of Æschines was tarnished by the acceptance of a bribe from the Macedonian prince, whose tyranny had hitherto been the general subject of his declamation. When the Athenians wished to reward the patriotic labours of Demosthenes with a golden crown, Æschines impeached Ctesiphon, who proposed it: and to their subsequent dispute we are indebted for the two celebrated orations de coronâ. Æschines was defeated by his rival's superior eloquence, and banished to Rhodes; but as he retired from Athens, Demosthenes ran after him, and nobly forced him to accept a present of silver. In his banishment the orator repeated to the Rhodians what he had delivered against Demosthenes; and after receiving much applause, he was desired to read the answer of his antagonist. It was received with great marks of approbation; but, exclaimed Æschines, how much more would your admiration have been raised, had you heard Demosthenes himself speak it! Æschines died in the 75th year of his age, at Rhodes, or, as some suppose, at Samos. He wrote three orations and nine epistles, which, from their number, received the name, the first of the graces, and the last of the muses. The orations alone are extant, generally found collected with those of Lysias. An oration, which bears the name of Deliaca lex, is said not to be his production, but that of Æschines, another orator of that age. Cic. de Orat. 1, c. 24, l. 2, c. 53, in Brut. c. 17.—Plut. in Demosth.—Diog. 2 and 3.—Plin. 7, c. 30. Diogenes mentions seven more of the same name. ——II. A philosopher, disciple of Socrates, who wrote several dialogues, some of which bore the following titles: Aspasia, Phædon, Alcibiades, Draco, Erycia, Polyænus, Telauges, &c. The dialogue entitled Axiochus, and ascribed to Plato, is supposed to be his composition. The best editions are that of Leovard, 1718, with the notes of Horræus, in 8vo. and that of Fischer, 8vo. Lips. 1766.

ÆSCHRION, I. a Mitylenean poet, intimate with Aristotle. He accompanied Alexander in his Asiatic expedition.——II. An Iambic poet of Samos. Athen.——III. A physician commended by Galen. A treatise of his on husbandry has been quoted by Pliny.

ÆSCHŸLUS, I. the son of Euphorion, was born of a noble family at Eleusis in Attica, Olymp. 63d, 4, B. C. 525. Pausanias records a story of his boyhood, professedly on the authority of the poet himself, which, if true, shows that his mind at a very early period had been enthusiastically struck with the exhibitions of the infant drama. An impression like this, acting upon his fervid imagination, would naturally produce such a dream as is described. 'Æschylus,' says Pausanias, 'used to tell that, when still a stripling, he was once set to watch grapes in the country, and there fell asleep. In his slumbers Bacchus appeared and bade him turn his attention to the tragic art. When day dawned and he awoke, the boy, anxious to obey the vision, made an attempt and found himself possessed of the utmost facility in dramatic composition. At the age of twenty-five he made his first public essay as a tragic author, Olymp. 70, B. C. 499. The next notice which we have of him is at Olymp. 72d, 3, B. C. 490; when, along with his two celebrated brothers, Cynægeirus and Ameinias, he was graced at Marathon with the prize of pre-eminent bravery, being then in his thirty-fifth year. How dearly he valued the distinction there acquired by his valour we learn from Pausanias; where, apparently alluding to the epitaph which the exiled dramatists composed for himself, the topographer tells us, that Æschylus, out of all the topics of his glory as a poet and a warrior, selected his exploits at Marathon as his highest honour. Six years after that memorable battle, Æschylus gained his first tragic victory, Olymp. 74th, B. C. 484. Four years after this was fought the battle of Salamis, in which Æschylus took part along with his brother Ameinias; to whose extraordinary valour the ἀριστεῖα were decreed. In the following year he served with the Athenian troops at Platæa. Eight years afterwards he gained the prize with a tetralogy, composed of the Persæ, the Phineus, the Glaucus Potniensis, and the Prometheus Ignifer, a satiric drama. The latter part of the poet's life is involved in much obscurity. That he quitted Athens and died in Sicily is agreed on all hands; but the time and the cause of his departure are points of doubt and conjecture. It seems that Æschylus had laid himself open to a charge of profanation, by too boldly introducing on the stage something connected with the Mysteries. He was tried and acquitted; but the peril which he had run, the dread of a multitude ever merciless in their superstitions, indignation at the treatment which he had received, joined, in all likelihood, to feelings of vexation and jealousy at witnessing the preference occasionally given to young and aspiring rivals, were motives sufficiently powerful to induce his proud spirit to leave his native city, and seek a retreat in the court of the munificent and literary Hiero, prince of Syracuse: where he found, as fellow-guests, Simonides, Epicharmus, and Pindar. This must have been before Olymp. 78th, 2, B. C. 467, for in that year Hiero died. In Sicily he composed a drama, entitled Ætna, to gratify his royal host, who had recently founded a city of that name. During the remainder of his life it is doubtful whether he ever returned to Athens. If he did not, those pieces of his, which were composed in the interval, might be exhibited on the Athenian stage under the care of some friend or relation, as was not unfrequently the case. Among these dramas was the Orestean tetralogy, which won the prize Olymp. 80th, 2. B C. 458, two years before his death. At any rate, his residence in Sicily must have been of considerable length, as it was sufficient to affect the purity of his language. We are told by Athenæus that many Sicilian words are to be found in his later plays. Æschylus died at Gela in the sixty-ninth year of his age, Olymp. 81st, B. C. 456. His death, if the common account be true, was of a most singular nature. Sitting motionless, in silence and meditation, in the fields, his head, now bald from years, was mistaken for a stone by an eagle, which happened to be flying over him with a tortoise in her bill. The bird dropped the tortoise to break the shell; and the poet was killed by the blow. The Geloans, to show their respect for so illustrious a sojourner, interred him with much pomp in the public cemetery, and engraved on his tomb the following epitaph, which had been composed by himself:—

Αἰσχύλον Εὐφορίωνος Ἀθηναῖον τόδε κεύθει
Μνῆμα καταφθίμενον πυροφόροιο Γέλας
Ἀλκὴν δ' εὐδόκιμον Μαραθώνιον ἄλσος ἂν εἴποι, Καὶ βαθυχαίτης Μῆδος ἐπιστάμενος.

Æschylus is said to have composed seventy dramas, of which five were satiric, and to have been thirteen times victor. This great dramatist was in reality the creator of tragedy. He added a second actor to the locutor of Thespis and Phrynichus, and thus introduced the regular dialogue. He abridged the immoderate length of the choral odes, making them subservient to the main interest of the plot, and expanded the short episodes into scenes of competent extent. To these improvements in the economy of the drama he added the decorations of art in its exhibition. A regular stage, with appropriate scenery, was erected; the performers were furnished with becoming dresses, and raised to the stature of the heroes represented, by the thick-soled cothurnus; whilst the face was brought to the heroic cast by a mask of proportionate size and strongly marked character; which was also so contrived as to give power and distinctness to the voice. And the hero of Marathon and Salamis did not disdain to come forward in person as an actor, like his predecessor Thespis. He paid moreover great attention to the choral dances, and invented several figure dances himself: in which, declining the assistance of the regular ballet-masters, he carefully instructed his choristers: one of whom, Telestes, was such a proficient in the art, as distinctly to express by dance alone the various occurrences of the play. Among his other improvements is mentioned the introduction of a practice, which subsequently became established as a fixed and essential rule, the removal of all deeds of bloodshed and murder from public view. In short, so many and so important were the alterations and additions of Æschylus, that he was considered by the Athenians as the Father of tragedy; and, as a mark of distinguished honour paid to his merits, they passed a decree after his death, that a chorus should be allowed to any poet who chose to re-exhibit the dramas of Æschylus. In philosophical sentiments, Æschylus is said to have been a Pythagorean. In his extant dramas the tenets of this sect may occasionally be traced; as, deep veneration in what concerns the gods; high regard for the sanctity of an oath and the nuptial bond; the immortality of the soul; the origin of names from imposition and not from nature; the importance of numbers; the science of physiognomy; and the sacred character of suppliants. Aristophanes, in that invaluable comedy, the Frogs, has sketched a most lively character of Æschylus; and thus enabled us to ascertain the light in which he was regarded by his immediate posterity. His temper is there depicted as proud, stern, and impatient; his sentiments pure, noble, and warlike; his genius inventive, magnificent, and towering, even to occasional extravagance; his style bold, lofty, and impetuous, full of gorgeous imagery and ponderous expressions; whilst in the dramatic arrangement of his pieces there remained much of ancient simplicity and somewhat even of uncouth rudeness. Yet still in the estimation of the right-minded and judicious, he ranked supreme in tragedy. Even the majestic dignity of Sophocles bows at once before the gigantic powers of Æschylus; and nothing save ignorance and vitiated taste dare for a moment to set up a rival in the philosophic Euripides. With the portrait, thus drawn by Aristophanes, the opinions of the ancient critics in general coincide. Dionysius lauds the splendour of his talents, the propriety of his characters, the originality of his ideas, the force, variety, and beauty of his language. Longinus speaks of the bold magnificence of his imagery; whilst he condemns some of his conceptions as rude and turgid, and his expressions as not unfrequently overstrained. Quinctilian again, among the Romans, assigns him the praise of dignity in sentiment, sublimity of idea, and loftiness in style; although often overcharged in diction and irregular in composition. Such, in the eyes of antiquity, was the Shakspeare of the Grecian drama. Besides his tragedies, it is said that he wrote an account of the battle of Marathon in elegiac verses. The best editions of his works are that of Stanley, fol. London, 1663; that of Glasg. 2 vols. in 12mo. 1746, and that of Schutz, 2 vols. 8vo. Halæ, 1782. *Horat. Art. Æsōpus, I. a Phrygian philosopher, who, though originally a slave, procured his liberty by the sallies of his genius. He travelled over the greatest part of Greece and Egypt, but chiefly resided at the court of Crœsus, king of Lydia, by whom he was sent to consult the oracle of Delphi. In this commission, Æsop behaved with great severity, and satirically compared the Delphians to floating sticks, which appear large at a distance, but are nothing when brought near. The Delphians, offended with his sarcastic remarks, accused him of having secreted one of the sacred vessels of Apollo's temple, and threw him down from a rock, 561 B. C. Maximus Planudes has written his life in Greek; but no credit is to be given to the biographer who falsely asserts that the mythologist was short and deformed. Æsop dedicated his fables to his patron Crœsus; but what appears now under his name, is, no doubt, a compilation of all the fables and apologues of wits before and after the age of Æsop, conjointly with his own. Plut. in Solon.—Phæd. 1, fab. 2, l. 2, fab. 9.——II. This piece was much valued, and was exposed to public view at the Olympic games, where it gained so much applause that the president of the games gave the painter his daughter in marriage. *Cic. Agamemnon, king of Mycenæ and Argos, was brother to Menelaus, and son of Plisthenes the son of Atreus. Homer calls them sons of Atreus, which is false, upon the authority of Hesiod, Apollodorus, &c. Vid. Plisthenes. When Atreus was dead, his brother Thyestes seized the kingdom of Argos, and removed Agamemnon and Menelaus, who fled to Polyphidus, king of Sicyon, and hence to Œneus, king of Ætolia, where they were educated. Agamemnon married Clytemnestra, and Menelaus Helen, both daughters of Tyndarus, king of Sparta, who assisted them to recover their father's kingdom. After the banishment of the usurper to Cythera, Agamemnon established himself at Mycenæ, whilst Menelaus succeeded his father-in-law at Sparta. When Helen was stolen by Paris, Agamemnon was elected commander in chief of the Grecian forces going against Troy; and he showed his zeal in the cause by furnishing 100 ships, and lending 60 more to the people of Arcadia. The fleet was detained at Aulis, where Agamemnon sacrificed his daughter to appease Diana. Vid. Iphigenia. During the Trojan war Agamemnon behaved with much valour; but his quarrel with Achilles, whose mistress he took by force, was fatal to the Greeks. Vid. Briseis. After the ruin of Troy, Cassandra, fell to his share and foretold him that his wife would put him to death. He gave no credit to this, and returned to Argos with Cassandra. Clytemnestra, with her adulterer Ægisthus, prepared to murder him; and as he came from the bath, to embarrass him, she gave him a tunic, whose sleeves were sewed together, and while he attempted to put it on, she brought him to the ground with a stroke of a hatchet, and Ægisthus seconded her blows. Agathias, a Greek historian of Æolia. A poet and historian in the age of Justinian, of whose reign he published the history in five books. Several of his epigrams are found in the Anthologia. His history is a sequel to that of Procopius. The best edition is that of Paris, fol. 1660.

Agîtho, I a Samian historian, who wrote an account of Scythia.——II. A poet, who flourished 406 B. C.——III. A learned and melodious musician, who first introduced songs in tragedy. Aristot. in Poet. He was the contemporary and friend of Euripides. At his house Plato lays the scene of his Symposium, given in honour of a tragic victory won by the poet. Agathon was no mean dramatist. Plato represents him as abounding in the most exquisite ornaments and the most dazzling antitheses. Aristophanes pays a handsome tribute to his memory as a poet and a man, in the Ranæ, where Bacchus calls him ἀγαθὸς ποιητὴς καὶ νοθεινὸς, τοῖς φίλοις. In the Thesmophoriazusæ, which was exhibited six years before the Ranæ, Agathon, then alive, is introduced as the friend of Euripides, and ridiculed for his effeminacy. He is there brought on the stage in female attire, and described as

Γυναικόφωνος, ἁπαλὸς, εὐπρεπὴς ἰδεῖν—191.

His poetry seems to have corresponded with his personal appearance: profuse in trope, inflection, and metaphor; glittering with sparkling ideas, and flowing softly along, with harmonious words and nice construction, but deficient in manly thought and vigour. Agathon may, in some degree, be charged with having begun the decline of true tragedy. It was he who first commenced the practice of inserting choruses betwixt the acts of the drama, which had no reference whatever to the circumstances of the piece: thus infringing the law by which the chorus was made one of the actors. Aristotle blames him also for want of judgment in selecting too extensive subjects. He 'occasionally wrote pieces with fictitious names, (a transition towards the New Comedy) one of which was called the Flower; and was probably, therefore, neither seriously affecting nor terrible, but in the style of the Idyl.' One of his tragic victories is recorded, Olymp. 91st, 2, B. C. 416. He too, like Euripides, left Athens for the court of the Macedonian Archelaus. He died before the representation of the Ranæ."—Diog. Laert. 3, c. 32.

Agathŏcles, I. a youth, son of a potter, who made himself master of Syracuse. He reduced Sicily; but, being defeated at Himera by the Carthaginians, he carried the war into Africa. He afterwards passed into Italy, and made himself master of Crotona. He died in his 72d year, B. C. 289, after a reign of 28 years of mingled prosperity and adversity. Plut. in Apoph.—Justin. 22 and 23.—Polyb. 15.—Diod. 18, &c.——II. A son of Lysimachus, taken prisoner by the Getæ. He was ransomed, and married Lysandra, daughter of Ptolemy Lagus.

Agesander, a sculptor of Rhodes under Vespasian, who made a representation of Laocoon's history, which now passes for the best relic of all ancient sculpture.

Agesias, a Platonic philosopher, who taught the immortality of the soul. One of the Ptolemies forbade him to continue his lectures, because his doctrine was so prevalent that many of his auditors committed suicide.

Agesilāus, I. king of Sparta, of the family of the Agidæ, was son of Doryssus and father of Archelaus. During his reign Lycurgus instituted his famous laws. Herodot. 7, c. 204.—Paus. 3, c. 2.——II. A son of Archidamus, of the family of the Proclidæ, made king in preference to his nephew Leotychides. He made war against Artaxerxes, king of Persia, with success; but in the midst of his conquests in Asia, he was recalled home to oppose the Athenians and Bœotians, who desolated his country; and his return was so expeditious that he passed, in thirty days, over that tract of country which had taken up a whole year of Xerxes' expedition. He defeated his enemies at Coronea; but sickness prevented the progress of his conquests, and the Spartans were beat in every engagement, especially at Leuctra, till he appeared at their head. Though deformed, small of stature, and lame, he was brave; and a greatness of soul compensated all the imperfections of nature. He was as fond of sobriety as of military discipline; and when he went, in his 80th year, to assist Tachus, king of Egypt, the servants of the monarch could hardly be persuaded that the Lacedæmonian general was eating with his soldiers on the ground bareheaded, and without any covering to repose upon. Agesilaus died on his return from Egypt, after a reign of 36 years, 362 B. C., and his remains were embalmed and brought to Lacedæmon. Justin. 6, c. 1.—Plut. and C. Nep. in vit.—Paus. 3, c. 9.—Zenoph. Orat. pro Ages.——III. A brother of Themistocles, who was sent as a spy into the Persian camp, where he stabbed Mardonius instead of Xerxes. Plut. in Parall.

Agesipŏlis, I. king of Lacedæmon, son of Pausanias, obtained a great victory over the Mantineans. He reigned 14 years, and was succeeded by his brother Cleombrotus, B. C. 380. Paus. 3, c. 5, l. 8, c. 8.—Xenoph. 3, Hist. Græc.——II. son of Cleombrotus, king of Sparta, was succeeded by Cleomenes 2d, B. C. 370. Paus. 1, c. 13, l. 3, c. 5.

Aggrammes, a cruel king of the Gangarides. His father was a hairdresser, of whom the queen became enamoured, and whom she made governor to the king's children, to gratify her passion. He killed them to raise Aggrammes, his son by the queen, to the throne. Curt. 9, c. 2.

Agīdæ, the descendants of Eurysthenes, who shared the throne of Sparta with the Proclidæ; the name is derived from Agis, son of Eurysthenes. The family became extinct in the person of Cleomenes, son of Leonidas. Virg. Æn. 8, v. 682.

Agis, I. king of Sparta, succeeded his father, Eurysthenes, and, after a reign of one year, was succeeded by his son Echestratus, B. C. 1058. Paus. 3, c. 2.——II. Another king of Sparta, who waged bloody wars against Athens, and restored liberty to many Greek cities. He attempted to restore the laws of Lycurgus at Sparta, but in vain; the perfidy of friends, who pretended to second his views, brought him to difficulties, and he was at last dragged from a temple, where he had taken refuge, to a prison, where he was strangled by order of the Ephori. Plut. in Agid.——III. Another, son of Archidamus, who signalized himself in the war which the Spartans waged against Epidaurus. He obtained a victory at Mantinea, and was successful in the Peloponnesian war. He reigned 27 years. Thucyd. 3 and 4.—Paus. 3, c. 8 and 10.——IV. Another, son of Archidamus, king of Sparta, who endeavoured to deliver Greece from the empire of Macedonia, with the assistance of the Persians. He was conquered in the attempt, and slain by Antipater, Alexander's general, and 5300 Lacedæmonians perished with him. Curt. 6, c. 1.—Diod. 17.—Justin. 12, c. 1, &c.——V. An Arcadian in the expedition of Cyrus against his brother Artaxerxes. Polyæn. 7, c. 18.——VI. A poet of Argos, who accompanied Alexander into Asia, and said that Bacchus and the sons of Leda would give way to his hero when a god. Curt. 8, c. 5.

Aglaŏphon, an excellent Greek painter. Plin. 35, c. 8.

Aglaus, the poorest man of Arcadia, pronounced by the oracle more happy than Gyges, king of Lydia. Plin. 7, c. 46.—Val. Max. 7, c. 1.

Agnodĭce, an Athenian virgin, who disguised her sex to learn medicine. She was taught by Hierophilus the art of midwifery, and when employed, always discovered her sex to her patients. This brought her into so much practice, that the males of her profession, who were now out of employment, accused her before the Areopagus of corruption. She confessed her sex to the judges, and a law was immediately made to empower all freeborn women to learn midwifery. Hygin. fab. 274.

Agnon, son of Nicias, was present at the taking of Samos by Pericles. In the Peloponnesian war he went against Potidæa, but abandoned his expedition through disease. He built Amphipolis, whose inhabitants rebelled to Brasidas, whom they regarded as their founder, forgetful of Agnon. Thucyd. 2, 3, &c.

Agnonĭdes, a rhetorician of Athens, who accused Phocion of betraying the Piræus to Nicanor. When the people recollected what services Phocion had rendered them, they raised him statues, and put to death his accuser. Plut. and Nep. in Phocion.

Agōnālia, and Agonia, festivals in Rome, celebrated three times a year, in honour of Janus or Agonius. They were instituted by Numa, and on the festive days the chief priest used to offer a ram. Ovid. Fast. 1, v. 317.—Varro. de L. L. 5.

Agōnes Capitolīni, games celebrated every fifth year upon the Capitoline hill. Prizes were proposed for agility and strength, as well as for poetical and literary compositions. The poet Statius publicly recited there his Thebaid, which was not received with much applause.

Agoracrītus, a sculptor of Pharos, who made a statue of Venus for the people of Athens, B. C. 150.

Agoranŏni, ten magistrates at Athens, who watched over the city and port, and inspected whatever was exposed to sale.

Agraria Lex, was enacted to distribute among the Roman people all the lands which they had gained by conquest. It was first proposed A. U. C. 268, by the consul Sp. Cassius Vicellinus, and rejected by the senate. This produced dissensions between the senate and the people, and Cassius, upon seeing the ill success of the new regulations he proposed, offered to distribute among the people the money which was produced from the corn of Sicily, after it had been brought and sold in Rome. This act of liberality the people refused, and tranquillity was soon after re-established in the state. It was proposed a second time, A. U. C. 269, by the tribune Licinius Stolo; but with no better success: and so great were the tumults which followed, that one of the tribunes of the people was killed, and many of the senators fined for their opposition. Mutius Scævola, A. U. C. 620, persuaded the tribune Tiberius Gracchus to propose it a third time; and although Octavius, his colleague in the tribuneship, opposed it, yet Tiberius made it pass into a law after much altercation, and commissioners were authorized to make a division of the lands. This law at last proved fatal to the freedom of Rome under J. Cæsar. Flor. 3, c. 3 and 13.—Cic. pro Leg. Agr.—Liv. 2, c. 41.

Agricŏla, the father-in-law of the historian Tacitus, who wrote his life. He was eminent for his public and private virtues. He was governor of Britain, and first discovered it to be an island. Domitian envied his virtues; he recalled him from the province he had governed with equity and moderation, and ordered him to enter Rome in the night, that no triumph might be granted to him. Agricola obeyed, and without betraying any resentment, he retired to a peaceful solitude, and the enjoyment of the society of a few friends. He died in his 56th year, A. D. 93. Tacit. in Agric.

M. Agrippa Vipsanius, I. a celebrated Roman, who obtained a victory over S. Pompey, and favoured the cause of Augustus at the battle of Actium and Philippi, where he behaved with great valour. He advised his imperial friend to re-establish the republican government at Rome, but he was overruled by Mecænas. In his expeditions in Gaul and Germany he obtained several victories, but refused the honours of a triumph, and turned his liberality towards the embellishing of Rome, and the raising of magnificent buildings, one of which, the Pantheon, still exists. After he had retired for two years to Mitylene, in consequence of a quarrel with Marcellus, Augustus recalled him, and, as a proof of his regard, gave him his daughter Julia in marriage, and left him the care of the empire, during an absence of two years employed in visiting the Roman provinces of Greece and Asia. He died, universally lamented, at Rome, in the 51st year of his age, 12 B. C. and his body was placed in the tomb which Augustus had prepared for himself. He had been married three times; to Pomponia, daughter of Atticus, to Marcella, daughter of Octavia, and to Julia, by whom he had five children, Caius, and Lucius Cæsares, Posthumus Agrippa, Agrippina, and Julia. His son, C. Cæsar Agrippa, was adopted by Augustus, and made consul, by the flattery of the Roman people, at the age of fourteen or fifteen. This promising youth went to Armenia on an expedition against the Persians, where he received a fatal blow from the treacherous hand of Lollius, the governor of one of the neighbouring cities. He languished for a little time, and died in Lycia. His younger brother, L. Cæsar Agrippa, was likewise adopted by his grandfather Augustus; but he was soon after banished to Campania, for using seditious language against his benefactor. In the 7th year of his exile, he would have been recalled, had not Livia and Tiberius, jealous of the partiality of Augustus for him, ordered him to be assassinated in his 26th year. He has been called ferocious and savage; and he gave himself the name of Neptune, because he was fond of fishing. Virg. Æn. 8, v. 682.—Horat. 1, od. 6.——II. Sylvius, a son of Tiberinus Sylvius, king of Latium. He reigned 33 years, and was succeeded by his son Romulus Sylvius. Dionys. Hal. 1, c. 8.——III. One of the servants of the murdered prince assumed his name, and raised commotions. Tacit. Ann. 2, c. 37.——IV. A consul, who conquered the Æqui.——V. A philosopher. Diog.——VI. Herodes, a son of Aristobulus, grandson of the great Herod, who became tutor to the grandchild of Tiberius, and was soon after imprisoned by the suspicious tyrant. When Caligula ascended the throne, his favourite was released, presented with a chain of gold as heavy as that which had lately confined him, and made king of Judea. He was a popular character with the Jews; and it is said, that while they were flattering him with the appellation of god, an angel of God struck him with the lousy disease of which he died, A. D. 43. His son of the same name, was the last king of the Jews, deprived of his kingdom by Claudius, in exchange for other provinces. He was with Titus at the celebrated siege of Jerusalem, and died A. D. 94. It was before him that St. Paul pleaded, and made mention of his incestuous commerce with his sister Berenice. Juv. 6, v. 156.—Tacit. 2, Hist. c. 81.——VII. Menenius, a Roman general, who obtained a triumph over the Sabines, appeased the populace of Rome by the well-known fable of the belly and the limbs, and erected the new office of tribunes of the people, A. U. C. 261. He died poor, but universally regretted; his funeral was at the expense of the public, from which also his daughters received dowries. Liv. 2, c. 32. Flor. 1, c. 23.——VIII. A mathematician in the reign of Domitian; he was a native of Bithynia.

Agrippina, I. a wife of Tiberius. The emperor repudiated her to marry Julia. Sueton. in Tib. 7.——II. a daughter of M. Agrippa, and grand-daughter to Augustus. She married Germanicus, whom she accompanied in Syria; and when Piso poisoned him, she carried his ashes to Italy, and accused his murderer, who stabbed himself. She fell under the displeasure of Tiberius, who exiled her in an island, where she died, A. D. 26, for want of bread. She left nine children, and was universally distinguished for intrepidity and conjugal affection. Tacit. 1, Ann. c. 2, &c.—Sueton. in Tib. 52.——III. Julia, daughter of Germanicus and Agrippina, married Domitius Ænobarbus, by whom she had Nero. After her husband's death, she married her uncle, the emperor Claudius, whom she destroyed to make Nero succeed to the throne. After many cruelties and much licentiousness, she was assassinated by order of her son, A. D. 59. She left memoirs which assisted Tacitus in the composition of his annals. The town which she built, where she was born, on the borders of the Rhine, and called Agrippina Colonia, is the modern Cologne. Tacit. Ann. 4, c. 75, l. 12, c. 7, 22.

Agrotĕra, I. an anniversary sacrifice of goats, offered to Diana at Athens. It was instituted by Callimachus the Polemarch, who vowed to sacrifice to the goddess so many goats as there might be enemies killed in a battle which he was going to fight against the troops of Darius, who had invaded Attica. The quantity of the slain was so great, that a sufficient number of goats could not be procured; therefore they were limited to five hundred every year, till they equalled the number of Persians slain in battle.——II. A temple of Ægira in Peloponnesus, erected to the goddess under this name. Paus. 7, c. 26.

Ahăla, the surname of the Servilii at Rome.

Ajax, I. son of Telamon by Peribœa or Eribœa, daughter of Alcathous, was, next to Achilles, the bravest of all the Greeks in the Trojan war. He engaged Hector, with whom, at parting, he exchanged arms. After the death of Achilles, Ajax and Ulysses disputed their claim to the arms of the dead hero. When they were given to the latter, Ajax was so enraged that he slaughtered a whole flock of sheep, supposing them to be the sons of Atreus, who had given the preference to Ulysses, and stabbed himself with his sword. The blood which ran to the ground from the wound was changed into the flower hyacinth. Some say that he was killed by Paris in battle; others, that he was murdered by Ulysses. His body was buried at Sigæum, some say on mount Rhœtus, and his tomb was visited and honoured by Alexander. Hercules, according to some authors, prayed to the gods that his friend Telamon, who was childless, might have a son with a skin as impenetrable as the skin of the Nemæan lion, which he then wore. His prayers were heard. Jupiter, under the form of an eagle, promised to grant the petition; and when Ajax was born, Hercules wrapped him up in the lion's skin, which rendered his body invulnerable, except that part which was left uncovered by a hole in the skin, through which Hercules hung his quiver. This vulnerable part was in his breast, or, as some say, behind the neck. Q. Calab. 1 and 4.—Apollod. 3, c. 10 and 13.—Philostr. in Heroic. c. 12.—Pindar. Isthm. 6.—Homer. Il. 1, &c. Od. 11.—Dictys Cret. 5.—Dares Phry. 9.—Ovid. Met. 13.—Horat. 2, Sat. 3, v. 197.—Hygin. fab. 107 and 242.—Paus. 1, c. 35, l. 5, c. 19.——II. The son of Oileus, king of Locris, was surnamed Locrian, in contradistinction to the son of Telamon. He went with forty ships to the Trojan war, as being one of Helen's suitors. The night that Troy was taken he offered violence to Cassandra, who fled into Minerva's temple; and for this offence, as he returned home, the goddess, who had obtained the thunders of Jupiter and the power of tempests from Neptune, destroyed his ship in a storm. Ajax swam to a rock, and said that he was safe, in spite of all the gods. Such impiety offended Neptune, who struck the rock with his trident, and Ajax tumbled into the sea with part of the rock, and was drowned. His body was afterwards found by the Greeks, and black sheep offered on his tomb. Virg. Æn. 1, v. 43, &c.—Homer. Il. 2, 13, &c. Od. 4.—Hygin. fab. 116 and 273.—Philostr. Ico. 2, c. 13.—Senec. in Agam.—Horat. epod. 10, v. 13.—Paus. 10, c. 26 and 31.—The two Ajaces were, as some suppose, placed after death in the island of Leuce, a separate place, reserved only for the bravest heroes of antiquity.

Alaricus, a famous king of the Goths, who plundered Rome in the reign of Honorius. He was greatly respected for his military valour, and during his reign he kept the Roman empire in continual alarms. He died, after a reign of 13 years, A. D. 410.

Alarōdi, a nation near Pontus. Herodot. 3, c. 94.

Alba Sylvius, son of Latinus Sylvius, succeeded his father in the kingdom of Latium, and reigned 36 years.

Albia Terentia, the mother of Otho. Suet.

Albĭci, a people of Gallia Aquitania. Cæs. Bell. Civ. 1, c. 34.

Albĭni, two Roman orators, of great merit, mentioned by Cicero in Brut. This name is common to many tribunes of the people. Liv. 2, c. 33, l. 6, c. 30.—Sallust. de Jug. Bell.

Albinovānus Celsus, I. Vid. Celsus.——II. Pedo, a poet, contemporary with Ovid. He wrote elegies, epigrams, and heroic poetry in a style so elegant that he merited the epithet of divine. Ovid. ex. Pont. 4, ep. 10.—Quintil. 10, c. 5.

Albīnus, I. was born at Adrumetum in Africa, and made governor of Britain by Commodus. After the murder of Pertinax, he was elected emperor by the soldiers in Britain. Severus had also been invested with the imperial dignity by his own army; and these two rivals, with about 50,000 men each, came into Gaul to decide the fate of the empire. Severus was conqueror, and he ordered the head of Albinus to be cut off, and his body to be thrown into the Rhone, A. D. 198. Albinus, according to the exaggerated account of a certain writer, called Codrus, was famous for his voracious appetite, and sometimes eat for breakfast no less than 500 figs, 100 peaches, 20 pounds of dry raisins, 10 melons, and 400 oysters.——II. A pretorian, sent to Sylla as ambassador from the senate during the civil wars. He was put to death by Sylla's soldiers. Plut. in Syll.——III. A Roman plebeian, who received the vestals into his chariot in preference to his family, when they fled from Rome, which the Gauls had sacked. Val. Max. 1, c. 1.—Liv. 5, c. 40.—Flor. 1, c. 13.——IV. A. Posthumus, consul with Lucullus, A. U. C. 603, wrote a history of Rome in Greek.

Albūtius, I. a prince of Celtiberia, to whom Scipio restored his wife. Arrian.——II. An ancient satirist. Cic. in Brut.——III. Titus, an epicurean philosopher, born at Rome; so fond of Greece, and Grecian manners, that he wished not to pass for a Roman. He was made governor of Sardinia; but he grew offensive to the senate, and was banished. It is supposed that he died at Athens.

Alcæus, I. a celebrated lyric poet of Mitylene in Lesbos, about 600 years before the Christian era. He fled from a battle, and his enemies hung up, in the temple of Minerva, the armour which he left in the field, as a monument of his disgrace. He is the inventor of Alcaic verses. He was contemporary with the famous Sappho, to whom he paid his addresses. Of all his works nothing but a few fragments remain, found in Athenæus. Quintil. 10, c. 1.—Herodot. 5, c. 95.—Hor. 4, od. 9.—Cic. 4. Tusc. c. 33.——II. A poet of Athens, said by Suidas to be the inventor of tragedy.——III. A writer of epigrams.——IV. A comic poet.

Alcamĕnes, I. one of the Agidæ, king of Sparta, known by his apophthegms. He succeeded his father Teleclus, and reigned 37 years. The Helots rebelled in his reign. Paus. 3, c. 2, l. 4, c. 4 and 5.——II. A general of the Achæans. Paus. 7, c. 15.——III. A statuary, who lived 448 B. C. and was distinguished for his statues of Venus and Vulcan. Paus. 5, c. 10.——IV. The commander of a Spartan fleet, put to death by the Athenians. Thucyd. 4, c. 5, &c.

Alcander, I. a Lacedæmonian youth, who accidentally put out one of the eyes of Lycurgus, and was generously forgiven by the sage. Plut. in Lyc.—Paus. 3, c. 18.——II. A Trojan, killed by Turnus. Virg. Æn. 9, v. 767.

Alcēnor. Vid. Otkryades.

Alceste, or Alcestis. Vid. Part III.

Alcētas, I. a king of the Molossi, descended from Pyrrhus, the son of Achilles. Paus. 1, c. 11.——II. A general of Alexander's army, brother to Perdiccas.——III. The eighth king of Macedonia, who reigned 29 years.——IV. An historian, who wrote an account of every thing that had been dedicated in the temple of Delphi. Athen.

Alchimāchus, a celebrated painter. Plin. 35, c. 11.

Alcibīdes, an Athenian general, famous for his enterprising spirit, versatile genius, and natural foibles. He was disciple to Socrates. In the Peloponnesian war he encouraged the Athenians to make an expedition against Syracuse. He was chosen general in that war, and, in his absence, his enemies accused him of impiety, and confiscated his goods. Upon this he fled, and stirred up the Spartans to make war against Athens; and when this did not succeed, he retired to Tissaphernes, the Persian general. Being recalled by the Athenians, he obliged the Lacedæmonians to sue for peace, made several conquests in Asia, and was received in triumph at Athens. His popularity was of short duration; the failure of an expedition against Cyme exposed him again to the resentment of the people, and he fled to Pharnabazus, whom he almost induced to make war upon Lacedæmon. This was told to Lysander, the Spartan general, who prevailed upon Pharnabazus to murder Alcibiades. Two servants were sent for that purpose, and they set on fire the cottage where he was, and killed him with darts as he attempted to make his escape. He died in the 46th year of his age, 404 B. C. after a life of perpetual difficulties. If the fickleness of his countrymen had known how to retain among them the talents of a man who distinguished himself, and was admired wherever he went, they might have risen to greater splendour, and to the sovereignty of Greece. His character has been cleared from the aspersions of malevolence by the writings of Thucydides, Timæus, and Theopompus; and he is known to us as a hero, who, to the principles of the debauchee added the intelligence and sagacity of a statesman, the cool intrepidity of the general, and the humanity of the philosopher. Plut. & C. Nep. in Alcib.—Thucyd. 5, 6 and 7.—Xenoph. Hist. Græc. 1, &c.—Diod. 12.

Alcidamīdas, a general of the Messenians, who retired to Rhegium, after the taking of Ithome by the Spartans, B. C. 723. Strab. 6.

Alcidāmus, a philosopher and orator, who wrote a treatise on death. He was pupil to Gorgias, and flourished B. C. 424. Quint. 3, c. 1.

Alcidas, a Lacedæmonian, sent with 23 galleys against Corcyra, in the Peloponnesian war. Thucyd. 4, c. 16, &c.

Alcmēnes, I. a tragic poet of Megara.—II. A comic writer of Athens.

Alcinous, I. a man of Elis. Paus.—II. A philosopher in the second century, who wrote a book, De doctrinâ Platonis, the best edition of which is the 12mo. printed Oxon. 1667. Vid. Part III.

Alciphron, a philosopher of Magnesia in the age of Alexander. There are some epistles in Greek that bear his name, and contain a very perfect picture of the customs and manners of the Greeks. They are by some supposed to be the production of a writer of the 4th century.

Alcmæon, I. a philosopher, disciple to Pythagoras, born in Crotona. He wrote on physic, and he was the first who dissected animals to examine into the structure of the human frame. Cic. de Nat. D. 6, c. 27.—II. A son of the poet Æschylus, the 13th archon of Athens.—III. A son of Syllus, driven from Messenia, with the rest of Nestor's family, by the Heraclidæ. He came to Athens, and from him the Alcmæonidæ are descended. Vid. Part III. Paus. 1, c. 18.

Alcmæōnīdæ, a noble family of Athens, descended from Alcmæon. They undertook for 300 talents to rebuild the temple of Delphi, which had been burnt, and they finished the work in a more splendid manner than was required; in consequence of which they gained popularity, and by their influence the Pythia prevailed upon the Lacedæmonians to deliver their country from the tyranny of the Pisistratidæ. Herodot. 5 and 6.—Thucyd. 6, c. 59.—Plut. in Solon.

Alcman, a very ancient lyric poet, born in Sardinia, and not at Lacedæmon, as some suppose. He wrote, in the Doric dialect, 6 books of verses, besides a play called Colymbosas. He flourished B. C. 670, and died of the lousy disease. Some of his verses are preserved by Athenæus and others. Plin. 11, c. 33.—Paus. 1, c. 41, l. 3, c. 15.—Aristot. Hist. Anim. 5, c. 31.

Alcyōneus, a youth of exemplary virtue, son to Antigonus. Plut. in Pyrrh.—Diog. 4. Vid. Part III.

Alemanni, certain tribes, originally of the Suevi, the most warlike of the Germans. Approaching the banks of the Rhine they mingled with other people, among which were probably many Gallic families; and then from their heterogeneous composition it is supposed they first assumed or received the designation of Allmans or Alemanni. The country which bore their name, from their having effected in it a residence, was that tract which, including the Tyrol, the country of the Grisons, parts of Switzerland, and all the western borders of the Rhine, extended also on the east as far as the Maine. After many conflicts with the Romans and the Franks, and various changes in their territorial limits, the Alemanni were overcome by Clovis, and obliged to retreat to their own country beyond the river Rhine. From the narrow region to which they were then obliged to confine themselves, they were subsequently enabled to give their name to modern Germany.

Alēmon, the father of Myscellus. He built Crotona in Magna Græcia. Myscellus is often called Alemonides. Ovid. Met. 15, v. 19 and 26.

Alēthes, the first of the Heraclidæ, who was king of Corinth. He was son of Hippotas. Paus. 2, c. 4.

Aletidas, (from ἀλαομαι, to wander,) certain sacrifices at Athens, in remembrance of Erigone, who wandered with a dog after her father Icarus.

Aleuādæ, a royal family of Larissa in Thessaly, descended from Aleuas, king of that country. They betrayed their country to Xerxes. The name is often applied to the Thessalians without distinction. Diod. 16.—Herodot. 7, c. 6, 172.—Paus. 3, c. 8, l. 7, c. 10.—Ælian. Anim. 8, c. 11.

Alexamenus, an Ætolian, who killed Nabis, tyrant of Lacedæmon, and was soon after murdered by the people. Liv. 35, c. 34.

Alexander 1st, son of Amyntas was the tenth king of Macedonia. He killed the Persian ambassadors for their immodest behaviour to the women of his father's court, and was the first who raised the reputation of the Macedonians. He reigned 43 years, and died 451 B. C. Justin. 7, c. 3.—Herodot. 5, 7, 8 and 9.

Alexander 2d, son of Amyntas 2d, king of Macedonia, was treacherously murdered, B. C. 370, by his younger brother Ptolemy, who held the kingdom for four years, and made way for Perdiccas and Philip. Justin. 7, c. 5, says, Eurydice, the wife of Amyntas, was the cause of his murder.

Alexander 3d, surnamed the Great, was son of Philip and Olympias. He was born B. C. 355, that night on which the famous temple of Diana at Ephesus was burnt by Erostratus. Two eagles perched for some time on the house of Philip, as if foretelling that his son would become master of Europe and Asia. He was pupil to Aristotle during five years, and received his learned preceptor's instructions with becoming deference and pleasure, and ever respected his abilities. When Philip went to war, Alexander in his 15th year, was left governor of Macedonia, where he quelled a dangerous sedition, and soon after followed his father to the field, and saved his life in a battle. He was highly offended when Philip divorced Olympias to marry Cleopatra; and he even caused the death of Attalus, the new queen's brother. After this he retired from court to his mother Olympias, but was recalled; and when Philip was assassinated, he punished his murderers; and by his prudence and moderation gained the affection of his subjects. He conquered Thrace and Illyricum, and destroyed Thebes; and after he had been chosen chief commander of all the forces of Greece, he declared war against the Persians. With 32,000 foot and 5,000 horse he invaded Asia, and after the defeat of Darius at the Granicus, he conquered all the provinces of Asia Minor. He obtained two other celebrated victories over Darius at Issus and Arbela, took Tyre, after an obstinate siege of seven months and the slaughter of 2000 of the inhabitants in cool blood, and made himself master of Egypt, Media, Syria, and Persia. From Egypt he visited the temple of Jupiter Ammon, and bribed the priests, who saluted him as the son of their god, and enjoined his army to pay him divine honours. He built a town, which he called Alexandria, on the western side of the Nile, near the coast of the Mediterranean, to become the future capital of his dominions, and to extend the commerce of his subjects from the Mediterranean to the Ganges. His conquests were spread over India, where he fought with Porus, a powerful king of the country; and after he had invaded Scythia, and visited the Indian ocean, he retired to Babylon, loaded with the spoils of the east. He died at Babylon, the 21st of April, in the 32d year of his age, after a reign of 12 years and 8 months of brilliant and continued success, 323 B. C. His death was so premature that some have attributed it to the effects of poison and excess of drinking. Antipater has been accused of causing the fatal poison to be given him at a feast; and perhaps the resentment of the Macedonians, whose services he seemed to forget by intrusting the guard of his body to the Persians, was the cause of his death. He was so universally regretted, that Babylon was filled with tears and lamentations; and the Medes and Macedonians declared that no one was able or worthy to succeed him. Many conspiracies were formed against him by the officers of his army, but they were all seasonably suppressed. His tender treatment of the wife and mother of king Darius, who were taken prisoners, has been greatly praised; and the latter who survived the death of her son, killed herself when she heard that Alexander was dead. His great intrepidity more than once endangered his life; he always fought as if sure of victory, and the terror of his name was often more powerfully effectual than his arms. He was always forward in every engagement, and bore the labours of the field as well as the meanest of his soldiers. During his conquest in Asia, he founded many cities, which he called Alexandria after his own name. When he had conquered Darius, he ordered himself to be worshipped as a god; and Callisthenes, who refused to do it, was put to death. He murdered, at a banquet, his friend Clitus, who had once saved his life in a battle, because he enlarged upon the virtues and exploits of Philip, and preferred them to those of his son. His victories and success increased his pride; he dressed himself in the Persian manner, and gave himself up to pleasure and dissipation. He set on fire the town of Persepolis, in a fit of madness and intoxication, encouraged by the courtesan Thais. Yet, among all his extravagances, he was fond of candour and of truth; and when one of his officers read to him, as he sailed on the Hydaspes, a history which he had composed of the wars with Porus, and in which he had too liberally panegyrized him, Alexander snatched the book from his hand, and threw it into the river, saying, "What need is there of such flattery? are not the exploits of Alexander sufficiently meritorious in themselves without the colouring of falsehood?" He, in like manner, rejected a statuary, who offered to cut mount Athos like him, and represent him as holding a town in one hand and pouring a river from the other. He forbade any statuary to make his statue except Lysippus, and any painter to draw his picture except Apelles. On his death-bed he gave his ring to Perdiccas, and it was supposed that by this singular present he wished to make him his successor. Some time before his death, his officers asked him whom he appointed to succeed him on the throne? and he answered, The worthiest among you; but I am afraid, (added he,) my best friends will perform my funeral obsequies with bloody hands. Alexander, with all his pride, was humane and liberal, easy and familiar with his friends, a great patron of learning, as may be collected from his assisting Aristotle with a purse of money to effect the completion of his natural history. He was brave often to rashness; he frequently lamented that his father conquered every thing, and left him nothing to do; and exclaimed, in all the pride of regal dignity, Give me kings for competitors, and I will enter the lists at Olympia. All his family and infant children were put to death by Cassander. The first deliberation that was made after his decease, among his generals, was to appoint his brother Philip Aridæus successor, until Roxane, who was then pregnant by him, brought into the world a legitimate heir. His empire was subsequently divided among his generals. *Vid. Ptolemy, Antigonus, &c. Curt. Twenty-five years after, Telestes dispossessed him, and put him to death.——IV. A son of Cassander, king of Macedonia, who reigned two years conjointly with his brother Antipater, and was prevented by Lysimachus from revenging his mother Thessalonica, whom his brother had murdered. Demetrius, the son of Antigonus, put him to death. Justin. 16, c. 1.—Paus. 9, c. 7.——V. A king of Epirus, brother to Olympias, and successor to Arybas. He banished Timolaus to Peloponnesus, and made war in Italy against the Romans, and observed that he fought with men, while his nephew, Alexander the Great, was fighting with an army of women (meaning the Persians). He was surnamed Molossus. Justin. 17, c. 3.—Diod. 16.—Liv. 8, c. 17 and 27.—Strab. 16.——VI. A son of Pyrrhus, was king of Epirus. A king of Syria, first called Bala, was a merchant and succeeded Demetrius. He conquered Nicanor by means of Ptolemy Physcon, and was afterwards killed by Antiochus Gryphus, son of Nicanor. Joseph. Ant. Jud. 13, c. 18.——IX. Ptolemy was one of the Ptolemean kings in Egypt. His mother Cleopatra raised him to the throne, in preference to his brother Ptolemy Lathurus, and reigned conjointly with him. Cleopatra, however, expelled him, and soon after recalled him; and Alexander, to prevent being expelled a second time, put her to death, and for this unnatural action was himself murdered by one of his subjects. Joseph. 13, *Ant. Alexandra, I. the name of some queens of Judæa, mentioned by Joseph.——II. A nurse of Nero. Suet. in Nero, 50.

Alexas, of Laodicea, was recommended to M. Antony by Timagenes. He was the cause that Antony repudiated Octavia to marry Cleopatra. Augustus punished him severely after the defeat of Antony. Plut. in Anton.

Alexĭnus, a disciple of Eubulides the Milesian, famous for the acuteness of his genius and judgment, and for his fondness for contention and argumentation. He died of a wound he had received from a sharp-pointed reed as he swam across the river Alpheus. Diog. in Euclid.

Alexion, a physician intimate with Cicero. Cic. ad Att. 13, ep. 25.

Alexis, I. a man of Samos, who endeavoured to ascertain, by his writings, the borders of his country.——II. A comic poet, 336 B. C. of Thurium. He was either uncle or patron to Menander. Like Antiphanes, he was a very voluminous composer. Suidas states the number of his plays at 245; the titles of 113 are still upon record. Plato was occasionally the object of his satire also, as he was a mark for the wit of Anaxandrides.——III. A statuary, disciple to Polycletes, 87th Olympiad. Plin. 34, c. 8.

P. Alfēnus Varus, a native of Cremona, who, by the force of his genius and his application, raised himself from his original profession of a cobbler, to offices of trust at Rome, and at last became consul. Horat. 1, Sat. 3, v. 130.

Aliēnus Cæcĭna, a questor in Bœotia appointed, for his services, commander of a legion in Germany, by Galba. The emperor disgraced him for his bad conduct, for which he raised commotions in the empire. Tacit. 1, Hist. c. 52.

Alimentus, C. an historian in the second Punic war, who wrote in Greek an account of Annibal, besides a treatise on military affairs. Liv. 21 and 30.

Allutius, or Albutius, a prince of the Celtiberi, to whom Scipio restored the beautiful princess whom he had taken in battle.

Alōa, festivals at Athens in honour of Bacchus and Ceres, by whose beneficence the husbandmen received the recompense of their labours. The oblations were the fruits of the earth. Ceres has been called, from this, Aloas and Alois.

Alotia, festivals in Arcadia, in commemoration of a victory gained over Lacedæmon by the Arcadians.

Alphius Avitus, a writer in the age of Severus, who gave an account of illustrious men, and a history of the Carthaginian war.

Alpīnus, I. (Cornelius,) a contemptible poet, whom Horace ridicules for an epic poem on the wars in Germany. Horat. 1, Sat. 10, v. 36.——II. Julius, one of the chiefs of the Helvetii. Tacit. Hist. 1, c. 68.

Althæmēnes. Vid. Part III.

Alyattes, I. a king of Lydia, descended from the Heraclidæ. He reigned 57 years.——II. King of Lydia, of the family of the Mermnadæ, was father of Crœsus. He drove the Cimmerians from Asia, and made war against the Medes. He died when engaged in a war against Miletus, after a reign of 35 years. A monument was raised on his grave with the money which the women of Lydia had obtained by prostitution. An eclipse of the sun terminated a battle between him and Cyaxares. Herodot. 1, c. 16, 17, &c.—Strab. 13.

ALYCÆUS, a son of Sciron, was killed by Theseus. A place in Megara received its name from him. Plut. in Thes.

AMADŌCUS, a king of Thrace, defeated by his antagonist Seuthes. Aristot. 5. Polit. 10.

AMAGÉ, a queen of Sarmatia, remarkable for her justice and fortitude. Polyæn. 8, c. 56.

AMÂNDUS, CN. SAL. a rebel general under Dioclesian, who assumed imperial honours, and was at last conquered by Dioclesian's colleague.

AMARYNCEUS, a king of the Epeans, buried at Buprasium. Strab. 8.—Paus. 8, c. 1.

AMASIS, I. a man who, from a common soldier, became king of Egypt. He made war against Arabia, and died before the invasion of his country by Cambyses king of Persia. He made a law, that every one of his subjects should yearly give an account to the public magistrates of the manner in which he supported himself. He refused to continue in alliance with Polycrates the tyrant of Samos, on account of his uncommon prosperity. When Cambyses came into Egypt, he ordered the body of Amasis to be dug up, and to be insulted and burnt; an action which was very offensive to the religious notions of the Egyptians. Herodot. 1, 2, 3.—II. A man who led the Persians against the inhabitants of Barce. Herodot. 4, c. 201, &c.

AMASTRIS, I. the wife of Dionysius the tyrant of Sicily, was sister to Darius whom Alexander conquered. Strab.——II. Also the wife of Xerxes, king of Persia. Vid. Amestris.

AMÂTA, the wife of king Latinus. She had betrothed her daughter Lavinia to Turnus before the arrival of Æneas in Italy. She zealously favoured the interest of Turnus; and when her daughter was given in marriage to Æneas, she hung herself to avoid the sight of her son-in-law. Virg. Æn. 7, &c.

AMAZÊNES, or MAZÊNES, a prince of the island Oaractus, who sailed for some time with the Macedonians and Nearchus in Alexander's expedition to the East. Arrian. in Indic.

AMBARVÂLIA, a joyful procession round the ploughed fields, in honour of Ceres, the goddess of corn. There were two festivals of that name celebrated by the Romans; one about the month of April, the other in July. They went three times round their fields, crowned with oak leaves, singing hymns to Ceres, and entreating her to preserve their corn. The word is derived ab ambiendis is arvis, going round the fields. A sow, a sheep, and a bull, called ambarvaliæ hostiæ, were afterwards immolated, and the sacrifice has sometimes been called suovetaurilia, from sus, ovis, and taurus. Virg. G. 1, v. 339 and 345.—Tib. 2, el. 1, v. 19.—Cato de R. R. c. 141.

AMBIGÂTUS, a king of the Celtæ in the time of Tarquinius Priscus. Seeing the great population of his country, he sent his two nephews, Sigovesus and Bellovesus, with two colonies, in quest of new settlements; the former towards Italy. Liv. 5, c. 34, &c.

AMBIÔRIX, a king of a portion of the Eburones, in Gaul. He was a great enemy to Rome, and was killed in a battle with J. Cæsar, in which 60,000 of his countrymen were slain. Cæs. Bell. G. 5, c. 11, 26, l. 6, c. 30.

AMBRÔSIA, I. festivals observed in honour of Bacchus in some cities of Greece. They were the same as the Brumalia of the Romans.—— II. The food of the gods was called ambrosia, and their drink nectar. The word signifies immortal. It had the power of giving immortality to all those who ate it; and it is said that Berenice, the wife of Ptolemy Soter, was saved from death by eating ambrosia given her by Venus. Homer. Il. 1, 14, 16, and 24.—Lucian. de deâ Syria.—Catull. ep. 100.—Theocrit. Id. 15.—Virg. Æn. 1, v. 407, l. 12, v. 419.—Ovid. Met. 2.—Pindar. 1, Olymp.

AMBROSIUS, bishop of Milan, obliged the emperor Theodosius to make penance for the murder of the people of Thessalonica, and distinguished himself by his writings, especially against the Arrians. His three books de officiis are still extant, besides eight hymns on the creation. His style is not inelegant, but his diction is sententious, his opinions eccentric, though his subject is diversified by copiousness of thought. He died A. D. 397. The best edition of his works is that of the Benedictines, 2 vols. fol. Paris, 1686.

AMBUBÆ, Syrian women of immoral lives, who, in the dissolute period of Rome, attended festivals and assemblies as minstrels. The name is derived by some from Syrian words, which signify a flute. Horat. 1, Sat. 2.—Suet. in Ner. 27.

AMENÎDES, a secretary of Darius, the last king of Persia. Alexander set him over the Arimaspi. Curt. 7, c. 3.

AMENÔCLES, a Corinthian, said to be the first Grecian who built a three-oared galley at Samos and Corinth. Thucyd. 1, c. 13.

AMESTRIS, queen of Persia, was wife to Xerxes. She cruelly treated the mother of Artiante, her husband's mistress, and cut off her nose, ears, lips, breast, tongue, and eye-brows. She also buried alive fourteen noble Persian youths, to appease the deities under the earth. Herodot. 7, c. 61, l. 9, c. 111.

AMILCAR, I. a Carthaginian general of great eloquence and cunning, surnamed Rhodanus. When the Athenians were afraid of Alexander, Amilcar went to his camp, gained his confidence, and secretly transmitted an account of all his schemes to Athens. Trogus. 21, c. 6. ——II. A Carthaginian, whom the Syracusans called to their assistance against the tyrant Agathocles, who besieged their city. Amilcar soon after favoured the interest of Agathocles, for which he was accused at Carthage. He died in Syracuse, B. C. 309. Diod. 20.—Justin. 22, c. 2 and 3.——III. A Carthaginian, surnamed Barcas, father to the celebrated Annibal. He was general in Sicily during the first Punic war; and after a peace had been made with the Romans, he quelled a rebellion of slaves who had besieged Carthage, and taken many towns of Africa, and rendered themselves so formidable to the Carthaginians, that they begged and obtained assistance from Rome. After this, he passed into Spain, with his son Annibal, who was but nine years of age, and laid the foundation of the town of Barcelona. He was killed in a battle against the Vettones, B. C. 237. He had formed the plan of an invasion of Italy, by crossing the Alps, which his son afterwards carried into execution. His great enmity to the Romans was the cause of the second Punic war. He used to say of his three sons, that he kept three lions to devour the Roman power. Nep. in Vit.—Liv. 21, c. 1.—Polyb. 2.—Plut. in Annib.——IV. A Carthaginian general, who assisted the Insubres against Rome, and was taken by Cn. Cornelius. Liv. 32, c. 30, l. 33, c. 8.——V. A son of Hanno, defeated in Sicily by Gelon, the same day that Xerxes was defeated at Salamis by Themistocles. He burnt himself that his body might not be found among the slain. Sacrifices were offered to him. Herodot. 7, c. 165, &c.

Amsias, a comic poet, whom Aristophanes ridiculed for his insipid verses.

Ammianus. Vid. Marcellinus.

Ammonius, I. a Christian philosopher, who opened a school of Platonic philosophy at Alexandria, 232, A. D. and had among his pupils Origen and Plotinus. His treatise Περι Ομοιων was published in 4to. by Valckenaer, L. Bat. 1739.——II. A writer who gave an account of sacrifices, as also a treatise on the harlots of Athens. Athen. 13.——III. An Athenian general, surnamed Barcas. Polyb. 3.

Amphiaraïdes, a patronymic of Alcmæon, as being son of Amphiaraus. Ovid. Fast. 2, v. 43.

Amphictyon, the son of Hellen, who first established the celebrated council of the Amphictyons, composed of the wisest and most virtuous men of some of the cities of Greece. This assembly was at first but inconsiderable; nor did it arrive to its full strength and lustre but by gradual advances, and in a long series of years. Its first origin we are to ascribe to Amphictyon, the son of Deucalion, an ancient king of Thessaly, as the authority of the Arundelian Marbles warrants us to determine. Their testimony is full and explicit, and, on account of the high antiquity of this monument, deserves particular attention. 'Amphictyon, the son of Deucalion, reigned at Thermopylæ, and collected the people bordering on his territory, and called them Amphictyons, and the assembly Pylæa, in the place where the Amphictyons sacrifice to this day.' Androtion asserts, that the convention was at first held at Delphi, and composed only of those who lived in the neighbourhood of this city, and who were called not from Amphictyon, but Αμφικτιονες, the neighbouring inhabitants; but to this again we must oppose the high authority of the Marbles. The assembly, thus formed, was at first but small, being wholly composed of those people whom Deucalion had commanded, and who, from his son Hellen, where called Ἑλλῆες. As Greece improved, and the Hellenes increased in number, new regulations became necessary; and accordingly we find, that, in some time after the original institution, Acrisius, king of Argos, when, through fear of Perseus, (who, as the oracle declared, was to kill him,) he retired into Thessaly, observed the defects of the Amphictyonic council, and undertook to new-model and regulate it; extended its privileges; augmented the number of its members; enacted new laws, by which the collective body was to be governed; and assigned to each state one single deputy, and one single voice, to be enjoyed by some, in their own sole right: by others, in conjunction with one or more inferior states; and thus came to be considered as the founder of this famous representative of the Hellenic body. From the time of Acrisius, the Amphictyons still continued to hold one of their annual councils at Thermopylæ, that of autumn. But it was now made a part of their function to guard and protect the national region. The vernal assembly therefore was held at Delphi, the great seat of the Grecian religion; the object of universal veneration; whither all people, Greeks and Barbarians, resorted, to seek the advice and direction of the famous Pythian oracle. The time of assembling we have said were two in each year. The following history however affords an instance of the Amphictyons assuming a power of assembling oftener, on some extraordinary emergencies. But this seems to have been a corruption introduced by time, or the power of particular parties; and, as such, was condemned and discountenanced. The alterations, made in the council of Amphictyons at different times, seem to have occasioned the difference in historians as to the number and names of the people who had a right to send representatives to that assembly. Agreeably to the dispositions made by Acrisius, twelve cities only were invested with this right, according to Strabo. Æschines and Theopompus also confine it to twelve people, whom the orator calls, not πολεις, cities, but ἔθνη, a word denoting a collection of several particular communities. Pausanius also calls them γενη, a term of like signification. The Amphictyonic people were, according to Æschines, Thessalians, Bœotians, Dorians, Ionians, Perrhæbeans, Magnetes, Locrians, Œteans, Phthiotes, Maleans, Phocians;—to Theopompus: Ionians, Dorians, Perrhæbeans, Bœotians, Magnetes, Achæans, Phthiotes, Maleans, Dolopes, Ænians, Delphians, Phocians;—to Pausanias: Ionians, Dolopes, Thessalians, Ænians, Magnetes, Maleans, Phthiotes, Dorians, Phocians, Locri Epicnemides. Æschines, we see, enumerates but eleven; yet he asserts the number to be twelve. We see, then, how this famous council was formed. The whole nation of Greece was divided into twelve districts or provinces: each of these contained a certain number of Amphictyonic states, or cities, each of which enjoyed an equal right in voting and determining in all affairs relative to the general interest. Other inferior cities were dependant on some of these, and, as members of their community, were also represented by the same deputies; and thus the assembly of the Amphictyons became really and properly the representative of the whole Hellenic body: το κοινον των Ἑλληνων Συνεδριον. Each of those cities, which had a right to assist in the Amphictyonic council, was obliged to send its deputies to every meeting; and the number of these deputies was usually and regularly two: the one entitled hieromnemon, to whom was particularly intrusted the care of religion and its rites. His office was annual, as appears from several decrees, in which his name is joined with that of the Athenian archon επωνυμος; and he was appointed by lot. The other deputy was called by the general name pylagoras, and was chosen by election for each particular meeting. Each of these deputies, however differing in their functions, enjoyed an equal power of determining all affairs relative to the general interest.

And thus the cities which they represented, without any distinction or subordination, each gave two voices in the council of the Amphictyons, a privilege known by the name of the double suffrage. When the deputies, thus appointed, appeared to execute their commission, they in the first place offered up their solemn sacrifices to the gods; to Ceres, when they assembled at Thermopylæ; when at Delphi, to Apollo, Diana, Latona, and Minerva: and before they entered on their function, each deputy was obliged to take an oath, which Æschines hath preserved, or at least some part of it; and which was conceived in these terms: 'I swear that I will never subvert any Amphictyonic city: I will never stop the courses of their waters, neither in war or peace. If any such outrages shall be attempted, I will oppose them by force of arms, and destroy those cities who may be guilty of such attempts. If any devastations shall be committed in the territory of the god; if any shall be privy to such offence or entertain any design against the temple; I will make use of my feet, my hands, my whole force, to bring the offending party to condign punishment. If any one shall violate any part of this solemn engagement, whether city, private person, or country, may such violators be obnoxious to the vengeance of Apollo, Diana, Latona, and Minerva the provident. May their lands never produce their fruits: may their women never bring forth children of the same nature with their parents, but offsprings of an unnatural and monstrous kind: may they be for ever defeated in war, in judicial controversies, and in all civil transactions; and may they, their families, and their whole race, be utterly destroyed: may they never offer up an acceptable sacrifice to Apollo, Diana, Latona, and Minerva the provident; but may all their sacred rights be for ever rejected.' It was the peculiar privilege of one of the hieromnemons to preside in the council. He collected the votes; he reported the resolutions: he had the power of convening the Εκκλησια, or general convention. His name was prefixed to every decree, together with his title, which was that of sovereign pontiff or priest of Apollo. While the generous principles, on which this illustrious body was first formed, continued to preserve their due vigour, the Amphictyons of consequence were respectable, august and powerful. When the nation itself began to degenerate, its representative of course shared in the general corruption. The decline of this council we may therefore date from the time when Philip king of Macedon, began to practise with its members, and prevailed to have his kingdom annexed to the Hellenic body. It continued, however, for ages after the destruction of Grecian liberty, to assemble and to exercise some remains of its authority. In the time of Pausanias, who lived in the reign of Antoninus Pius, the Amphictyonic cities were thirty; but of these the cities of Athens, Delphi, and Nicopolis, only sent their deputies constantly, the rest at particular times in rotation. But as their care was now entirely confined to the rites of their idolatrous worship, and as these came to be forbidden in the time of Constantine, this famous council of Amphictyons seems to have fallen, together with their temple and their religion. Paus. in Phocic. and Achaic.—Strab. ib. —Suidas.—Hesych.—Æschin.

Amphidromia, a festival observed by private families at Athens, the fifth day after the birth of every child. It was customary to run round the fire with a child in their arms; whence the name of the festivals.

Amphilytus, a soothsayer of Acarnania, who encouraged Pisistratus to seize the sovereign power of Athens. Herodot. 1, c. 62.

Amphion, a painter and statuary, son of Acestor of Gnossus. Plin. 36, c. 10. Vid. Part III.

Amphipoles, magistrates appointed at Syracuse, by Timoleon, after the expulsion of Dionysius the younger. The office existed for above 300 years. Diod. 16

Amphitryoniades, a surname of Hercules.

Ampia Labiena Lex, was enacted by T. Ampius and A. Labienus, tribunes of the people, A. U. C. 693. It gave Pompey the great privilege of appearing in triumphal robes and with a golden crown at the Circensian games, and with a prætexta and golden crown at theatrical plays.

Amulius, I. king of Alba, was son of Procas, and youngest brother to Numitor. The crown belonged to Numitor by right of birth, but Amulius dispossessed him of it. Romulus and Remus, when they had attained the years of manhood, put to death the usurper Amulius, and restored the crown to their grandfather. Ovid. Fast. 3, v. 67.—Liv. 1, c. 3 and 4.—Plut. in Romul.—Flor. 1, c. 1.—Dionys. Hal.——II. A celebrated painter. Plin. 35, c. 10.

Amyclas, the master of a ship in which Cæsar embarked in disguise. When Amyclas wished to put back to avoid a violent storm, Cæsar, unveiling his head, discovered himself, and bidding the pilot pursue his voyage, exclaimed, Cæsarem vehis, Cæsarisque fortunam. Lucan. 5, v. 520.

Amyntas, I. was king of Macedonia after his father Alectas. His son Alexander murdered the ambassadors of Megabyzus for their wanton and insolent behaviour to the ladies of his father's court. Bubares, a Persian general, was sent with an army to revenge the death of the ambassadors; but, instead of making war, he married the king's daughter, and defended his possessions. Justin. 7, c. 3.—Herodot. 5, 7 and 8.——The second of that name was son of Menelaus, and king of Macedonia after his murder of Pausanias. He was expelled by the Illyrians, and restored by the Thessalians and Spartans, He made war against the Illyrians and Olynthians, and lived to a great age. His wife Eurydice conspired against his life; but her snares were seasonably discovered by one of his daughters by a former wife. He had Alexander, Perdiccas, and Philip, Alexander the Great's father, by his first wife; and by the other he had Archelaus, Aridæus, and Menelaus. He reigned 24 years; and soon after his death, his son Philip murdered all his brothers and ascended the throne. Justin. 7, c. 4 and 9.—Diod. 14, &c.—C. Nep. and Plut. in Pelopid.——III. Another king of Macedonia, of the same name. ——IV. A man who succeeded Dejotarus in the kingdom of Gallogræcia. After his death it became a Roman province under Augustus. Strab. 12.——V. Another officer who deserted to Darius, and was killed as he attempted to seize Egypt. Curt. 3, c. 9.——VI. A son of Antiochus, who withdrew himself from Macedonia, because he hated Alexander.——VII. An officer in Alexander's cavalry. He was accused of conspiracy against the king, on account of his great intimacy with Philotas, and acquitted. Curt. 4, c. 15, l. 6, c. 9, l. 8, c. 12. ——VIII. A Greek writer, who composed several works quoted by Athenæus 10 and 12.

Amyntianus, an historian in the age of Antoninus, who wrote a treatise in commendation of Philip, Olympias, and Alexander.

Amyrius, a king by whom Cyrus was killed in a battle. Ctesias.

Amytis, I. a daughter of Astyages, whom Cyrus married. Ctesias.——II. A daughter of Xerxes, who married Megabyzus and disgraced herself by her debaucheries.

Anacharsis, a Scythian philosopher, 592 B. C. who, on account of his wisdom, temperance, and extensive knowledge, has been called one of the seven wise men. Like his countrymen, he made use of a cart instead of a house. He was wont to compare laws to cobwebs, which can stop only small flies, and are unable to resist the superior force of large insects. When he returned to Scythia from Athens, where he had spent some time in study, and in the friendship of Solon, he attempted to introduce there the laws of the Athenians, which so irritated his brother, who was then on the throne, that he killed him with an arrow. Anacharsis has rendered himself famous among the ancients by his writings, and his poems on war, the laws of Scythia, &c. Two of his letters to Crœsus and Hanno are still extant. Later authors have attributed to him the invention of tinder, of anchors, and of the potter's wheel. The name of Anacharsis is become very familiar to modern ears, by that elegant, valuable, and truly classical work of Barthelemi, called the Travels of Anacharsis. Herodot. 4, c. 46, 47 and 48.—Plut. in Conviv.—Cic. Tusc. 5, c. 32.—Strab. 7.

Anacreon, a famous lyric poet of Teos, in Ionia, highly favoured by Polycrates and Hipparchus, son of Pisistratus. He was of a lascivious and intemperate disposition, much given to drinking, and deeply enamoured of a youth called Bathylus. His odes are still extant, and the uncommon sweetness and elegance of his poetry have been the admiration of every age and country. He lived to his 85th year, and, after every excess of pleasure and debauchery, choked himself with a grape-stone, and expired. Plato says that he was descended from an illustrious family, and that Codrus, the last king of Athens, was one of his progenitors. His statue was placed in the citadel of Athens, representing him as an old drunken man, singing, with every mark of dissipation and intemperance. Anacreon flourished 532 B. C. All that he wrote is not extant; his odes were first published by H. Stephens, with an elegant translation. The best editions of Anacreon are, that of Maittaire, 4to. London, 1725, of which only one hundred copies were printed, and the very correct one of Barnes, 12mo. Cantab. 1721, to which may be added that of Brunck, 12mo. Argentor. 1778. Paus. 1, c. 2, 25.—Strab. 14.—Ælian. V. H. 9, c. 4.—Cic. in Tusc. 4, c. 33.—Horat. epod. 14, v. 20.—Plin. 7.—Herodot. 3, c. 121.

Anadyomĕne, a valuable painting of Venus represented as rising from the sea, by Apelles, Augustus bought it, and placed it in the temple of J. Cæsar. The lower part of it was a little defaced, and there were found no painters in Rome, able to repair it. Plin. 35, c. 10.

Anagogia, a festival celebrated by the people of Eryx in Sicily, in honour of Venus. Ælian. V. H. 1, c. 15. H. A. 4, c. 2.

Anaxagŏras, I. succeeded his father, Megapenthes, on the throne of Argos. He shared the sovereign power with Bias and Melampus, who had cured the women of Argos of madness. Paus. 2, c. 18.——II. A Clazomenian philosopher, son of Hegesibulus, disciple to Anaximenes, and preceptor to Socrates and Euripides. He disregarded wealth and honours, to indulge his fondness for meditation and philosophy. He applied himself to astronomy, was acquainted with eclipses, and predicted that one day a stone would fall from the sun, which it is said really fell into the river Ægos. Anaxagoras travelled into Egypt for improvement, and used to say that he preferred a grain of wisdom to heaps of gold. Pericles was in the number of his pupils, and often consulted him in matters of state; and once dissuaded him from starving himself to death. The ideas of Anaxagoras concerning the heavens were wild and extravagant. He supposed that the sun was inflammable matter, about the bigness of Peloponnesus: and that the moon was inhabited. The heavens he believed to be of stone, and the earth of similar materials. He was accused of impiety, and condemned to die; but he ridiculed the sentence, and said it had long been pronounced upon him by nature. Being asked whether his body should be carried into his own country, he answered, no, as the road that led to the other side of the grave was as long from one place as the other. His scholar, Pericles, pleaded eloquently and successfully for him, and the sentence of death was exchanged for banishment. In prison, the philosopher is said to have attempted to square the circle, or determine exactly the proportion of its diameter to the circumference. When the people of Lampsacus asked him before his death, whether he wished any thing to be done in commemoration of him, Yes, says he, let the boys be allowed to play on the anniversary of my death. This was carefully observed, and that time, dedicated to relaxation, was called Anaxagoreia. He died at Lampsacus in his seventy-second year, 428 B. C. His writings were not much esteemed by his pupil Socrates. Diog. in Vita.—Plut. in Nicia and Pericl.—Cic. Acad. Q. 4, c. 23.—Tusc. 1, c. 43.——III. A statuary of Ægina. Paus. 5, c. 23.——IV. A grammarian, disciple to Zenodotus. Diog.——V. An orator, disciple to Socrates. Diog.——VI. A son of Echeanax, who, with his brothers Codrus and Diodorus, destroyed Hegesias, tyrant of Ephesus.

Anaxander, of the family of the Heraclidæ, was son of Eurycrates, and king of Sparta. The second Messenian war began in his reign. Herodot. 7. c. 204.—Plut. in Apoph.—Paus. 3, c. 3, l. 4, c. 15 and 16.

Anaxandrides, I. son of Leon, and father to Cleomenes I. and Leonidas, was king of Sparta. By the order of the Ephori he divorced his wife, of whom he was extremely fond, on account of her barrenness; and he was the first Lacedæmonian who had two wives. Herodot. 1, 5 and 7.—Plut. in Apoph. 1.—Paus. 3, c. 3, &c.——II. A comic poet of Rhodes, in the age of Philip and Alexander. He was the first poet who introduced intrigues and rapes upon the stage. He was of such a passionate disposition that he tore to pieces all his compositions which met with no success. He composed about a hundred plays, of which ten obtained the prize. Some fragments of his poetry remain in Athenæus. He was starved to death, by order of the Athenians, for satirizing their government. Aristot. 3, Rhet.

ANAXARCHUS, a philosopher of Abdera, one of the followers of Democritus, and the friend of Alexander. When the monarch had been wounded in a battle, the philosopher pointed to the place, adding, that is human blood and not the blood of a god. The freedom of Anaxarchus offended Nicocreon, and after Alexander's death, the tyrant, in revenge, seized the philosopher, and pounded him in a stone mortar with iron hammers. He bore this with much resignation, and exclaimed, "Pound the body of Anaxarchus, for thou dost not pound his soul." Upon this Nicocreon threatened to cut his tongue, and Anaxarchus bit it off with his teeth, and spit it out into the tyrant's face. Ovid. in Ib. v. 571.—Plut. in Symp. 7.—Diog. in Vitâ.—Cic. in Tusc. 2, c. 22.

ANAXĒNOR, a musician, whom Antony greatly honoured, and presented with the tribute of four cities. Strab. 14.

ANAXĪLĀS, and ANAXĪLAUS, I. a Messenian, tyrant of Rhegium. He took Zancle, and was so mild and popular during his reign, that when he died, 476 B. C. he left his infant sons to the care of one of his servants, and the citizens chose rather to obey a slave than revolt from their benevolent sovereign's children. Justin. 3, c. 2.—Paus. 4, c. 23, l. 5, c. 27.—Thucyd. 6, c. 5.—Herodot. 6, c. 23, l. 7, c. 167.——II. A magician of Larissa, banished from Italy by Augustus.——III. A Lacedæmonian. Plut. Alcib.——IV. A comic writer, about the 100th olympiad.

ANAXILĪDES, wrote some treatises concerning philosophers, and mentioned that Plato's mother became pregnant by a phantom of the god Apollo, from which circumstance her son was called the prince of wisdom. Diog. in Plut.

ANAXIMANDER, a Milesian philosopher, the companion and disciple of Thales. He was the first who constructed spheres, asserted that the earth was of a cylindrical form, and thought that men were born of earth and water mixed together, and heated by the beams of the sun; that the earth moved, and that the moon received light from the sun, which he considered as a circle of fire, like a wheel, about twenty-eight times bigger than the earth. He made the first geographical maps and sun-dials. He died in the 64th year of his age, B. C. 547. Cic. Acad. Quæst. 4, c. 37.—Diog. in Vit.—Plin. 2, c. 79.—Plut. Ph. He had a son who bore his name. Strab. 1.

ANAXIMĒNES, I. a philosopher, son of Erasistratus, and disciple of Anaximander, whom he succeeded in his school. He said that the air was the cause of every created being, and a self-existent divinity, and that the sun, the moon, and the stars, had been made from the earth. He considered the earth as a plain, and the heavens as a solid concave figure, on which the stars were fixed like nails, an opinion prevalent at that time, and from which originated the proverb, τι ει ουρανος εμπεσοι, if the heavens should fall? to which Horace has alluded, 3 Od. 3, v. 7. He died 504 years B. C. Cic. Acad. Quæst. 4, c. 37, de Nat. D. 1, c. 10.—Plut. Ph.—Plin. 2, c. 76.——II. A native of Lampsacus, son of Aristocles. He was pupil to Diogenes the Cynic, and preceptor to Alexander the Great, of whose life, and that of Philip, he wrote the history. When Alexander, in a fit of anger, threatened to put to death all the inhabitants of Lampsacus, because they had maintained a long siege against him, Anaximenes was sent by his countrymen to appease the king, who, as soon as he saw him, swore he would not grant the favour he was going to ask. Upon this Anaximenes begged the king to destroy the city and enslave the inhabitants, and by this artful request the city of Lampsacus was saved from destruction. Besides the life of Philip and his son, he wrote a history of Greece in 12 books, all now lost. His nephew bore the same name, and wrote an account of ancient paintings. Paus. 6, c. 18.—Val. Max. 7, c. 3.—Diog. in Vit.

ANAXIPŎLIS, I. a comic poet of Thasos. Plin. 14, c. 14.——II. A writer on agriculture, likewise of Thasos.

ANAXIPPUS, a comic writer in the age of Demetrius. He used to say that philosophers were wise only in their speeches, but fools in their actions. Athens.

ANAXIS, a Bœotian historian, who wrote a history down to the age of Philip, son of Amyntas. Diod. 25.

ANCHARIA, a family of Rome.——The name of Octavia's mother. Plut. in Anton.

ANCHESĪTES, a wind which blows from Anchisa, a harbour of Epirus. Cic. ad Attic. 7, ep. 1.—Dionys. Hal.

ANCHIMOLIUS, I. a Spartan general sent against the Pisistratidæ, and killed in the expedition. Herodot. 5, c. 63.——II. A son of Rhœtus. Vid. Anchemolus.

ANCHĪSES, a son of Capys by Themis, daughter of Ilus. He was of such a beautiful complexion, that Venus came down from heaven on mount Ida, in the form of a nymph, to enjoy his company. The child which Venus brought forth was called Æneas, and intrusted to the care of Chiron the Centaur. When Troy was taken, Anchises was become so infirm, that Æneas carried him through the flames upon his shoulders, and thus saved his life. He accompanied his son in his voyage towards Italy, and died in Sicily in the 80th year of his age. He was buried on mount Eryx, by Æneas and Acestes, king of the country; and the anniversary of his death was afterwards celebrated by his son and the Trojans on his tomb. Some authors have maintained that Anchises had forgot the injunctions of Venus, and boasted at a feast that he enjoyed her favours on mount Ida, upon which he was killed with thunder. Others say that the wounds he received from the thunder were not mortal, and that they only weakened and disfigured his body. Virgil, in the sixth book of the Æneid, introduces him in the Elysian fields, relating to his son the fates that were to attend him, and the fortune of his descendants the Romans. Vid. Æneas. Virg. Æn. 1, 2, &c.—Hygin. fab. 94, 254, 260, 270.—Hesiod. Theog. v. 1010.—Apollod. 3.—Ovid. Rom.—Pausanias, 8, c. 12, says, that Anchises was buried on a mountain in Arcadia, which from him has been called Anchisia.

Ancīle. Vid. Part III.

Ancus Martius, the 4th king of Rome, was grandson to Numa, by his daughter. He waged a successful war against the Latins, Veientes, Fidenates, Volsci, and Sabines, and joined mount Janiculum to the city by a bridge, and enclosed mount Martius and the Aventine within the walls of the city. He extended the confines of the Roman territories to the sea, where he built the town of Ostia, at the mouth of the Tiber. He inherited the valour of Romulus with the moderation of Numa. He died B. C. 616, after a reign of 24 years, and was succeeded by Tarquin the elder. Dionys. Hal. 3, c. 9.—Liv. 1, c. 32, &c.—Flor. 1, c. 4.—Virg. Æn. 6, v. 815.

Andabātæ, certain gladiators who fought blindfolded; whence the proverb, Andabatarum more, to denote rash and inconsiderate measures. Cic. 6, ad Famil. ep. 10.

Andocīdes, an Athenian orator, son of Leogoras. He lived in the age of Socrates, the philosopher, and was intimate with the most illustrious men of his age. He was often banished, but his dexterity always restored him to favour. Plut. has written his life in 10 orat. Four of his orations are extant.

Andræas, I. a statuary of Argos. Paus. 6, c. 16.——II. A man of Panormus, who wrote an account of all the remarkable events that had happened in Sicily. Athen.

Andrisous, I. a man who wrote a history of Naxos. Athen. 1.——II. A worthless person, called Pseudophilippus on account of the likeness of his features to king Philip. He incited the Macedonians to revolt against Rome, and was conquered and led in triumph by Metellus, 152 B. C. Flor. 2, c. 14.

Androclīdes, I. a noble Theban who defended the democratical against the encroachments of the oligarchical power. He was killed by one of his enemies.——II. A sophist in the age of Aurelian, who gave an account of philosophers.

Andrōclus, a son of Codrus, who reigned in Ionia, and took Ephesus and Samos. Paus. 7, c. 2.

Androcȳdes, a physician, who wrote the following letter to Alexander:—Vinum potaturus, Rex, memento, te bibere sanguinem terræ Sicuti venenum est homini cicuta, sic et vinum. Plin. 14, c. 5.

Androdāmus. Vid. Andromadas.

Andrōdus, a slave known and protected in the Roman circus by a lion whose foot he had cured. Gell. 5, c. 15.

Andrōmăche, a daughter of Eetion, king of Thebes in Cilicia, married Hector son of Priam, king of Troy, by whom she had Astyanax. She was so fond of her husband, that she even fed his horses with her own hand. During the Trojan war she remained at home employed in her domestic concerns. Her parting with Hector, who was going to a battle, in which he perished, has always been deemed the best, most tender, and pathetic of all the passages in Homer's Iliad. She received the news of her husband's death with extreme sorrow; and after the taking of Troy, she had the misfortune to see her only son Astyanax, after she had saved him from the flames, thrown headlong from the walls of the city, by the hands of the man whose father had killed her husband. (Senec. in Troad.) Andromache, in the division of the prisoners by the Greeks, fell to the share of Neoptolemus, who treated her as his wife and carried her to Epirus. He had by her three sons, Molossus, Piclus, and Pergamus, and afterwards repudiated her. After this divorce she married Helenus son of Priam, who, as herself, was a captive of Pyrrhus. She reigned with him over part of the country, and became mother by him of Cestrinus. Some say that Astyanax was killed by Ulysses, and Euripides says that Menelaus put him to death. *Homer. Andromăchus, I. an opulent person of Sicily, father to the historian Timæus. Diod. 16. He assisted Timoleon in recovering the liberty of the Syracusans.——II. A general of Alexander, to whom Parmenio gave the government of Syria. He was burnt alive by the Samaritans. Curt. 4, c. 5 and 8.——III. An officer of Seleucus the younger. Polyæn. 4.

Andromădas, or Androdamus, a native of Rhegium, who made laws for the Thracians concerning the punishment of homicide, &c. Aristot.

Andron, I. a man set over the citadel of Syracuse by Dionysius. Hermocrates advised him to seize it and revolt from the tyrant, which he refused to do. The tyrant put him to death for not discovering that Hermocrates had incited him to rebellion. Polyæn. 5, c. 2.——II. A man of Halicarnassus who composed some historical works. Plut. in Thes.——III. A native of Ephesus, who wrote an account of the seven wise men of Greece. Diog.——IV. Another of Alexandria, &c. Apollon. Hist. Mirab. c. 25.—Athen.

Andronīcus Livius. Vid. Livius.

Andronīcus, I. a peripatetic philosopher of Rhodes, who flourished 50 years B. C. He was the first who published and revised the works of Aristotle and Theophrastus. His periphrasis is extant, the best edition of which is that of Heinsius, 8vo. L. Bat. 1617. Plut. in Syll.——II. A Latin poet in the age of Cæsar.——III. A Latin grammarian, whose life Suetonius has written.——IV. A king of Lydia, surnamed Alpyus.——V. An astronomer of Athens, who built a marble octagonal tower in honour of the eight principal winds, on the top of which was placed a Triton with a stick in his hand, pointing always to the side whence the wind blew.

Androsthĕnes, I. one of Alexander's generals, sent with a ship on the coast of Arabia. Arrian. 7, c. 10.—Strab. 16.——II. A governor of Thessaly, who favoured the interest of Pompey. He was conquered by J. Cæsar. Cæs. 3, Bell. Civ. c. 80.——III. A statuary of Thebes. Paus. 10, c. 19.——IV. A geographer in the age of Alexander.

ANGELION, a statuary, who made Apollo's statue at Delphi. Paus. 2, c. 32.

ANIA, a Roman widow, celebrated for her beauty. One of her friends advised her to marry again. No, (said she,) if I marry a man as affectionate as my first husband, I shall be apprehensive for his death; and if he is bad, why have him, after such a kind and indulgent one?

ANICĒTUS, a freedman who directed the education of Nero, and became the instrument of his crimes. Suet. in Ner.

ANICIA, I. a family at Rome, which, in the flourishing times of the republic, produced many brave and illustrious citizens.——II. A relation of Atticus. C. Nepos.

ANICIUS GALLUS, I. triumphed over the Illyrians and their king Gentius, and was proprætor of Rome, A. U. C. 585.——II. A consul with Corn Cethegus, A. U. C. 594.——III. Probus, a Roman consul in the fourth century, famous for his humanity.

ANNA COMMĒNA, a princess of Constantinople, known to the world for the Greek history which she wrote of her father Alexius, emperor of the east. The character of this history is not very high for authenticity or beauty of composition: the historian is lost in the daughter; and, instead of simplicity of style and narrative, as Gibbon says, an elaborate affectation of rhetoric and science betrays in every page the vanity of a female author. The best edition of Anna Commena is that of Paris, folio, 1651.

ANNÆUS, a Roman family, which was subdivided into the Lucani, Senecæ, Flori, &c.

ANNĀLES, a chronological history, which gives an account of all the important events of every year in a state, without entering into the causes which produced them. The annals of Tacitus may be considered in this light. In the first ages of Rome, the writing of the annals was one of the duties and privileges of the high-priest; whence they have been called Annales Maximi, from the priest Pontifex Maximus, who consecrated them, and gave them as truly genuine and authentic.

ANNĀLIS LEX settled the age at which, among the Romans, a citizen could be admitted to exercise the offices of the state. This law originated in Athens, and was introduced in Rome. No man could be a knight before 18 years of age, nor be invested with the consular power before he had arrived to his 25th year.

ANNIĀNUS, a poet in the age of Trajan.

ANNĪBAL, a celebrated Carthaginian general, son of Amilcar. He was educated in his father's camp, and inured from his early years to the labours of the field. He passed into Spain when nine years old, and at the request of his father, took a solemn oath that he never would be at peace with the Romans. After his father's death he was appointed over the cavalry in Spain; and, some time after, upon the death of Asdrubal, he was invested with the command of all the armies of Carthage, though not yet in the 25th year of his age. In three years of continual success he subdued all the nations of Spain which opposed the Carthaginian power, and took Saguntum after a siege of eight months. The city was in alliance with the Romans; and its fall was the cause of the second Punic war, which Annibal prepared to support with all the courage and prudence of a consummate general. He levied three large armies, one of which he sent to Africa; he left another in Spain; and marched at the head of the third towards Italy. This army some have calculated at 20,000 foot and 6000 horse; others say that it consisted of 100,000 foot, and 20,000 horse. Liv. 21, c. 38. He came to the Alps, and after much trouble gained the top in nine days. The passage of the Alps by this bold leader, which struck the utmost terror into the Romans, appeared to them so prodigious that the embellishments of fiction seemed to add nothing of wonder to the recital, and it soon began to be believed that this extraordinary passage had been effected by the use of vinegar, in which the Alpine rocks were dissolved. Modern writers, however, by the application of a just criticism, and being, moreover, less excited and less interested on this point, have generally assigned to the marvellous story its proper place among the inventions of fancy. An author, nevertheless, of great learning and genius at the present day, seems, by the weight of his opinion to give the story of the older writers fresh currency and new authority; since he manifestly inclines to receive the tradition. He thinks, however, that there might have been one difficulty in the way, and ingenuously allows that he cannot imagine how Annibal obtained a "sufficient supply for his purpose." (See Lemp. Dict. 6th Am. Ed.) He was opposed by the Romans as soon as he entered Italy; and after he had defeated P. Corn. Scipio and Sempronius, near the Rhone, the Po, and the Trebia, he crossed the Apennines and invaded Etruria. He defeated the army of the consul Flaminius near the lake Trasimenus, and soon after met the two consuls, C. Terentius and L. Æmilius at Cannæ. His army consisted of 40,000 foot and 10,000 horse, when he engaged the Romans at the celebrated battle of Cannæ. The slaughter was so great, that no less than 40,000 Romans were killed, and the conqueror made a bridge with the dead carcasses; and, as a sign of his victory, he sent to Carthage three bushels of gold rings, which had been taken from 5630 Roman knights slain in the battle. Had Annibal, immediately after the battle, marched his army to the gates of Rome, it must have yielded amidst the general consternation, if we believe the opinions of some writers; but his delay gave the enemy spirit and boldness, and when at last he approached the walls, he was informed that the piece of ground on which his army then stood, was selling at a high price in the Roman forum. After hovering for some time round the city, he retired to Capua, where the Carthaginian soldiers soon forgot to conquer in the pleasures and riot of this luxurious city. From that circumstance it has been said that Capua was a Cannæ to Annibal. After many important debates in the senate, it was decreed that war should be carried into Africa, to remove Annibal from the gates of Rome: and Scipio, who was the first proposer of the plan, was empowered to put it into execution. When Carthage saw the enemy on her coasts, she recalled Annibal from Italy; and that great general is said to have left, with tears in his eyes, a country which, during sixteen years, he had kept under continual alarms, and which he could almost call his own. He and Scipio met near Carthage, and after a parley, in which neither would give the preference to his enemy, they determined to come to a general engagement. The battle was fought near Zama; Scipio made a great slaughter of the enemy, 20,000 were killed, and the same number made prisoners. Annibal, after he had lost the day, fled to Adrumetum. Soon afterwards Annibal, who was jealous and apprehensive of the Roman power, fled to Syria, to king Antiochus, whom he advised to make war against Rome, and lead an army into the heart of Italy. Antiochus distrusted the fidelity of Annibal, and was conquered by the Romans, who granted him peace on the condition of his delivering their mortal enemy into their hands. Annibal, who was apprized of this, left the court of Antiochus, and fled to Prusias, king of Bithynia. He encouraged him to declare war against Rome, and even assisted him in weakening the power of Eumenes, king of Pergamus, who was in alliance with the Romans. The senate received intelligence that Annibal was in Bithynia, and immediately sent ambassadors, amongst whom was L. Q. Flaminius, to demand him of Prusias. The king was unwilling to betray Annibal, and violate the laws of hospitality, but at the same time he dreaded the power of Rome. Annibal extricated him from his embarrassment; and when he heard that his house was besieged on every side, and all means of escape fruitless, he took a dose of poison, which he always carried with him, in a ring on his finger; and as he breathed his last, he exclaimed, Solvamus diuturnâ curâ populum Romanum, quando mortem senis expectare longum censet. He died in his 70th year, according to some, about 182 years, B. C. That year was famous for the death of the three greatest generals of the age, Annibal, Scipio, and Philopœmen. The death of so formidable a rival was the cause of great rejoicings in Rome; he had always been a professed enemy to the Roman name, and ever endeavoured to destroy its power. If he shone in the field, he also distinguished himself by his studies. He was taught Greek by Sosilus, a Lacedæmonian, and he even wrote some books in that language on different subjects. It is remarkable that the life of Annibal, whom the Romans wished so many times to destroy by perfidy, was never attempted by any of his soldiers or countrymen. He made himself as conspicuous in the government of the state as at the head of armies; and though his enemies reproached him with the rudeness of laughing in the Carthaginian senate, while every senator was bathed in tears for the misfortunes of the country, Annibal defended himself by saying, that he who had been bred all his life in a camp, ought to dispense with all the more polished feelings of a capital. He was so apprehensive for his safety, that when he was in Bithynia his house was fortified like a castle; and on every side there were secret doors, which could give immediate escape, if his life was ever attempted. When he quitted Italy, and embarked on board a vessel for Africa, he strongly suspected the fidelity of his pilot, who told him that the lofty mountain which appeared at a distance was a promontory of Sicily, that he killed him on the spot; and when he was convinced of his fatal error, he gave a magnificent burial to the man whom he had so falsely murdered, and called the promontory by his name. The labours which he sustained, and the inclemency of the weather to which he exposed himself in crossing the Alps, so weakened one of his eyes that he ever after lost the use of it. The Romans have celebrated the humanity of Annibal, who, after the battle of Cannæ, sought the body of the fallen consul amidst the heaps of slain, and honoured it with a funeral becoming the dignity of Rome. He performed the same friendly offices to the remains of Marcellus and Tib. Gracchus, who had fallen in battle. Annibal, when in Spain, married a woman of Castulo. The Romans entertained such a high opinion of him, as a commander, that Scipio, who conquered him, calls him the greatest general that ever lived, and gives the second rank to Pyrrhus the Epirot, and places himself the next to these in merit and abilities. The failure of Annibal's expedition in Italy did not arise from his neglect, but from that of his countrymen, who gave him no assistance. Livy has painted the character of Annibal like an enemy; and it is much to be lamented that this celebrated historian has withheld the tribute due to the merits and virtues of the greatest of generals. *C. A Carthaginian, surnamed Senior. He was conquered by the consul C. Sulpit. Paterculus, in Sardinia, and hung on a cross by his countrymen for his ill success.

Annicĕris, an excellent charioteer of Cyrene, who exhibited his skill in driving a chariot before Plato and the academy. When the philosopher was wantonly sold by Dionysius, Anniceris ransomed his friend; and he showed further his respect for learning, by establishing a sect at Cyrene, called after his name, which supported that all good consisted in pleasure. Cic. de Off. 3.—*Diog. in Plat. & Arist.—Ælian. ANSER, a Roman poet, whom Ovid, Trist. 3, el. 1, v. 425, calls bold and impertinent. Virgil and Propertius are said to have played upon his name with some degree of severity.

ANTÆAS, a king of Scythia, who said that the neighing of a horse was far preferable to the music of Ismenias, a famous musician who had been taken captive. Plut.

ANTAGÓRAS, a Rhodian poet much admired by Antigonus, Id. 1, c. 2. One day, as he was cooking some fish, the king asked him whether Homer ever dressed any meals when he was recording the actions of Agamemnon? And do you think, replied the poet, that he ever inquired whether any individual dressed fish in his army? Plut. Symp. & Apoph.

ANTALCÍDAS, of Sparta, son of Leon, was sent into Persia, where he made a peace with Artaxerxes, very disadvantageous to his country, by which B. C. 387, the Greek cities of Asia became tributary to the Persian monarch. Paus. 9, c. 1, &c.—Diod. 14.—Plut. in Artax.

ANTÆUS PUBLIUS, was appointed over Syria by Nero. He was accused of sedition and conspiracy, and drank poison, which, operating slowly, obliged him to open his veins. Tacit. An. 13, &c.

ANTÉNOR, I. a Trojan prince related to Priam. It is said that during the Trojan war he always kept a secret correspondence with the Greeks, and chiefly with Menelaus and Ulysses. In the council of Priam, Homer introduces him as advising the Trojans to restore Helen and conclude the war. He advised Ulysses to carry away the Trojan palladium, and encouraged the Greeks to make the wooden horse, which, at his persuasion, was brought into the city of Troy by a breach made in the walls. Æneas has been accused of being a partner of his guilt; and the night that Troy was taken, they had a number of Greeks stationed at the doors of their houses, to protect them from harm. After the destruction of his country, Antenor migrated to Italy near the Adriatic, where he built the town of Padua. His children were also concerned in the Trojan war, and displayed much valour against the Greeks. Their names were Polybius, Acamas, Agenor, and, according to others, Polydamas and Helicaon. Liv. 1, c. 1.—Plin. 3, c. 13.—Virg. Æn. 1, v. 242.—Tacit. 16, c. 21.—*Homer. A Cretan who wrote a history of his country. Ælian.

ANTHERMUS, a Chian sculptor, son of Micciades and grandson to Malas. He and his brother Bupalas made a statue of the poet Hipponax, which caused universal laughter, on account of the deformity of its countenance. The poet was so incensed upon this, and inveighed with so much bitterness against the statuaries, that they hung themselves, according to the opinion of some authors. Plin. 36, c. 5.

ANTHES, a native of Anthedon, who first invented hymns. Plut. de Mus.

ANTHESPHORIA, a festival celebrated in Sicily, in honour of Proserpine, who was carried away by Pluto as she was gathering flowers. Claudian. de Rapt. Pros.——Festivals of the same name were also observed at Argos in honour of Juno, who was called Antheia. Paus. Corinth.—Pollux. Onom. 1, c. 1.

ANTHESTERIA, festivals in honour of Bacchus among the Greeks. They were celebrated in the month of February, called Anthesterion, whence the name is derived, and continued three days. The first was called Πιθοιγια απο του πιθους οιγειν, because they tapped their barrels of liquor. The second day was called Χοες, from the measure χους, because every individual drank of his own vessel, in commemoration of the arrival of Orestes, who, after the murder of his mother, came, without being purified, to Demophoon, or Pandion, king of Athens, and was obliged, with all the Athenians, to drink by himself for fear of polluting the people by drinking with them before he was purified of the parricide. It was usual on that day to ride out in chariots, and ridicule those that passed by. The best drinker was rewarded with a crown of leaves, or rather of gold, and with a cask of wine. The third day was called Χυτροι, from Χυτρα, a vessel brought out full of all sorts of seed and herbs, deemed sacred to Mercury, and therefore not touched. The slaves had the permission of being merry and free during these festivals; and at the end of the solemnity a herald proclaimed, Θυραζε, Καρες, ουκ ετ Ανθεστηρια i. e. Depart, ye Carian slaves, the festivals are at an end. Ælian. V. H. 2, c. 41.

ANTIA LEX was made for the suppression of luxury at Rome. The enactor was Antius Restio, who afterwards never supped abroad. Macrob. 3, c. 17.

ANTICLÉA, a daughter of Autolycus and Amphithea. She was pregnant of Ulysses when she married Laertes, king of Ithaca. Laertes was, nevertheless, the reputed father of Ulysses. It is said that Anticlea killed herself when she heard a false report of her son's death. Homer. Od. 11, 19.—Hygin. fab. 201, 243.—Paus. 10, c. 29. Vid. Part III.

ANTICLÍDES, a Greek historian, whose works are now lost. They are often quoted by Athenæus and Plut. in Alex.

ANTICRÁTES, a Spartan, who stabbed Epaminondas, the Theban general, at the battle of Mantinea. Plut. in Ages.

ANTIDŌTUS, an excellent painter, pupil of Euphranor. Plin. 35, c. 11.

ANTIGÉNES, one of Alexander's generals, publicly rewarded for his valour. Curt. 5, c. 14.

ANTIGENÍDAS, a famous musician of Thebes, disciple to Philoxenus.

ANTIGŌNA, daughter of Berenice, was wife to king Pyrrhus. Plut. in Pyrrh.

ANTIGŌNUS, I. one of Alexander's generals, universally supposed to be the illegitimate son of Philip, Alexander's father. In the division of the provinces, after the king's death, he received Pamphylia, Lycia, and Phrygia. He united with Antipater and Ptolemy, to destroy Perdiccas and Eumenes; and after the death of Perdiccas, he made continual war against Eumenes, whom, after three years of various fortune, he took prisoner and ordered to be starved. He afterwards declared war against Cassander, whom he conquered, and had several engagements by his generals with Lysimachus. He obliged Seleucus to retire from Syria, and fly for refuge and safety to Egypt. Ptolemy, who had established himself in Egypt, promised to defend Seleucus; and from that time all friendship ceased between Ptolemy and Antigonus, and a new war was begun, in which Demetrius, the son of Antigonus, conquered the fleet of Ptolemy near the island of Cyprus, and took 16,000 men prisoners, and sunk 200 ships. After this famous naval battle, which happened 26 years after Alexander's death, Antigonus and his son assumed the title of kings, and their example was followed by all the rest of Alexander's generals. The power of Antigonus was now become so formidable, that Ptolemy, Seleucus, Cassander, and Lysimachus, combined together to destroy him; yet Antigonus despised them, saying that he would disperse them as birds. He attempted to enter Egypt in vain, though he gained several victories over his opponents; and he at last received so many wounds in a battle that he could not survive them, and died in the 80th year of his age, 301 B. C. During his life he was master of all Asia Minor as far as Syria. Antigonus was concerned in the different intrigues of the Greeks. He made a treaty of alliance with the Ætolians, and was highly respected by the Athenians, to whom he showed himself very liberal and indulgent. Antigonus discharged some of his officers because they spent their time in taverns, and he gave their commissions to common soldiers, who performed their duty with punctuality. A certain poet called him divine; but the king despised his flattery, and bade him go and inquire of his servants whether he was really what he supposed him. Strab. 13.—Diod. 17, &c.—Paus. 2, c. 6, &c.—Justin. 13, 14, and 15.—C. Nep. in Eumen.—Plut. in Demetr. Eumen. & Arat.——II. Gonatas, son of Demetrius, and grandson to Antigonus, was king of Macedonia. He restored the Armenians to liberty, conquered the Gauls, and at last was expelled by Pyrrhus, who seized his kingdom. After the death of Pyrrhus, he recovered Macedonia, and died after a reign of 34 years, leaving his son Demetrius to succeed, B. C. 243. Justin. 21 and 25.—Polyb.—Plut. in Demetr.——III. The guardian of his nephew Philip, the son of Demetrius, who married the widow of Demetrius, and usurped the kingdom. He was called Doson, from his promising much and giving nothing. He conquered Cleomenes, king of Sparta, and obliged him to retire into Egypt, because he favoured the Ætolians against the Greeks. He died B. C. 221, after a reign of 11 years, leaving his crown to the lawful possessor, Philip, who distinguished himself by his cruelties and the war he made against the Romans. Justin. 28 and 29.—Polyb. 2.—Plut. in Cleom.——IV. A son of Aristobulus, king of Judæa, who obtained an army from the king of Parthia, by promising him 1000 talents and 500 women. With these foreign troops he attacked his country, and cut the ears of Hyrcanus to make him unfit for the priesthood. Herod, with the aid of the Romans, took him prisoner, and he was put to death by Antony. Joseph. 14.—Dion. and Plut. in Anton.——V. Carystius, an historian in the age of Philadelphus, who wrote the lives of some of the ancient philosophers. Diog.—Athen.——VI. A statuary who wrote on his profession.

Antilŏchus, I. a king of Messenia.——II. The eldest son of Nestor, by Eurydice. He went to the Trojan war with his father, and was killed. Homer. Od. 4.—Ovid. Heroid. says he was killed by Hector.——III. A poet who wrote a panegyric upon Lysander, and received a hat filled with silver. Plut. in Lys.

Antimachus, I. an historian.——II. A Greek poet and musician of Ionia in the age of Socrates. He wrote a treatise on the age and genealogy of Homer, and proved him to be a native of Colophon. He repeated one of his compositions before a large audience; but his diction was so obscure and unintelligible, that all retired except Plato; upon which he said, Legam, nihil ominus, Plato enim mihi est unus instar omnium. He was reckoned the next to Homer in excellence, and the emperor Adrian was so fond of his poetry, that he preferred him to Homer. He wrote a poem upon the Theban war; and before he had brought his heroes to the city of Thebes, he had filled twenty-four volumes. He was surnamed Clarius, from Claros, a mountain near Colophon, where he was born. Paus. 9, c. 35.—Plut. in Lysand. & Timol.—Propert. 2, el. 34, v. 45.—Quintil. 10, c. 1.——III. Another poet of the same name, surnamed Psecas, because he praised himself. Suidas.——IV. A Trojan, whom Paris bribed to oppose the restoring of Helen to Menelaus and Ulysses, who had come as ambassadors to recover her. His sons, Hippolochus and Pisander, were killed by Agamemnon. Homer. Il. 11, v. 123, l. 23, v. 188.——V. A native of Heliopolis, who wrote a poem on the creation of the world in 3780 verses.

Antinoeia, annual sacrifices and quinquennial games, in honour of Antinous, instituted by the emperor Adrian, at Mantinea, where Antinous was worshipped as a divinity.

Antinous, a youth of Bithynia, of whom the emperor Adrian was so extremely fond, that at his death he erected a temple to him, and wished it to be believed that he had been changed into a constellation. Some writers suppose that Antinous was drowned in the Nile, while others maintain that he offered himself at a sacrifice as a victim in honour of the emperor. Vid. Part III.

Antiochus, I. surnamed Soter, was son of Seleucus, and king of Syria and Asia. He made a treaty of alliance with Ptolemy Philadelphus, king of Egypt. He fell into a lingering disease, which none of his father's physicians could cure for some time, till it was discovered that his pulse was more irregular than usual when Stratonice, his step-mother, entered his room, and that love for her was the cause of his illness. This was told to the father, who willingly gave Stratonice to his son, that his immoderate love might not cause his death. He died 291 B. C. after a reign of 19 years. Justin. 17, c. 2, &c.—Val. Max. 5.—Polyb. 4.—Appian.——The second of that name, surnamed Theos (God) by the Milesians, because he put to death their tyrant Timarchus, was son and successor of Antiochus Soter. He put an end to the war which had been begun with Ptolemy; and, to strengthen the peace, he married Berenice, the daughter of the Egyptian king. This so offended his former wife, Laodice, by whom he had two sons, that she poisoned him, and suborned Artemon, whose features were similar to his, to represent him as king. Artemon, subservient to her will, pretended to be indisposed, and, as king, called all the ministers, and recommended to them Seleucus, surnamed Callinicus, son of Laodice, as his successor. After this ridiculous imposture, it was made public that the king had died a natural death, and Laodice placed her son on the throne, and despatched Berenice and her son, 246 years before the Christian era. Appian.——The third of that name, surnamed the Great, brother to Seleucus Ceraunus, was king of Syria and Asia, and reigned 36 years. He was defeated by Ptolemy Philopater, at Raphia, after which he made war against Persia, and took Sardes. After the death of Philopater, he endeavoured to crush his infant son Epiphanes; but his guardians solicited the aid of the Romans, and Antiochus was compelled to resign his pretensions. He conquered the greatest part of Greece, of which some cities implored the aid of Rome; and Annibal, who had taken refuge at his court, encouraged him to make war against Italy. He was glad to find himself supported by the abilities of such a general; but his measures were dilatory, and not agreeable to the advice of Annibal and he was conquered, and obliged to retire beyond mount Taurus, and pay a yearly fine of 2000 talents to the Romans. His revenues being unable to pay the fine, he attempted to plunder the temple of Belus, in Susiana, which so incensed the inhabitants that they killed him with his followers, 187 years before the Christian era. In his character of king, Antiochus was humane and liberal, the patron of learning and the friend of merit; and he published an edict, ordering his subjects never to obey except his commands were consistent with the laws of the country. He had three sons, Seleucus Philopater, Antiochus Epiphanes, and Demetrius. The first succeeded him, and the two others were kept as hostages by the Romans. Justin. 31 and 32.—Strab. 16.—Liv. 34, c. 59.—Flor. 2, c. 1.—Appian. Bell. Syr.——The fourth Antiochus, surnamed Epiphanes, or Illustrious, was king of Syria after the death of his brother Seleucus, and reigned eleven years. He destroyed Jerusalem, and was so cruel to the Jews, that they called him Epimanes, or Furious, and not Epiphanes. He attempted to plunder Persepolis without effect. He was of a voracious appetite, and fond of childish diversions; he used, for his pleasure, to empty bags of money in the streets, to see the people's eagerness to gather it; he bathed in the public baths with the populace, and was fond of perfuming himself to excess. He invited all the Greeks he could at Antioch, and waited upon them as a servant, and danced with such indecency among the stage-players, that even the most dissipated and shameless blushed at the sight. Polybius.—Justin. 34, c. 3.——The fifth, surnamed Eupator, succeeded his father Epiphanes on the throne of Syria, 164 B. C. He made a peace with the Jews, and in the second year of his reign was assassinated by his uncle Demetrius, who said that the crown was lawfully his own, and that it had been seized from his father. Justin. 34. —Joseph. 12.——The sixth, king of Syria, was surnamed Eutheus or Noble. His father, Alexander Bala, intrusted him to the care of Malcus, an Arabian; and he received the crown from Tryphon, in opposition to his brother Demetrius, whom the people hated. Before he had been a year on the throne, Tryphon murdered him, 143 B. C. and reigned in his place for three years. Joseph. 13.——The seventh, called Sidetes, reigned nine years. In the beginning of his reign he was afraid of Tryphon, and concealed himself, but he soon obtained the means of destroying his enemy. He made war against Phraates, king of Parthia, and he fell in the battle which was soon after fought, about 130 years before the Christian era. Justin. 36, c. 1.—Appian. Bell. Syr.——The eighth, surnamed Grypus, from his aquiline nose, was son of Demetrius Nicanor, by Cleopatra. His brother Seleucus was destroyed by Cleopatra; and he himself would have shared the same fate, had he not discovered his mother's artifice, and compelled her to drink the poison which was prepared for himself. He killed Alexander Zebina, whom Ptolemy had sent to oppose him on the throne of Syria, and was at last assassinated B. C. 112, after a reign of eleven years. Justin. 39, &c.—Joseph.—Appian.——The ninth, surnamed Cyzenicus, from the city Cyzicus, where he received his education, was son of Antiochus Sidetes, by Cleopatra. He disputed the kingdom with his brother Grypus, who ceded to him Cœlosyria, part of his patrimony. He was at last conquered by his nephew Seleucus, near Antioch, and rather than to continue longer in his hands, he killed himself, B. C. 92. While a private man he seemed worthy to reign; but when on the throne he was dissolute and tyrannical. He was fond of mechanics, and invented some useful military engines. Appian.—Joseph.——The tenth, was ironically surnamed Pius, because he married Selena, the wife of his father and of his uncle. He was the son of Antiochus ninth, and he expelled Seleucus, the son of Grypus, from Syria, and was killed in a battle he fought against the Parthians, in the cause of the Galatians. Joseph.—Appian.—— After his death, the kingdom of Syria was torn to pieces by the factions of the royal family, or usurpers, who, under a good or false title, under the name of Antiochus or his relations, established themselves for a little time as sovereigns either of Syria or Damascus, or other dependent provinces. At last, Antiochus, surnamed Asiaticus, the son of Antiochus the ninth, was restored to his paternal throne by the influence of Lucullus, the Roman general, on the expulsion of Tigranes, king of Armenia, from the Syrian dominions; but, four years after, Pompey deposed him, and observed that he who had hid himself while an usurper sat upon his throne, ought not to be a king. From that time, B. C. 65, Syria became a Roman province, and the race of Antiochus was extinguished. Justin. 40.——A philosopher of Ascalon, famous for his writings, and the respect with which he was treated by his pupils, Lucullus, Cicero, and Brutus. Plut. in Lucull.——An historian of Syracuse, son of Xenophanes, who wrote, besides other works, a history of Sicily, in nine books, in which he began at the age of king Cocalus. Strab.—Diod. 12.——A rich king, tributary to the Romans in the age of Vespasian. Tacit. Hist. 2, c. 81.——A sophist, who refused to take upon himself the government of a state, on account of the vehemence of his passions. ——A king, conquered by Antony, &c. Cæs. 3, Bell. Civ. 4.——A king of Messenia. Paus. 4.——A commander of the Athenian fleet, under Alcibiades, conquered by Lysander. Xenoph. Hist. Græc.——A writer of Alexandria, who published a treatise on comic poets. Athen. ——A sculptor, said to have made the famous statue of Pallas, preserved in the Ludovisi gardens at Rome.

Antipăter, I. son of Iolaus, was soldier under king Philip, and raised to the rank of a general under Alexander the Great. When Alexander went to invade Asia, he left Antipater supreme governor of Macedonia and of all Greece. Antipater exerted himself in the cause of his king; he made war against Sparta, and was soon after called into Persia, with a reinforcement, by Alexander. He had been suspected of giving poison to Alexander, to raise himself to power. After Alexander's death, his generals divided the empire among themselves, and Macedonia was allotted to Antipater. The wars which Greece, and chiefly Athens, meditated during Alexander's life, now burst forth with uncommon fury as soon as the news of his death was received. The Athenians levied an army of 30,000 men, and equipped 200 ships against Antipater, who was master of Macedonia. Their expedition was attended with much success, Antipater was routed in Thessaly, and even besieged in the town of Lamia. But when Leosthenes, the Athenian general, was mortally wounded under the walls of Lamia, the fortune of the war was changed. Antipater obliged the enemy to raise the siege, and soon after received a reinforcement from Craterus from Asia, with which he conquered the Athenians at Cranon in Thessaly. After this defeat, Antipater and Craterus marched into Bœotia, and conquered the Ætolians, and granted peace to the Athenians, on the conditions which Leosthenes had proposed to Antipater when besieged in Lamia, i. e. that he should be absolute master over them. Besides this, he demanded from their ambassadors, Demades, Phocion, and Xenocrates, that they should deliver into his hands the orators Demosthenes and Hyperides, whose eloquence had inflamed the minds of their countrymen, and had been the primary causes of the war. The conditions were accepted, a Macedonian garrison was stationed in Athens, but the inhabitants still were permitted the free use of their laws and privileges. Antipater and Craterus were the first who made hostile preparations against Perdiccas; and, during that time, Polyperchon was appointed over Macedonia. Polyperchon defeated the Ætolians, who made an invasion upon Macedonia. Antipater gave assistance to Eumenes, in Asia, against Antigonus, according to Justin. 14, c. 2. At his death, B. C. 319, Antipater appointed Polyperchon master of all his possessions. Curt. 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, and 10.—Justin. 11, 12, 13, &c.—Diod. 17, 18, &c.—C. Nep. in Phoc. & Eumen. —Plut. in Eumen. Alexand. &c.——II. A son of Cassander, king of Macedonia, and son-in-law of Lysimachus. He killed his mother, because she wished his brother Alexander to succeed to the throne. Alexander, to revenge the death of his mother, solicited the assistance of Demetrius; but peace was re-established between the two brothers, by the advice of Lysimachus, and, soon after, Demetrius killed Antipater, and made himself king of Macedonia, 294 B. C. Justin. 26, c. 1.——III. A king of Macedonia, who reigned only 45 days, 277 B. C. ——IV. A powerful prince, father to Herod. He was appointed governor of Judæa by Cæsar, whom he had assisted in the Alexandrine war. Joseph.——V. One of Alexander's soldiers, who conspired against his life with Hermolaus. Curt. 8, c. 6.——VI. A celebrated sophist of Hieropolis, preceptor to the children of the emperor Severus.——VII. A stoic philosopher of Tarsus, 144 years B. C.——VIII. A poet of Sidon, who could compose a number of verses extempore upon any subject. He ranked Sappho among the muses in one of his epigrams. He had a fever every year on the day of his birth, of which at last he died. He flourished about 80 years B. C. Some of his epigrams are preserved in the Anthologia. Plin. 7, c. 51.—Val. Max. 1, 10.—Cic. de Orat. 3, de Offic. 3, de Quæst. Acad. 4.——IX. A philosopher of Phœnicia, preceptor to Cato of Utica. Plut. in Cat. ——A stoic philosopher, disciple to Diogenes of Babylon. He wrote two books on divination, and died at Athens. Cic. de Div. 1, c 3. —Ac. Quæst. 4, c. 6.—De Offic. 3, c. 12.—— XI. A disciple of Aristotle, who wrote two books of letters.——XII. A poet of Thessalonica, in the age of Augustus.

Antiphĭnes, I. an ingenious statuary, of Argos. Paus. 5, c. 17.——II. A comic poet of Rhodes, Smyrna, or Carystus. He was born B. C. 408, of parents in the low condition of slaves. This most prolific poet, (he is said to have composed upwards of three hundred dramas,) notwithstanding the meanness of his origin, was so popular in Athens, that on his decease a decree was passed to remove his remains from Chios to that city, where they were interred with public honours.——III. A physician of Delos, who used to say that diseases originated from the variety of food that was eaten. Clem. Alex.—Athen.

Antiphĭlus, I. an Athenian who succeeded Leosthenes at the siege of Lamia against Antipater. Diod. 18.——II. A noble painter, who represented a youth leaning over a fire and blowing it, from which the whole house seemed to be illuminated. He was an Egyptian by birth: he imitated Apelles, and was disciple to Ctesidemus. Plin. 35, c. 10.

Antĭphus, a brother of Ctimenus, was son of Ganyctor the Naupactian. These two brothers murdered the poet Hesiod, on the false suspicion that he had offered violence to their sister, and threw his body into the sea. The poet's dog discovered them, and they were seized and convicted of the murder. Plut. de Solert. Anim.

Antisthenes, I. a philosopher, born of an Athenian father and of a Phrygian mother. He taught rhetoric, and had among his pupils the famous Diogenes; but when he had heard Socrates, he shut up his school, and told his pupils, "Go seek for yourselves a master, I have now found one." He was the head of the sect of the cynic philosophers. One of his pupils asked him what philosophy had taught him? "To live with myself," said he. He sold his all, and preserved only a very ragged coat, which drew the attention of Socrates, and tempted him to say to the cynic, who carried his contempt of dress too far, "Antisthenes, I see thy vanity through the holes of thy coat." Antisthenes taught the unity of God, but he recommended suicide. Some of his letters are extant. His doctrines of austerity were followed as long as he was himself an example of the cynical character; but after his death they were all forgotten. Antisthenes flourished 396 years B. C. Cic. Orat. 3, c. 35.—Diog. 6.—Plut. in Lyc. ——II. A disciple of Heraclitus.——III. An historian of Rhodes. Diog.

Antistius Labeo, I. an excellent lawyer at Rome, who defended the liberties of his country against Augustus, for which he is taxed with madness, by Horat. 1, Stat. 3, v. 82.—Sueton. in Aug. 54.——II. Petro of Gabii, was the author of a celebrated treaty between Rome and his country, in the age of Tarquin the Proud. Dionys. Val. 4.

Antomĕnes, the last king of Corinth. After his death magistrates with regal authority were chosen annually.

Antōnia Lex, was enacted by M. Antony, the consul, A. U. C. 710. It abrogated the lex Atia, and renewed the lex Cornelia, by taking away from the people the privilege of choosing priests, and restoring it to the college of priests, to which it originally belonged. Dio. 44.—— Another, by the same. It allowed an appeal to the people, to those who were condemned de majestate, or of perfidious measures against the state.——Another, by the same, during his triumvirate. It made it a capital offence to propose, ever after, the election of a dictator, and for any person to accept of the office. Appian. de Bell. Civ. 3.

Antōnia, I. a daughter of M. Antony, by Octavia. She married Domitius Ænobarbus, and was mother of Nero and two daughters. ——II. A sister of Germanicus.——III. A daughter of Claudius and Ælia Petina. She was of the family of the Tuberos, and was repudiated for her levity. Sueton. in Claud. 1. —Tacit. Ann. 11.——IV. The wife of Drusus, the son of Livia, and brother to Tiberius. She became mother of three children, Germanicus, Caligula's father; Claudius the emperor; and the debauched Livia. Her husband died very early, and she never would marry again, but spent her time in the education of her children. Some people suppose her grandson, Caligula, ordered her to be poisoned, A. D. 38. Val. Max. 4, c. 3.

Antonīnus, I. (Titus,) surnamed Pius, was adopted by the emperor Adrian, to whom he succeeded. This prince is remarkable for all the virtues that can form a perfect statesman, philosopher, and king. He rebuilt whatever cities had been destroyed by wars in former reigns. He suffered the governors of the provinces to remain long in the administration, that no opportunity of extortion might be given to new comers. When told of conquering heroes, he said with Scipio, I prefer the life and preservation of a citizen to the death of one hundred enemies. He did not persecute the Christians like his predecessors, but his life was a scene of universal benevolence. His last moments were easy, though preceded by a lingering illness. He extended the boundaries of the Roman province in Britain, by raising a rampart between the Friths of Clyde and Forth; but he waged no war during his reign, and only repulsed the enemies of the empire who appeared in the field. He died in the 75th year of his age, after a reign of 23 years, A. D. 161. He was succeeded by his adopted son, M. Aurelius Antoninus, surnamed the philosopher, a prince as virtuous as his father. He raised to the imperial dignity his brother L. Verus, whose voluptuousness and dissipation were as conspicuous as the moderation of the philosopher. During their reign, the Quadi, Parthians, and Marcomanni were defeated. Antoninus wrote a book in Greek, entitled, τωνὰ ἑαυτον, concerning himself; the best editions of which are the 4to. Cantab. 1659, and the 8vo. Oxon. 1704. After the war with the Quadi had been finished, Verus died of an apoplexy, and Antoninus survived him eight years, and died in his 61st year, after a reign of 29 years and ten days. Dio Cassius.——II. Bassianus Caracalla, son of the emperor Septimus Severus, was celebrated for his cruelties. He killed his brother Geta in his mother's arms, and attempted to destroy the writings of Aristotle, observing that Aristotle was one of those who sent poison to Alexander. He married his mother, and publicly lived with her; which gave occasion to the people of Alexandria to say that he was an Œdipus, and his wife a Jocasta. He was assassinated at Edessa by Macrinus, April 8, in the 43d year of his age, A. D. 217. His body was sent to his wife Julia, who stabbed herself at the sight. There is extant a Greek itinerary, and another book, called Iter Britannicum, which some have attributed to the emperor Antoninus, though it was more probably written by a person of that name whose age is unknown.

M. Antōnius Gnipho, I. a poet of Gaul, who taught rhetoric at Rome; Cicero and other illustrious men frequented his school.——II. An orator, grandfather to the triumvir of the same name. He was killed in the civil wars of Marius, and his head was hung in the forum. Val. Max. 9, c. 2.—Lucan. 2, v. 121.——III. Marcus, the eldest son of the orator of the same name, by means of Cotta and Cethegus obtained from the senate the office of managing the corn on the maritime coasts of the Mediterranean with unlimited power. This gave him many opportunities of plundering the provinces and enriching himself. He died of a broken heart. Sallust. Frag.——IV. Caius, a son of the orator of that name, who obtained a troop of horse from Sylla, and plundered Achaia. He was carried before the prætor M. Lucullus, and banished from the senate by the censors, for pillaging the allies, and refusing to appear when summoned before justice.——V. Caius, son of Antonius Caius, was consul with Cicero, and assisted him to destroy the conspiracy of Catiline in Gaul. He went to Macedonia as his province, and fought with ill success against the Dardani. He was accused at his return and banished.——VI. Marcus, the triumvir, was grandson to the orator M. Antonius, and son of Antonius, surnamed Cretensis, from his wars in Crete. He was augur and tribune of the people, in which he distinguished himself by his ambitious views. When the senate was torn by the factions of Pompey's and Cæsar's adherents, Antony proposed that both should lay aside the command of their armies in the provinces; but as this proposition met not with success, he privately retired from Rome to the camp of Cæsar, and advised him to march his army to Rome. In support of his attachment, he commanded the left wing of his army at Pharsalia; and, according to a premeditated scheme, offered him a diadem in the presence of the Roman people. He besieged Mutina, which had been allotted to D. Brutus, for which the senate judged him an enemy to the republic, at the remonstration of Cicero. He was conquered by the consuls Hirtius and Pansa, and by young Cæsar, who soon after joined his interest with that of Antony, and formed the celebrated triumvirate, which was established with such cruel proscriptions, that Antony did not even spare his own uncle that he might strike off the head of his enemy Cicero. The triumvirate divided the Roman empire among themselves; and Antony returned into the east, where he enlarged his dominions by different conquests. Antony had married Fulvia, whom he repudiated to marry Octavia the sister of Augustus, and by this conjunction to strengthen the triumvirate. He assisted Augustus at the battle of Philippi against the murderers of J. Cæsar, and he buried the body of M. Brutus, his enemy, in a most magnificent manner. During his residence in the east he became enamoured of Cleopatra, queen of Egypt, and repudiated Octavia to marry her. This devorce incensed Augustus, who now prepared to deprive Antony of all his power. The two enemies met at Actium, where a naval engagement soon began, and Cleopatra, by flying with 60 sail, drew Antony from the battle and ruined his cause. After the battle of Actium, Antony followed Cleopatra into Egypt, where he was soon informed of the defection of all his allies and adherents, and saw the conqueror on his shores. He stabbed himself, and died in the 56th year of his age, B. C. 30; and the conqueror shed tears when he was informed that his enemy was no more. Antony left seven children by his three wives. In his public character Antony was brave and courageous; but with the intrepidity of Cæsar, he possessed all his voluptuous inclinations. It is said that the night of Cæsar's murder Cassius supped with Antony; and being asked whether he had a dagger with him, answered, Yes, if you, Antony, aspire to sovereign power. Plutarch has written an account of his life. Virg. Æn. 8, v. 685.—Horat. ep. 9.—Juv. 10, v. 122.—C. Nep. in Attic.—Cic. in Philip.—Justin. 41 and 42.——VII. Julius, son of Antony, the triumvir, by Fulvia, was consul with Paulus Fabius Maximus. He was surnamed Africanus, and put to death by order of Augustus. Some say that he killed himself. It is supposed that he wrote an heroic poem on Diomede, in 12 books. Horace dedicated his 4 Od. 2. to him. Tacit. 4, Ann. c. 44.——VIII. Lucius, the triumvir's brother, was besieged in Pelusium by Augustus, and obliged to surrender himself, with 300 men, by famine. The conqueror spared his life. Some say that he was killed at the shrine of Cæsar.——IX. Julius, was put to death by Augustus, for his criminal conversation with Julia.

Antorides, a painter, disciple to Aristippus. Plin.

Apama, I. a daughter of Artaxerxes, who married Pharnabazus, satrap of Ionia.——II. A daughter of Antiochus. Paus. 1, c. 8.

Apame, I. the mother of Nicomedes, by Prusias, king of Bithynia.——II. The mother of Antiochus Soter, by Seleucus Nicanor.

Apella, a word, Horat. 1, Sat. 5, v. 10, which has given much trouble to critics and commentators. Some suppose it to mean circumcised, (sine pelle,) an epithet highly applicable to a Jew. Others maintain that it is a proper name, upon the authority of Cicero, ad Attic. 12, ep. 19, who mentions a person of the same name.

Apelles, a celebrated painter of Cos, or as others say, of Ephesus, or Colophon, son of Pithius. He lived in the age of Alexander the Great, who honoured him so much that he forbade any man but Appelles to draw his picture. He was so attentive to his profession, that he never spent a day without employing his pencil; whence the proverb of Nulla dies sine linea. His most perfect picture was Venus Anadyomene, which was not totally finished when the painter died. He made a painting of Alexander holding thunder in his hand, so much like life, that Pliny, who saw it, says that the hand of the king with the thunder seemed to come out of the picture. This picture was placed in Diana's temple at Ephesus. He made another of Alexander, but the king expressed not much satisfaction at the sight of it; and at that moment a horse passing by, neighed at the horse which was represented in the piece, supposing it to be alive; upon which the painter said, "One would imagine that the horse is a better judge of painting than your majesty." When Alexander ordered him to draw the picture of Campaspe, one of his mistresses, Apelles became enamoured of her, and the king permitted him to marry her. He wrote three volumes upon painting, which were still extant in the age of Pliny. It is said that he was accused in Egypt of conspiring against the life of Ptolemy; and that he would have been put to death had not the real conspirator discovered himself and saved the painter. Apelles never put his name to any pictures but three; a sleeping Venus, Venus Anadyomene, and an Alexander. The proverb of Ne sutor ultra crepidam, is applied to him by some. Plin. 35, c. 10.—Horat. 2, ep. 1, v. 238.—Cic. in Famil. 1, ep. 9.—Ovid. de Art. Am. 3, v. 401.—Val. Max. 8, c. 11.

Apellicon, a Teian peripatetic philosopher, whose fondness for books was so great that he is accused of stealing them when he could not obtain them with money. He bought the works of Aristotle and Theophrastus, but greatly disfigured them by his frequent interpolations. The extensive library which he had collected at Athens, was carried to Rome when Sylla had conquered the capital of Attica; and among the valuable books was found an original manuscript of Aristotle. He died about 86 years before Christ. Strab. 13.

Aper, Marcus, I. a Latin orator of Gaul, who distinguished himself as a politician as well as by his genius. The dialogue of the orators, inserted with the works of Tacitus and Quintilian, is attributed to him. He died A. D. 85. ——II. Another. Vid. Numerianus.

Apharēus, I. a king of Messenia, who married Arene daughter of Œbalus, by whom he had three sons.——II. The step-son of Isocrates. He began to exhibit Olymp. cii. B. C. 368, and continued to compose till B. C. 341. He produced thirty-five or thirty-seven tragedies, and was four times victor.

Aphellas, a king of Cyrene, who, with the aid of Agathocles, endeavoured to reduce all Africa under his power. Justin. 22, c. 7.

Aphrices, an Indian prince, who defended the rock Aornus with 20,000 foot and 15 elephants. He was killed by his troops, and his head sent to Alexander.

Aphrodisia, festivals in honour of Venus, celebrated in different parts of Greece, but chiefly in Cyprus. They were first instituted by Cinyras, from whose family the priests of the goddess were always chosen. All those that were initiated offered a piece of money to Venus, and received, as a mark of the favours of the goddess, a measure of salt and a φαλλος; the salt, because Venus arose from the sea; the φαλλος, because she is the goddess of wantonness. They were celebrated at Corinth by harlots, and in every part of Greece they were very much frequented. Strab. 14.—Athen.

Apiānus, or Apion, was born at Oasis in Egypt, whence he went to Alexandria, of which he was deemed a citizen. He succeeded Theus in the profession of rhetoric in the reign of Tiberius, and wrote a book against the Jews, which Josephus refuted. He was at the head of an embassy which the people of Alexandria sent to Caligula to complain of the Jews. Seneca, ep. 88.—Plin. præf. Hist.

Apicius, a famous glutton in Rome. There were three of the same name, all famous for their voracious appetite. The first lived in the time of the republic, the second in the reign of Augustus and Tiberius, and the third under Trajan. The second was the most famous, as he wrote a book on the pleasures and incitements of eating. He hanged himself after he had consumed the greatest part of his estate. The best edition of Apicius Cœlius de Arte Coquinariâ, is that of Amst. 12mo. 1709. Juv. 11. v. 3.—Martial. 2, ep. 69.

Apollinares Ludi, games celebrated at Rome in honour of Apollo. The people generally sat crowned with laurel at the representation of these games, which were usually celebrated at the option of the prætor, till the year U. C. 545, when a law was passed to settle the celebration yearly on the same day, about the nones of July. When this alteration happened, Rome was infested with a dreadful pestilence, which, however, seemed to be appeased by this act of religion. Liv. 25, c. 12.

Apollināris, C. Sulpitius, I. a grammarian of Carthage in the second century, who is supposed to be the author of the verses prefixed to Terence's plays as arguments.——II. A writer better known by the name of Sidonius. Vid. Sidonius.

Apollocrātes, a friend of Dion, supposed by some to be the son of Dionysius.

Apollodōrus, I. a famous grammarian and mythologist of Athens, son of Asclepias, and disciple to Panætius, the Rhodian philosopher. He flourished about 115 years before the Christian era, and wrote a history of Athens besides other works. But of all his compositions, nothing is extant but his Bibliotheca, a valuable work, divided into three books. It is an abridged history of the gods and of the ancient heroes, of whose actions and genealogy it gives a true and faithful account. The best edition is that of Heyne, Goett. in 8vo. 4 vols. 1782. Athen.—Plin. 7, c. 37.—Diod. 4 and 13.——II. A tragic poet of Cilicia, who wrote tragedies entitled Ulysses, Thyestes, &c.——III. A comic poet of Gela in Sicily, in the age of Menander, who wrote 47 plays. He was one of the six writers whom the ancient critics selected as the models of the New Comedy. The other five were Philippides, Philemon, Menander, Diphilus, and Posidippus. Terence copied his Hecyra, and Phormio from two of his dramas; all of which, though very numerous, are now lost, save the titles of eight, with a few fragments.——IV. An architect of Damascus, who directed the building of Trajan's bridge across the Danube. He was put to death by Adrian, to whom, when in a private station, he had spoken in too bold a manner.——V. A disciple of Epicurus, the most learned of his school, and deservedly surnamed the illustrious. He wrote about 40 volumes on different subjects. Diog.——VI. A painter of Athens, of whom Zeuxis was a pupil. Two of his paintings were admired at Pergamus in the age of Pliny: a priest in a suppliant posture, and Ajax struck with Minerva's thunders. Plin. 35, c. 9.——VII. A statuary in the age of Alexander. He was of such an irascible disposition, that he destroyed his own pieces upon the least provocation. Plin. 34, c. 8.——VIII. A rhetorician of Pergamus, preceptor and friend to Augustus, who wrote a book on rhetoric. Strab. 13.

Apollonia, a festival at Ægialea, in honour of Apollo and Diana. It arose from this circumstance: these two deities came to Ægialea after the conquest of the serpent Python; but they were frightened away, and fled to Crete. Ægialea was soon visited with an epidemical distemper, and the inhabitants, by the advice of their prophets, sent seven chosen boys, with the same number of girls, to entreat them to return to Ægialea. Apollo and Diana granted their petition, in honour of which a temple was raised to πειθω, the goddess of persuasion; and, ever after, a number of youths, of both sexes, were chosen to march in solemn procession, as if anxious to bring back Apollo and Diana. Pausan. in Corinth.

Apolloniades, a tyrant of Sicily, compelled to lay down his power by Timoleon.

Apollonides, a physician of Cos, at the court of Artaxerxes, who became enamoured of Amytis, the monarch's sister, and was some time after put to death for slighting her after the reception of her favours.

Apollonius, I. a stoic philosopher of Chalcis, sent for by Antoninus Pius, to instruct his adopted son Marcus Antoninus. When he came to Rome, he refused to go to the palace, observing, that the master ought not to wait upon his pupil, but the pupil upon him. The emperor, hearing this, said, laughing, "It was, then, easier for Apollonius to come from Chalcis to Rome than from Rome to the palace."——II. A geometrician of Perga in Pamphylia, whose works are now lost. He lived about 242 years before the Christian era, and composed a commentary on Euclid, whose pupils he attended at Alexandria. He wrote a treatise on conic sections, edited by Dr. Halley, Oxon. fol. 1710.——III. A poet of Naucratis, according to some authorities, or, according to others, of Alexandria, generally called Apollonius of Rhodes, because he lived for some time there. He was pupil, when young, to Callimachus and Panætius, and succeeded to Eratosthenes, as third librarian of the famous library of Alexandria, under Ptolemy Evergetes. He was ungrateful to his master, Callimachus, who wrote a poem against him, in which he denominated him Ibis. Of all his works nothing remains but his poem on the expedition of the Argonauts, in four books. The best editions of Apollonius are those printed at Oxford, in 4to. by Shaw, 1777, in 2 vols. and in 1, 8vo. 1779, and that of Brunck, Argentor, 12mo. 1780. Quintil. 10, c. 1.——IV. A Greek orator, surnamed Molo, was a native of Alabanda in Caria. He opened a school of rhetoric at Rhodes and Rome, and had J. Cæsar and Cicero among his pupils. He discouraged the attendance of those whom he supposed incapable of distinguishing themselves as orators, and he recommended to them pursuits more congenial to their abilities. He wrote a history, in which he did not candidly treat the people of Judæa, according to the complaint of Josephus contra Apion. Cic. de Orat. 1, c. 28, 75, 126, and 130. Ad. Famil. 3, ep. 16. De Invent. 1, c. 81. —Quintil. 3, c. 1, l. 2, c. 6.—Suet. in Cæs. 4.—Plut. in Cæs.——V. A Greek historian, about the age of Augustus, who wrote upon the philosophy of Zeno and of his followers. Strab. 14.——VI. Thyaneus, a Pythagorean philosopher, well skilled in the art of imposture. One day, while haranguing the populace at Ephesus, he suddenly exclaimed, "Strike the tyrant!—strike him! The blow is given; he is wounded, and fallen!" At that very moment the emperor Domitian had been stabbed at Rome. He was courted by kings and princes, and commanded unusual attention by his numberless artifices. His friend and companion, called Damis, wrote his life, which 200 years after engaged the attention of Philostratus. In his history, the biographer relates so many curious and extraordinary anecdotes of his hero, that many have justly deemed it a romance; yet for all this, Hierocles had the presumption to compare the impostures of Apollonius with the miracles of Jesus Christ.——VII. A sophist of Alexandria, distinguished for his Lexicon Græcum Iliadis et Odysseæ, a book that was beautifully edited by Villoison, in 4to. 2 vols. Paris, 1773. Apollonius was one of the pupils of Didymus, and flourished in the beginning of the first century.

Apollŏphănes, a stoic, who greatly flattered king Antigonus, and maintained that there existed but one virtue, prudence. Diog.

Aponius, M. a governor of Mœsia, rewarded with a triumphal statue by Otho, for defeating 9000 barbarians. Tacit. Hist. 1, c. 79.

Apotheōsis, a ceremony observed by the ancient nations of the world, by which they raised their kings, heroes, and great men, to the rank of deities. The nations of the East were the first who paid divine honours to their great men, and the Romans followed their example, and not only deified the most prudent and humane of their emperors, but also the most cruel and profligate. Herodian. 4, c. 2, has left us an account of the apotheosis of a Roman emperor. After the body of the deceased was burnt, an ivory image was laid on a couch for seven days, representing the emperor under the agonies of disease. The city was in sorrow, the senate visited it in mourning, and the physicians pronounced it every day in a more decaying state. When the death was announced, a young band of senators carried the couch and image to the Campus Martius, where it was deposited on an edifice in the form of a pyramid, where spices and combustible materials were thrown. After this the knights walked round the pile in solemn procession, and the images of the most illustrious Romans were drawn in state, and immediately the new emperor, with a torch set fire to the pile, and was assisted by the surrounding multitude. Meanwhile an eagle was let fly from the middle of the pile, which was supposed to carry the soul of the deceased to heaven, where he was ranked among the gods. If the deified was a female, a peacock, and not an eagle, was sent from the flames. The Greeks observed ceremonies much of the same nature.

Appianus, a Greek historian of Alexandria, who flourished A. D. 123. His universal history, which consisted of 24 books, was a series of history of all the nations that had been conquered by the Romans in the order of time; and in the composition the writer displayed, with a style simple and unadorned, a great knowledge of military affairs, and described his battles in a masterly manner. This excellent work is greatly mutilated, and there is extant now only the account of the Punic, Syrian, Parthian, Mithridatic, and Spanish wars, with those of Illyricum and the civil dissentions, with a fragment of the Celtic wars. The best editions are those of Tollius and Variorum, 2 vols. 8vo. Amst. 1670, and that of Schweigheuserus, 3 vols. 8vo. Lips. 1785. He was so eloquent that the emperor highly promoted him in the state. He wrote a universal history in 24 books, which began from the time of the Trojan war, down to his own age. Few books of this valuable work are extant.

Appius, the prænomen of an illustrious family at Rome.——A censor of that name, A. U. C. 442. Horat. 1, Sat. 6.

Appius Claudius, I. a decemvir, who obtained his power by force and oppression. He attempted the virtue of Virginia, whom her father killed to preserve her chastity. This act of violence was the cause of a revolution in the state, and the ravisher destroyed himself when cited to appear before the tribunal of his country. Liv. 3, c. 33.——II. Claudius Cæcus, a Roman orator, who built the Appian way, and many aqueducts in Rome. When Pyrrhus, who was come to assist the Tarentines against Rome, demanded peace of the senators, Appius, grown old in the service of the republic, caused himself to be carried to the senate-house, and, by his authority, dissuaded them from granting a peace which would prove dishonourable to the Roman name. Ovid. Fast. 6, v. 203. Cic. in Brut. & Tusc. 4.——III. A Roman, who, when he heard that he had been proscribed by the triumvirs, divided his riches among his servants, and embarked with them for Sicily. In their passage the vessel was shipwrecked, and Appius alone saved his life. Appian. 4.——IV. Claudius Crassus, a consul, who, with Sp. Naut. Rutulius, conquered the Celtiberians, and was defeated by Perseus, king of Macedonia. Liv. ——V. Claudius Pulcher, a grandson of Ap. Cl. Cæcus, consul in the age of Sylla, retired from grandeur to enjoy the pleasures of a private life.——VI. Clausus, a general of the Sabines, who, upon being ill-treated by his countrymen, retired to Rome with 5000 of his friends, and was admitted into the senate in the early ages of the republic. Plut. in Poplic.——VII. Herdonius, seized the capital with 4000 exiles, A. U. C. 292, and was soon after overthrown. Liv. 3, c. 15.—Flor. 3, c. 19.——VIII. Claudius Lentulus, a consul with M. Perpenna.——IX. A dictator who conquered the Hernici.——The name of Appius was common in Rome, and particularly to many consuls whose history is not marked by any uncommon event.

Apries, and Aprius, one of the kings of Egypt in the age of Cyrus, supposed to be the Pharaoh Hophra of Scripture. He took Sidon, and lived in great prosperity till his subjects revolted to Amasis, by whom he was conquered and strangled. Herodot. 2, c. 159, &c.—Diod. 1.

Apsinus, an Athenian sophist in the third century, author of a work called Præceptor de Arte Rhetoricâ.

Apuleia Lex, was enacted by L. Apuleius, the tribune, A. U. C. 652, for inflicting a punishment upon such as were guilty of raising seditions, or showing violence in the city.——Varilia, a grand-daughter of Augustus, convicted of adultery with a certain Manlius in the reign of Tiberius. Tacit. An. c. 50.

Apuleius, a learned man, born at Madaura in Africa. He studied at Carthage, Athens, and Rome, where he married a rich widow called Pudentilla, for which he was accused by some of her relations of using magical arts to win her heart. His apology was a masterly composition. In his youth Apuleius had been very profuse; but he was, in a maturer age, more devoted to study, and learnt Latin without a master. The most famous of his works extant is the golden ass, in eleven books, an allegorical piece, replete with morality. The best editions of Apuleius are the Delphin, 2 vols. 4to. Paris, 1688, and Pricæi, 8vo. Goudæ, 1650.

Aquilius Niger, Sabinus, I. a lawyer of Rome, surnamed the Cato of his age. He was father to Aquilia Severa, whom Heliogabalus married.——II. Severus, a poet and historian in the age of Valentinian.

Aquillia and Aquilia, a patrician family at Rome, from which few illustrious men rose.

Aquĭlo, a wind blowing from the north. Its name is derived, according to some, from Aquila, on account of its keenness and velocity.

Ara, a constellation, consisting of seven stars, near the tail of the Scorpion. Ovid. Met. 2, v. 138.

Arabarches, a vulgar person among the Egyptians, or perhaps a usual expression for the leaders of the Arabians, who resided in Rome. Juv. 1, v. 130. Some believe that Cicero, 2, ep. 17, ad Attic. alluded to Pompey under the name of Arabarches.

Araros, son of Aristophanes, was the contemporary of Eubulus. Under his name the two last pieces of his father were represented, whose talents he by no means possessed. Nicostratus and Philippus, two other sons of Aristophanes, are also recorded among the poets of the Middle Comedy. The titles of several comedies written by these three brothers are preserved in Athenæus.

Aratus, I. a Greek poet of Cilicia, about 277 B. C. He was greatly esteemed by Antigonus Gonatas, king of Macedonia, at whose court he passed much of his time, and by whose desire he wrote a poem on astronomy, in which he gives an account of the situations, rising and setting, number and motion of the stars. Cicero represents him as unacquainted with astrology, yet capable of writing upon it in elegant and highly finished verses, which, however, from the subject, admit of little variety. Aratus wrote, besides, hymns and epigrams, &c. and had among his interpreters and commentators many of the learned men of Greece whose works are lost, besides Cicero, Claudius, and Germanicus Cæsar, who, in their youth or moments of relaxation, translated the phænomena into Latin verse. The best editions of Aratus are Grotius, 4to. apud Raphaleng. 1600; and Oxon. 8vo. 1672. Cic. de Nat. D. 2, c. 41.—Paus. 1, c. 2. —Ovid. Am. 1, el. 15, v. 26.——II. The son of Clinias and Aristodama, was born at Sicyon in Achaia, near the river Asopus. When he was but seven years of age, his father, who held the government of Sicyon, was assassinated by Abantidas, who made himself absolute. After some revolutions the sovereignty came into the hands of Nicocles, whom Aratus murdered to restore his country to liberty. He was so jealous of tyrannical power, that he even destroyed a picture which was the representation of a tyrant. He joined the republic of Sicyon in the Achæan league, which he strengthened by making a treaty of alliance with the Corinthians, and with Ptolemy, king of Egypt. He was chosen chief commander of the forces of the Achæans, and drove away the Macedonians from Athens and Corinth. He made war against the Spartans, but was conquered in a battle by their king Cleomenes. To repair the losses he had sustained, he solicited the assistance of king Antigonus, and drove away Cleomenes from Sparta, who fled to Egypt, where he killed himself. The Ætolians soon after attacked the Achæans; and Aratus, to support his character, was obliged to call to his aid Philip, king of Macedonia. His friendship with this new ally did not long continue. Philip showed himself cruel and oppressive; and put to death some of the noblest of the Achæans, and even seduced the wife of the son of Aratus. Aratus, who was now advanced in years, showed his displeasure by withdrawing himself from the society and friendship of Philip. But this rupture was fatal. Philip dreaded the power and influence of Aratus, and therefore he caused him and his son to be poisoned. Some days before his death Aratus was observed to spit blood; and when apprized of it by his friends, he replied, "Such are the rewards which a connexion with kings will produce." He was buried with great pomp by his countrymen; and two solemn sacrifices were annually made to him, the first on the day that he delivered Sicyon from tyranny, and the second on the day of his birth. During those sacrifices, which were called Aratcia, the priests wore a riband bespangled with white and purple spots, and the public schoolmaster walked in procession at the head of his scholars, and was always accompanied by the richest and most eminent senators adorned with garlands. Aratus died in the 62d year of his age, B. C. 213. He wrote a history of the Achæan league, much commended by Polybius. Plut. in vita.—Paus. 2, c. 8.—Cic. de Offic. 2, c. 23.—Strab. 14.—Liv. 27, c. 31.—Polyb. 2.

Arbaces, a Mede, who revolted with Belesis against Sardanapalus, and founded the empire of Media upon the ruins of the Assyrian power, 820 years before the Christian era. He reigned above fifty years, and was famous for the greatness of his undertakings as well as for his valour. Justin. 1, c. 3.—Paterc. 1, c. 6.

Arbuscula, an actress on the Roman stage, who laughed at the hisses of the populace while she received the applauses of the knights. Hor. 1, Sat. 10, v. 77.

Arcadius, eldest son of Theodosius the Great, succeeded his father A. D. 395. Under him the Roman power was divided into the eastern and western empire. He made the eastern empire his choice, and fixed his residence at Constantinople; while his brother Honorius was made emperor of the west, and lived in Rome. After this separation of the Roman empire the two powers looked upon one another with indifference; and, soon after, their indifference was changed into jealousy, and contributed to hasten their mutual ruin. In the reign of Arcadius, Alaricus attacked the western empire and plundered Rome. Arcadius married Eudoxia, a bold ambitious woman, and died in the 31st year of his age, after a reign of 13 years, in which he bore the character of an effeminate prince, who suffered himself to be governed by favourites, and who abandoned his subjects to the tyranny of ministers, while he lost himself in the pleasures of a voluptuous court.

Arcesilaus, I. son of Battus, king of Cyrene, was driven from his kingdom in a sedition, and died B. C. 575.——II. One of Alexander's generals, who obtained Mesopotamia at the general division of the provinces after the king's death.——III. A chief of Catana, which he betrayed to Dionysius the elder. Diod. 14.——IV. A philosopher of Pitane in Æolia, disciple of Polemon. He visited Sardes and Athens, and was the founder of the middle academy, as Socrates founded the ancient and Carneades the new one. He pretended to know nothing, and accused others of the same ignorance. He acquired many pupils in the character of teacher; but some of them left him for Epicurus, though no Epicurean came to him; which gave him occasion to say, that it is easy to make a eunuch of a man, but impossible to make a man of a eunuch. He was very fond of Homer, and generally divided his time among the pleasures of philosophy, love, reading, and the table. He died in his 75th year, B. C. 241, or 300, according to some. Diog. in vitâ.—Persius, 3, v. 78.—Cic. de Finib.

Archæanax, of Mitylene, was intimate with Pisistratus, tyrant of Athens. He fortified Sigæum with a wall from the ruins of ancient Troy. Strab. 13.

Archelaus, I. a name common to some kings of Cappadocia. One of them was conquered by Sylla for assisting Mithridates.——II. A person of that name married Berenice, and made himself king of Egypt; a dignity he enjoyed only six months, as he was killed by the soldiers of Gabinius, B. C. 56. He had been made priest of Comana by Pompey. His grandson was made king of Cappadocia by Antony, whom he assisted at Actium, and he maintained his independence under Augustus till Tiberius perfidiously destroyed him.——III. A king of Macedonia, who succeeded his father, Perdiccas the second: as he was but a natural child, he killed the legitimate heirs to gain the kingdom. He proved himself to be a great monarch; but he was at last killed by one of his favourites, because he had promised him his daughter in marriage, and given her to another, after a reign of 23 years. He patronised the poet Euripides. Diod. 14.—Justin. 7, c. 4.—Ælian. V. H. 2, 8, 12, 14.——IV. A king of the Jews, son of Herod. He married Glaphyre, daughter of Archelaus, king of Macedonia, and widow of his brother Alexander. Cæsar banished him for his cruelties. Dio.——V. A king of Lacedæmon, son of Agesilaus. He reigned 42 years with Charilaus, of the other branch of the family. Herodot. 7, c. 204.—Paus. 3, c. 2.——VI. A general of Antigonus the younger, appointed governor of the Acrocorinth, with the philosopher Persæus. Polyæn. 6, c. 5.——VII. A celebrated general of Mithridates against Sylla. Id. 8, c. 8.——VIII. A philosopher of Athens or Messenia, son of Apollodorus, and successor to Anaxagoras. He was preceptor to Socrates, and was called Physicus. He supposed that heat and cold were the principles of all things. He first discovered the voice to be propagated by the vibration of the air. Cic. Tusc. 5.—Diog. in vitâ.—Augustin. de civ. Dei, 8.——IX. A man set over Susa by Alexander, with a garrison of 3000 men. Curt. 5, c. 2.——X. A Greek philosopher, who wrote a history of animals, and maintained that goats breathed not through the nostrils, but through the ears. Plin. 8, c. 50.——XI. A sculptor of Priene, in the age of Claudius. He made an apotheosis of Homer, a piece of sculpture highly admired, and said to have been discovered under ground, A. D. 1658.——XII. A writer of Thrace.

Archemachus, a Greek writer, who published a history of Eubœa. Athen. 6.

Archeptolymus, son of Iphitus, king of Elis, went to the Trojan war, and fought against the Greeks. As he was fighting near Hector, he was killed by Ajax, son of Telamon. It is said that he re-established the Olympic games. Homer. Il. 8, v. 128.

Archestratus, I. a tragic poet, whose pieces were acted during the Peloponnesian war. Plut. in Arist.——II. A follower of Epicurus, who wrote a poem in commendation of gluttony.

Archias, I. a Corinthian, descended from Hercules. He founded Syracuse, B. C. 732.

being told by an oracle to make choice of health or riches, he chose the latter. Dionys. Hal. 2. ——II. A poet of Antioch, intimate with the Luculli. He obtained the rank and name of a Roman citizen by the means of Cicero, who defended him in an elegant oration when his enemies had disputed his privileges of citizen of Rome. He wrote a poem on the Cimbrian war, and began another concerning Cicero's consulship, which are now lost. Some of his epigrams are preserved in the Anthologia. Cic. pro Arch. ——III. A polemarch of Thebes, assassinated in the conspiracy of Pelopidas, which he could have prevented, if he had not deferred to the morrow the reading of a letter which he had received from Archias, the Athenian highpriest, and which gave him information of his danger. Plut. in Pelop.——IV. A highpriest of Athens, contemporary and intimate with the polemarch of the same name. Id. ibid.——V. A Theban who abolished the oligarchy. Aristot.

Archibiades, I. a philosopher of Athens, who affected the manners of the Spartans, and was very inimical to the views and measures of Phocion. Plut. in Phoc.——II. An ambassador of Byzantium, &c. Polyæn. 4, c. 44.

Archibius, the son of the geographer Ptolemy.

Archidamia, I. a priestess of Ceres, who, on account of her affection for Aristomenes, restored him to liberty when he had been taken prisoner by her female attendants at the celebration of their festivals. Paus. 4, c. 17.——II. A daughter of Cleadas, who, upon hearing that her countrymen, the Spartans, were debating whether they should send away their women to Crete, against the hostile approach of Pyrrhus, seized a sword, and ran to the senate-house, exclaiming that the women were as able to fight as the men. Upon this, the decree was repealed. Plut. in Pyrrh.—Polyæn. 8, c. 8.

Archigēnes, a physician, born at Apamea, in Syria. He lived in the reign of Domitian, Nerva, and Trajan, and died in the 73d year of his age.

Archilŏchus, I. a poet of Paros, who wrote elegies, satires, odes, and epigrams, and was the first who introduced iambics in his verses. He had courted Neobule, the daughter of Lycambes, and had received promises of marriage; but the father gave her to another, superior to the poet in rank and fortune; upon which Archilochus wrote such a bitter satire, that Lycambes hanged himself in a fit of despair. The Spartans condemned his verses, on account of their indelicacy, and banished him from their city as a petulant and dangerous citizen. He flourished 665 B. C., and it is said that he was assassinated. Some fragments of his poetry remain, which display vigour and animation, boldness and vehemence, in the highest degree; from which reason, perhaps, Cicero calls virulent edicts Archilochia edicta. Cic. Tusc. 1.—Quintil. 10, c. 1.—Herodot. 1, c. 12.—Horat. art. poet. v. 79.—Athen. 1, 2, &c.——II. A Greek historian, who wrote a chronological table, and other works about the 20th or 30th olympiad.

Archimēdes, a famous geometrician of Syracuse, who invented a machine of glass that faithfully represented the motion of all the heavenly bodies. When Marcellus, the Roman consul, besieged Syracuse, Archimedes constructed machines, which suddenly raised up in the air the ships of the enemy from the bay before the city, and then let them fall with such violence into the water that they sunk. He set them also on fire with his burning-glasses. When the town was taken, the Roman general gave strict orders to his soldiers not to hurt Archimedes, and even offered a reward to him who should bring him alive and safe into his presence. All these precautions were useless; the philosopher was so deeply engaged in solving a problem, that he was even ignorant that the enemy were in possession of the town; and a soldier, without knowing who he was, killed him, because he refused to follow him, B. C. 212. Marcellus raised a monument over him, and placed upon it a cylinder and a sphere; but the place remained long unknown, till Cicero, during his questorship in Sicily, found it near one of the gates of Syracuse, surrounded with thorns and brambles. Some suppose that Archimedes raised the site of the towns and villages of Egypt, and began those mounds of earth by means of which communication is kept from town to town, during the inundations of the Nile. The story of his burning-glasses had always appeared fabulous to some of the moderns, till the experiments of Buffon demonstrated it beyond contradiction. These celebrated glasses were supposed to be reflectors made of metal, and capable of producing their effect at the distance of a bow-shot. The manner in which he discovered how much brass a goldsmith had mixed with gold in making a golden crown for the king, is well known to every modern hydrostatic, as well as the pumping screw which still bears his name. Among the wild schemes of Archimedes, is his saying, that by means of his machines he could move the earth with ease if placed on a fixed spot near it. Many of his works are extant, especially treatises de sphæra & cylindro, circuli dimensio, de lineis spiralibus, de quadratura parabolæ, de numero arenæ, &c. the best edition of which is that of David Rivaltius, fol. Paris, 1615. Cic. Tusc. 2, c. 25.—De Nat. D. 2, c. 34.—Liv. 24, c. 34.—Quintil. 1, c. 10.—Vitruv. 9, c. 3.—Polyb. 9.—Plut. in Marcell.—Val. Max. 8, c. 7.

Archinus, I. a man who when he was appointed to distribute new arms among the populace of Argos, raised a mercenary band, and made himself absolute. Polyæn. 3, c. 8.——II. A rhetorician of Athens.

Archippus, a comic poet of Athens, of whose eight comedies only one obtained the prize.

Archon, one of Alexander's generals, who received the provinces of Babylon at the general division after the king's death. Diod. 18.

Archontes, the name of the chief magistrates of Athens. They were nine in number, and none were chosen but such as were descended from ancestors who had been free citizens of the republic for three generations. They were also to be without deformity in all the parts and members of their body; and were obliged to produce testimonials of their dutiful behaviour to their parents, of the services they had rendered their country, and the competency of their fortune to support their dignity. They took a solemn oath that they would observe the laws, administer justice with impartiality, and never suffer themselves to be corrupted. If they ever received bribes, they were compelled by the laws to dedicate to the god of Delphi a statue of gold of equal weight with their body. They all had the power of punishing malefactors with death. The chief among them was called Archon; the year took its denomination from him; he determined all causes between man and wife, and took care of legacies and wills; he provided for orphans, protected the injured, and punished drunkenness. If he suffered himself to be intoxicated during the time of his office, the misdemeanor was punished with death. The second of the archons was called Basileus; it was his office to keep good order, and to remove all causes of quarrel in the families of those who were dedicated to the service of the gods. The profane and the impious were brought before his tribunal; and he offered public sacrifices for the good of the state. He assisted at the celebration of the Eleusinian festivals and other religious ceremonies. His wife was to be related to the whole people of Athens, and of a pure and unsullied life. He had a vote among the Areopagites, but was obliged to sit among them without his crown. The Polemarch was another archon of inferior dignity. He had the care of all foreigners, and provided a sufficient maintenance from the public treasury, for the families of those who had lost their lives in defence of their country. These three archons generally chose each of them two persons of respectable character, and of an advanced age, whose councils and advice might assist and support them in their public capacity. The six other archons were indistinctly called Thesmothetæ, and received complaints against persons accused of impiety, bribery, and ill behaviour. They settled all disputes between the citizens, redressed the wrongs of strangers, and forbade any laws to be enforced but such as were conducive to the safety of the state. These officers of state were chosen after the death of king Codrus; their power was originally for life, but afterwards it was limited to ten years, and at last to one year. After some time, the qualifications which were required to be an archon were not strictly observed. Adrian, before he was elected emperor of Rome, was made archon at Athens, though a foreigner; and the same honours were conferred upon Plutarch. The perpetual archons after the death of Codrus were Medon, whose office began B. C. 1070; Acastus, 1050; Archippus, 1014; Thersippus, 995; Phorbas, 954; Megacles, 923; Diogenetus, 893; Pherecles, 865; Ariphron, 846; Thespieus, 826; Agamestor, 799; Æschylus, 778; Alcmæon, 756; after whose death the archons were decennial, the first of whom was Charops, who began 753; Æsimedes, 744; Clidicus, 734; Hippomenes, 724; Leocrates, 714; Apsander, 704; Eryxias, 694; after whom, the office became annual, and of these annual archons Creon was the first. Aristoph. in Nub. and Avib.—Plut. Sympos. 1.—Demost.—Pollux.—Lysias.

Archytas, I. a musician of Mitylene, who wrote a treatise on agriculture. Diog.——II. The son of Hestiæus of Tarentum, was a follower of the Pythagorean philosophy, and an able astronomer and geometrician. He redeemed his master, Plato, from the hands of the tyrant Dionysius, and, for his virtues, he was seven times chosen by his fellow-citizens governor of Tarentum. He invented some mathematical instruments, and a wooden pigeon which could fly. He perished in a shipwreck, about 394 years before the Christian era. He is also the reputed inventor of the screw and the pulley. A fragment of his writings has been preserved by Porphyry. Horat. 1, od. 28.—Cic. 3, de Orat.—Diog. in Vit.

Arctinus, a Milesian poet, said to be pupil to Homer. Dionys. Hal. 1.

Arctos, two celestial constellations near the north pole, commonly called Ursa Major and Minor. Virg. G. 1.

Arcturus, a star near the tail of the Great Bear, whose rising and setting were generally supposed to portend great tempests. Horat. 3, od. 1. The name is derived from its situation, αρκτος ursus, ουρα cauda. It rises now about the beginning of October; and Pliny tells us it rose in his age on the 12th, or, according to Columella, on the 5th of September.

Ardys, a son of Gyges, king of Lydia, who reigned 49 years, took Priene, and made war against Miletus. Herodot. 1, c. 15.

Areas, a general chosen by the Greeks against Ætolia. Justin. 24, c. 1.

Areius, the Platonist, was a man of equal worth and knowledge with Athenodorus, but he professed a milder philosophy, and one which was more adapted to the temper of the times. Though a native of Alexandria, he had escaped the moral contagion of that licentious town. When Egypt was subdued by Augustus, the conqueror entered Alexandria, holding Areius by the hand; and, in the harangue which he delivered to the inhabitants from his tribunal, informed them that he spared their town partly for the sake of Areius, his own friend and their fellow-citizen. Yet, mild as were the temper and philosophy of this Platonist, he strongly urged Augustus to destroy Cæsario, the reputed son of Julius Cæsar and Cleopatra, fortifying his opinion by a line in Homer:—

which Areius thus converted:—

Οὐκ ἀγαθὸν πολυκαισαρίη· εἷς Καισαρος ἔστω.

When Augustus returned from Egypt, Areius followed him to Rome. The empress Livia, in the commencement of her grief for the loss of her son Drusus, admitted him as a visiter, and acknowledged that her sorrows were much assuaged by the topics of consolation which he suggested. He was also patronised by Mæcenas, in whose house he frequently resided. Dunlop.

Arellius, a celebrated painter of Rome, in the age of Augustus. He painted the goddesses in the form of his mistresses. Plin. 35, c. 10.

Areopagitæ, the judges of the Areopagus, a seat of justice on a small eminence near Athens, whose name is derived from αρεος παγος, the hill of Mars. The time in which this celebrated seat of justice was instituted is unknown. Some suppose that Cecrops, the founder of Athens, first established it; while others give the credit of it to Cranaus, and others to Solon. The number of judges that composed this august assembly is not known. They have been limited by some to 9, to 31, to 51, and sometimes to a greater number. The most worthy and religious of the Athenians were admitted as members, and such archons as had discharged their duty with care and faithfulness. If any of them were convicted of immorality, if they had used any indecent language, they were immediately expelled from the assembly, and held in the greatest disgrace, though the dignity of a judge of the Areopagus always was for life. The Areopagites took cognizance of murders, impiety, and immoral behaviour; and particularly of idleness, which they deemed the cause of all vice. They watched over the laws, and they had the management of the public treasury; they had the liberty of rewarding the virtuous, and of inflicting severe punishment upon such as blasphemed against the gods, or slighted the celebration of the holy mysteries. They always sat in the open air, because they took cognizance of murder; and by their laws it was not permitted for the murderer and his accuser to be both under the same roof. This custom also might originate because the persons of the judges were sacred, and they were afraid of contracting pollution by conversing in the same house with men who had been guilty of shedding innocent blood. They always heard causes and passed sentence in the night, that they might not be prepossessed in favour of the plaintiff or of the defendant by seeing them. Whatever causes were pleaded before them, were to be divested of all oratory and fine speaking, lest eloquence should charm their ears and corrupt their judgment. Hence arose the most just and most impartial decisions, and their sentence was deemed sacred and inviolable, and the plaintiff and defendant were equally convinced of its justice. The Areopagites generally sat on the 27th, 28th, and 29th day of every month. Their authority continued in its original state till Pericles, who was refused admittance among them, resolved to lessen their consequence and destroy their power. From that time, the morals of the Athenians were corrupted, and the Areopagites were no longer conspicuous for their virtue and justice; and when they censured the debaucheries of Demetrius, one of the family of Phalereus, he plainly told them, that if they wished to make a reform in Athens, they must begin at home.

Arĕta, a daughter of Dionysius, who married Dion. She was thrown into the sea. Plut. in Dion.

Aretæus, a physician of Cappadocia, very inquisitive after the operations of nature. His treatise on agues has been much admired. The best edition of his works which are extant, is that of Boerhaave, L. Bat. fol. 1735.

Aretaphila, the wife of Melanippus, a priest of Cyrene. Nicocrates murdered her husband to marry her. She, however, was so attached to Melanippus, that she endeavoured to poison Nicocrates, and at last caused him to be assassinated by his brother Lysander, whom she married. Lysander proved as cruel as his brother, upon which Aretaphila ordered him to be thrown in the sea. After this she retired to a private station. Plut. de Virtut. Mulier.—Polyæan. 8, c. 38.

Aretĭdes, a Cnidian, who wrote a history of Macedonia, besides a treatise on islands. Plut.

Areus, I. a king of Sparta, preferred in the succession to Cleonymus, brother of Acrotatus, who had made an alliance with Pyrrhus. He assisted Athens when Antigonus besieged it, and died at Corinth. Paus. 3, c. 6.—Plut.—II. A king of Sparta, who succeeded his father Acrotatus 2d, and was succeeded by his son Leonidas, son of Cleonymus.

Argæus, and Argĕus, a son of Perdiccas, who succeeded his father in the kingdom of Macedonia. Justin. 7, c. 1. Vid. Part I.

Argathŏnius, a king of Tartessus, who, according to Plin. 7, c. 48, lived 120 years, and 300 according to Val. 3, v. 396.

Argĭa, daughter of Adrastus, married Polynices, whom she loved with uncommon tenderness. When he was killed in the war, she buried his body in the night against the positive orders of Creon, for which pious action she was punished with death. Theseus revenged her death by killing Creon. Hygin. fab. 69 and 72.—Stat. Theb. 12.

Argilius, a favourite youth of Pausanias, who revealed his master's correspondence with the Persian king to the Ephori. C. Nep. in Paus.

Argius, a steward of Galba, who privately interred the body of his master in his gardens. Tacit. Hist. 1, c. 49.

Aria, the wife of Pætus Cecinna, of Padua, a Roman senator who was accused of conspiracy against Claudius, and carried to Rome by sea. She accompanied him, and in the boat she stabbed herself, and presented the sword to her husband, who followed her example. Plin. 7. Vid. Part I.

Ariæus, an officer who succeeded to the command of the surviving army after the death of Cyrus the younger, after the battle of Cunaxa. He made peace with Artaxerxes. Xenoph.

Ariamnes, a king of Cappadocia, son of Ariarathes 3d.

Ariarathes, a king of Cappadocia, who joined Darius Ochus in his expedition against Egypt, where he acquired much glory.—His nephew, the 2d of that name, defended his kingdom against Perdiccas, the general of Alexander; but he was defeated and hung on a cross, in the 81st year of his age, 321 B. C.—His son, Ariarathes 3d, escaped the massacre, and after the death of Perdiccas recovered Cappadocia, by conquering Amyntas, the Macedonian general. He was succeeded by his son Ariamnes.——Ariarathes the 4th, succeeded his father Ariamnes, and married Stratonice, daughter of Antiochus Theos. He died after a reign of twenty-eight years, B. C. 220, and was succeeded by his son Ariarathes the 5th, a prince who married Antiochia, the daughter of king Antiochus, whom he assisted against the Romans. Antiochus being defeated, Ariarathes saved his kingdom from invasion by paying the Romans a large sum of money remitted at the instance of the king of Pergamus.——His son, the 6th of that name, called Philopater, from his piety, succeeded him 166 B. C. An alliance with the Romans shielded him against the false claims that were laid to his crown by one of the favourites of Demetrius, king of Syria. He was maintained on his throne by Attalus, and assisted his friends of Rome against Ari-onicus, the usurper of Pergamus; but he was killed in the war B. C. 130, leaving six children, five of whom were murdered by his surviving wife Laodice.——The only one who escaped, Ariarathes 7th, was proclaimed king, and soon after married Laodice, the sister of Mithridates Eupator, by whom he had two sons. He was murdered by an illegitimate brother, upon which his widow Laodice gave herself and kingdom to Nicomedes, king of Bithynia. Mithridates made war against the new king, and raised his nephew to the throne. The young king, who was the 8th of the name of Ariarathes, made war against the tyrannical Mithridates, by whom he was assassinated in the presence of both armies, and the murderer's son, a child eight years old, was placed on the vacant throne. The Cappadocians revolted, and made the late monarch's brother, Ariarathes 9th, king; but Mithridates expelled him, and restored his own son. The exiled prince died of a broken heart; and Nicomedes of Bithynia, dreading the power of the tyrant, interested the Romans in the affairs of Cappadocia. The arbiters wished to make the country free; but the Cappadocians demanded a king, and received Ariobarzanes, B. C. 91. On the death of Ariobarzanes, his brother ascended the throne, under the name of Ariarathes 10th; but his title was disputed by Sisenna, the eldest son of Glaphyra, by Archelaus, priest of Comana. M. Antony, who was umpire between the contending parties, decided in favour of Sisenna; but Ariarathes recovered it for a while, though he was soon after obliged to yield in favour of Archelaus, the second son of Glaphyra, B. C. 36. Diod. 18.—Justin. 13 and 29.—Strab. 12.

ARIDÆUS, I. a companion of Cyrus the younger. After the death of his friend, he reconciled himself to Artaxerxes, by betraying to him the surviving Greeks in their return. Diod.——II. An illegitimate son of Philip, who, after the death of Alexander, was made king of Macedonia, till Roxane, who was pregnant by Alexander, brought into the world a legitimate male successor. Aridæus had not the free enjoyment of his senses; and therefore Perdiccas, one of Alexander's generals, declared himself his protector, and even married his sister, to strengthen their connexion. He was seven years in possession of the sovereign power, and was put to death, with his wife Eurydice, by Olympias. Justin. 9, c. 8.—Diod.

ARIMAZES, a powerful prince of Sogdiana, who treated Alexander with much insolence, and even asked, whether he could fly, to aspire to so extensive a dominion. He surrendered, and was exposed on a cross with his friends and relations. Curt. 7, c. 11.

ARIOBARZANES, I. a man made king of Cappadocia by the Romans, after the troubles, which the false Ariarathes had raised, had subsided. Mithridates drove him from his kingdom, but the Romans restored him. He followed the interest of Pompey, and fought at Pharsalia against J. Cæsar. He and his kingdom were preserved by means of Cicero. Cic. ad Attic. ep. 29.—Horat. ep. 6, v. 38.—Flor. 3, c. 5.——II. A satrap of Phrygia, who, after the death of Mithridates, invaded the kingdom of Pontus, and kept it for twenty-six years. He was succeeded by the son of Mithridates. Diod. 17.——III. A general of Darius, who defended the passes of Susa with 15,000 foot against Alexander. After a bloody encounter with the Macedonians, he was killed as he attempted to seize the city of Persepolis. Diod. 17.—Curt. 4 and 5.——IV. A Mede of elegant stature and great prudence, whom Tiberius appointed to settle the troubles of Armenia. Tacit. Ann. 2, c. 4.

ARIOMANDES, son of Gobryas, was general of Athens against the Persians. Plut. in Cim.

ARIOMARDUS, a son of Darius, in the army of Xerxes when he went against Greece. Herodot. 7, c. 78.

ARION, a famous lyric poet and musician, son of Cylos, of Methymna, in the island of Lesbos. He went into Italy with Periander, tyrant of Corinth, where he obtained immense riches by his profession. Some time after he wished to revisit his country; and the sailors of the ship in which he embarked resolved to murder him, to obtain the riches which he was carrying to Lesbos. Arion begged that he might be permitted to play some melodious tune; and as soon as he had finished it, he threw himself into the sea. A number of dolphins had been attracted round the ship by the sweetness of his music; and it is said that one of them carried him safe on his back to Tænarus, whence he hastened to the court of Periander, who ordered all the sailors to be crucified at their return. Hygin. fab. 194.—Herodot. 1, c. 23 and 24.—Ælian. de Nat. An. 13, c. 45.—Ital. 11.—Propert. 2, el. 26, v. 17.—Plut. in Symp. Vid. Part III.

ARIOVISTUS, a king of Germany, who professed himself a friend of Rome. When Cæsar was in Gaul, Ariovistus marched against him, and was conquered with the loss of 80,000 men. Cæs. in Bell. Gall.—Tacit. 4. Hist.

ARISTÆNĒTUS, a writer whose epistles have been beautifully edited by Abresch. Zwollæ, 1749.

ARISTAGŌRAS, I. a writer who composed a history of Egypt. Plin. 36, c. 12.——II. A son-in-law of Histiæus, tyrant of Miletus, who revolted from Darius, and incited the Athenians against Persia, and burnt Sardis. This so exasperated the king, that every evening before supper, he ordered his servants to remind him of punishing Aristagoras. He was killed in a battle against the Persians, B. C. 499. Herodot. 5, c. 30, &c. l. 7, c. 8.—Polyæn. 1, c. 14.

ARISTARCHUS, I. a celebrated grammarian of Samos, disciple of Aristophanes. He lived the greatest part of his life at Alexandria, and Ptolemy Philometor intrusted him with the education of his sons. He was famous for his critical powers, and he revised the poems of Homer with such severity, that ever after all severe critics were called Aristarchi. He wrote above 800 commentaries on different authors, much esteemed in his age. In his old age he became dropsical, upon which he starved himself, and died in his 72d year, B. C. 157. He left two sons, called Aristarchus and Aristagoras, both famous for their stupidity. Horat. de Art. poet. v. 499.—Ovid. 3, ex Pont. ep. 9, v. 24.—Cic. ad Fam. 3, ep. 11. ad Attic. 1, ep. 14.—Quintil. 10, c. 1.——II. A tragic poet of Tegea in Arcadia, about 454 years B. C. He composed 70 tragedies, of which two only were rewarded with the prize. One of them, called Achilles, was translated into Latin verse by Ennius. Suidas.——III. An astronomer of Samos, who first supposed that the earth turned round its axis, and revolved round the sun. This doctrine nearly proved fatal to him, as he was accused of disturbing the peace of the gods Lares. He maintained that the sun was nineteen times further distant from the earth than the moon, and that the moon was 56 semi-diameters of our globe, and little more than one third, and the diameter of the sun six or seven times more than that of the earth. The age in which he flourished is not precisely known. His treatise on the largeness and the distance of the sun and moon is extant, of which the best edition is that of Oxford, 8vo. 1688.

Aristeas, a poet of Proconnesus, who, as fables report, appeared seven years after his death to his countrymen, and 540 years after to the people of Metapontum in Italy, and commanded them to raise him a statue near the temple of Apollo. He wrote an epic poem on the Arimaspi in three books, and some of his verses are quoted by Longinus. Herodot. 4, c. 13.—Strab. 14.—Max. Tyr. 22.

Aristides, I. a celebrated Athenian, son of Lysimachus, whose great temperance and virtue procured him the surname of Just. He was rival to Themistocles, by whose influence he was banished for ten years, B. C. 484; but before six years of his exile had elapsed, he was recalled by the Athenians. He was at the battle of Salamis, and was appointed chief commander with Pausanias against Mardonius, who was defeated at Platæa. He died so poor, that the expenses of his funeral were defrayed at the public charge; and his two daughters, on account of their father's virtues, received a dowry from the public treasury when they were come to marriageable years. Poverty, however, seemed hereditary in the family of Aristides, for the grandson was seen in the public streets, getting his livelihood by explaining dreams. When he sat as judge, it is said that the plaintiff, in his accusation, mentioned the injuries his opponent had done to Aristides. "Mention the wrongs you have received," replied the equitable Athenian; "I sit here as judge, and the lawsuit is yours, and not mine." C. Nep. & Plut. in vitâ.——II. An historian of Miletus, fonder of stories and of anecdotes than of truth. He wrote a history of Italy, of which the fortieth volume has been quoted by Plut. in Parall.——III. A painter of Thebes in Bœotia, in the age of Alexander the Great, for one of whose pieces Attalus offered 6000 sesterces. Plin. 7 and 35. ——IV. A Greek orator, who wrote 50 orations. When Smyrna was destroyed by an earthquake, he wrote so pathetic a letter to M. Aurelius, that the emperor ordered the city immediately to be rebuilt, and a statue was in consequence raised to the orator. His works consist of hymns in prose in honour of the gods, funeral orations, apologues, panegyrics, and harangues; the best edition of which is that of Jebb, 2 vols. 4to. Oxon. 1722, and that in a smaller size, in 12mo. 3 vols. of Canterus apud P. Steph. 1604.——V. A man of Locris, who died by the bite of a weazel. Ælian. V. H. 14.

Aristillus, a philosopher of the Alexandrian school, who, about 300 years B. C., attempted, with Timocharis, to determine the place of the different stars in the heavens, and to trace the course of the planets.

Aristio, a sophist of Athens, who, by the support of Archelaus, the general of Mithridates, seized the government of his country, and made himself absolute. He poisoned himself when defeated by Sylla. Liv. 81, 82.

Aristippus, I. the elder, a philosopher of Cyrene, disciple to Socrates, and founder of the Cyrenaic sect. He was one of the flatterers of Dionysius of Sicily, and distinguished himself for his epicurean voluptuousness, in support of which he wrote a book, as likewise a history of Libya. When travelling in the deserts of Africa, he ordered his servants to throw away the money they carried, as too burdensome. On another occasion, discovering that the ship in which he sailed belonged to pirates, he designedly threw his property into the sea, adding, that he chose rather to lose it than his life. Many of his sayings and maxims are recorded by Diogenes, in his life. Horat. 2, Sat. 3, v. 100.——II. His grandson of the same name, called the younger, was a warm defender of his opinions, and supported that the principles of all things were pain and pleasure. He flourished about 363 years B. C.——III. A tyrant of Argos, whose life was one continued series of apprehension. He was killed by a Cretan, in a battle against Aratus, B. C. 242. Diog.

Aristoclea, a beautiful woman, seen naked by Strabo, as she was offering a sacrifice. She was passionately loved by Callisthenes, and was equally admired by Strabo. The two rivals so furiously contended for her hand, that she died during their quarrel; upon which Strabo killed himself, and Callisthenes was never seen after. Plut. in Amat.

Aristocles, a peripatetic philosopher of Messenia, who reviewed, in a treatise on philosophy, the opinions of his predecessors. The 14th book of this treatise is quoted, &c. He also wrote on rhetoric, and likewise nine books on morals.

Aristoclides, a tyrant of Orchomenus, who, because he could not win the affection of Stymphalis, killed her and her father; upon which all Arcadia took up arms, and destroyed the murderer.

Aristocrates, I. a king of Arcadia, put to death by his subjects for offering violence to the priestess of Diana. Paus. 8, c. 5.——II. His grandson of the same name was stoned to death for taking bribes, during the second Messenian war, and being the cause of the defeat of his Messenian allies, B. C. 682. Id. ibid.——III. A Greek historian, son of Hipparchus. Plut. in Lyc.

Aristodemus, I. son of Aristomachus, was one of the Heraclidæ. He, with his brothers Temenus and Cresphontes, invaded Peloponnesus, conquered it, and divided the country among themselves, 1104 years before the Christian era. He married Argia, by whom he had the twins Procles and Eurysthenes. He was killed by a thunderbolt at Naupactum, though some say he died at Delphi in Phocis. Paus. 2, c. 18, l. 3, c. 1 and 16.—Herodot. 7, c. 204, l. 8, c. 131.——II. A king of Messenia, who maintained a famous war against Sparta. After some losses, he recovered his strength, and effectually defeated the enemy's forces. Aristodemus put his daughter to death for the good of his country. Being afterwards persecuted in a dream by her manes, he killed himself, after a reign of six years and some months, in which he had obtained much military glory, B. C. 724. His death was lamented by his countrymen, who did not appoint him a successor, but only invested Damis, one of his friends, with absolute power to continue the war, which was at last terminated, after much bloodshed and many losses on both sides. Paus. in Messen.——III. A Spartan, who taught the children of Pausanias.——IV. A man who was preceptor to the children of Pompey.

ARISTOGĔNES, I. a physician of Cnidos, who obtained great reputation by the cure of Demetrius Gonatas, king of Macedonia.——II. A Thrasian who wrote 24 books on medicine.

ARISTOGĪTON and HARMODĬUS, two celebrated friends of Athens, who, by their joint efforts, delivered their country from the tyranny of the Pisistratidæ, B. C. 510. They received immortal honours from the Athenians, and had statues raised to their memory. These statues were carried away by Xerxes, when he took Athens. The conspiracy of Aristogiton was so secretly planned, and so wisely carried into execution, that it is said a courtesan bit her tongue off not to betray the trust reposed in her. Paus. 1, c. 29.—Herodot. 5, c. 55.—Plut. de 10, Orat. ——An Athenian orator, surnamed Canis, for his impudence. He wrote orations against Timarchus, Timotheus, Hyperides, and Thrasyllus. Paus.

ARISTOMĂCHUS, I. the son of Cleodæus, and grandson of Hyllus, whose three sons, Cresphontes, Temenus, and Aristodemus, called Heraclidæ, conquered Peloponnesus. Paus. 2, c. 7, l. 3, c. 15.—Herodot. 6, 7 and 8.——II. A man who laid aside his sovereign power at Argos, at the persuasion of Aratus. Paus. 2, c. 8.

ARISTOMĔNES, I. a commander of the fleet of Darius on the Hellespont, conquered by the Macedonians. Curt. 4. c. 1.——II. A famous general of Messenia, who encouraged his countrymen to shake off the Lacedæmonian yoke, under which they had laboured for above 30 years. He once defended the virtue of some Spartan women, whom his soldiers had attempted; and when he was taken prisoner and carried to Sparta, the women whom he had protected interested themselves so warmly in his cause that they procured his liberty. He refused to assume the title of king, but was satisfied with that of commander. He acquired the surname of Just, from his equity, to which he joined the true valour, sagacity and perseverance of a general. He often entered Sparta without being known, and was so dexterous in eluding the vigilance of the Lacedæmonians, who had taken him captive, that he twice escaped from them. As he attempted to do it a third time, he was unfortunately killed, and his body being opened, his heart was found all covered with hair. He died 671 years B. C. and it is said that he left dramatical pieces behind him. Diod. 15.—Paus. in Messen.

ARISTON, I. the son of Agasicles, king of Sparta.——II. A tyrant of Methymna, who, being ignorant that Chios had surrendered to the Macedonians, entered into the harbour, and was taken and put to death. Curt. 4 c. 9. ——III. A philosopher of Chios, pupil to Zeno the stoic, and founder of a sect which continued but a little while. He supported that the nature of the divinity is unintelligible. It is said that he died by the heat of the sun, which fell too powerfully upon his bald head. In his old age he was much given to sensuality. Diog.

ARISTONĪCUS, I. son of Eumenes, by a concubine of Ephesus, 126 B. C. invaded Asia and the kingdom of Pergamus, which Attalus had left by his will to the Roman people. He was conquered by the consul Perpenna, and strangled in prison. Justin. 36, c. 4.—Flor. 2, c. 20. ——II. A grammarian of Alexandria, who wrote a commentary on Hesiod and Homer, besides a treatise on the Museum established at Alexandria by the Ptolemies.

ARISTOPHĂNES, I. Of Aristophanes antiquity supplies us with few notices, and those of doubtful credit. The most likely account makes him the son of Philippus, a native of Ægina; and therefore the comedian was an adopted, not a natural, citizen of Athens. The exact dates of his birth and death are equally unknown. At a very early period of his dramatic career Aristophanes directed his attention to the political situation and occurrences of Athens. His second recorded comedy, the Babylonians, was aimed against Cleon, and his third, the Acharnians, turns upon the evils of the Peloponnesian war—then in its sixth year—and the advantage of a speedy peace. His talents and address soon gave him amazing influence with his countrymen; as Cleon felt to his cost, the succeeding year on the representation of the Equites. The fame of Aristophanes was not confined to his own city. Dionysius of Syracuse would gladly have admitted the popular dramatist to his court and patronage; but his invitations were steadily refused by the independent Athenian. In B. C. 423, the sophists felt the weight of his lash, for in that year he produced, though unsuccessfully, his Nubes. The vulgar notion that the exhibition of Socrates in this play was an intentional prelude to his capital accusation in the criminal court, and that Aristophanes was the leagued accomplice of Melitus, has of late been frequently and satisfactorily refuted. The simple consideration that twenty-four years intervened between the representation of the Nubes and the trial of Socrates, affords a sufficient answer to any such charge. In fact, after the performance of this very comedy, we find Socrates and Aristophanes become acquainted, and occasionally meeting together on the best terms. An imperfect knowledge of Socrates at the time, his reputed doctrines, and his constantly consorting with notorious sophists, along with the marked singularity of his face, figure, and manners, so well adapted to comic mimicry, were doubtless the main reasons for the selection of him as the sophistic Coryphæus. In the Peace and the Lysistrata Aristophanes again reverts to politics and the Peloponnesian war: in the Wasps, the Birds, and the Ecclesiazusæ, he takes cognizance of the internal concerns of the state; in the Thesmophoriazusæ, and the Ranæ, he attacks Euripides and discusses the drama; whilst in the Plutus he presents us with a specimen of the Middle Comedy. Eleven of his comedies are still extant out of upwards of sixty. Aristophanes, during the whole of his career, had a numerous body of rival comedians to oppose. Ecphantides, Pisander, Callias, Hermippus, Myrtilus, Lysimachus, Lycis, Leucon, and Pantacles, besides the more celebrated writers whom we have noticed above, were a little his seniors; Aristomenes, Amcipsias, Teleclides, Pherecrates, Plato, Diocles, Sannyrio, Philyllius, Philonides, Strattis, and Theopompus, with several others, to the number of thirty in all, were somewhat his juniors; with most of whom Aristophanes had to contend in the course of his dramatic exhibitions. Of these poets little is left us beyond their names and a few isolated fragments. Yet Plato, Pherecrates, and Philonides were men of superior talent. With Theopompus, who flourished B. C. 386, closes the list of the Old Comedians. Although among the extant works of Aristophanes we have some of his earliest, yet all bear the marks of equal maturity. But he had long been preparing himself in silence for the exercise of his art, which he represents to be the most difficult of all art; nay out of modesty, (or according to his own expression, like a young girl who having given birth to a child in secret, intrusts it to the care of another,) he at first had his labours brought out under another person's name. He first appeared in his own character, in his Knights; and here he maintained the boldness of a comedian in full measure, by hazarding a capital attack on the popular opinion. Its object was nothing less than the ruin of Cleon, who, after Pericles, stood at the head of all state affairs, who was a promoter of the war, a worthless vulgar person, but the idol of the infatuated people. His only adversaries were those more wealthy men of property, who formed the class of Knights: these Aristophanes blends with his party in the strongest manner, by making them his chorus. He had the prudence no where to name Cleon, but merely to describe him, so that he could not be mistaken. Yet, from fear of Cleon's faction, no mask-maker dared to make a copy of his face; the poet therefore resolved to play the part himself, merely painting his face. It may be conceived what tumults the performance excited among the collected populace; yet the bold and skilful efforts of the poet were crowned with success, and his piece gained the prize. Scarcely any of his comedies is more political and historical; it is also almost irresistibly powerful as a piece of rhetoric to excite indignation: it is truly a philippic drama. It is only after the storm of jeering sarcasms has wasted its fury, that droller scenes follow; and droll scenes they are indeed, where the two demagogues, the leather-cutter (that is to say, Cleon,) and his antagonist the sausage-maker, by adulation, by prophecies, and by dainties, vie with each other in wooing the favour of the old dotard Demos, the personification of the people; and the play ends with a triumph almost touchingly joyous, where the scene changes from the Pnyx, the place of the popular assemblies, to the majestic Propylæa; and Demos, wondrously restored to youth, comes forward in the garb of the old Athenians, and, together with his youthful vigour, has recovered the old feelings of the times of Marathon. With the exception of this attack on Cleon, and of those on Euripides, whom he frequently singles out, the other plays of Aristophanes are not so exclusively directed against individuals. They have, for the most part, a general, and often a very important aim, of which, notwithstanding all his roundabout ways—his extravagant digressions, and heterogeneous interpolations, the poet never loses sight. The Peace, the Acharnians and Lysistrata, under various turns of expression, recommend peace; the Ecclesiazusæ, the Thesmophoriazusæ, and again the Lysistrata, besides their other purposes, are satires on the conditions and manners of the female sex. The Clouds ridicule the metaphysics of the sophists; the Wasps, the mania of the Athenians for lawsuits and trials; the Frogs treat of the decline of tragic art; Plutus is an allegory on the unequal distribution of wealth; the Birds are seemingly the most purposeless of all, and for that very reason one of the most delightful. The Peace begins in an extremely sprightly and lively manner: the peace-loving Trygæus riding to heaven on the back of a dung-beetle, in the manner of Bellerophon: War, a wild giant, who, with his comrade Riot, is the sole inhabitant of Olympus, in place of all the other gods, and is pounding the cities in a huge mortar, in which operation he uses the most famous generals as his pestles; the goddess of peace buried in a deep well, whence she is hauled up with ropes by the united exertions of all the Greek nations: all these inventions, which are alike ingenious and fantastic, are calculated to produce the most pleasant effect. But afterwards the poetry does not maintain an equal elevation. nothing more remains but to sacrifice and make feasts to the restored goddess of peace, while the pressing visits of such persons as found their advantage in the war, form indeed a pleasant entertainment, though not a satisfactory conclusion after a beginning of so much promise. We have here one example, among several others, which shows that the old comedians not only altered the scenes in the intervals, while the stage was empty, but even when an actor was still in sight. The scene here changes from a spot in Attica to Olympus, while Trygæus on his beetle hangs aloft in air, and calls out to the machine-manager to take care that he does not break his neck. His subsequent descent into the orchestra denotes his return to earth. The liberties taken by the tragedians, according as their subject might require it, in respect of the unities of place and time, on which the moderns lay so foolish a stress, might be overlooked: the boldness with which the old comedian subjects these mere externalities to his humorous caprice is so striking, as to force itself on the most short-sighted: and yet, in none of the treatises on the constitution of the Greek stage has it been properly noticed. The Acharnians, a play of an earlier date, seems to us much more excellent than the Peace, for the continual progress and the ever-heightening wit, which at last ends in a really bacchanalian revelry. Dicæopolis, the honest citizen, enraged at the false pretexts with which the people are put off, and all terms of peace thwarted, sends an embassy to Lacedæmon, and concludes a separate peace for himself and his family. Now he returns into the country, and, in spite of all disturbances, makes an enclosure before his house, within which there is peace and free market for the neighbouring people, while the rest of the country is harassed by the war. The blessings of peace are exhibited in the most palpable manner for hungry maws; the fat Bœotian brings his eels and poultry for barter, and nothing is thought of but feasting and revelling. Lamachus, the famous general, who lives on the other side, is summoned, by a sudden attack of the enemy, to the defence of the frontier; while Dicæopolis is invited by his neighbours to partake of a feast, to which each brings his contribution. The preparations of arms, and the preparations in the kitchen, now go on with equal diligence and despatch on both sides: here they fetch the lance, there the spit; here the armour, there the wine-can; here they fasten the crest on the helmet, there they pluck thrushes. Shortly afterwards, Lamachus returns with broken head and crippled foot, supported by two comrades; on the other side, Dicæopolis, drunk, and led by two good-natured damsels. The lamentations of the one are continually mimicked and derided by the exultations of the other, and with this contrast, which is carried to the very highest point, the play ends. The Lysistrata bears so evil a character, that we must make but fugitive mention of it, like persons passing over hot embers. The women, according to the poet's invention, have taken it into their heads, by a severe resolution, to compel their husbands to make peace. Under the guidance of their clever chieftain, they organize a conspiracy for this end through all Greece, and at the same time get possession, in Athens, of the fortified Acropolis. The terrible plight into which the husbands are reduced by this separation, occasions the most ridiculous scenes; ambassadors come from both the belligerent parties, and the peace is concluded with the greatest despatch under the direction of the clever Lysistrata. In spite of all the bold indecencies which the play contains, its purpose, divested of these, is, on the whole, very innocent; the longing for the pleasures of domestic life, which were so often interrupted by the absence of the men, is to put an end to this unhappy war which was ruining all Greece. The honest coarseness of the Lacedæmonians, in particular, is inimitably well portrayed. The Ecclesiazusæ; also a government of women, but much more corrupt than the former. The women, disguised as men, steal into the assembly, and by means of this surreptitious majority, ordain a new constitution, in which there is to be a community of goods and wives. This is a satire upon the ideal republics of the philosophers with laws like these; such as Protagoras had projected before Plato's time. This play, in our opinion, labours under the same faults as the Peace: the introduction, the private assembly of the women, the description of the assembly, are all treated in a masterly style; but towards the middle it comes to a stand-still. Nothing remains but to show the confusion arising from the different communities, especially from the community of women, and the appointment of the same rights in love for the old and ugly, as for the young and beautiful. This confusion is pleasant enough, but it turns too much upon one continually repeated joke. The old allegoric comedy, in general, is exposed to the danger of sinking in its progress. When a person begins with turning the world upside down, of course the strangest individual incidents will result, but they are apt to appear petty compared with the decisive strokes of wit in the commencement. The play called the Thesmophoriazusæ, has a proper intrigue, a knot which is not untied till quite at the end, and in this it possesses a great advantage. Euripides, on account of the well-known misogyny of his tragedies, is accused and sentenced to condign punishment at the festival of the Thesmophoria, at which women alone might be present. After a vain attempt to excite the effeminate poet Agathon to such an adventure, Euripides disguises his brother-in-law Mnesilochus, a man now advanced in years, in the garb of a woman, that in this shape he may plead his cause. The manner in which he does this, renders him suspected, it is discovered that he is a man; he flees to an altar, and for greater security against their persecution, he snatches a child from the arms of a woman, and threatens to kill it if they do not let him alone. As he is about to throttle it, it turns out to be only a wine-skin dressed up in child's clothes. Then comes Euripides under various forms to rescue his friend; now he is Menelaus, who finds his wife Helen in Egypt; now Echo, helping the chained Andromache to complain; now Perseus, about to release her from her bonds. At last he frees Mnesilochus, who is fastened to a kind of pillory, by disguising himself as a procuress, and enticing away the officer, a simple barbarian, who is guarding him, by the charms of a flute-playing girl. These parodied scenes, composed almost in the very words of the tragedies, are inimitable. Everywhere in this poet, the instant Euripides comes into play, we may lay our account with finding the cleverest and most cutting ridicule: as though the mind of Aristophanes possessed quite a specific talent for decomposing the poetry of this tragedian into comedy. The play of the Clouds is very well known, but for the most part has not been properly understood and appreciated. It is intended to show, that the propensity to philosophical subtilties, the martial exercises of the Athenians were neglected, that speculation only serves to shake the foundations of religion and morality, that by sophistical slight, in particular, all justice was turned into quibbles, and the weaker cause often enabled to come off victorious. The Clouds, themselves, who form the chorus, (for such beings the poet personified, and, no doubt dressed them out strangely enough) are an allegory on these metaphysical thoughts, which do not rest on the ground of experience, but hover about without definite form and substance, in the region of possibilities. It is one of the principal forms of Aristophanic wit, in general, to take a metaphor in the literal sense, and so place it before the eyes of the spectators. Thus, it is said of a person who has a propensity to idle, unintelligible dreams, that he walks in air, and here, therefore, Socrates at his first appearance descends from the air in his basket. Whether this description be directly applicable to him is another question: but we have reason to believe, that the philosophy of Socrates was very idealistic, and not so much confined to popular usefulness as Xenophon would have us believe. But why did Aristophanes imbody the metaphysics of the sophists in the person of Socrates, himself, in fact, a decided antagonist of the sophists? Perhaps there was some personal dislike at the bottom; we must not attempt to justify him on this score, but the choice of the name does not at all prejudice the excellence of the fiction. Aristophanes declares this to be the most elaborate of all his works, though, in this expression indeed, he must not be exactly taken at his word. He unhesitatingly allows himself on every occasion the most unbounded praises of himself; this also seems to belong to the unrestrained license of comedy. The play of the Clouds, it may be added, was unfavourably received at its performance; it was twice exhibited in competition for the prize, but without success. The play of the Frogs, as already mentioned, turns upon the decline of tragic art. Euripides was dead, so were Sophocles and Agathon; there remained none but second-rate tragedians. Bacchus misses Euripides, and wishes to fetch him back from the infernal world. In this he imitates Hercules, but though equipped with the lion-hide and club of that hero, he is very unlike him in character, and as a dastardly voluptuary, gives rise to much laughter. Here we may see the boldness of the comedian in the right point of view; he does not scruple to attack the guardian god of his own art, in honour of whom the play was exhibited. It was the common belief that the gods understood fun as well, if not better, than men. Bacchus rows himself over the Acherusian lake, where the frogs pleasantly greet him with their unmelodious croaking. The proper chorus, however, consists of the shades of the initiated in the Eleusinian Mysteries, and odes of wonderful beauty are assigned to them. Æschylus had at first assumed the tragic throne in the lower world, but now Euripides is for thrusting him off it. Pluto proposes that Bacchus should decide this great contest; the two poets, the sublimely wrathful Æschylus, the subtle, vain Euripides, stand opposite each other and submit specimens of their art; they sing, they declaim against each other, and all their features are characterized in masterly style. At last a balance is brought, on which each lays a verse; but let Euripides take what pains he will to produce his most ponderous lines, a verse of Æschylus instantly jerks up the scale of his antagonist. At last he grows weary of the contest, and tells Euripides he may mount into the balance himself with all his works, his wife, children, and Cephisophon, and he will lay against them only two verses. Bacchus, in the meantime, has come over to the cause of Æschylus, and though he had sworn to Euripides that he would take him back with him from the lower world, he despatches him with an allusion to his own verse from the Hippolytus:—

ἡ γλῶσσ' ὁμώμοκ', Αἰσχύλον δ' ἁλίσκομαι,

Æschylus, therefore, returns to the living world, and resigns the tragic throne to Sophocles during his absence. The observation which was made concerning the changes of scene in the Peace, may be repeated of the Frogs. The scene at first lies in Thebes, of which place both Bacchus and Hercules were natives. Afterwards the stage, though Bacchus had not left it, is transformed at once into the hither shore of the Acherusian lake, which was represented by the sunken space of the orchestra, and it was not till Bacchus landed on the other end of the Logeum, that the scenery represented the infernal regions, with the palace of Pluto in the background. Let not this be taken for mere conjecture; the ancient Scholiast testifies as much expressly. The Wasps appears to be the weakest of Aristophanes' plays. The subject is too confined, the folly exhibited appears as a singular weakness without any satisfactory general significance, and in the treatment it is too long spun out. In this instance, the poet himself speaks modestly of his means of entertainment, and will not promise unbounded laughter. On the contrary, the Birds sparkles with the boldest and richest imagination in the province of the fantastically marvellous: it is a merry, buoyant creation, bright with the gayest plumage. I cannot agree with the ancient critic, who conceives the main purport of the work to consist in the most universal, and most unreserved satire on the corruption of the Athenian state, nay, of all human constitutions in general. Rather say, that it is a piece of the most harmless buffoonry, which has a touch at every thing, gods as well as man, but without any where pressing towards any particular object. All that was remarkable in the stories about birds in natural history, in mythology, in the lore of augury, in Æsop's Fables, or even in proverbial expressions, the poet has ingeniously blended in this poem; he even goes back as far as the Cosmogony, and shows how at first black-winged Night laid a wind-egg, whence lovely Eros, with golden pinions (doubtlessly a bird) soared aloft, and then gave birth to all things. Two fugitives of the human species find their way into the domain of the birds, who are determined to revenge themselves on them for the many hostilities they have suffered from man; the captives save themselves by proving clearly, that the birds are pre-eminent above all creatures, and advise them to collect their scattered powers into one enormous state; thus the wondrous city, Cloud-cuckoo-town (Νεφελοκοκκυγία,) is built above the earth; all sorts of unbidden guests, priests, poets, soothsayers, geometers, lawgivers, sycophants, wish to feather their nests in the new state, but are bid go their ways, new gods are ordained, of course after the image of birds, as mankind conceive theirs as human beings; the frontier of Olympus is walled up against the old gods, so that no savour of sacrifice can reach them, whereby they are brought into great distress, and send an embassy, consisting of the voracious Hercules, Neptune, (who after the usual fashion among men, swears "By Neptune!") and a Thracian god who cannot talk Greek in the most correct fashion, but discourses gibberish; these, however, are compelled to put up with whatever terms the birds please to offer, and they leave to the birds the sovereignty of the world. However like a farcical tale all this may seem, it has a philosophical significance; it casts a bird's-eye glance, as it were, on the sum of all things, which, once in a way, is all very proper, considering that most of our conceptions are true only for a human point of view. The ancient critics judged Cratinus to be strong in keen, straight-forward satire, but to be deficient in pleasantry and humour; neither, say they, had he skill to develop a striking plot to the best advantage, nor to fill up his plays with the proper detail. Eupolis, they say, was pleasing in his mirth, skilful in ingenious turns of meaning, so that he had no need of Parabases to say whatever he wished; but he wanted satiric power. Aristophanes, they add, in a happy medium, unites the excellences of both; satire and mirth in his poem are most completely melted down into each other, and in the most attractive proportions. From these accounts, we are justified in assuming that of the plays of Aristophanes, that of "The Knights," is most in the style of Cratinus; "The Birds," in that of Eupolis; and that he had their respective manners immediately in view when he composed these plays. For though he boasts of his independence and originality, and of his never borrowing any thing from others, yet there could not fail to be a reciprocal influence at work among such distinguished contemporaries. If this conjecture be well grounded, we have perhaps to deplore the loss of the works of Cratinus, rather for their bearing on the history of Athenian manners and the insight which they would have afforded us into the Athenian constitution; and the loss of the works of Eupolis rather in respect of their comic form. The Plutus is the refashionment of an earlier work of Aristophanes, but in its extant form, one of his latest. In its essence it belongs to the Old Comedy, but in the sparingness of personal satire, and in the mildness which pervades it, it seems to verge towards the Middle Comedy. The older comedy, indeed, received its death-blow from a formal enactment, but even before that event it was perhaps every day more hazardous to exercise the democratic privilege of the old comedian in its full extent. We are even told, (but probably only on conjecture, for others have denied the story,) that Alcibiades had Eupolis drowned, on account of a play which that poet had directed against him. Against such perils no zeal in the cause of art will stand its ground: it is but fair that a person, whose calling it is to amuse his fellow-citizens, should at least be secure of his life. The best editions of the works of Aristophanes are, Kuster's, fol. Amst. 1710, and the 12mo. L. Bat. 1670, and that of Brunck. 4 vols. 8vo. Argent. 1783, which would still be more perfect did it contain the valuable scholia. Quintil. 10, c. 1.—Paterc. 1, c. 16.—Horat. 1, Sat. 4, v. 1.——II. A grammarian of Byzantium, keeper of the library of Alexandria under Ptolemy Evergetes.

ARISTŌPHON, I. a painter in the age of Socrates. He drew the picture of Alcibiades reclining on the bosom of Nemea, and all the people of Athens ran in crowds to be spectators of the masterly piece. He also made a painting of Mars leaning on the arm of Venus. Plut. in Alc.—Athen. 13.—Plin. 35, c. 11.——II. A comic poet in the age of Alexander, many of whose fragments are collected in Athenæus.

ARISTOTELEIA, festivals in honour of Aristotle, because he obtained the restitution of his country from Alexander.

ARISTOTĔLES, a famous philosopher, son of the physician Nicomachus by Festiada, born at Stagira. After his father's death he went to Athens, to hear Plato's lectures, where he soon signalized himself by the brightness of his genius. He had been of an inactive and dissolute disposition in his youth, but now he applied himself with uncommon diligence, and, after he had spent 20 years in hearing the instructions of Plato, he opened a school for himself, for which he was accused of ingratitude and illiberality by his ancient master. He was moderate in his meals; he slept little, and always had one arm out of his couch with a bullet in it, which by falling into a brazen basin underneath, early awakened him. He was, according to some, ten years preceptor to Alexander, who received his instructions with much pleasure and deference, and always respected him. Almost all his writings, which are composed on a variety of subjects, are extant: he gave them to Theophrastus at his death, and they were bought by one of the Ptolemies, and placed in the famous library of Alexandria. Diogenes Laertes has given us a very extensive catalogue of them. Aristotle had a deformed countenance, but his genius was a sufficient compensation for all his personal defects. He has been called by Plato the philosopher of truth; and Cicero compliments him with the title of a man of eloquence, universal knowledge, readiness and acuteness of invention, and fecundity of thought. Aristotle studied nature more than art, and had recourse to simplicity of expression more than ornament. He was so authoritative in his opinions, that, as Bacon observes, he wished to establish the same dominion over men's minds as his pupil over nations. Alexander, it is said, wished and encouraged his learned tutor to write the history of animals; and the more effectually to assist him, he supplied him with 800 talents, and in his Asiatic expedition employed above a thousand men to collect animals, either in fishing, hunting, or hawking, which were carefully transmitted to the philosopher. Aristotle's logic has long reigned in the schools, and been regarded as the perfect model of all imitation. As he expired, the philosopher is said to have uttered the following sentiment: Fede hunc mundum intravi, anxius vixi, perturbatus egredior, causa causarum miserere mei. The letter which Philip wrote to Aristotle has been preserved, and is in these words: "I inform you I have a son; I thank the gods, not so much for making me a father, as for giving me a son in an age when he can have Aristotle for his instructer. I hope you will make him a successor worthy of me, and a king worthy of Macedonia." He died in the 63d year of his age, B. C. 322. His treatises have been published separately; but the best edition of the works collectively, is that of Duval, 2 vols. fol. Paris, 1629. Tyrrwhitt's edition of the Poetica, Oxon. 4to. 1794, is a valuable acquisition to literature. He had a son, whom he called Nicomachus, by the courtesan Herpyllis. Some have said that he drowned himself in the Euripus, because he could not find out the cause of its flux and reflux. There are, however, different reports about the manner of his death, and some believe that he died at Athens of a colic, two years after Alexander's death. The people of Stagira instituted festivals in his honour, because he had rendered important services to their city. Diog. in vitâ.—Plut. in Alex. and de Alex. fort. &c.—*Cic. Acad. &c.——There were besides seven of the same name.

Aristoxĕnus, a celebrated musician, disciple of Aristotle, and born at Tarentum. He wrote 453 different treatises on philosophy, history, &c. and was disappointed in his expectations of succeeding in the school of Aristotle, for which he always spoke with ingratitude of his learned master. Of all his works, nothing remains but three books upon music, the most ancient on that subject extant.

Arius, a celebrated writer, the origin of the Arian controversy that denied the eternal divinity and consubstantiality of the Word. Though he was greatly persecuted for his opinions, he gained the favour of the emperor Constantine, and triumphed over his powerful antagonist Athanasius. He died the very night he was going to enter the church of Constantinople in triumph.

Armentarius, a Cæsar in the reign of Diocletian.

Armilustrium, a festival at Rome on the 19th of October. When the sacrifices were offered, all the people appeared under arms. The festival has often been confounded with that of the Salii. It was instituted A. U. C. 543. Varro. de L. L. 5, c. 3.—Liv. 27, c. 37.

Arminius, a warlike general of the Germans, who supported a bloody war against Rome for some time, and was at last conquered by Germanicus in two great battles. He was poisoned by one of his friends, A. D. 19, in the 37th year of his age. Dio. 56.—Tacit. Ann. 1, &c.

Arnobius, a philosopher in Dioclesian's reign, who became a convert to Christianity. He applied for ordination, but was refused by the bishops till he gave them a proof of his sincerity. Upon this he wrote his celebrated treatise, in which he exposed the absurdity of irreligion, and ridiculed the heathen gods. Opinions are various concerning the purity of his style, though all agree in praise of his extensive erudition. The book that he wrote, de Rhetorica Institutione, is not extant. The best edition of his treatise Adversus Gentes is the 4to. printed L. Bat. 1651.

Arrianus, I. a philosopher of Nicomedia, priest of Ceres and Proserpine, and disciple of Epictus, called a second Xenophon, from the elegance and sweetness of his diction, and distinguished for his acquaintance with military and political life. He wrote seven books on Alexander's expedition, the periplus of the Euxine and Red Sea, four books on the dissertations of Epictetus, besides an account of the Alani, Bithynians, and Parthians. He flourished about the 140th year of Christ, and was rewarded with the consulship and government of Cappadocia by M. Antoninus. The best edition of Arrian's Expeditio Alexandri, is the fol. Gronovii. L. Bat. 1704, and the 8vo. a Raphelio, 2 vols. 1757, and the Tactica, 8vo. Amst. 1683.——II. A poet who wrote an epic poem in twenty-four books on Alexander; also another poem on Attalus, king of Pergamus. He likewise translated Virgil's Georgics into Greek verse.

Arrius, and Arius, a philosopher of Alexandria, who so ingratiated himself with Augustus after the battle of Actium, that the conqueror declared the people of Alexandria owed the preservation of their city to three causes; because Alexander was their founder, because of the beauty of the situation, and because Arrius was a native of the place. Plut. in Anton.

Arruntius, a famous geographer, who, upon being accused of adultery and treason under Tiberius, opened his veins. Tacit. Ann. 6.

Arsăces, I. a man of obscure origin, who, upon seeing Seleucus defeated by the Gauls, invaded Parthia, and conquered the governor of the province called Andragoras, and laid the foundations of an empire, 250 B. C. He added the kingdom of the Hyrcani to his newly-acquired possessions, and spent his time in establishing his power and regulating the laws. Justin. 41, c. 5 and 6.—Strab. 11 and 12.——II. His son and successor bore the same name. He carried war against Antiochus, the son of Seleucus, who entered the field with 100,000 foot and 20,000 horse. He afterwards made peace with Antiochus, and died B. C. 217. Id. 41, c. 5.——III. The third king of Parthia, of the family of the Arsacidæ, bore the same name, and was also called Priapatius. He reigned twelve years, and left two sons, Mithridates and Phraates. Phraates succeeded, as being the elder, and at his death he left his kingdom to his brother, though he had many children; observing, that a monarch ought to have in view, not the dignity of his family, but the prosperity of his subjects. Justin. 31, c. 5.——IV. A king of Pontus and Armenia, in alliance with the Romans. He fought long with success against the Persians, till he was deceived by the snares of king Sapor, his enemy, who put out his eyes, and soon after deprived him of life. Marcellin.——V. The eldest son of Artabanus, appointed over Armenia by his father, after the death of king Artaxias. Tacit. Hist. 6.

Arsacĭdæ, a name given to some of the monarchs of Parthia, in honour of Arsaces, the founder of the empire. Their power subsisted till the 229th year of the Christian era, when they were conquered by Artaxerxes king of Persia. Justin. 41.

Arsănes, the son of Ochus, and father of Codomanus.

Arses, the younger son of Ochus, whom the eunuch Bagoas raised to the throne of Persia, and destroyed with his children, after a reign of three years. Diod. 17.

Arsinoe, I. a daughter of Leucippus and Philodice, was mother of Æsculapius by Apollo, according to some authors. She received divine honours after death at Sparta. Apollod. 8.—Paus. 2, c. 26, l. 3, c. 12.——II. The sister and wife of Ptolemy Philadelphus, worshipped after death under the name of Venus Zephyritis. Dinochares began to build her a temple with loadstones, in which there stood a statue of Arsinoe suspended in the air by the power of the magnet; but the death of the architect prevented it being perfected. Plin. 34, c. 14. ——III. A daughter of Ptolemy Lagus, who married Lysimachus king of Macedonia. After her husband's death, Ceraunus, her own brother, married her, and ascended the throne of Macedonia. He previously murdered Lysimachus and Philip, the sons of Arsinoe by Lysimachus, in their mother's arms. Arsinoe was sometime after banished to Samothrace. Jus-tus. 17, c. 1, &c.——IV. A younger daughter of Ptolemy Auletes, sister to Cleopatra. Antony despatched her to gain the good graces of her sister. Hirt. Alex. 4.—Appian. Vid. Part I.

ARTABANUS, I. son of Hystaspes, was brother to Darius the first. He dissuaded his nephew Xerxes from making war against the Greeks, and at his return he assassinated him with the hopes of ascending the throne. Darius, the son of Xerxes, was murdered in a similar manner; and Artaxerxes, his brother, would have shared the same fate, had not he discovered the snares of the assassin and punished him with death. Diod. 11.—Justin. 3, c. 1, &c.—Herodot. 4, c. 38, l. 7, c. 10, &c.——II. A king of Parthia after the death of his nephew Phraates 2d. He undertook a war against a nation of Scythia, in which he perished. His son Mithridates succeeded him, and merited the appellation of Great. Justin. 42, c. 2.——III. A king of Media, and afterwards of Parthia. He invaded Armenia, from whence he was driven away by one of the generals of Tiberius. He was expelled from his throne, which Tiridates usurped; and, some time after, he was restored again to his ancient power, and died A. D. 48. Tacit. Ann. 5, &c. ——IV. Another king of Parthia, who made war against the emperor Caracalla, who had attempted his life on pretence of courting his daughter. He was murdered, and the power of Parthia abolished, and the crown translated to the Persian monarchs. Dio.—Herodian.

ARTABAZÂNES, or ARTAMÈNES, the eldest son of Darius when a private person. He attempted to succeed to the Persian throne in preference to Xerxes. Justin.

ARTABAZUS, I. a son of Pharnaces, general in the army of Xerxes. He fled from Greece upon the ill success of Mardonius. Herodot. 7, 8 and 9.——II. A general who made war against Artaxerxes, and was defeated. He was afterwards reconciled to his prince, and became the familiar friend of Darius 3d. After the murder of this prince, he surrendered himself up with his sons to Alexander, who treated him with much humanity and confidence. Curt. 5, c. 9 and 12, l. 6, c. 5, l. 7, c. 3 and 5, l. 8, c. 1.

ARTACÆAS, an officer in the army of Xerxes, the tallest of all the troops, the king excepted.

ARTAPHERNES, a general whom Darius sent into Greece with Datis. He was conquered at the battle of Marathon by Miltiades. Vid. Datis. C. Nep. in Milt.—Herodot.

ARTAVASDES, a son of Tigranes, king of Upper Armenia, who wrote tragedies, and shone as an orator and historian. He lived in alliance with the Romans, but Crassus, the Roman general, was defeated partly on account of his delay. He betrayed M. Antony in his expedition against Parthia, for which Antony reduced his kingdom, and carried him to Egypt, where he adorned the triumph of the conqueror led in golden chains. He was some time after murdered. Strab. 11.——Two other kings of Armenia bore this name.

ARTAXA, and ARTAXIAS, a general of Antiochus the Great, who erected the province of Armenia into a kingdom, by his reliance on the friendship of the Romans. King Tigranes was one of his successors. Strab. 11.

ARTAXERXES, I. succeeded to the kingdom of Persia after his father Xerxes. He destroyed Artabanus, who had murdered Xerxes, and attempted to destroy the royal family to raise himself to the throne. He made war against the Bactrians, and re-conquered Egypt that had revolted, with the assistance of the Athenians, and was remarkable for his equity and moderation. One of his hands was longer than the other, whence he has been called Macrochir or Longimanus. He reigned 39 years, and died B. C. 425. C. Nep. in Reg.—Plut. in Artax. ——The second of that name, king of Persia, was surnamed Mnemon, on account of his extensive memory. He was son of Darius the second, by Parysatis, the daughter of Artaxerxes Longimanus, and had three brothers, Cyrus, Ostanes, and Oxathres. His name was Arsaces, which he changed into Artaxerxes when he ascended the throne. His brother Cyrus, who had been appointed over Lydia and the seacoasts, assembled a large army under various pretences, and at last marched against his brother at the head of 100,000 barbarians and 13,000 Greeks. He was opposed by Artaxerxes with 900,000 men, and a bloody battle was fought at Cunaxa, in which Cyrus was killed and his forces routed. It has been reported that Cyrus was killed by Artaxerxes, who was so desirous of the honour, that he put to death two men for saying that they had killed him. After he was delivered from the attacks of his brother, Artaxerxes stirred up a war among the Greeks against Sparta, and exerted all his influence to weaken the power of the Greeks. It is said that Artaxerxes died of a broken heart, in consequence of his son's unnatural behaviour, in the 94th year of his age, after a reign of 46 years, B. C. 358. Artaxerxes had 150 children by his 350 concubines, and only four legitimate sons. Plut. in vitâ.—C. Nep. in Reg.—Justin. 10, c. 1, &c.—Diod. 13, &c.——The 3d, surnamed Ochus, succeeded his father Artaxerxes 2d, and established himself on his throne by murdering about 80 of his nearest relations. He punished with death one of his officers who conspired against him, and recovered Egypt, which had revolted, destroyed Sidon, and ravaged all Syria. He made war against the Cadusii, and greatly rewarded a private man called Codomanus for his uncommon valour. But his behaviour in Egypt, and his cruelty towards the inhabitants, offended his subjects, and Bagoas at last obliged his physician to poison him, B. C. 337, and afterwards gave his flesh to be devoured by cats, and made handles for swords with his bones. Justin. 10, c. 3.—Diod. 17.—Ælian. V. H. 6, c. 8.

ARTAXERXES, or ARTAXARES I. a common soldier of Persia, who killed Artabanus, A. D. 228, and erected Persia again into a kingdom, which had been extinct since the death of Darius. Severus, the Roman emperor, conquered him, and obliged him to remain within his kingdom. Herodian. 5.——One of his successors, son of Sapor, bore his name, and reigned eleven years, during which he distinguished himself by his cruelties.

ARTAXIAS, I. a son of Artavasdes, king of Armenia, was proclaimed king by his father's troops. He opposed Antony, by whom he was defeated, and became so odious that the Romans, at the request of the Armenians, raised Tigranes to the throne.——II. Another, son of Polemon, whose original name was Zeno. After the expulsion of Venones from Armenia, he was made king of Germanicus. Tacit. 6, Ann. c. 31. Vid. Artaxa.

Artaÿctes, a Persian, appomted governor of Sestos by Xerxes. He was hung on a cross by the Athenians for his cruelties. Herod. 7 and 9.

Artemidorus, I. a native of Ephesus, who wrote a history and description of the earth, in eleven books. He flourished about 104 years B. C.——II. A man in the reign of Antoninus, who wrote a learned work on the interpretation of dreams, still extant; the best edition of which is that of Rigaltius, Paris, 4to. 1604, to which is annexed Achmetis oneirocritica.——III. A man of Cnidus, son to the historian Theopompus. He had a school at Rome, and he wrote a book on illustrious men, not extant. As he was a friend of J. Cæsar, he wrote down an account of the conspiracy which was formed against him. He gave it to the dictator from among the crowd as he was going to the senate, but J. Cæsar put it with other papers which he held in his hand, thinking it to be of no material consequence. Plut. in Cæs.

Artemisia, daughter of Lygdamis of Halicarnassus, reigned over Halicarnassus and the neighbouring country. She assisted Xerxes in his expedition against Greece with a fleet, and her valour was so great that the monarch observed that all his men fought like women, and all his women like men. The Athenians were so ashamed of fighting against a woman, that they offered a reward of 10,000 drachms for her head.——There was also another queen of Caria of that name, often confounded with the daughter of Lygdamis. She was daughter of Hecatomnus king of Caria, or Halicarnassus, and was married to her own brother Mausolus, famous for his personal beauty. She was so fond of her husband, that at his death she drank in her liquor his ashes after his body had been burned, and erected to his memory a monument, which, for its grandeur and magnificence, was called one of the seven wonders of the world. This monument she called Mausoleum, a name which has been given from that time to all monuments of unusual splendour. She invited all the literary men of her age, and proposed rewards to him who composed the best elegiac panegyric upon her husband. The prize was adjudged to Theopompus. She was so inconsolable for the death of her husband, that she died through grief two years after. Vitruv.—Strab. 14.—Plin. 25, c. 7, l. 36, c. 5.

Artêmon, I. a native of Clazomenæ, who was with Pericles at the siege of Samos, where it is said he invented the battering-ram, the testudo, and other equally valuable military engines. ——II. A man who wrote a treatise on collecting books.——III. A Syrian, whose features resembled in the strongest manner, those of Antiochus. Vid. Antiochus.

Artobarzânes, a son of Darius, who endeavoured to ascend the throne in preference to his brother Xerxes, but to no purpose. Herodot. 7, c. 2 and 3.

Arvâles, a name given to twelve priests who celebrated the festivals called Ambarvalia. They were descended from the twelve sons of Acca Laurentia. Varro de L. L. 4. Vid. Ambravalia.

Aruns, I. a brother of Tarquin the Proud. He married Tullia, who murdered him to espouse Tarquin, who had assassinated his wife. ——II. A son of Tarquin the Proud, who, in the battle that was fought between the partisans of his father and the Romans, attacked Brutus, the Roman consul, who wounded him and threw him down from his horse. Liv. 2, c. 6.——III. A son of Porsenna, king of Etruria, sent by his father to take Aricia. Liv. 2, c. 14.

Aruntius, (Paterculus.) Vid. Phalaris.

Aryandes, a Persian appointed governor of Egypt by Cambyses. He was put to death because he imitated Darius in whatever he did. Herodot. 4, c. 166.

Arymbæus, a prince of the Molossi, who privately encouraged the Greeks against Macedonia, and afterwards embraced the party of the Macedonians.

Ascanius, son of Æneas by Creusa, was saved from the flames of Troy by his father, whom he accompanied in his voyage to Italy. He was afterwards called Iulus. He behaved with great valour in the war which his father carried on against the Latins, and succeeded Æneas in the kingdom of Latinus, and built Alba, to which he transferred the seat of his empire from Lavinium. The descendants of Ascanius reigned in Alba for above 420 years, under 14 kings, till the age of Numitor. Ascanius reigned 38 years, 30 at Lavinium and eight at Alba; and was succeeded by Sylvius Posthumus, son of Æneas by Lavinia. Liv. 1, c. 3.—Virg. Æn. 1, &c.——According to Dionys. Hal. 1, c. 15, &c. the son of Æneas by Lavinia was also called Ascanius.

Asclêpia, festivals in honour of Asclepius, or Æsculapius, celebrated all over Greece, when prizes for poetical and musical compositions were honourably distributed. At Epidaurus they were called by a different name.

Asculêpiâdes, I. a rhetorician in the age of Eumenes, who wrote an historical account of Alexander. Arrian.——II. A philosopher, disciple to Stilpo, and very intimate with Menedemus. The two friends lived together, and that they might not be separated when they married, Asclepiades married the daughter, and Menedemus, though much the younger, the mother. When the wife of Asclepiades was dead, Menedemus gave his wife to his friend, and married another. He was blind in his old age, and died in Eretria. Plut.——III. A physician of Bithynia, B. C. 90, who acquired great reputation at Rome, and was the founder of a sect in physic. He relied so much on his skill, that he laid a wager he should never be sick; and won it, as he died of a fall, in a very advanced age. Nothing of his medical treatises is now extant. ——IV. An Egyptian, who wrote hymns on the gods of his country, and also a treatise on the coincidence of all religions.——V. A native of Alexandria, who gave a history of the Athenian archons.——VI. A disciple of Isocrates, who wrote six books on those events which had been the subject of tragedies.

Asclepiodôrus, a painter in the age of Apelles, 12 of whose pictures of the gods were sold for 300 minæ each, to an African prince. Plin. 35.

Ascletarion, a mathematician in the age of Domitian, who said that he should be torn by dogs. The emperor ordered him to be put to death, and his body carefully secured; but as soon as he was set on the burning pile, a sudden storm arose which put out the flames, and the dogs came and tore to pieces the mathematician's body. Sueton. in Domit. 15.

Ascōlia, a festival in honour of Bacchus, celebrated about December, by the Athenian husbandmen, who generally sacrificed a goat to the god, because that animal is a great enemy to the vine. They made a bottle with the skin of the victim, which they filled with oil and wine, and afterwards leaped upon it. He who could stand upon it first was victorious, and received the bottle as a reward. This was called ασκωλιαζειν παρα το επι του ασκου αλλεσθαι, leaping upon the bottle, whence the name of the festival is derived. It was also introduced in Italy, where the people besmeared their faces with the dregs of wine, and sung hymns to the god. They always hanged some small images of the god on the tallest tree in their vineyards, and these images they called Oscilla: Virg. G. 2, v. 384.—Pollux. 9, c. 7.

Asconius Labeo, I. a preceptor of Nero.——II. Pedia, a man in the age of Vespasian, who became blind in his old age, and lived 12 years after. He wrote, besides some historical treatises, annotations on Cicero's orations.

Asdrŭbal, I. a Carthaginian, son-in-law of Hamilcar. He distinguished himself in the Numidian war, and was appointed chief general on the death of his father-in-law, and for eight years presided with much prudence and valour over Spain, which submitted to his arms with cheerfulness. Here he laid the foundation of new Carthage, and saw it complete. To stop his progress towards the east, the Romans, in a treaty with Carthage, forbade him to pass the Iberus, which was faithfully observed by the general. He was killed in the midst of his soldiers, B. C. 220, by a slave whose master he had murdered. Ital. 1, v. 165.—Appian. Iberic.—Polyb. 2.—Liv. 21, c. 2, &c.——II. A son of Hamilcar, who came from Spain with a large reinforcement for his brother Annibal. He crossed the Alps and entered Italy; but some of his letters to Annibal having fallen into the hands of the Romans, the consuls M. Livius Salinator and Claudius Nero attacked him suddenly near the Metaurus, and defeated him, B. C. 207. He was killed in the battle, and 56,000 of his men shared his fate, and 5400 were taken prisoners; about 8000 Romans were killed. The head of Asdrubal was cut off, and some days after thrown into the camp of Annibal, who, in the moment that he was in the greatest expectations of a promised supply, exclaimed at the sight, "In losing Asdrubal, I lose all my happiness, and Carthage all her hopes." Asdrubal had before made an attempt to penetrate into Italy by sea, but had been defeated by the governor of Sardinia. Liv. 21, 23, 27, &c.—Polyb.—Horat. 4, od. 4.——II. A Carthaginian general, surnamed Calvus, appointed governor of Sardinia, and taken prisoner by the Romans. Liv.——III. Another, son of Gisgon, appointed general of the Carthaginian forces in Spain, in the time of the great Annibal. He made head against the Romans in Africa, with the assistance of Syphax, but he was soon after defeated by Scipio. He died B. C. 206. Liv.——IV. Another, who advised his countrymen to make peace with Rome, and upbraided Annibal for laughing in the Carthaginian senate. Liv.——V. A grandson of Massinissa, murdered in the senate-house by the Carthaginians.——VI. Another, whose camp was destroyed in Africa by Scipio, though at the head of 20,000 men, in the last Punic war. When all was lost, he fled to the enemy and begged his life. Scipio showed him to the Carthaginians, upon which his wife, with a thousand imprecations, threw herself and her two children into the flames of the temple of Æsculapius, which she, and others, had set on fire. He was not of the same family as Hannibal. Liv. 51.——VII. A Carthaginian general, conquered by L. Cæcilius Metellus in Sicily, in a battle in which he lost 130 elephants. These animals were led in triumph all over Italy by the conquerors.

Asellio (Sempronius,) an historian and military tribune, who wrote an account of the actions in which he was present. Dionys. Hal.

Asinaria, a festival in Sicily, in commemoration of the victory obtained over Demosthenes and Nicias at the river Asinarius.

Asinius Gallus, I. son of Asinius Pollio, the orator, married Vipsania after she had been divorced by Tiberius. This marriage gave rise to a secret enmity between the emperor and Asinius, who starved himself to death, either voluntarily, or by order of his imperial enemy. He wrote a comparison between his father and Cicero, in which he gave a decided superiority to the former. Tacit. 1 and 5. Ann.—Dio. 58.—Plin. 7, ep. 4.——II. Pollio, an excellent orator, poet, and historian, intimate with Augustus. He triumphed over the Dalmatians, and wrote an account of the wars of Cæsar and Pompey, in 17 books, besides poems. He refused to answer some verses against him by Augustus, "Because," said he, "you have the power to proscribe me should my answer prove offensive." He died in the 80th year of his age, A. D. 4. He was consul with Cn. Domitius Calvinus, A. U. C. 714. It is to him that the fourth of Virgil's Bucolics is inscribed. Quintil.—Sueton. in Cæs. 30 and 55.—Dio. 27, 49, 55.—Senec. de Tranq. Ani. & ep. 100.—Plin. 7, c. 30.—Tacit. 6.—Paterc. 2.—Plut. in Cæs.

Aspăsia, I. a daughter of Hermotimus of Phocæa, famous for her personal charms and elegance. She was priestess of the sun, mistress to Cyrus, and afterwards to his brother Artaxerxes, from whom she passed to Darius. She was called Milto, Vermillion, on account of the beauty of her complexion. Ælian. V. H. 12, c. 1.—Plut. in Artax.——II. Another woman, daughter of Axiochus, born at Miletus. She came to Athens, where she taught eloquence, and Socrates was proud to be among her scholars. She so captivated Pericles by her mental and personal accomplishments, that he became her pupil, and at last took her for his mistress and wife.——III. The wife of Xenophon, was also called Aspasia, if we follow the improper interpretation given by some to Cic. de Inv. 1, c. 31.

Aspasius, a peripatetic philosopher in the 2d century, whose commentaries on different subjects were highly valued.

Aspathines, one of the seven noblemen of Persia, who conspired against the usurper Smerdis. Herodot. 3, c. 70, &c.

Assaracus, a Trojan prince, son of Tros by Callirrhoe. He was father to Capys, the father of Anchises. The Trojans were frequently called the descendants of Assaracus, Gens Assaraci. Homer. Il. 20.—Virg. Æn. 1.

Aster, a dexterous archer, who offered his services to Philip, king of Macedonia. Upon being slighted, he retired into the city and aimed an arrow at Philip, who pressed it with a siege. The arrow, on which was written, "Aimed at Philip's right eye," struck the king's eye and put it out; and Philip, to return the pleasantry, threw back the same arrow, with these words, "If Philip takes the town, Aster shall be hanged." The conqueror kept his word. Lucian. de Hist. Scrib.

Astiochus, a general of Lacedæmon, who conquered the Athenians near Cnidus, and took Phocæa and Cumæ, B. C. 411.

Astyages, son of Cyaxares, was the last king of Media. He was deprived of his crown by his grandson, after a reign of 35 years. Astyages was very cruel and oppressive; and Harpagus, one of his officers, whose son he had wantonly murdered, encouraged Mandane's son, who was called Cyrus, to take up arms against his grandfather, and he conquered him and took him prisoner, 559 B. C. Xenophon, in his Cyropædia, relates a different story, and asserts that Cyrus and Astyages lived in the most undisturbed friendship together. Justin. 1, c. 4, &c.—Herodot. 1, c. 74, 75, &c.

Astyanax, I. a son of Hector and Andromache. He was very young when the Greeks besieged Troy; and when the city was taken, his mother saved him in her arms from the flames. Ulysses, who was afraid lest the young prince should inherit the virtues of his father, and one day avenge the ruin of his country upon the Greeks, seized him, and threw him down from the walls of Troy. According to Euripides, he was killed by Menelaus; and Seneca says, that Pyrrhus, the son of Achilles, put him to death. Hector had given him the name of Scamandrius; but the Trojans, who hoped he might prove as great as his father, called him Astyanax, or the bulwark of the city. Homer. Il. 6, v. 400, l. 22, v. 500.—Virg. Æn. 2, v. 457, l. 3, v. 489.—Ovid. Met. 13, v. 415. ——II. A writer in the age of Gallienus.

Astydamas, I. an Athenian, pupil to Isocrates. He wrote 240 tragedies, of which only 15 obtained the poetical prize.——II. A Milesian, three times victorious at Olympia. He was famous for his strength as well as for his voracious appetite. He was once invited to a feast by king Ariobarzanes, and he eat what had been prepared for nine persons. Athen. 10. ——III. Two tragic writers bore the same name, one of whom was disciple to Socrates. ——IV. A comic poet of Athens.

Asychis, a king of Egypt, who succeeded Mycerinus, and made a law, that whoever borrowed money must deposite his father's body in the hands of his creditors as a pledge of his promise of payment. He built a magnificent pyramid. Herodot. 2, c. 136.

Atabulus, a wind which was frequent in Apulia. Horat. 1, Sat. 5, v. 78.

Athanasius, a bishop of Alexandria, celebrated for his sufferings, and the determined opposition he maintained against Arius and his doctrine. His writings, which were numerous, and some of which have perished, contain a defence of the mystery of the Trinity, the divinity of the Word and of the Holy Ghost, and an apology to Constantine. The creed which bears his name is supposed by some not to be his composition. Athanasius died 2d May, 373 A. D. after filling the archiepiscopal chair 47 years, and leading alternately a life of exile and of triumph. The latest edition of his works is that of the Benedictines, 3 vols. fol. Paris, 1698.

Athenæa, festivals celebrated at Athens in honour of Minerva. One of them was called Panathenæa and the other Chalcea; for an account of which see those words.

Athenæus, I. a Greek cosmographer.——II. A peripatetic philosopher of Cilicia in the time of Augustus. Strab.——III. A Spartan sent by his countrymen to Athens to settle the peace during the Peloponnesian war.——IV. A grammarian of Naucratis, who composed an elegant and miscellaneous work, called Deipnosophistæ, replete with very curious and interesting remarks and anecdotes of the manners of the ancients, and likewise valuable for the scattered pieces of ancient poetry it preserves. The work consists of 15 books, of which the two first, part of the third, and almost the whole of the last, are lost. Athenæus wrote, besides this, a history of Syria, and other works now lost. He died A. D. 194. The best edition of his works is that of Casaubon, fol. 2 vols. Lugd. 1612, by far superior to the editions of 1595 and 1657. ——V. A physician of Cilicia in the age of Pliny, who made heat, cold, wet, dry, and air, the elements, instead of the four commonly received.

Athenagoras, I. a Greek in the time of Darius, to whom Pharnabazus gave the government of Chios, &c. Curt. 8, c. 5.——II. A Christian philosopher in the age of Aurelius, who wrote a treatise on the resurrection, and an apology for the Christians, still extant. He died A. D. 177. The best edition of his works is that of Dechair, 8vo. Oxon. 1706. The romance of Theagenes and Charis is falsely ascribed to him.

Athenion, I. a peripatetic philosopher, 108 B. C.——II. A general of the Sicilian slaves.

Athenodorus, I. a philosopher of Tarsus, intimate with Augustus. The emperor often profited by his lessons, and was advised by him always to repeat the 24 letters of the Greek alphabet before he gave way to the impulse of anger. Athenodorus died in his 82d year, much lamented by his countrymen. Suet.—— II. A stoic philosopher of Cana, near Tarsus, in the age of Augustus. He was intimate with Strabo. Strab. 14.——III. A philosopher, disciple to Zeno, and keeper of the royal library at Pergamus.

Atia, I. a law enacted A. U. C. 690, by Atius Labienus, the tribune of the people. It abolished the Cornelian law, and put in full force the Lex Domitia, by transferring the right of electing priests from the college of priests to the people.——II. The mother of Augustus. Vid. Accia.

Atilia Lex, gave the prætor, and a majority of the tribunes, power of appointing guardians to those minors who were not previously provided for by their parents. It was enacted about A. U. C. 560.——Another, A. U. C. 443, which gave the people power of electing 20 tribunes of the soldiers in four legions. Liv. 9, c. 30.

Atilius, a freedman, who exhibited combats of gladiators at Fidenæ. The amphitheatre, which contained the spectators, fell during the exhibition, and about 50,000 persons were killed or mutilated. Tacit. 4, Ann. c. 62.

Atilla, the mother of the poet Lucan. She was accused of conspiracy by her son, who expected to clear himself of the charge. Tacit. Ann. 15, c. 56.

Atinia Lex, was enacted by the tribune Atinius. It gave a tribune of the people the privileges of a senator, and the right of sitting in the senate.

Atossa, a daughter of Cyrus, who was one of the wives of Cambyses, Smerdis, and afterwards of Darius, by whom she had Xerxes. She was cured of a dangerous cancer by Democedes. She is supposed by some to be the Vashti of scripture. Herodot. 3, c. 68, &c.

Atreus, son of Pelops by Hippodamia, daughter of Œnomaus, king of Pisa, was king of Myceneæ, and brother to Pittheus, Trœzen, Thyestes, and Chrysippus. As Chrysippus was an illegitimate son, and at the same time a favourite of his father, Hippodamia resolved to remove him. She persuaded her sons Thyestes and Atreus to murder him; but their refusal exasperated her more, and she executed it herself. This murder was grievous to Pelops; he suspected his two sons, who fled away from his presence. Atreus retired to the court of Eurysthenes king of Argos, his nephew, and upon his death he succeeded him on the throne. He married, as some report, Ærope, his predecessor's daughter, by whom he had Plisthenes, Menelaus, and Agamemnon. Others affirm that Ærope was the wife of Plisthenes, by whom he had Agamemnon and Menelaus, who are the reputed sons of Atreus, because that prince took care of their education and brought them up as his own. (Vid. Plisthenes.) Thyestes had followed his brother to Argos, where he lived with him, and debauched his wife, by whom he had two, or according to some, three children. This incestuous commerce offended Atreus, and Thyestes was banished from his court. He was, however, soon after recalled by his brother, who determined cruelly to revenge the violence offered to his bed. To effect this purpose he invited his brother to a sumptuous feast, where Thyestes was served up with the flesh of the children he had by his sister-in-law the queen. After the repast was finished, the arms and heads of the murdered children were produced, to convince Thyestes of what he had feasted upon. This action appeared so cruel and impious, that the sun is said to have shrunk back in its course at the bloody sight. Thyestes immediately fled to the court of Thesprotus, and thence to Sicyon, where he ravished his own daughter Pelopea, in a grove sacred to Minerva, without knowing who she was. This incest he committed intentionally, as some report, to revenge himself on his brother Atreus, according to the words of the oracle, which promised him satisfaction for the cruelties he had suffered only from the hand of a son who should be born of himself and his own daughter. Pelopea brought forth a son, whom she called Ægisthus, and soon after she married Atreus, who had lost his wife. Atreus adopted Ægisthus, and sent him to murder Thyestes, who had been seized at Delphi and imprisoned. Thyestes knew his son, and made himself known to him; he made him espouse his cause, and instead of becoming his father's murderer, he rather avenged his wrongs, and returned to Atreus whom he assassinated. Vid. Thyestes, Ægisthus, Pelopea, Agamemnon, and Menelaus. Hygin. fab. 83, 86, 87, 88, and 258.—Euripid. in Orest. in Iphig. Taur.—Plut. in Parall.—Paus. 9, c 40. —Apollod. 3, c. 10.—Senec. in Atr.

Atridæ, a patronymic given by Homer to Agamemnon and Menelaus, as being the sons of Atreus. This is false, upon the authority of Hesiod, Lactantius, Dictys of Crete, &c. who maintain that these princes were not the sons of Atreus, but of Plisthenes, and that they were brought up in the house and under the eye of their grandfather. Vid. Plisthenes.

Atta, T. Q. a writer of merit in the Augustan age, who seems to have received this name from some deformity in his legs or feet. His compositions, dramatical as well as satirical, were held in universal admiration, though Horace thinks of them with indifference. Horat. 2, ep. 1, v. 79.

Attălus 1st, king of Pergamus, succeeded Eumenes 1st. He defeated the Gauls, who had invaded his dominions, extended his conquests to mount Taurus, and obtained the assistance of the Romans against Antiochus. The Athenians rewarded his merit with great honours. He died at Pergamus, after a reign of 44 years, B. C. 197. Liv. 26, 27, 28, &c.—Polyb. 5.—Strab. 13.——The 2d of that name, was sent on an embassy to Rome by his brother Eumenes the second, and at his return was appointed guardian to his nephew, Attalus the third, who was then an infant. Prusias made successful war against him, and seized his capital; but the conquest was stopped by the interference of the Romans, who restored Attalus to his throne. Attalus, who has received the name of Philadelphus, from his fraternal love, was a munificent patron of learning, and the founder of several cities. He was poisoned by his nephew, in the 82d year of his age, B. C. 138. He had governed the nation with great prudence and moderation for 20 years. Strab. 13.—Polyb. 5.——The 3d, succeeded to the kingdom of Pergamus by the murder of Attalus the 2d, and made himself odious by his cruelty to his relations, and his wanton exercise of power. He was son to Eumenes 2d, and surnamed Philopator. He left the cares of government, to cultivate his garden, and to make experiments on the melting of metals. He lived in great amity with the Romans; and, as he died without issue by his wife Berenice, he left in his will the words P. R. meorum hæres esto, which the Romans interpreted as themselves, and therefore took possession of his kingdom, B. C. 133, and made it a Roman province, which they governed by a proconsul. From this circumstance, whatever was a valuable acquisition, or an ample fortune, was always called by the epithet Attalicus. Attalus, as well as his predecessors, made themselves celebrated for the valuable libraries which they collected at Pergamps, and for the patronage which merit and virtue always found at their court. Liv. 24, &c. Plin. 7, 8, 33, &c.—Justin. 39.—Horat. 1, od. 1.——IV. An officer in Alexander's army. Curt. 4, c. 13.——V. Another, very inimical to Alexander. He was put to death by Parmenio, and Alexander was accused of the murder. Curt. 6, c. 9, l. 8, c. 1.——VI. A philosopher, preceptor to Seneca. Senec. ep. 108.

ATTEIUS CAPITO, a consul in the age of Augustus, who wrote treatises on the sacerdotal laws, public courts of justice, and the duty of a senator. Vid. Ateius.

ATTICUS, I. (T. Pomponius) a celebrated Roman knight, to whom Cicero wrote a great number of letters, which contained the general history of the age. They are now extant, and divided into 17 books. In the time of Marius and Sylla, Atticus retired to Athens, where he so endeared himself to the citizens, that, after his departure, they erected statues to him, in commemoration of his munificence and liberality. He was such a perfect master of the Greek writers, and spoke their language so fluently, that he was surnamed Atticus. He behaved in such a disinterested manner, that he offended neither of the inimical parties at Rome, and both were equally anxious of courting his approbation. He lived in the greatest intimacy with the illustrious men of his age, and he was such a lover of truth, that he not only abstained from falsehood, even in a joke, but treated with the greatest contempt and indignation a lying tongue. It is said that he refused to take aliment, when unable to get the better of a fever, and died in his 77th year, B. C. 32, after bearing the amiable character of peacemaker among his friends. Cornelius Nepos, one of his intimate friends, has written a minute account of his life. Cic. ad Attic. &c.——II. Herodes, an Athenian in the age of the Antonines, descended from Miltiades, and celebrated for his munificence. His son of the same name was honoured with the consulship, and he generously erected an aqueduct at Troas, of which he had been made governor by the emperor Adrian, and raised in other parts of the empire several public buildings, as useful as they were magnificent. Philostrat. in. vit. 2, p. 548.—A. Gell. noct. Att.

ATTILA, a celebrated king of the Huns, a nation in the southern parts of Scythia, who invaded the Roman empire in the reign of Valentinian, with an army of 500,000 men, and laid waste the provinces. He took the town of Aquileia, and marched against Rome; but his retreat and peace were purchased with a large sum of money by the feeble emperor. Attila, who boasted in the appellation of the scourge of God, died A. D. 453, of an uncommon effusion of blood the first night of his nuptials. He had expressed his wish to extend his conquests over the whole world; and he often feasted his barbarity by dragging captive kings in his train. Jornand. de Reb. Get. Vid. Hunni, Part I.

ATTILIUS, I. Vid. Regulus.——II. Calatinus, a Roman consul, who fought the Carthaginian fleet.——III. Marcus, a poet, who translated the Electra of Sophocles into Latin verse, and wrote comedies whose unintelligible language procured him the appellation of Ferreus.——IV. Regulus, a Roman censor, who built a temple to the goddess of concord. Liv. 23, c. 23, &c. ——The name of Attilius was common among the Romans, and many of the public magistrates are called Attilii.

ATTIUS PELIGNUS, I. Tullius, the general of the Volsci, to whom Coriolanus fled when banished from Rome. Liv.——II. Varus, seized Auxinum, in Pompey's name, whence he was expelled. After this, he fled to Africa, which he alienated from J. Cæsar. Cæs. 1, Bell. Civ. ——III. A poet. Vid. Accius. The family of the Attii was descended from Atys, one of the companions of Æneas, according to the opinion which Virgil has adopted. Æn. 5, v. 568.

ATYS, I. an ancient king of Lydia, who sent away his son Tyrrhenus, with a colony of Lydians, who settled in Italy. Herodot. 1, c. 7. Vid. Part III.——II. A son of Crœsus, king of Lydia. He was forbidden the use of all weapons by his father, who had dreamt that he had been killed. Some time after this, Atys prevailed on his father to permit him to go to hunt a wild boar, which laid waste the country of Mysia, and he was killed in the attempt by Adrastus, whom Crœsus had appointed guardian over his son, and thus the apprehensions of the monarch were realized. Herodot. 1, c. 34, &c. Vid. Adrastus.

AUFIDIA LEX, was enacted by the tribune Aufidius Lurco, A. U. C. 692. It ordained that if any candidate, in canvassing for an office, promised money to the tribunes, and failed in the performance, he should be excused; but if he actually paid it, he should be compelled to pay every tribune 6000 sesterces.

AUFIDIUS, I. (BASSUS,) a famous historian in the age of Quintilian, who wrote an account of Germany and of the civil wars.——II. A Roman senator, famous for his blindness and abilities. Cic. Tusc. 5.——II. Lurco, a man who enriched himself by fattening peacocks and selling them. Plin. 10.

AUGURES, a certain officer at Rome who foretold future events, whence their name, ab avium garritu. They were first created by Romulus, to the number of three. Servius Tullius added a fourth, and the tribunes of the people, A. U. C. 454, increased the number to nine; and Sylla added six more during his dictatorship. They had a particular college, and the chief amongst them was called magister collegii. Their office was honourable; and if any one of them was convicted of any crime, he could not be deprived of his privileges; an indulgence granted to no other sacerdotal body at Rome. The augur generally sat on a high tower to make his observations. His face was turned towards the east, and he had the north to his left and the south at his right. With a crooked staff he divided the face of the heavens into four different parts, and afterwards sacrificed to the gods, covering his head with his vestment. There were generally five things from which the augurs drew omens: the first consisted in observing the phenomena of the heavens, such as thunder, lightning, comets, &c. The second kind of omen was drawn from the chirping or flying of birds. The third was from the sacred chickens, whose eagerness or indifference in eating the bread which was thrown to them, was looked upon as lucky or unlucky. The fourth was from quadrupeds, from their crossing or appearing in some unaocustomed place. The fifth was from different casualties, which were called Dira, such as spilling salt upon a table or wine upon one's clothes, hearing strange noises, stumbling or sneezing, meeting a wolf, hare, fox, or pregnant bitch. The sight of birds on the left hand was always deemed a lucky object, and the words sinister and lævus, though generally supposed to be terms of ill luck, were always used by the augurs in an auspicious sense. Cic. de Div.—Liv. 1, &c.—Dionys. Hal.—Ovid. Fast.

Augustalia, a festival at Rome, in commemoration of the day on which Augustus returned to Rome, after he had established peace over the different parts of the empire.

Augustinus, a bishop of Hippo, in Africa, distinguished himself by his writings, as well as by the austerity of his life. In his works, which are numerous, he displayed the powers of a great genius, and an extensive acquaintance with the philosophy of Plato. He died in the 76th year of his age, A. D. 430. The best edition of his works is that of the Benedict. fol. Ant. 1700 to 1703. 12 vols.

Augustus Octavianus Cæsar, second emperor of Rome, was son of Octavius, a senator, and Accia, daughter of Julius and sister to Julius Cæsar. There can be little doubt that Cæsar had intended his grandnephew as his successor in the empire; perceiving, probably, in that precocious youth the gem of those talents which Sylla had foreseen in himself. Octavius had passed his boyhood in the family of his uncle; he had accompanied him to Spain, in the expedition against the sons of Pompey, and had been sent by him, about six months before his death, to complete his education in the Greek city of Apollonia. It was there he first heard of the assassination of his protector; and he immediately set out for Rome, where he arrived a weakly student from the schools of Greece, in the most difficult and momentous crisis which had yet occurred in the history of his country. Before he could reach the capital, Antony had sufficient leisure to concert various measures calculated to secure his own power, and to possess himself of the whole public treasure, which had been amassed by Cæsar. Octavius, with one object ever in view, but veering about with wonderful dexterity in his professions, perceived, in a short while, that his only chance of success against this formidable opponent, was to place himself at the head of the senatorian party, by whose aid he nearly ruined his dangerous rival at Modena. The consuls, Hirtius and Pansa, having been slain in the memorable combats which were fought under the walls of that city. Octavius marched to Rome to demand the first magistracy of the state at the head of his army. Meanwhile, the reduced strength of Antony was recruited by the forces of Pollio, Plancus, and Lepidus, from Gaul and Spain. After this accession, it became apparent that Antony and Octavius were destined to form the preponderating powers in the commonwealth. They met near Bologna, where, along with Lepidus, they established the inauspicious triumvirate, and entered into a sanguinary convention, by which it was agreed to destroy the legal government—to put their mutual enemies to death—divide the lands of the richest towns and colonies in Italy among their soldiers—distribute the provinces of the republic among themselves, and proceed in the following spring against Brutus and Cassius, who still upheld the party of the commonwealth in Greece and Asia. These bloody and illegal designs were all fully accomplished. The former triumvirs had wished only to obtain power; their successors had resentments to gratify, vengeance to exercise, and lawless troops to satiate. They massacred in cold blood the chiefs of the republic who had remained in Italy; they overthrew its legion at Philippi; and Sextus Pompey, who, for some time after that fatal combat, maintained by his naval power an image of the commonwealth in Sicily, at length fell a victim to the jealousy and engrossing ambition of the triumviral tyrants. But the blood which these usurpers had so profusely shed, did not cement their unhallowed alliance. So jarring were their interests, and so unprincipled their motives, that distrust and discord could hardly fail to arise among them. Antony, intoxicated with love, and wine, and power, was long watched by a sober and subtle rival. Various temporary, but ineffectual expedients, were tried to adjust their differences, and to heal the mutual jealousies and suspicions, which rankled in their bosoms. Lepidus was deprived of his share of sovereignty, without a blow: one blow hurled Antony from his sumptuous throne and Octavius passed through the gates of Alexandria to the undisputed empire of the world. When the genius of Octavius had thus successively triumphed over his adversaries, and when he remained without a rival, his counsels, and perhaps even his temper, changed. 'There were,' says Blackwell, 'three very different periods in the life of Octavius. The first, on his early entering on business at his return from Apollonia, till the victory at Modena, during which, under the direction of Cicero, he acted the Roman and the patriot. The second, from his extorted consulship till the defeat of Antony, at Actium, where he played the tyrant and the triumvir; and the third, from the conquest of Egypt to the end of his life, when he became first the prince, and then the parent of his country and people.' Hitherto the palace of Octavius had resembled the headquarters of a general, or citadel of a tyrant; but, after his return from Egypt, it began to assume the appearance of a regular court, where every thing was conducted with order, prudence, and moderation. Few citizens now survived, who had witnessed the golden days of the republic, and all had felt the evils of its anarchy. The fear of new tumults extinguished the love of liberty, or checked at least all struggles to regain it. On the other part, Octavius felt that his interest was now identified with that of the state: he wished to enjoy in security the lofty prize he had gained, and to augment its value. Timidity had been the source of many of his crimes, but, having resolved to retain the government, he wisely thought it safest to be just and merciful. Military strength, he perceived, was an insufficient prop for his power. To render his authority permanent, he saw it was necessary to add the good opinion, or at least the affections, of the people. While, therefore, he bribed the soldiers with donations of money, or grants of land, he cajoled the populace with shows and entertainments, and distributions of corn, which, by supporting them in idleness and dissipation, made them forget the state of political degradation into which they were fallen. The senators he soothed, by presenting them with the flattering image of their ancient privileges, and the forms of the republican government. Nothing was farther from his wish or intention, than that the commonwealth should be actually revived. Indeed, he could no more have restored it to its former state, than he could have reanimated the corse of Cicero; and when advised by Agrippa to make the attempt, he prudently rejected the counsel which would probably have proved ruinous to himself, and came too late to be of service to his country. Yet while he determined to preserve the sovereign power, he resolved at the same time, by re-establishing ancient forms, to veil in part the hideous aspect of despotism. He was careful not to display his power by any external marks of royalty; and he exercised his authority not under any new title or magistracy, but as uniting in his person most of the ancient offices which were of weight or importance in the state. Servitude was thus established in the place of liberty; but a phantom in the shape of freedom still frequented the senate, and at the choice of consuls yearly walked the Forum. Octavius, however, (whom we shall hereafter style Augustus,) had recourse to more worthy arts than these, to endear his name and reign to the Roman citizens. He revived or enacted beneficial laws, and introduced the most provident regulations for the maintenance of order and tranquillity. The police which he established, gave security to life and property in the capital and throughout Italy: the provinces were protected from the exactions and oppressions of their governors, under which they had so often groaned in the days of the republic. He bestowed even personally, an unremitting attention on the due administration of justice; and he used his best exertions to stem the overwhelming tide of luxury and moral corruption. His plans for the melioration of the state were aided by those wise counsellors by whom he was so long surrounded, till at length the blood-stained crafty triumvir was hailed, during his life, as the father of his country, by the united voice of senate and people, and left at his death the memory of a reign which has become proverbial for beneficence, clemency, and justice. Among the various arts to which Augustus resorted to beguile the hearts of his people, and perhaps to render them forgetful of their former freedom, one of the most remarkable was, the encouragement which he extended to learning, and the patronage he so liberally bestowed on all by whom it was cultivated. To this noble protection of literature he was prompted not less by taste and inclination than sound policy; and in his patronage of the learned, his usual artifice had probably a smaller share than in those other parts of his conduct, by which he acquired the favourable opinion of the world. From infancy every thing had contributed to give him a relish for learning and a respect for the learned. His mother Atia, a woman of sense and prudence, had admirably regulated in his boyhood the education of her son. She herself spoke the Latin tongue with a purity resembling the language of Cornelia, the mother of the Gracchi; and Augustus retained during life that urbanity of style and conversation to which he had been accustomed in his youth. The great Julius, by whom he had been adopted, was desirous, among other less laudable objects of ambition, to hold the first place in letters as well as in arms. Those daring adventurers, Antony, Curio, and Dolabella, were the instruments of his military power; but his private friends were Balbus, Matius, Hirtius, and Oppidus, men who were all eminently accomplished—elegant in their modes of life, and fond of literary pursuits. Augustus had thus before him an example which he would naturally respect and imitate. His adoptive father placed around his destined heir the ablest instructers; and sometime before his death sent him to Apollonia, a Corinthian colony in Illyria, where he assiduously studied morals under Athenodorus. He was ardently perusing the Grecian orators, and had made considerable progress in rhetoric, under Apollodorus, a distinguished master of eloquence, when he received intelligence of the assassination of Cæsar. The events which called him from Greece, and hurried him into the tumult of affairs, broke not his course of study. During that campaign against Antony, which terminated with the battle of Modena, not a day passed in which he did not read, write, and declaim. He, at the same time, was constantly surrounded by men of literature and taste. After the victory at Modena, when he marched to Rome, to demand the consulship, he was accompanied by Cornelius Gallus and Mæcenas, who likewise followed him to Rome from Philippi; and on his first landing in Italy, after the victory he had there gained over Brutus, were his advisers in writing to the senate in terms of moderation. Though Athens was hostile to the Cæsarian name, yet, when he visited it after the battle of Actium, he showed the city many marks of respect, and was initiated into the solemnities of its goddesses, Minerva and Ceres. When Egypt was subdued, he entered Alexandria, holding by the hand the philosopher Areius, who was a native of that city; and, in the harangue which he delivered to the inhabitants from his tribunal, he informed them that he spared their town, first, on account of the god Serapis; secondly, out of respect for its founder, Alexander the Great; and, thirdly, for the sake of Areius, his own friend and their fellow-citizen. After being firmly established without a competitor in the empire, Augustus still continued to prosecute his private studies with unremitting assiduity, and to reap from them the greatest advantages. When he perused a Greek or Latin author, he dwelt chiefly on what might be a lesson or example in the administration of public affairs, or in his own private conduct.—'In evolvendis utriusque linguæ auctoribus,' says Suetonius, 'nihil æque sectabatur, quam præcepta et exempla publice vel privatim salubria.' His literary tastes appears from the multitude of his Greek secretaries, his superintendants for the charge of his collection of statues and pictures, his copyists and librarians. When wakeful through the night, he had a reader or a storyteller, like the eastern monarchs, who sat by him; and he often continued listening, till he dropped asleep. Among other embellishments which he bestowed on the city of Rome, he erected two public libraries; the one called the Octavian, which stood in the portico of Octavia, and the other on mount Palatine, adjacent to the temple of Apollo. From his own share of the spoils of the conquered towns in Dalmatia, he erected, at the Palatine library, a magnificent colonnade, with double rows of pillars; the interstices of which were adorned with statues and pictures, executed by the chief Grecian masters. It was open below, but above it comprehended an extensive and curious library, with retiring rooms for private reading—public halls for reciting—schools for teaching—and in short, every allurement and aid to study. Around were delightful walks, fitted for exercise or contemplation—some under shade, and others exposed to the sun, which could be alternately resorted to as the season of the year required. A colossal statue of Apollo in bronze, which was of Tuscan workmanship, presided as the genius of the place, and no spot on earth could then have been dearer to the god:—

'Tum medium claro surgebat marmore templum,
Et patriâ Phœbo carius Orygiâ.'

By advice of Mæcenas, he likewise provided means for the careful education of the Roman youth. In pursuance of his ministers' recommendation, he, among other measures for promoting this design, transferred the school of Verrius Flaccus to the Palatine library, and settled a large salary on that celebrated grammarian. On literary men in general he lavished not merely pecuniary rewards and recompense, but paid them that attention and regard which they all court; and which, by raising their station in society, animates their exertions. Thus, when he was absent from the city, he never wrote to any of his own family or political advisers, without sending letters by the same opportunity to Atticus, to inform him in what place he was, how long he intended remaining in it, and what books he was engaged in reading. While he was at Rome, and unable from the multiplicity of affairs to enjoy the society of Atticus, he scarcely ever allowed a day to pass without proposing to him in writing some question on the subjects of antiquities, criticisms, or poetry. The commencement of his political career had indeed been somewhat inauspicious to the rising poets of his country. Virgil, Tibullus, and Propertius, all mourn the losses they had sustained during the reign of the triumvirate. But Virgil had no sooner displayed his genius than his lands were restored; while, to other poets, crowns were assigned, or statues were erected, as rewards and distinctions. They also frequently read their works in the presence of Augustus, and he willingly attended public recitations and discussions on literary topics.—'Ingenia seculi sui,' says Suetonius, 'omnibus modis fovit. Recitantes et benigne et patienter audivit, nec tantum carmina, et historias, sed et orationes, et dialogos. Componi tamen aliquid de se, nisi et serio et a præstantissimis, offendebatur.' As Augustus advanced in years, and became surrounded by his own shortlived descendants, and those of the empress Livia by her former husband, all the young members of the imperial family, who wished to gain his favour, distinguished themselves by their proficiency in polite literature; and by the acquisition of elegant accomplishments. The uncommon attention which he paid to their instruction, and to the preservation of the purity of the Roman language, is evinced by one of his letters to his grandson, Caius Cæsar, quoted by Quintilian, in which he censures him for using the word Calidus instead of Caldus, not but what the former was Latin, but because it was unusual and pedantic. At the very close of life, when indisposition rendered him incapable of continued attention to business, or of long residence in the capital, he was carried in a litter to Præneste, Tibur, or Baiæ, through beautiful alleys, which terminated with the sea, or through odoriferous groves, which he himself had planted with myrtles and laurels, the shade of which was then considered salutary for the health. On these journeys he read the works of the poets whose genius he himself had fostered, and was constantly attended by philosophers, in whose conversation he found his chief solace. Even when on his death-bed at Nola, he passed his time and exercised his faculties, which he retained to the last moment, in philosophic conversations on the vanity and emptiness of all human affairs. Augustus was, besides, an excellent judge of composition, and a true critic in poetry; so that his patronage was never misplaced, or lavished on those whose writings might rather have tended to corrupt than improve the taste and learning of the age. He was wont to laugh at the tinsel of that style which Mæcenas affected, at the laboured language of Tiberius, at Pollio's fondness for antiquated expressions, and the empty pomp of Asiatic eloquence which delighted Antony. His own style was smooth, easy, and natural: he avoided all puerile or far-fetched thoughts, all affectation in the turn or disposition of his phrases, and all words not in general use. Perspicuity was his principal care; and whatever deviated in any shape from Nature, hurt the delicacy of his taste and judgment. Aulus Gellius, in mentioning the letters of Augustus to his grandson, Caius Agrippa, which he had just been reading, speaks with much delight and admiration of the simple, unlaboured elegance of the style in which they were written; but he unfortunately quotes from them only a single passage. This good taste of the prince had the happiest effect on that of the age. No writer could hope for patronage or popularity except by cultivating a style chaste and simple—which, if ornamental, was not luxuriant, or if severe, was not rugged or antiquated. The court of Augustus thus became a school of urbanity, where men of genius acquired that delicacy of taste, that elevation of sentiment, and that purity of expression, which characterized the writers of the age. This extensive and judicious patronage of literature was attended with manifold political advantages to the emperor. His poets palliated whatever was odious in his despotism; and his protection of philosophers was regarded by the people as a pledge or declaration that he was resolved to govern with humanity and justice. The pageantry of learning may originally have been but one of those many arts of government which Augustus practised so admirably that he inquired on his death-bed if he had not well performed his part in the farce of life. But what commenced chiefly in artifice, though partly perhaps in inclination, tended ultimately to amend his own disposition and character. The emperor Julian insinuates that an intercourse with those men of worth and learning by whom he was surrounded, mollified a heart by nature obdurate and unrelenting, and from which ambition seemed to have eradicated every feeling of compassion or tenderness. The productions of genius, with which he became acquainted, occupied the heart as well as the fancy; and in a situation otherwise calculated to instil pride, jealousy, and distrust of mankind, served at once as an antidote to those evils which beset the possessor of a new raised throne, and opened the way to better dispositions. What prince could be conversant with the epistles of Horace, and not receive a lesson of urbanity? or read the works of Virgil without rising from the perusal more gracious and benign? From this temper of the monarch considerable freedom of expression was allowed to the poets, whose verses often show that, though the republic was subverted, the minds of the Romans were still in a great measure republican. The daring pretensions of a people to punish, as well as to resist a tyrant, could not have been asserted with more energy by Milton himself than by Virgil, in his story of Mezentius and of his subjects' insurrection, which is approved both by the gods and the poet:—

Ergo omnis furiis surrexit Etruria justis;
Regem ad supplicium præsenti Marte reposcunt, &c.

With all his political virtues, sound judgment, and exquisite taste in literature, Augustus had some follies and weaknesses, which also exercised an influence on the literature of the age, and to which many things that we meet with, particularly in the works of the poets, must be referred. Thus their extravagant flattery in addressing him as a divinity, who had descended for a short while on earth, and was about to resume his place in the celestial mansions, originated in his absurd and impious desire to be considered and even worshipped as a god. He began with deifying his adoptive father, Julius, who also had boasted that celestial blood flowed in his veins. In a funeral oration, pronounced for his aunt, Julius had alluded to his divine descent, and he frequently gave Venus Genetrix as his word of battle. Seven days after his death, a comet had appeared, which was believed by the vulgar to be the soul of Cæsar, converted by Venus into a blazing star, and in that form received into heaven. Augustus, availing himself of this belief, placed a brazen statue of Cæsar in the temple of Venus, with a star over its head. His image was carried in procession with that of Venus, whenever intelligence of a victory was received, and supplications were decreed to him as a divinity. Hence the poetic incense offered to the manes of the deceased usurper, and Virgil's enumeration of the prodigies that had announced his death. The cool and reflecting head of Augustus did not preserve him from the influence of those extravagant and impious fancies which, about the same period, induced Antony to assume the character of Bacchus, and Sextus Pompey to bear the title and ensigns of the son of Neptune. While he affected to appear for a time on earth as the avenger of his adoptive parent, he was not unwilling it should be thought that his real father was a greater than Octavius. A fable was circulated, which Augustus did not discountenance, with regard to his mother Atia and Apollo, resembling that which had been feigned concerning Olympias and Jupiter Ammon; and it gained such credit that, as Suetonius informs us, some writers gravely asserted he was the son of Apollo. The name of that divinity was the word of battle chosen by the triumvirs at Philippi, and it was considered as an omen of the fate of Brutus, that, shortly before his death, he had involuntarily repeated the Homeric line:—

Ἄλλα με μοῖρ' ὁλοὴ καὶ Ἀπόλλων δεύτερος ἵκει.

At an impious feast, held by Augustus in the beginning of his reign, he, with five of his courtiers, represented the six great celestial gods, while some of the ladies of his court personated the six great goddesses; and on this occasion the emperor himself, who was in fact uncommonly beautiful, chose to appear with the attributes of Apollo. In his medals, the countenance of Augustus is what the Romans called an Apollinian face; and Servius informs us that there were statues of Augustus in Rome, which represented him under the character and with the emblems of that bright divinity. We also learn, that because Apollo was usually represented with a flow of light beaming from the eyes, Augustus wished it to be supposed that his eyes likewise, which were really fine, darted forth so strong a brightness, as to dazzle those who looked on them too steadily or closely: 'Oculos habuit claros,' says Suetonius, 'ac nitidos quibus etiam existimari volebat inesse quoddam divini vigoris, gaudebatque si quis sibi acrius contuenti, quasi ad fulgorem solis, vultum submitteret.' He also permitted his name to be inserted in the hymns to the gods. He at length became the object of private worship, and at public festivals libations were poured out to him, as a tutelar deity of the empire. When a general obsequiousness to the will of Augustus prevailed at Rome, and the senate had idolized him by its decrees, we cannot wonder that the poets of the court should have followed the example of the conscript fathers, or that Virgil and Horace should have represented him as a god, the avenger of Julius, descended from heaven for a time, but soon about to resume his place among the constellations. This, it is true, might be, in some degree conventional language. There are three topics which poets in all ages have treated somewhat in a similar manner—Devotion, Love, and Loyalty; or rather, they have applied to the two latter feelings a set of expressions which have been borrowed from the former. The pliable nature, too, of ancient mythology, made the proffer of a godhead seem less ridiculous to the Romans than it appears to us. It admitted of local genii, and of deified heroes. Romulus, the founder, had been early assumed among the number of the gods; and since the days of Ennius a system had been promulgated, and found credit in Rome, which taught that all the objects of vulgar worship were deified human spirits. Hence, a poet might the more readily venture to ask a beneficent prince, what sort of divinity he would become, if he would take his station in the heavens, rule the immense ocean, or preside in the realms below. The example, however, of Augustus was of unfortunate precedent in Latin poetry; and Nero and Domitian, though degraded by their vices below the ordinary level of the human species, were extolled in verse as constellations or demi-gods. Towards the close of the reign of Augustus, and when Rome had enjoyed for nearly half a century the benign influence of his paternal government, the absurd adoration which had been paid to him changed into those mixed feelings of reverence and affection, the union of which, in modern times, has been termed loyalty, and for which pietas was the Latin expression. This sentiment towards the sovereign and his family, which prompts the subject to feel the wrongs of the monarch as his own, and, as such, to be ready at all hazards to avenge them, is frequently expressed in the works of the poets who flourished at the end of Augustus' reign, both in reference to their own feelings and to those which prevailed among others:—

Quæque tua est pietas in totum nomen Fili,
Te lædi, cum quis læditur inde, putas.

Augustus, like Sylla, paid a sincere devotion to Fortune; and, accordingly, in the Cæsars of Julian, that deity admits that he was the only prince who had been sincerely grateful to her. He repaired her temples, and omitted no opportunity of paying her honour. Hence, Horace's courtly Odes to Fortune, and a tone prevailing among the poets, as if it were more flattering to the vanity of a patron, that his wealth and power should have been acquired by her blind favour, than by his own talents or virtues. Great, happy, and powerful, in the commencement of his reign, Augustus was, in his declining years, feeble, credulous, and unfortunate, at least in the interior of his palace. Domestic chagrins besieged his old age, and often wrung from his lips the melancholy line:—

'Αιθ' ὄφελον ἀγαμος τ' ἐμεναι ἀγονος τ' ἀπολεσθαι.

Hence, in the works of the poets there were, as Blackwell expresses it, 'decencies to be observed, and distances to be kept.' Concerning many topics, there could not be the same freedom as in the days of Lucilius, or Catullus. Some imprudent epigrams are said to have accelerated the melancholy fate of Cornelius Gallus, and an offensive poem was made at least the pretext for the exile of Ovid. The patronage of a prince, however liberal and judicious, can seldom of itself be sufficient essentially to promote the interests of literature: but his example spreads among his courtiers and the great of the land. Accordingly, there never was an age in which the learned were so rewarded and encouraged by statesmen, politicians, and generals, as that which grateful posterity has stamped with the name of Augustus. Its literature, more than any other period, was the result of patronage and court favour, and consequently we must expect to find in it those excellences and defects which patronage and court favour are calculated to produce. Nothing can be more obvious, than the advantages which the literature of a nation derives from men of elevated rank aiding its progress, and co-operating to promote its expansion. They remove the contempt which in rude ages has been sometimes felt for it, and the prejudices which, in more civilized states of society, have been frequently entertained against it. Their influence insensibly extends itself to each department of literature, and their countrymen learn to judge of every thing, and to treat every thing, as if they were all animated with a dignified and patrician spirit. It is to this exalted patronage that Roman literature has been indebted for a large portion of its characteristic greatness, both of expression and of thought. On the other hand, those compositions, particularly the poetical, which have been produced by command of a patron, or with a view to merit his approbation, have always an air as if they had proceeded rather from premeditation than feeling or impulse, and appear to have been written, not as the natural expression of powerful emotions, but from the desire of favour, or at best of fame. When an author, too, depends solely on the patronage of exalted individuals, and not, as in modern times, on the support of the public, a spirit of servility and flattery is apt to infuse itself into his writings. Yet to this system of adulation we owe some of the sweetest lines of Tibullus, and the most splendid passages of Virgil! At the commencement of the reign of Augustus, the old Cæsarians, Balbus, Matius and Oppius, men who were highly accomplished, and had been the chief personal friends of the great Julius, still survived, and led the way in every species of learning and elegance. Their correspondence with Cicero, in his Familiar Epistles, exhibits much refinement in the individuals, and in general, a highly polished state of society. They had a taste for gardening, planting, and architecture, and all those various arts which contribute to the embellishment of life. They rewarded the verses of poets, listened to their productions, and courted their society. When Augustus landed in Italy from Apollonia, Balbus was the first person who came to offer his services, and Matius took charge of the shows which he exhibited on his arrival at Rome. These ancient friends of the Julian line continued, during the early part of his reign to frequent the court of Augustus; and though not first in favour with the new sovereign, they felt no jealousy of their successor, but lived on the most cordial and intimate terms with Mæcenas, who now held, near the person of the adopted son, the enviable place which they had occupied with the father.——The name of Augustus was afterwards given to the successors of Octavianus in the Roman empire as a personal, and the name of Cæsar as a family distinction. In a more distant period of the empire, the title of Augustus was given only to the emperor, while that of Cæsar was bestowed on the second person in the state, who was considered as presumptive heir.

Avidius Cassius, a man saluted emperor A. D. 175. He reigned only three months, and was assassinated by a centurion. He was called a second Catiline, from his excessive love of bloodshed. Diod.

Avienus, Rufus Festus, a poet in the age of Theodosius, who translated the Phænomena of Aratus, as also all Livy, into iambic verses. The best edition of what remains of him is that of Cannegetier, 8vo. 1731.

Avitus, I. a governor of Britain under Nero. Tacit. Ann. 14.——II. Alcinus, a Christian poet, who wrote a poem in 6 books on original sin, &c.

Aurelia Lex, was enacted A. U. C. 653, by the prætor L. Aurelius Cotta, to invest the senatorian and equestrian orders, and the Tribuni Ærarii, with judicial power.——Another, A. U. C. 678. It abrogated a clause of the Lex Cornelia, and permitted the tribunes to hold other offices after the expiration of the tribuneship.

Aurelianus, emperor of Rome after Flavius Claudius, was austere, and even cruel in the execution of the laws, and punished his soldiers with unusual severity. He rendered himself famous for his military character; and his expedition against Zenobia, the celebrated queen of Palmyra, gained him great honours. He beautified Rome, was charitable to the poor, and the author of many salutary laws. He was naturally brave; and in all the battles he fought, it is said he killed no less than 800 men with his own hand. In his triumph he exhibited to the Romans, people of 15 different nations, all of which he had conquered. He was the first emperor who wore a diadem. After a glorious reign of six years, as he marched against the northern barbarians, he was assassinated near Byzantium, A. D. 275, 29th January, by his soldiers, whom Mnestheus had incited to rebellion against their emperor.

Aurelius, I. emperor of Rome. Vid. Antoninus Bassianus.——II. Victor, an historian in the age of Julian, two of whose compositions are extant, an account of illustrious men, and a biography of all the Cæsars to Julian. The best editions of Aurelius are the 4to. of Artuzenius, Amst. 1733, and the 8vo. of Pitiscus, Utr. 1696. Vid. Antoninus.

Aureolus, a general who assumed the purple in the age of Gallienus.

Aurinia, a prophetess held in great veneration by the Germans. Tacit. Germ. 8.

Ausonius, Decim. Magnus, a poet, born at Bourdeaux in Gaul, in the 4th century, preceptor to Gratian, son of the emperor Valentinian, and made consul by the means of his pupil. His compositions have been long admired. The thanks he returned the emperor Gratian is one of the best of his poems, which were too often hurried for publication, and consequently not perfect. He wrote the consular fasti of Rome, a useful performance, now lost.

Auspices, a sacerdotal order at Rome, nearly the same as the augurs. Vid. Augures.

Auxesia and Damia, two virgins who came from Crete to Trœzene, where the inhabitants stoned them to death in a sedition. The Epidaurians raised them statues, by order of the oracle, when their country was become barren. They were held in great veneration at Trœzene. Herodot. 5, c. 82.—Paus. 2, c. 30.

Babilius, a Roman, who, by the help of a certain herb, is said to have passed in six days from the Sicilian Sea to Alexandria. Plin. Præm. 19.

Bagabasus, betrayed the snares of Artabanus, brother of Darius, against Artaxerxes. Justin. 3, c. 1.

Bacchæ, the priestesses of Bacchus. Paus. 2, c. 7.

Bacchanalia. Vid. Dionysia.

Bacchantes, priestesses of Bacchus, who are represented at the celebration of the orgies almost naked, with garlands of ivy, with a thyrsus, and dishevelled hair. Their looks are wild, and they utter dreadful sounds, and clash different musical instruments together. They are also called Thyades and Menades. Ovid. Met. 6, v. 595.—Horat. 3, od. 25.—Propert. 3, el. 21.—Lucan. 1, v. 674.

Bacchis, or Balus, king of Corinth, succeeded his father, Prumnides. His successors were always called Bacchidæ, in remembrance of the equity and moderation of his reign. The Bacchidæ increased so much, that they chose one of their number to preside among them, with regal authority; and it is said that the sovereign power continued in their hands near 200 years. Cypselus overturned this institution by making himself absolute. Strab. 8.—Paus. 2, c. 4.—Herodot. 5, c. 92.—Ovid. Met. 5, v. 407.

Bacchius and Bithus, two celebrated gladiators, of equal age and strength; whence the proverb to express equality, Bithus contra Bacchium. Suetor. in Aug.—Horat. 1, sat. 7, v. 20.

Bacchylides, a lyric poet of Cos, nephew to Simonides, who, like Pindar, wrote the praises of Hiero. Some of his verses have been preserved. Marcel.

Bacis, a famous soothsayer of Bœotia. Cic. 1, de Div. c. 34.

Bæbia Lex, was enacted for the election of four prætors every other year. Liv. 40.——Another law, by M. Bæbius, a tribune of the people, which forbade the division of the lands, whilst it substituted a yearly tax to be paid by the possessors, and to be divided among the people. Appian. 1.

Bagoas, and Bagosas, an Egyptian eunuch in the court of Artaxerxes Ochus, so powerful that nothing could be done without his consent. He led some troops against the Jews, and profaned their temple. He poisoned Ochus, gave his flesh to cats, and made knife-handles with his bones, because he had killed the god Apis. He placed on the throne Arses, the youngest of the slaughtered prince's children, and afterwards put him to death. He was at last killed, B. C. 335, by Darius, whom, after raising to the crown, he had attempted to poison. Diod. 16 and 17.——The name of Bagoas occurs very frequently in the Persian history; and it seems that most of the eunuchs of the monarchs of Persia were generally known by that appellation.

Balbillus, C. a learned and benevolent man, governor of Egypt, of which he wrote the history, under Nero. Tacit. Ann. 13, c. 22.

Balbinus, a Roman, who, after governing provinces with credit and honour, assassinated the Gordians and seized the purple. He was some time after murdered by his soldiers, A. D. 238.

Balneæ, (baths,) were very numerous at Rome, private as well as public. In the ancient times simplicity was observed, but in the age of the emperors they became expensive; they were used after walking, exercise, or labour; and were deemed more necessary than luxuriots. Under the emperors, it became so fashionable to bathe, that without this the meanest of the people seemed to be deprived of one of the necessaries of life. There were certain hours of the day appointed for bathing, and a small piece of money admitted the poorest as well as the most opulent. In the baths, there were separate apartments for the people to dress and to undress; and, after they had bathed, they commonly covered themselves, the hair was plucked out of the skin, and the body rubbed over with a pumice-stone, and perfumed, to render it smooth and fair. The Roman emperors generally built baths, and all endeavoured to eclipse each other in the magnificence of the building. It is said that Diocletian employed 40,000 of his soldiers in building his baths; and when they were finished, he destroyed all the workmen. Alexander Severus first permitted the people to use them in the night, and he himself often bathed with the common people. For some time both sexes bathed promiscuously and without shame, and the edicts of the emperors proved abortive for a while in abolishing that indecent custom, which gradually destroyed the morals of the people. They generally read in bathing, and we find many compositions written in the midst of this luxurious enjoyment.

Bantius, L. a gallant youth of Nola, whom Annibal found, after the battle of Cannæ, almost dead amongst the heap of slain. He was sent back home with great humanity; upon which he resolved to betray his country to so generous an enemy. Marcellus, the Roman general, heard of it, and rebuked Bantius, who continued firm and faithful to the interest of Rome. Liv. 35, c. 15.

Baptæ, I. the priests of Cotytto, at Athens. Her festivals were celebrated in the night. The name is derived from βαπτειν, to wash, because the priests bathed themselves in the most effeminate manner. Juv. 2, v. 91.——II. A comedy of Eupolis, in which men are introduced dancing on the stage with indecent gestures.

Barbări, a name originally applied to those who spoke inelegantly, or with harshness and difficulty. The Greeks and Romans generally called all nations, except their own, by the despicable name of barbarians.

Barcha, the surname of a noble family at Carthage, of which Annibal and Hamilcar were descended. By means of their bribes and influence, they excited a great faction, which is celebrated in the annals of Carthage by the name of the Barchinian faction; and at last raised themselves to power, and to the independent disposal of all the offices of trust or emolument in the state. Liv. 21, c. 2 and 9.

Bardi, a celebrated sacerdotal order among the ancient Gauls, who praised their heroes, and published their fame in their verses or on musical instruments. They were so esteemed and respected by the people, that at their sight two armies who were engaged in battle laid down their arms, and submitted to their orders. They censured, as well as commended, the behaviour of the people. Lucan. 1, v. 447.—Strab. 4.—Marcell. 15, c. 24.

Bardyllis, an Illyrian prince, whose daughter Bircenna married king Pyrrhus. Plut. in Pyrrh.

Barsine, and Barsene, a daughter of Darius, who married Alexander, by whom she had a son called Hercules. Cassander ordered her and her child to be put to death. Justin. 13, c. 2, l. 15, c. 2.—Arrian.

Basilides, I. the father of Herodotus, who, with others, attempted to destroy Strattes, tyrant of Chios. Herodot. 8, c. 132.——II. A family who held an oligarchical power at Erythræ. Strab. 14.——III. A priest of mount Carmel, who foretold many momentous events to Vespasian, when he offered sacrifices. Tacit. 2, Hist. c. 87.—Sueton. in Vesp. 7.

Basilius, a celebrated bishop of Africa, very animated against the Arians, whose tenets and doctrines he refuted with warmth, but great ability. He was eloquent as well as ingenious, and possessed of all those qualities which constitute the persuasive orator and the elegant writer. Erasmus has placed him in the number of the greatest orators of antiquity. He died in his 51st year, A. D. 379. The latest edition of his works is that of the Benedictines, fol. Paris, 1721.

Bassărides, a name given to the votaries of Bacchus, and to Agave by Persius, which seems derived from Bassara, a town of Libya sacred to the god, or from a particular dress worn by his priestesses, and so called by the Thracians. Persius 1, v. 101.

Bassus Aufidius, I. an historian in the age of Augustus, who wrote on the Germanic war. Quintil. 10, c. 1.——II. Cæsius, a lyric poet in Nero's age, to whom Persius addressed his 6th satire. Some of his verses are extant.——III. Julius, an orator in the reign of Augustus, some of whose orations have been preserved by Seneca.

Bathyllus, a beautiful youth of Samos, greatly beloved by Polycrates the tyrant, and by Anacreon. Horat. ep. 14, v. 9.——Mecænas was also fond of a youth of Alexandria of the same name. Juv. 6, v. 63.——The poet who claimed as his own Virgil's distich, Nocte pluit totâ, &c. bore also the same name.

Batillus, Lent. a man of Campania, who kept a house full of gladiators, who rebelled against him. Plut. in Cras.

Bitis, a eunuch, governor of Gaza, who, upon being unwilling to yield, was dragged round the city tied by the heels to Alexander's chariot. Curt. 4, c. 6.

Baton, of Sinope, wrote commentaries on the Persian affairs. Strab. 12.

Batrachomyomachia, a poem, describing the fight between frogs and mice, written by Homer, which has been printed sometimes separately from the Iliad and Odyssey. The best edition of it is Maittaire's 8vo. London, 1721.

Battiades, a patronymic of Callimachus, from his father Battus. Ovid. in Ibin. v. 53.——A name given to the people of Cyrene from king Battus. Ital. 3, v. 253.

Battus I. a Lacedæmonian, who built the town of Cyrene, B. C. 630, with a colony from the island of Thera. He was son of Polymnestus and Phronime, and reigned in the town he had founded, and after death received divine honours. The difficulty with which he spoke first procured him the name of Battus. Herodot. 4, c. 155, &c.—Paus. 10, c. 15.——The 2d of that name was grandson to Battus 1st, by Arcesilaus. He succeeded his father on the throne of Cyrene, and was surnamed Felix, and died 544 B. C. Herodot. 4, c. 159, &c.

Bavius and Mævius, two stupid and malevolent poets in the age of Augustus, who attacked the superior talents of the contemporary writers. Virg. Ecl. 3.

Belephantes, a Chaldean, who, from his knowledge of astrology, told Alexander that his entering Babylon would be attended with fatal consequences to him. Diod. 17.

Belesis, a priest of Babylon, who told Arbaces, governor of Media, that he should reign one day in the place of Sardanapalus. His prophecy was verified, and he was rewarded by the new king with the government of Babylon, B. C. 896. Diod. 2.

Belisarius, a celebrated general, who, in a degenerate and an effeminate age, in the reign of Justinian, emperor of Constantinople, renewed all the glorious victories, battles, and triumphs, which had rendered the first Romans so distinguished in the time of their republic. He died, after a life of military glory, and the trial of royal ingratitude, in the 565th year of the Christian era. The story of his begging charity, with date obolum Belasario is said to be a fabrication.

Belistida, a woman who obtained a prize at Olympia. Paus. 5, c. 8.

Bellovesus, a king of the Celtæ, who, in the reign of Tarquin Priscus, was sent at the head of a colony to Italy by his uncle Ambigatus. Liv. 5, c. 34.

Belus, I. one of the most ancient kings of Babylon, about 1800 years before the age of Semiramis, was made a god after death, and worshipped with much ceremony by the Assyrians and Babylonians. He was supposed to be the son of the Osiris of the Egyptians. The temple of Belus was the most ancient and most magnificent in the world. It was originally the tower of Babel, which was converted into a temple. It had lofty towers, and it was enriched by all the succeeding monarchs till the age of Xerxes, who, after his unfortunate expedition against Greece, plundered and demolished it. Among the riches it contained were many statues of massy gold, one of which was forty feet high. In the highest of the towers was a magnificent bed, where the priests daily conducted a woman, who, as they said, was honoured with the company of the god. Joseph. Ant. Jud. 10. —Herodot. 1, c. 181, &c.—Strab. 16.—Arrian. 7.—Diod. 1, &c.——II. A king of Egypt, son of Epaphus and Libya, and father of Agenor. ——III. Another, son of Phœnix the son of Agenor, who reigned in Phœnica.

Berenice, and Beronice, I. a woman famous for her beauty, mother of Ptolemy Philadelphus by Lagus. Ælian. V. H. 14, c. 43.—Theocrit. —Paus. 1, c. 7.——II. A daughter of Philadelphus, who married Antiochus king of Syria, after he had divorced Laodice, his former wife. After the death of Philadelphus, Laodice was recalled; and mindful of the treatment she had received, she poisoned her husband, placed her son on the vacant throne, and murdered Berenice and her child at Antioch, where she had fled, B. C. 248.——III. A daughter of Ptolemy Auletes, who usurped her father's throne for some time, strangled her husband Seleucus, and married Archelaus, a priest of Bellona. Her father regained his power, and put her to death, B. C. 55.——IV. The wife of Mithridates, who, when conquered by Lucullus, ordered all his wives to destroy themselves, for fear the conqueror should offer violence to them. She accordingly drank poison, but this not operating soon enough, she was strangled by a eunuch.——V. The mother of Agrippa, who shines in the history of the Jews as daughter-in-law of Herod the Great.——VI. A daughter of Agrippa, who married her uncle Herod, and afterwards Polemon, king of Cilicia. She was accused by Juvenal of committing incest with her brother Agrippa. It is said that she was passionately loved by Titus, who would have made her empress but for fear of the people. ——VII. A wife of king Attalus.——VIII. Another, daughter of Philadelphus and Arsinoe, who married her own brother Evergetes, whom she loved with much tenderness. When he went on a dangerous expedition, she vowed all the hair of her head to the goddess Venus if he returned. Sometime after his victorious return, the locks which were in the temple of Venus disappeared; and Conon, an astronomer, to make his court to the queen, publicly reported that Jupiter had carried them away, and had made them a constellation. She was put to death by her son, B. C. 221. Catull. 67. —Hygin. P. A. 2, c. 24.—Justin. 26, c. 3.—— This name is common to many of the queens and princesses in the Ptolemean family in Egypt.

Berosus, a Babylonian by birth, who flourished in the reign of Alexander the Great, and resided for some years at Athens. As a priest of Belus, he possessed every advantage which the records of the temple and the learning and traditions of the Chaldæans could afford. He appears to have sketched his history of the earlier times from the representations upon the walls of the temple. From written and traditionary knowledge he must have learned several points too well authenticated to be called in question; and correcting the one by the other, and at the same time blending them as usual with mythology, he produced his strange history. The first fragment preserved by Alexander Polyhistor is extremely valuable, and contains a store of very curious information. The first book of the history apparently opens, naturally enough with a description of Babylonia. Then referring to the paintings, the author finds the first series a kind of preface to the rest. All men of every nation appear assembled in Chaldæa: among them is introduced a personage who is represented as their instructer in the arts and sciences, and informing them of the events which had previously taken place. Unconscious that Noah is represented under the character of Oannes, Berosus describes him, from the hieroglyphical delineation, as a being literally compounded of a fish and a man, and as passing the natural, instead of the diluvian night in the ocean, with other circumstances indicative of his character and life. The instructions of the patriarch are detailed in the next series of paintings. In the first of which, I conceive, the Chaos is portrayed by the confusion of the limbs of every kind of animal: the second represents the creation of the universe: the third the formation of mankind: others again that of animals, and of the heavenly bodies. The second book appears to have comprehended the history of the antediluvian world: and of this the two succeeding fragments seem to have been extracts. The historian, as usual, has appropriated the history of the world to Chaldæa. He finds nine persons, probably represented as kings, preceding Noah, who is again introduced under the name Xisuthrus, and he supposes that the representation was that of the first dynasty of the Chaldæan kings. From the universal consent of history and tradition he was well assured that Alorus or Orion, the Nimrod of the Scriptures, was the founder of Babylon and the first king: consequently he places him at the top, and Xisuthrus follows as the tenth. The destruction of the records by Nabonasar left him to fill up the intermediate names as he could: and who are inserted, is not easy so to determine. Berosus has given also a full and accurate description of the deluge, which is wonderfully consonant with the Mosaic account. We have also a similar account, or it may be an epitome of the same from the Assyrian history of Abydenus, who was a disciple of Aristotle, and a copyist from Berosus. The age in which he lived is not precisely known, though some fix it in the reign of Alexander, or 268 years B. C.

Bessus, I. a governor of Bactriana, who, after the battle of Arbela, seized Darius, his sovereign, and put him to death. After this murder he assumed the title of king, and was, some time after, brought before Alexander, who gave him to Oxatres, the brother of Darius. The prince ordered his hands and ears to be cut off, and his body to be exposed on a cross, and shot at by the soldiers. Justin. 12, c. 5.—Curt. 6 and 7.——II. A parricide who discovered the murder he had committed, upon destroying a nest of swallows, which, as he observed, reproached him of his crime. Plut.

Bibăculus, I. (M. Furius) a Latin poet in the age of Cicero. He composed annals in Iambic verses, and wrote epigrams full of wit and humour, and other poems now lost. Horat. 2. Sat. 5, v. 41.—Quintil. 10.——II. A prætor, &c. Val. Max. 1, c. 1.

Bibŭlus, a son of M. Calpurnius Bibulus by Portia, Cato's daughter. He was Cæsar's colleague in the consulship, but of no consequence in the state, according to this distich mentioned by Sueton. in Jul. c. 20.

Non Bibulo quicquam nuper, sed Cæsare factum est:
Nam Bibulo fieri consule nil memini.

One of the friends of Horace bore that name. 1 Sat. 10, v. 86.

Bion, I. a philosopher and sophist of Borysthenes in Scythia, who rendered himself famous for his knowledge of poetry, music, and philosophy. He made every body the object of his satire, and rendered his compositions distinguished for clearness of expression, for facetiousness, wit, and pleasantry. He died 241 B. C. Diog. in vitâ.——II. A Greek poet of Smyrna, who wrote pastorals in an elegant style. Moschus, his friend and disciple, mentions in an elegiac poem that he died by poison, about 300 years B. C. His Idyllia are written with elegance and simplicity, purity and ease; and they abound with correct images, such as the view of the country may inspire. There are many good editions of this poet's works, generally printed with those of Moschus, the best of which is that of Heskin, 8vo. Oxon. 1748.——III. A soldier in Alexander's army, &c. Curt. 4, c. 13.——IV. A native of Propontis in the age of Pherecydes.——V. A man of Syracuse, who wrote on rhetoric.——VI. A native of Abdera, disciple to Democritus. He first found out that there were certain parts of the earth where there were six months of perpetual light and darkness alternately.——VII. A man of Soli, who composed a history of Æthiopia.——VIII. Another, who wrote nine books on rhetoric, which he called by the names of the muses; and hence Bionei sermones mentioned by Horat. 2, ep. 2, v. 60.—Diog. 4.

Bituitus, a king of the Allobroges, conquered by a small number of Romans, &c. Val. Max. 6, c. 6.—Flor. 3, c. 2.

Boccar, a king of Mauretania. Juv. 4, v. 90, applies the word in a general sense to any native of Africa.

Bocchus, a king of Getulia, in alliance with Rome, who perfidiously delivered Jugurtha to Sylla, the lieutenant of Marius. Sallust. Jug.—Paterc. 2, c. 12.

Boedromia, an Athenian festival, instituted in commemoration of the assistance which the people of Athens received in the reign of Erechtheus, from Ion, son of Xuthus, when their country was invaded by Eumolpus son of Neptune. The word is derived απο του βοηδρομειν, coming to help. Plutarch in Thes. mentions it as in commemoration of the victory which Theseus obtained over the Amazons in a month called at Athens Boedromion.

Boeotarchæ, the chief magistrates in Bœotia. Liv. 42, c. 43.

Boeobistas, a man who made himself absolute among the Getæ by the strictness of his discipline. Strab. 7.

Boethius, a celebrated Roman, banished, and afterwards punished with death, on a suspicion of a conspiracy, by Theodoric, king of the Ostrogoths, A. D. 525. It was during his imprisonment that he wrote his celebrated poetical treatise de consolatione philosophiæ in five books. The best edition of his works is that of Hagenau, 4to. 1491, or that of L. Bat. 1671, with the notis variorum.

Boetus, a foolish poet of Tarsus, who wrote a poem on the battle of Philippi. Strab. 14.

Bolus, a king of the Cimbri, who killed a Roman ambassador. Liv. ep. 67.

Bomonicæ, youths that were whipt at the altar of Diana Orthia during the festivals of the goddess. He who bore the lash of the whip with the greatest patience, and without uttering a groan, was declared victorious, and received an honourable prize. Paus. 3, c. 16.—Plut. in Lyc.

Bonosius, an officer of Probus, who assumed the imperial purple in Gaul.

Boötes. Vid. Part III.

Boreïdes, the descendants of Boreas, who long possessed the supreme power and the priesthood in the island of the Hyperboreans. Diod. 1 and 2.

Boreas. Vid. Part III.

Boreasmi, a festival at Athens in honour of Boreas, who, as the Athenians supposed, was related to them on account of his marriage with Orithyia, the daughter of one of their kings. They attributed the overthrow of the enemy's fleet to the respect which he paid to his wife's native country. There were also sacrifices at Megalopolis in Arcadia, in honour of Boreas. Paus. Attic. & Arcad.

Boudicea, a queen in Britain, who rebelled upon being insulted by the Romans. She poisoned herself when conquered, A. D. 61. Tacit. Ann. 14, c. 31.

Brachmanes, Indian philosophers, who derived their name from Brahma, one of the three beings whom God, according to their theology, created, and with whose assistance he formed the world. They devoted themselves totally to the worship of the gods, and were accustomed from their youth to endure labours, and to live with frugality and abstinence. They never ate flesh, and abstained from the use of wine and all carnal enjoyments. After they had spent 37 years in the greatest trials, they were permitted to marry, and indulge themselves in a more free and unbounded manner. According to modern authors, Brahma is the parent of all mankind, and he produced as many worlds as there are parts in the body, which they reckoned 14. They believed that there were seven seas, of water, milk, curds, butter, salt, sugar, and wine, each blessed with its particular paradise. Strab. 15.—Diod. 17.

Branchyllides, a chief of the Bœotians. Paus. 9, c. 13.

Brasidas, a famous general of Lacedæmon, son of Tellus, who, after many great victories over Athens and other Grecian states, died of a wound at Amphipolis, which Cleon, the Athenian, had besieged, B. C. 422. A superb monument was raised to his memory. Paus. 3, c. 24.—Thucyd. 4 and 5.—Diod. 5.

Brasidēia, festivals at Lacedæmon in honour of Brasidas. None but freemen, born Spartans, were permitted to enter their lists, and such as were absent were fined.

Brennus, I. a general of the Galli Senones, who invaded Italy, defeated the Romans at the river Allia, and entered their city without opposition. The Romans fled into the capitol, and left the whole city in the possession of the enemy. The Gauls climbed the Tarpeian rock in the night, and the capital would have been taken had not the Romans been awakened by the noise of geese which were before the doors, and immediately repelled the enemy. Camillus, who was in banishment, marched to the relief of his country, and so totally defeated the Gauls, that not one remained to carry the news of their destruction. Liv. 5, c. 36, &c.—Plut. in Camill.——II. Another Gaul, who made an irruption into Greece with 150,000 men and 15,000 horse, and endeavoured to plunder the temple of Apollo at Delphi. He was destroyed with all his troops, by the god; or, more properly, he killed himself in a fit of intoxication, B. C. 278, after being defeated by the Delphians. Paus. 10, c. 22 and 23.—Justin. 24, c. 6, &c.

Brisēis, a woman of Lyrnessus, called also Hippodamia. When her country was taken by the Greeks, and her husband Mines and brother killed in the fight, she fell to the share of Achilles, in the division of the spoils. Agamemnon took her away some time after from Achilles, who made a vow to absent himself from the field of battle. Briseis was very faithful to Achilles; and when Agamemnon restored her to him, he swore he had never offended her chastity. Homer. Il. 1, 2, &c.—Ovid. Heroid. 3, de Art. Am. 2 and 3.—Propert. 2, el. 8, 20, and 22.—Paus. 5, c. 24.—Horat. 2, od. 4.

Britannicus, a son of Claudius Cæsar by Messalina. Nero was raised to the throne in preference to him, by means of Agrippina, and caused him to be poisoned. His corpse was buried in the night; but it is said that a shower of rain washed away the white paint which the murderer had put over his face, so that it appeared quite black, and discovered the effects of poison. Tacit. Ann.—Sueton. in Ner. c. 33.

Brumalia, festivals celebrated at Rome in honour of Bacchus, about the month of December. They were first instituted by Romulus.

Brutus, L. Junius, I. son of M. Junius and Tarquinia, second daughter of Tarquin Priscus. The father, with his eldest son, were murdered by Tarquin the Proud, and Lucius, unable to revenge their death, pretended to be insane. The artifice saved his life; he was called Brutus for his stupidity, which he, however, soon after showed to be feigned. When Lucretia killed herself, B. C. 509, in consequence of the brutality of Tarquin, Brutus snatched the dagger from the wound, and swore upon the reeking blade, immortal hatred to the royal family. His example animated the Romans, the Tarquins were proscribed by a decree of the senate, and the royal authority vested in the hands of consuls chosen from patrician families. Brutus, in his consular office, made the people swear they never would again submit to kingly authority; but the first who violated their oath were in his own family. His sons conspired with the Tuscan ambassador to restore the Tarquins; and when discovered, they were tried and condemned before their father, who himself attended at their execution. Sometime after, in a combat that was fought between the Romans and Tarquins, Brutus engaged with Arruns, and so fierce was the attack, that they pierced one another at the same time. The dead body was brought to Rome, and received as in triumph; a funeral oration was spoken over it, and the Roman matrons showed their grief by mourning a year for the father of the republic. Flor. 1, c. 9.—Liv. 1, c. 56, l. 2, c. 1, &c.—Dionys. Hal. 4 and 5.—C. Nep. in Attic. 8.—Eutrop. de Tarq.—Virg. Æn. 6, v. 818.—Plut. in Brut. & Cæs.—II. Marcus Junius, father of Cæsar's murderer, wrote three books on civil law. He followed the party of Marius, and was conquered by Pompey. After the death of Sylla, he was besieged in Mutina by Pompey, to whom he surrendered, and by whose orders he was put to death. He had married Servilia, Cato's sister, by whom he had a son and two daughters. Cic. de Orat. c. 55.—Plut. in Brut.——III. His son of the same name, by Servilia, was lineally descended from J. Brutus, who expelled the Tarquins from Rome. He seemed to inherit the republican principles of his great progenitor, and in the civil wars joined himself to the side of Pompey, though he was his father's murderer, only because he looked upon him as more just and patriotic in his claims. At the battle of Pharsalia, Cæsar not only spared the life of Brutus, but he made him one of his most faithful friends. He, however, forgot the favour, because Cæsar aspired to tyranny. He conspired with many of the most illustrious citizens of Rome against the tyrant, and stabbed him in Pompey's Basilica. Brutus retired into Greece, where he gained himself many friends by his arms as well as by persuasion, and he was soon after pursued thither by Antony, whom young Octavius accompanied. A battle was fought at Philippi. Brutus, who commanded the right wing of the republican army, defeated the enemy; but Cassius, who had the care of the left, was overpowered, and as he knew not the situation of his friend, and grew desperate, he ordered one of his freedmen to run him through. In another battle, the wing which Brutus commanded obtained a victory; but the other was defeated, and he found himself surrounded by the soldiers of Antony. He however made his escape, and soon after fell upon his sword, B. C. 42. Antony honoured him with a magnificent funeral. Brutus is not less celebrated for his literary talents, than his valour in the field. When he was in the camp, the greatest part of his time was employed in reading and writing; and the day which preceded one of his most bloody battles, while the rest of his army was under continual apprehensions, Brutus calmly spent his hours till the evening, in writing an epitome of Polybius. He was intimate with Cicero, to whom he would have communicated his conspiracy, had he not been apprehensive of his great timidity. Plutarch mentions that Cæsar's ghost made its appearance to Brutus in his tent, and told him that he would meet him at Philippi. Brutus married Portia, the daughter of Cato. C. Nep. in Attic.—Paterc. 2, c. 48.—Plut. in Brut. &c.—Cæs. 1.—Flor. 4. ——IV. D. Jun. Albinus, one of Cæsar's murderers, who, after the battle of Mutina, was deserted by the legions with which he wished to march against Antony. He was put to death by Antony's orders, though consul elect.—— V. Jun. one of the first tribunes of the people Plut.

Bubăris. Vid. Amyntas 1st.

Bucephălus, a horse of Alexander's, whose head resembled that of a bull, whence his name (βους κεφαλος, bovis caput.) Alexander was the only one who could mount on his back, and he always knelt down to take up his master. He was present in an engagement in Asia, where he received a heavy wound, and hastened immediately out of the battle, and dropped down dead as soon as he had set down the king in a safe place. He was 30 years old when he died, and Alexander built a city which he called after his name. Plut. in Alex. Curt.—Arrian. 5, c. 3.—Plin. 8, c. 42.

Bucolĭca, a sort of poem which treats of the care of the flocks, and of the pleasures and occupations of the rural life, with simplicity and elegance. The most famous pastoral writers of antiquity are Moschus, Bion, Theocritus, and Virgil. The invention of bucolics, or pastoral poetry, is attributed to a shepherd of Sicily.

Burrhus, Afranius, I. a chief of the prætorian guards, put to death by Nero.——II. A brother-in-law of the emperor Commodus.

Busa, a woman of Apulia, who entertained 1000 Romans after the battle of Cannæ. Val. Max. 4, c. 8.

Busiris, a king of Egypt, son of Neptune and Libya, or Lysianassa, who sacrificed all foreigners to Jupiter with the greatest cruelty. When Hercules visited Egypt, Busiris carried him to the altar bound hand and foot. The hero soon disentangled himself, and offered the tyrant, his son Amphidamus, and the ministers of his cruelty, on the altar.——Many Egyptian princes have borne the same name. One of them built a town called Busiris, in the middle of the Delta, where Isis had a famous temple. Herodot. 2, c. 59 and 61.—Strab. 17.—Ovid. Met. 9, v. 132. Heroid. 9, v. 69.—Plut. in Thes.—Virg. G. 3, v. 5.—Apollod. 2, c. 5.

Butes, one of the descendants of Amycus, king of the Bebryces, very expert in the combat of the cestus. He came to Sicily, where he was received by Lycaste, a beautiful harlot, by whom he had a son called Eryx. Lycaste, on account of her beauty, was called Venus; hence Eryx is often called the son of Venus. Virg. Æn. 5, v. 372.

Cæcilia Caia, or Tanaquil. Vid. Tanaquil.

Cæcilia Lex, was proposed, A. U. C. 693, by Cæcil. Metellus Nepos, to remove taxes, from all the Italian states, and to give them free exportation.——Another, called also Didia, A. U. C. 656, by the consul Q. Cæcilius Metellus, and T. Didius. It required that no more than one single matter should be proposed to the people in one question; and that every law, before it was preferred, should be exposed to public view on three market-days.

Cæcilĭanus, a Latin writer before the age of Cicero.

Cæcilii, a plebeian family at Rome, descended from Cæcas, one of the companions of Æneas, or from Cæculus, the son of Vulcan, who built Prænestе. This family gave birth to many illustrious generals and patriots.

Cæcĭlius, Claudius Isidorus, I. a man who left in his will to his heirs, 4116 slaves, 3600 yoke of oxen, 257,000 small cattle, and 600,000 pounds of silver. Plin. 33, c. 10.——II. Epirus, a freedman of Atticus, who opened a school at Rome, and is said to have first taught reading to Virgil and some other growing poets.——III. A Sicilian orator in the age of Augustus, who wrote on the Servile wars, a comparison between Demosthenes and Cicero, and an account of the orations of Demosthenes.——IV. Metellus. Vid. Metellus.——V. A comic poet, originally a slave. He acquired this name with his freedom, having been at first called by the servile appellation of Statius. He was a native of Milan, and flourished towards the sixth century of Rome, having survived Ennius, whose intimate friend he was, about one year, which places his death at 586. We learn from the prologue to the Hecyra of Terence, spoken in the person of Ambivius, the principal actor, or rather manager of the theatre, that when he first brought out the plays of Cæcilius, some were hissed off the stage, and others hardly stood their ground; but knowing the fluctuating fortunes of dramatic exhibitions, he had again attempted; to bring them forward. His perseverance having gained for them a full and unprejudiced hearing, they failed not to please; and this success excited the author to new efforts in the poetic art, which he had nearly abandoned in a fit of despondency. The comedies of Cæcilius, which amounted to thirty, are all lost, so that our opinion of their merits can be formed only from the criticisms of those Latin authors who wrote before they had perished. Cicero blames the improprieties of his style and language. From Horace's Epistle to Augustus, we may collect what was the popular sentiment concerning Cæcilius:—

"Vincere Cæcilius gravitate—Terentius arte."

It is not easy to see how a comic author could be more grave than Terence; and the quality applied to a writer of this cast appears of rather difficult interpretation. But the opinion which had been long before given by Varro affords a sort of commentary on Horace's expression—"In argumentis," says he, "Cæcilius palmam poscit; in ethesi Terentius." By gravitas therefore, as applied to Cæcilius, we may properly enough understand the grave and affecting plots of his comedies; which is farther confirmed by what Varro elsewhere observes of him—"Pathe Trabea, Attilius et Cæcilius facile moverunt." Velleius Paterculus joins him with Terence and Afranius, whom he reckons the most excellent comic writers of Rome—"Dulcesque Latini leporis facetiæ per Cæcilium, Terentiumque, et Afranium, sub pari ætate, nituerunt." A great many of the plays of Cæcilius were taken from Menander; and Aulus Gellius informs us that they seemed agreeable and pleasing enough, till, being compared with their Greek models, they appeared quite tame and disgusting, and the wit of the original, which they were unable to imitate, totally vanished. Horat. 2, ep. 1.

Cædicius, I. (Q.) a consul, A. U. C. 498.——II. Another, A. U. C. 465.——III. A military tribune in Sicily, who bravely devoted himself to rescue the Roman army from the Carthaginians, B. C. 254. He escaped with his life.

Cælia Lex, was enacted A. U. C. 635, by Cælius, a tribune. It ordained that in judicial proceedings before the people, in cases of treason, the votes should be given upon tablets, contrary to the exception of the Cæsian law.

Cælius, I. an orator, disciple to Cicero. He died very young. Cicero defended him when he was accused by Clodius of being accessary to Catiline's conspiracy, and of having murdered some ambassadors from Alexandria, and carried on an illicit amour with Clodia, the wife of Metellus. Orat. pro M. Cæl—Quintil. 10, c. 1.——II. Aurelianus, a writer about 300 years after Christ, the best edition of whose works is that of Almeloveen, Amst. 1722 and 1755.——III. L. Antipater, wrote a history of Rome, which M. Brutus epitomized, and which Adrian preferred to the histories of Sallust. Cælius flourished 120 years B. C. Val. Max. 1, c. 7.—Cic. 13. ad. Attic. ep. 8.——IV. Tubero, a man who came to life after he had been carried to the burning pile. Plin. 7, c. 52.——V. Vibienus, a king of Etruria, who assisted Romulus against the Cæninenses, &c.——VI. Sabinus, a writer in the age of Vespasian, who composed a treatise on the edicts of the curule ediles.

Cæsar, a surname given to the Julian family at Rome, either because one of them kept an elephant, which bears the same name in the Punic tongue, or because one was born with a thick head of hair. This name, after it had been dignified in the person of Julius Cæsar and of his successors, was given to the apparent heir of the empire in the age of the Roman emperors. The twelve first Roman emperors were distinguished by the surname of Cæsar. They reigned in the following order:—Julius Cæsar, Augustus, Tiberius, Caligula, Claudius, Nero, Galba, Otho, Vitellius, Vespasian, Titus, and Domitian. In Domitian, or rather in Nero, the family of Julius Cæsar was extinguished. But after such a lapse of time, the appellation of Cæsar seemed inseparable from the imperial dignity, and therefore it was assumed by the successors of the Julian family. Suetonius has written an account of these twelve characters in an extensive and impartial manner.——I. C. Julius Cæsar, the first emperor of Rome, was son of L. Cæsar and Aurelia the daughter of Cotta. He was descended, according to some accounts, from Julius the son of Æneas. When he reached his 15th year he lost his father, and the year after he was made priest of Jupiter. Sylla was aware of his ambition, and endeavoured to remove him; but Cæsar understood his intentions, and, to avoid discovery, changed every day his lodgings. He was received into Sylla's friendship sometime after; and the dictator told those who solicited the advancement of young Cæsar, that they were warm in the interest of a man who would prove, some day or other, the ruin of their country and of their liberty. When Cæsar went to finish his studies at Rhodes, under Apollonius Molo, he was seized by pirates, who offered him his liberty for 30 talents. He gave them 40, and threatened to revenge their insults; and he no sooner was out of their power, than he armed a ship, pursued them, and crucified them all. His eloquence procured him friends at Rome, and the generous manner in which he lived equally served to promote his interest. After he had passed through the inferior employments of the state, he was appointed over Spain, where he signalized himself by his valour and intrigues. At his return to Rome, he was made consul, and soon after he effected a reconciliation between Crassus and Pompey. He was appointed for the space of five years over the Gauls, by the interest of Pompey, to whom he had given his daughter Julia in marriage. Here he enlarged the boundaries of the Roman empire by conquest, and invaded Britain, which was then unknown to the Roman people. He checked the Germans, and soon after had his government over Gaul prolonged to five other years, by means of his friends at Rome. The ambition of Cæsar and Pompey soon became the cause of a civil war. Cæsar's petitions were received with coldness or indifference by the Roman senate; and by the influence of Pompey, a decree was passed to strip him of his power. Antony, who opposed it as tribune, fled to Cæsar's camp with the news, and the ambitious general no sooner heard this, than he made it a plea of resistance. On pretence of avenging the violence which had been offered to the sacred office of tribune in the person of Antony, he crossed the Rubicon, which was the boundary of his province. The passage of the Rubicon was a declaration of war, and Cæsar entered Italy sword in hand. Upon this, Pompey, with all the friends of liberty, left Rome, and retired to Dyrrachium; and Cæsar, after he had subdued all Italy, in 60 days, entered Rome, and provided himself with money from the public treasury. He went to Spain, where he conquered the partisans of Pompey, under Petreius, Afranius, and Varro; and, at his return to Rome, was declared dictator, and soon after consul. When he left Rome, he went in quest of Pompey, observing that he was marching against a general without troops, after having defeated troops without a general in Spain. In the plains of Pharsalia, B. C. 48, the two hostile generals engaged. Pompey was conquered, and fled into Egypt, where he was murdered. Cæsar, after he had made a noble use of victory, pursued his adversary into Egypt, where he for some time forgot his fame and character in the arms of Cleopatra. His danger was great while at Alexandria; but he extricated himself with wonderful success, and made Egypt tributary to his power. After several conquests in Africa, the defeat of Cato, Scipio, and Juba, and that of Pompey's sons in Spain, he entered Rome, and triumphed over five different nations, Gaul, Alexandria, Pontus, Africa, and Spain, and was created perpetual dictator. But now his glory was at an end; his uncommon success created him enemies, and the chiefest of the senators, among whom was Brutus, his most intimate friend, conspired against him, and stabbed him in the senate-house on the ides of March. He died, pierced with 23 wounds, the 15th of March, B. C. 44, in the 56th year of his age. He received, as he went to the senate-house, a paper from Artemidorus, which discovered the whole conspiracy to him; but he neglected the reading of what might have saved his life. When he was in his first campaign in Spain, he was observed to gaze at a statue of Alexander, and even shed tears at the recollection that that hero had conquered the world at an age in which he himself had done nothing. The learning of Cæsar deserves commendation as well as his military character. He reformed the calendar. He wrote his Commentaries on the Gallic wars on the spot where he fought his battles; and the composition has been admired for the elegance as well as the correctness of its style. This valuable book was nearly lost; and when Cæsar saved his life in the bay of Alexandria, he was obliged to swim from his ship, with his arms in one hand and his Commentaries in the other. Besides the Gallic and Civil wars, he wrote other pieces, which are now lost. The history of the war in Alexandria and Spain is attributed to him by some, and by others to Hirtius. His qualities were such that in every battle he could not but be conqueror, and in every republic, master; and to his sense of his superiority over the rest of the world, or to his ambition, we are to attribute his saying, that he wished rather to be first in a little village then second at Rome. It was after his conquest over Pharnaces in one day, that he made use of these remarkable words, to express the celerity of his operations: Veni, vidi, vici. Cæsar has been suspected of being privy to Catiline's conspiracy; and it was his fondness for dissipated pleasures which made his countrymen say that he was the husband of all the women at Rome, and the woman of all men. It is said that he conquered 300 nations, took 800 cities, and defeated three millions of men, one of which fell in the field of battle. Plin. 7, c. 25, says that he could employ at the same time, his ears to listen, his eyes to read, his hand to write, and his mind to dictate. The best editions of Cæsar's Commentaries, are the magnificent one by Dr. Clarke, fol. Lond. 1712; that of Cambridge, with a Greek translation, 4to. 1727; that of Oudendorp, 2 volumes, 4to. L. Bat. 1737; and that of Elzevir, 8vo. L. Bat. 1635. Sueton & Plut. in vitâ.—Dio.—Appian.—Orosius.—Diod. 16 and ecl. 31 and 37.—Virg. G. 1, v. 466.—*Ovid. Caius, a tragic poet and orator, commended by Cic. in Brut. His brother, C. Lucius, was consul, and followed, as well as himself, the party of Sylla. They were both put to death by order of Marius.——V. Lucius, an uncle of M. Antony, who followed the interest of Pompey, and was proscribed by Augustus. His son Lucius was put to death by J. Cæsar in his youth.——Two sons of Agrippa bore also the name of Cæsars, Caius and Lucius, Vid. Agrippa.

Cæsarion, the son of J. Cæsar, by queen Cleopatra, was, at the age of 13, proclaimed by Antony and his mother, king of Cyprus, Egypt, and Cœlosyria: He was put to death five years after by Augustus. Suet. in Aug. 17, and Cæs. 52.

Cæsonius, Maximus, was banished from Italy by Nero, on account of his friendship with Seneca, &c. Tacit. 15, Ann. c. 71.

Caius and Caia, a prænomen very common at Rome to both sexes. C, in its natural position, denoted the man's name, and when reversed Ↄ, it implied Caia. Quintil. 1, c. 7.

Calaber, Q. called also Smyrnæus, wrote a Greek poem in 14 books, as a continuation of Homer's Iliad, about the beginning of the third century. The best editions of this elegant and well written book, are, that of Rhodoman, 12mo. Hanover, 1604, with the notes of Dausqueius, and that of Pauw, 8vo. L. Bat. 1734.

Calanus, a celebrated Indian philosopher, one of the gymnosophists. He followed Alexander in his Indian expedition, and being sick, in his 83d year, he ordered a pile to be raised, upon which he mounted, decked with flowers and garlands, to the astonishment of the king and of the army. When the pile was fired, Alexander asked him whether he had any thing to say: "No," said he, "I shall meet you again in a very short time." Alexander died three months after in Babylon. Strab. 15.—Cic. de Div. 1, c. 23.—Arrian. & Plut. in Alex.—Ælian. 2, c. 41, l. 5, c. 6.—Val. Max. 1, c. 8.

Calchas. Vid. Part III.

Calēnus, I. a famous soothsayer of Etruria, in the age of Tarquin. Plin. 28, c. 2.——II. A lieutenant of Cæsar's army. After Cæsar's murder, he concealed some that had been proscribed by the triumvirs, and behaved with great honour to them. Plut. in Cæs.

Calidius, (M.) I. an orator and pretorian, who died in the civil wars, &c. Cæs. Bell. Civ. 1, c. 2.——II. L. Julius, a man remarkable for his riches, the excellence of his character, his learning, and poetical abilities. He was proscribed by Volumnius, but delivered by Atticus. C. Nep. in Attic. 12.

Caligŭla, C. the emperor, received this surname from his wearing in the camp, the Caliga, a military covering for the leg. He was son of Germanicus by Agrippina, and grandson to Tiberius. During the first eight months of his reign, Rome experienced universal prosperity; the exiles were recalled, taxes were remitted, and profligates dismissed; but Caligula soon became proud, wanton, and cruel. He built a temple to himself, and ordered his head to be placed on the images of the gods, while he wished to imitate the thunders and power of Jupiter. The statues of all great men were removed, as if Rome would sooner forget her virtues in their absence; and the emperor appeared in public places in the most indecent manner, encouraged roguery, committed incest with his three sisters, and established public places of prostitution. He often amused himself with putting innocent people to death; he attempted to famish Rome by a monopoly of corn; and as he was pleased with the greatest disasters which befell his subjects, he often wished the Romans had but one head that he might have the gratification to strike it off. Wild beasts were constantly fed in his palace with human victims; and a favourite horse was made high-priest and consul, and kept in marble apartments, and adorned with the most valuable trappings and pearls the Roman empire could furnish. Caligula built a bridge upwards of three miles in the sea; and would, perhaps, have shown himself more tyrannical, had not Chæreas, one of his servants, formed a conspiracy against his life, with others equally tired with his cruelties and the insults that were offered with impunity to the persons and feelings of the Romans. In consequence of this, the tyrant was murdered January 24th, in his 29th year, after a reign of three years and ten months, A. D. 41. It has been said that Caligula wrote a treatise on rhetoric; but his love of learning is better understood from his attempts to destroy the writings of Homer and of Virgil. *Dio.—Sueton. in vitâ.—Tacit. Callas, I. a general of Alexander. Diod. 17. ——II. Of Cassander against Polyperchon. Id.

Callias, I. an Athenian appointed to make peace between Artaxerxes and his country. Diod. 12.——II. A son of Temenus, who murdered his father with the assistance of his brothers. Apollod. 2, c. 6.——III. A Greek poet, son of Lysimachus. His compositions are lost. He was surnamed Schœnion, from his twisting ropes (σχοινος) through poverty. Athen. 10. ——IV. A partial historian of Syracuse. He wrote an account of the Sicilian wars, and was well rewarded by Agathocles, because he had shown him in a favourable view. Athen. 12.—Dionys.——V. An Athenian, greatly revered for his patriotism. Herodot. 6, c. 121.——VI. A soothsayer.——VII. An Athenian, commander of a fleet against Philip, whose ships he took, &c.——VIII. A rich Athenian, who liberated Cimon from prison, on condition of marrying his sister and wife Elpinice. C. Nep. and Plut. in Cim.——IX. An historian, who wrote an explanation of the poems of Alcæus and Sappho.

Callicerus, a Greek poet, some of whose epigrams are preserved in the Anthologia.

Callĭcles, an Athenian, whose house was not searched on account of his recent marriage, when an inquiry was made after the money given by Harpalus, &c. Plut. in Demosth.

Callicrătes, I. an Athenian, who seized upon the sovereignty of Syracuse, by imposing upon Dion when he had lost his popularity. He was expelled by the sons of Dionysius, after reigning thirteen months. He is called Callippus by some authors. C. Nep. in Dion.——II. An officer intrusted with the care of the treasures of Susa by Alexander. Curt. 5, c. 2.——III. An artist, who made, with ivory, ants and other insects so small that they could scarcely be seen. It is said that he engraved some of Homer's verses upon a grain of millet. Plin. 7, c. 21.—Ælian. V. H. 1, c. 17.

Calligratĭdas, I. a Spartan, who succeeded Lysander in the command of the fleet. He took Methymna, and routed the Athenian fleet under Conon. He was defeated and killed near the Arginusæ, in a naval battle, B. C. 406. Diod. 13.—Xenoph. Hist. G.——II. One of the four ambassadors sent by the Lacedæmonians to Darius, upon the rupture of their alliance with Alexander. Curt. 3, c. 13.

Callidius, a celebrated Roman orator, contemporary with Cicero, who speaks of his abilities with commendation. Cic. in Brut. 274.—Paterc. 2, 36.

Callĭmachus, I. an historian and poet of Cyrene, son of Battus and Mesatma, and pupil to Hermocrates the grammarian. He had, in the age of Ptolemy Philadelphus, kept a school at Alexandria, and had Apollonius of Rhodes among his pupils, whose ingratitude obliged Callimachus to lash him severely in a satirical poem, under the name of Ibis. (Vid. Apollonius.) The Ibis of Ovid is an imitation of this piece. He wrote a work in 120 books on famous men, besides the treatises on birds; but of all his numerous compositions, only 31 epigrams, an elegy, and some hymns on the gods, are extant; the best editions of which are that of Ernestus, 2 vols. 8vo. L. Bat. 1761, and that of Vulcanius, 12mo. Antwerp, 1584. Propertius styled himself the Roman Callimachus. The precise time of his death, as well as of his birth, is unknown. Propert. 4, el. 1, v. 65.—Cic. Tusc. 1, c. 84.—Horat. 2, ep. 2, v. 109.—Quintil. 10, c. 1.——II. An Athenian general, killed in the battle of Marathon. His body was found in an erect posture, all covered with wounds. Plut.——III. A Colophonian, who wrote the life of Homer. Plut.

Callimĕdon, a partisan of Phocion at Athens, condemned by the populace.

Callinus, an orator, who is said to have first invented elegant poetry, B. C. 776. Some of his verses are to be found in Stobæus. Athen. —Strab. 13.

Callipatīra, daughter of Diagoras, and wife of Callianax, the athlete, went disguised in man's clothes, with her son Pisidorus, to the Olympic games. When Pisidorus was declared victor, she discovered her sex through excess of joy, and was arrested, as women were not permitted to appear there on pain of death. The victory of her son obtained her release; and a law was instantly made which forbade any wrestlers to appear but naked. Paus. 5, c. 6, l. 6, c. 7.

Callĭphon, I. a painter of Samos, famous for his historical pieces. Plin. 10, c. 26.——II. A philosopher, who made the summum bonum consist in pleasure joined to the love of honesty. This system was opposed by Cicero. Quæst. Acad. 4, c. 131 and 139. de Offic. 3, c. 119.

Callipĕron, a celebrated dancing-master, who had Epaminondas among his pupils. C. Nep. in Epam.

Callĭpus, or Calippus, I. an Athenian, disciple to Plato. He destroyed Dion, &c. Vid. Callicrates. C. Nep. in Dion.——II. A Corinthian, who wrote a history of Orchomenos. Paus. 6, c. 29.——III. A philosopher. Diog. in Zen.——IV. A general of the Athenians when the Gauls invaded Greece by Thermopylæ. Paus. 1, c. 3.

Callisteia, a festival at Lesbos, during which all the women presented themselves in the temple of Juno, and the fairest was rewarded in a public manner. There was also an institution of the same kind among the Parrhasians, first made by Cypselus, whose wife was honoured with the first prize. The Eleans had one also, in which the fairest man received as a prize a complete suit of armour, which he dedicated to Minerva.

Callisthĕnes, I. a Greek, who wrote a history of his own country, in ten books, beginning from the peace between Artaxerxes and Greece, down to the plundering of the temple of Delphi by Philomelus. Diod. 14.——II. A man who, with others, attempted to expel the garrison of Demetrius from Athens. Polyæn. 5, c. 17.——III. A philosopher of Olynthus, intimate with Alexander, whom he accompanied in his oriental expedition, in the capacity of a preceptor, and to whom he had been recommended by his friend and master Aristotle. He refused to pay divine honours to the king, for which he was accused of conspiracy, mutilated, and exposed to wild beasts, dragged about in chains, till Lysimachus gave him poison, which ended together his tortures and his life, B. C. 328. None of his compositions are extant. Curt. 8, c. 6.—Plut. in Alex.—Arrian. 4.—Justin. 12, c. 6 and 7.——IV. A writer of Sybaris.——V. A freedman of Lucullus. It is said that he gave poison to his master. Plut. in Lucull.

Callistonicus, a celebrated statuary at Thebes. Paus. 9, c. 16.

Callistrătus, I. an Athenian, appointed general with Timotheus and Chabrias, against Lacedæmon. Diod. 15.——II. An orator of Aphidna, in the time of Epaminondas, the most eloquent of his age.——III. An Athenian orator, with whom Demosthenes made an intimate acquaintance, after he had heard him plead. Xenoph.——IV. A Greek historian, praised by Dionys. Hal.——V. A comic poet, rival of Aristophanes.

Callixĕnus, I. a general who perished by famine.——II. An Athenian, imprisoned for passing sentence of death upon some prisoners. Diod. 13.

Calphurnia, a daughter of L. Piso, who was Julius Cæsar's fourth wife. The night previous to her husband's murder, she dreamed that the roof of her house had fallen, and that he had been stabbed in her arms; and on that account she attempted, but in vain, to detain him at home. After Cæsar's murder, she placed herself under the patronage of M. Antony. Suet. in Jul.

Calphurnius Bestia, I. a noble Roman, bribed by Jugurtha. It is said that he murdered his wives when asleep. Plin. 27, c. 2.——II. Crassus, a patrician, who went with Regulus against the Massyli. He was seized by the enemy, as he attempted to plunder one of their towns, and he was ordered to be sacrificed to Neptune. Bisaltia, the king's daughter, fell in love with him, and gave him an opportunity of escaping and conquering her father. Calphurnius returned victorious, and Bisaltia destroyed herself.——III. A man who conspired against the emperor Nerva.——IV. Galerianus, son of Piso, put to death, &c. Tacit. Hist. 4, c. 11.——V. Piso, condemned for using seditious words against Tiberius. Tacit. Hist. 4, c. 21.——VI. Another, famous for his abstinence. Val. Max. 4, c. 3.——VII. Titus, a Latin poet, born in Sicily, in the age of Dioclesian, seven of whose eclogues are extant, and generally found with the works of the poets who have written on hunting. Though abounding in many beautiful lines, they are, however, greatly inferior to the elegance and simplicity of Virgil. The best edition is that of Kempher, 4to. L. Bat. 1728.——VIII. A man surnamed Frugi, who composed Annals, B. C. 130.

Calpurnia, or Calphurnia, a noble family in Rome, derived from Calpus, son of Numa. It branched into the families of the Pisones, Bibuli, Flammæ, Cæsennini, Asprenates, &c. Plin. in Num.

Calpurnia, and Calphurnia, Lex, was enacted A. U. C. 604, severely to punish such as were guilty of using bribes, &c. Cic. de Off. 2.——I. A daughter of Marius, sacrificed to the gods by her father, who was advised to do it, in a dream, if he wished to conquer the Cimbri. Plut. in Parall.——II. A woman who killed herself when she heard that her husband was murdered in the civil wars of Marius. Paterc. 2, 26.——III. The wife of J. Cæsar. Vid. Calphurnia.——IV. A favourite of the emperor Claudius, &c. Tacit. Ann.

Calusidius, a soldier in the army of Germanicus. When this general wished to stab himself with his own sword, Calusidius offered him his, observing that it was sharper. Tacit. 1, Ann. c. 35.

Calvus, Corn. Licinius, a famous orator, equally known for writing iambics. He excited attention by his animadversions upon Cæsar and Pompey, and disputed the palm of eloquence with Cicero. Cic. ep.—Horat. 1, Sat. 10, v. 19.

Cambўses, I. king of Persia, was son of Cyrus the Great. He conquered Egypt, and was so offended at the superstition of the Egyptians, that he killed their god Apis, and plundered their temples. When he wished to take Pelusium, he placed at the head of his army a number of cats and dogs; and the Egyptians refusing, in an attempt to defend themselves, to kill animals which they reverenced as divinities, became an easy prey to the enemy. Cambyses afterwards sent an army of 50,000 men to destroy Jupiter Ammon's temple, and resolved to attack the Carthaginians and Æthiopians. He killed his brother Smerdis from mere suspicion, and flayed alive a partial judge, whose skin he nailed on the judgment-seat, and appointed his son to succeed him, telling him to remember where he sat. He died of a small wound he had given himself with his sword, as he mounted on horseback; and the Egyptians observed, that it was the same place on which he had wounded their god Apis, and that therefore he was visited by the hand of the gods. His death happened 521 years before Christ. He left no issue to succeed him, and his throne was usurped by the magi, and ascended by Darius soon after. Herodot. 2, 3, &c.—Justin. 1, c. 9.—Val. Max. 6, c. 3.——II. A person of obscure origin, to whom king Astyages gave his daughter Mandane in marriage. The king, who had been terrified by dreams which threatened the loss of his crown by the hand of his daughter's son, had taken this step in hopes that the children of so ignoble a bed would ever remain in obscurity. He was disappointed. Cyrus, Mandane's son, dethroned him when grown to manhood. Herodot. 1, c. 46, 107, &c.—Justin. 1, c. 4.

Camerinus, a Latin poet, who wrote a poem on the taking of Troy by Hercules. Ovid. 4, ex Pont. el. 16, v. 19.——Some of the family of the Camerini were distinguished for their zeal as citizens, as well as for their abilities as scholars, among whom was Sulpicius, commissioned by the Roman senate to go to Athens to collect the best of Solon's laws. Juv. 7, v. 90.

Camilla. Vid. Part III.

Camillus, I. (L. Furius,) a celebrated Roman, called a second Romulus from his services to his country. He was banished by the people for distributing, contrary to his vow, the spoils he had obtained at Veii. During his exile Rome was besieged by the Gauls under Brennus. In the midst of their misfortunes the besieged Romans elected him dictator, and he forgot their ingratitude, and marched to the relief of his country, which he delivered, after it had been for some time in the possession of the enemy. He died in the 80th year of his age, B. C. 365, after he had been five times dictator, once censor, three times interrex, twice a military tribune, and obtained four triumphs. He conquered the Hernici, Volsci, Latini, and Etrurians; and dissuaded his countrymen from their intentions of leaving Rome to reside at Veii. When he besieged Falisci, he rejected, with proper indignation, the offers of a schoolmaster, who had betrayed into his hands the sons of the most worthy citizens. Plut. in vitâ. —Liv. 5.—Flor. 1, c. 13.—Diod. 14.—Virg. Æn. 6, v. 825.——II. A name of Mercury.—— III. An intimate friend of Cicero.

Camissares, a governor of part of Cilicia, father to Datames. C. Nep. in Dat.

Camma, a woman of Galatia, who avenged the death of her husband Sinetus upon his murderer Sinorix, by making him drink in a cup, of which the liquor was poisoned, on pretence of marrying him, according to the custom of their country, which required that the bridegroom and his bride should drink out of the same vessel. She escaped by refusing to drink on pretence of illness. Polyæn. 3.

Campana Lex, or Julian agrarian law, was enacted by J. Cæsar, A. U. C. 691, to divide some lands among the people.

Campaspe, and Pancaste, a beautiful concubine of Alexander, whom the king gave to Apelles, who had fallen in love with her as he drew her picture. It is said that from this beauty the painter copied the thousand charms of his Venus Anadomene. Plin. 35, c. 10.

Camulogenus, a Gaul, raised to great honours by Cæsar for his military abilities. Cæs. Bell. G. 7, c. 57.

Candace, a queen of Æthiopia, in the age of Augustus, so prudent and meritorious that her successors always bore her name. She was blind of one eye. Plin. 6, c. 22.—Dio. 54.-Strab. 17.

Candaules, or Myrsilus, son of Myrsus, was the last of the Heraclidæ who sat on the throne of Lydia. He showed his wife naked to Gyges one of his ministers; and the queen was so incensed, that she ordered Gyges to murder her husband, 718 years before the Christian era. After this murder, Gyges married the queen and ascended the throne. Justin. 1, c. 7.—Herodot. 1, c. 7, &c.—Plut. Symph.

Canephoria, festivals at Athens in honour of Bacchus, or, according to others, of Diana, in which all marriageable women offered small baskets to the deity, and received the name of Canephoræ; whence statues representing women in that attitude were called by the same appellation. Cic. in Verr. 4.

Caniculares Dies, certain days in the summer, in which the star Canis is said to influence the season, and to make the days more warm during its appearance. Manilius.

Caninius, a tribune who proposed a law to empower Pompey to go only with two lictors, to reconcile Ptolemy and the Alexandrians. Plut. in Pomp.

C. Caninius Rebilus, a consul with J. Cæsar after the death of Trebonius. He was consul only for seven hours, because his predecessor died the last day of the year, and he was chosen only for the remaining part of the day; whence Cicero observed, that Rome was greatly indebted to him for his vigilance, as he had not slept during the whole time of his consulship. Cic. 7, ad Fam. ep. 33.—Plut. in Cæs.

Canistius, a Lacedæmonian courier, who ran 1200 stadia in one day. Plin. 7, c. 20.

Canius, a poet of Gades, contemporary with Martial. He was so naturally merry that he always laughed. Mart. 1. ep. 62.

Canthărus, I. a famous sculptor of Sicyon. Paus. 6, c. 17.——II. A comic poet of Athens.

Canuleius, C. a tribune of the people of Rome, A. U. C. 310, who made a law to render it constitutional for the patricians and plebeians to intermarry. It ordained, also, that one of the consuls should be yearly chosen from the plebeians. Liv. 4, c. 3, &c.—Flor. 1, c. 17.

Canŭsius, a Greek historian under Ptolemy Auletes. Plut.

Canutius Tiberinus, I. a tribune of the people, who, like Cicero, furiously attacked Antony when declared an enemy to the state. His satire cost him his life. Patercul. 2, c. 64.—— II. A Roman actor. Plut. in Brut.

Capăneus. Vid. Part III.

Capella, I. an elegiac poet in the age of J. Cæsar. Ovid. de Pont. 4. el. 16, v. 36.——II. Martianus, a Carthaginian, A. D. 490, who wrote a poem on the marriage of Mercury and Philology, and in praise of the liberal arts. The best edition is that of Walthardus, 8vo. Bernæ, 1763.

Capito, I. the uncle of Paterculus, who joined Agrippa against Crassus.—Paterc. 2, c. 69.——II. Fonteius, a man sent by Antony to settle his disputes with Augustus. Horat. 1, Sat. 5, v. 32.——III. An historian of Lycia, who wrote an account of Isauria in eight books.

Capitolini Ludi, games yearly celebrated at Rome in honour of Jupiter, who preserved the capitol from the Gauls.

Capitolinus, (Julius,) an author in Dioclesian's reign, who wrote an account of the life of Verus, Antoninus Pius, the Gordians, &c. most of which are now lost.

Capricornus, a sign of the zodiac, in which appears 28 stars in the form of a goat, supposed by the ancients to be the goat Amalthæa, which fed Jupiter with her milk. Some maintain that it is Pan, who changed himself into a goat when frightened at the approach of Typhon. When the sun enters this sign it is winter solstice, or the longest night in the year. Manil. 2 and 4. —Horat. 2, od. 17, v. 19.—Hygin. fab. 196. P. A. 2, c. 28.

Caprificialis, a day sacred to Vulcan, on which the Athenians offered him money. Plin. 11, c. 15.

Capys Sylvius, a king of Alba, who reigned twenty-eight years. Dionys. Hal.—Virg. Æn. 6, v. 768.

Caractacus, a king of the Britons, conquered by an officer of Claudius Cæsar, A. D. 47. Tacit. Ann. 12, c. 33 and 37.

Carānus, I. one of the Heraclidæ, the first who laid the foundation of the Macedonian empire, B. C. 814. He took Edessa and reigned twenty-eight years, which he spent in establishing and strengthening the government of his newly-founded kingdom. He was succeeded by Perdiccas. Justin. 7, c. 1.—Paterc. 1, c. 6. ——II. A general of Alexander. Curt. 7.

Carausius, a tyrant of Britain for seven years, A. D. 293.

Carbo, I. a Roman orator, who killed himself because he could not curb the licentious manners of his countrymen. Cic. in Brut.——II. Cneus, a son of the orator Carbo, who embraced the party of Marius, and after the death of Cinna succeeded to the government. He was killed in Spain, in his third consulship, by order of Pompey. Val. Max. 9, c. 13.——III. An orator, son of Carbo the orator, killed by the army when desirous of re-establishing the ancient military discipline. Cic. in Brut.

Carcinus, I. a tragic poet of Agrigentum, in the age of Philip of Macedon. He wrote on the rape of Proserpine. Diod. 5.——II. A man of Rhegium, who exposed his son Agathocles on account of some uncommon dreams during his wife's pregnancy. Diod. 19.

Carcinus, a constellation, the same as the Cancer. Lucan. 9, v. 536.

Carinus, (M. Aurelius,) a Roman who attempted to succeed his father Carus as emperor. He was famous for his debaucheries and cruelties. Dioclesian defeated him in Dalmatia, and he was killed by a soldier whose wife he had debauched, A. D. 268.

Carmentales, festivals at Rome in honour of Carmenta, celebrated the 11th of January, near the Porta Carmentalis, below the capitol. This goddess was entreated to render the Roman matrons prolific and their labours easy. Liv. 1, c. 7.

Carneades, a philosopher of Cyrene in Africa, founder of a sect called the third or new Academy. The Athenians sent him, with Diogenes the stoic and Critolaus the peripatetic, as ambassadors to Rome, B. C. 155. The Roman youth were extremely fond of the company of these learned philosophers; and when Carneades, in a speech, had given an accurate and judicious dissertation upon justice, and in another speech confuted all the arguments he had advanced, and apparently given no existence to the virtue he had so much commended; a report prevailed all over Rome, that a Grecian was come, who had so captivated by his words the rising generation, that they forgot their usual amusements and ran mad after philosophy. When this reached the ears of Cato the censor, he gave immediate audience to the Athenian ambassadors in the senate, and dismissed them in haste, expressing his apprehension of their corrupting the opinions of the Roman people, whose only profession, he sternly observed, was arms and war. Carneades denied that any thing could be perceived or understood in the world; and he was the first who introduced a universal suspension of assent. He died in the 90th year of his age, B. C. 128. Cic. ad Attic. 12, ep. 23. de Orat. 1 and 2.—Plin. 7, c. 30.—Lactantius 5, c. 14.—Val. Max. 8, c. 8.

Carneia, a festival observed in most of the Grecian cities, but more particularly at Sparta, where it was first instituted, about 675 B. C. in honour of Apollo surnamed Carneus. It lasted nine days, and was an imitation of the manner of living in camps among the ancients.

Carpophorus, an actor greatly esteemed by Domitian. Martial.—Juv. 6, v. 198.

Carrinates, Secundus, a poor but ingenious rhetorician, who came from Athens to Rome, where the boldness of his expression, especially against tyrannical power, exposed him to Caligula's resentment, who banished him. Juv. 7, v. 205.

Carvilius, I. a king of Britain, who attacked Cæsar's naval station by order of Cassivelaunus, &c. Cæs. Bell. G. 5, c. 22.——II. Spurius, a Roman who made a large image of the breastplates taken from the Samnites, and placed it in the capitol. Plin. 34, c. 7.——III. The first Roman who divorced his wife during the space of above 600 years. This was for barrenness, B. C. 231. Dionys. Hal. 2.—Val. Max. 2, c. 1.

Carus, I. a Roman emperor who succeeded Probus. He was a prudent and active general; he conquered the Sarmatians, and continued the Persian war which his predecessor had commenced. He reigned two years, and died on the banks of the Tigris, as he was going in an expedition against Persia, A. D. 283. He made his two sons, Carinus and Numerianus, Cæsars; and as his many virtues had promised the Romans happiness, he was made a god after death. Eutrop.——II. One of those who attempted to scale the rock Aornus, by order of Alexander. Curt. 8, c. 11.

Cassander, son of Antipater, made himself master of Macedonia after his father's death, where he reigned for 18 years. He married Thessalonica, the sister of Alexander, to strengthen himself on his throne. Olympias, the mother of Alexander, wished to keep the kingdom of Macedonia for Alexander's young children; and therefore she destroyed the relations of Cassander, who besieged her in the town of Pydna, and put her to death. Roxane, with her son Alexander, and Barsena, the mother of Hercules, both wives of Alexander, shared the fate of Olympias with their children. Antigonus, who had been for some time upon friendly terms with Cassander, declared war against him; and Cassander, to make himself equal with his adversary, made a league with Lysimachus and Seleucus, and obtained a memorable victory at Ipsus, B. C. 301. He died three years after this victory, of a dropsy. His son Antipater killed his mother, and for this unnatural murder he was put to death by his brother Alexander, who, to strengthen himself, invited Demetrius, the son of Antigonus, from Asia. Demetrius took advantage of the invitation, and put to death Alexander, and ascended the throne of Macedonia. Paus. 1, c. 25.—Diod. 19.—Justin. 12, 13, &c.

Cassandra, a daughter of Priam and Hecuba, was passionately loved by Apollo, who promised to grant her whatever she might require. She asked the power of knowing futurity; and as soon as she had received it, she slighted Apollo. The god, in his disappointment, declared that no credit or reliance should ever be put upon her predictions, however true and faithful they might be. She was looked upon by the Trojans as insane, and she was even confined, and her predictions were disregarded. She was courted by many princes during the Trojan war. In the division of the spoils of Troy, Agamemnon, who was enamoured of her, took her as his wife, and returned with her to Greece. She repeatedly foretold to him the sudden calamities that awaited his return; but he gave no credit to her, and was assassinated by his wife Clytemnestra. Cassandra shared his fate, and saw all her prophecies but too truly fulfilled. Vid. Agamemnon. Æschyl. in Agam.—Homer. Il. 13, v. 363. Od. 4. —Hygin. fab. 117.—Virg. Æn. 2, v. 246, &c.—Q. Calab. 13, v. 421.—Eurip. in Troad.—Paus. 1, c. 16, l. 3, c. 19.

Cassia Lex, was enacted by Cassius Longinus, A. U. C. 649. By it no man condemned or deprived of military power was permitted to enter the senate-house.——Another, enacted by C. Cassius, the prætor, to choose some of the plebeians to be admitted among the patricians.——Another, A. U. C. 616, to make the suffrages of the Roman people free and independent. It ordained that they should be received upon tablets. Cic. in Læl.——Another, A. U. C. 267, to make a division of the territories taken from the Hernici, half to the Roman people and half to the Latins.——Another, enacted A. U. C. 596, to grant a consular power to P. Anicius and Octavius on the day they triumphed over Macedonia. Liv.

Cassiodorus, a great statesman and writer in the 6th century. He died A. D. 562, at the age of 100. His works were edited by Chandler, 8vo. London, 1722.

Cassivelaunus, a Briton invested with sovereign authority when J. Cæsar made a descent upon Britain. Cæs. Bell. G. 5, c. 19, &c.

Cassius, (C.) I. a celebrated Roman, who made himself known by being first quæstor to Crassus in his expedition against Parthia, from which he extricated himself with uncommon address. He followed the interest of Pompey; and when Cæsar had obtained the victory in the plains of Pharsalia, Cassius was one of those who owed their life to the mercy of the conqueror. He married Junia, the sister of Brutus, and with him he resolved to murder the man to whom he was indebted for his life, on account of his oppressive ambition; and before he stabbed Cæsar, he addressed himself to the statue of Pompey. When the provinces were divided among Cæsar's murderers, Cassius received Africa; and when his party had lost ground at Rome, by the superior influence of Augustus and M. Antony, he retired to Philippi, with his friend Brutus and their adherents. In the battle that was fought there, the wing which Cassius commanded was defeated, and his camp was plundered. In this unsuccessful moment he suddenly gave up all hopes of recovering his losses, and concluded that Brutus was conquered and ruined as well as himself. Fearful to fall into the enemy's hands, he ordered one of his freedmen to run him through, and he perished by that very sword which had given wounds to Cæsar. His body was honoured with a magnificent funeral by his friend Brutus, who declared over him that he deserved to be called the last of the Romans. If he was brave, he was equally learned. Some of his letters are still extant among Cicero's epistles. He was a strict follower of the doctrine of Epicurus. He was often too rash and too violent; and many of the wrong steps which Brutus took are to be ascribed to the prevailing advice of Cassius. He is allowed by Paterculus to have been a better commander than Brutus, though a less sincere friend. The day after Cæsar's murder he dined at the house of Antony, who asked him whether he had then a dagger concealed in his bosom; Yes, (replied he,) if you aspire to tyranny. Sueton. in Cæs. & Aug.—Plut. in Brut. & Cæs. Paterc. 2, c. 46.—Dio. 40.——II. A Roman citizen, who condemned his son to death on pretence of his raising commotions in the state. Val. Max. 5, c. 8.——III. A tribune of the people, who made many laws tending to diminish the influence of the Roman nobility. He was competitor with Cicero for the consulship.——IV. One of Pompey's officers who, during the civil wars, revolted to Cæsar with 10 ships.——V. A poet of Parma, of great genius. He was killed by Varus by order of Augustus, whom he had offended by his satirical writings. His fragments of Orpheus were found, and edited some time after by the poet Statius. Horat. 1, Sat. 10, v. 62.——VI. Spurius, a Roman, put to death on suspicion of his aspiring to tyranny, after he had been three times consul, B. C. 485. Diod. 11.—Val. Max. 6, c. 3. ——VII. Brutus, a Roman, who betrayed his country to the Latins, and fled to the temple of Pallas, where his father confined him, and he was starved to death.——VIII. Longinus, an officer of Cæsar in Spain, much disliked. Cæs. Alex. c. 48.——IX. A consul, to whom Tiberius married Drusilla, daughter of Germanicus.

Sueton. in Val. c. 57.——X. A lawyer, whom Nero put to death because he bore the name of J. Cæsar's murderer. Suet. in Ner. 37.——XI. L. Hemina, the most ancient writer of annals at Rome. He lived A. U. C. 608.——XII. Lucius, a Roman lawyer, whose severity in the execution of the law has rendered the words Cassiani judices applicable to rigid judges. Cic. pro Rosc. c. 30.——XIII. Longinus, a critic. Vid. Longinus.——XIV. Lucius, a consul with C. Marius, slain, with his army, by the Gauls Senones. Appian. in Celt.——XV. M. Scæva, a soldier of uncommon valour, in Cæsar's army. Val. Max. 3, c. 2.——XVI. An officer under Aurelius, made emperor by his soldiers, and murdered three months after.——XVII. Felix, a physician in the age of Tiberius, who wrote on animals.——XVIII. Severus, an orator, who wrote a severe treatise on illustrious men and women. He died in exile, in his 25th year. Vid. Severus. The family of the Cassii branched into the surname of Longinus, Viscellinus, Brutus, &c.

Catagogia, festivals in honour of Venus, celebrated by the people of Eryx. Vid. Anagogia.

Catenes, a Persian, by whose means Bessus was seized. Curt. 7, c. 43.

Catienus, an actor at Rome in Horace's age. Hor. 2, Sat. 3, v. 61.

Catilina, L. Sergius, a celebrated Roman, descended of a noble family. When he had squandered away his fortune by his debaucheries and extravagance, and been refused the consulship, he secretly meditated the ruin of his country, and conspired with many of the most illustrious of the Romans, as dissolute as himself, to extirpate the senate, plunder the treasury, and set Rome on fire. This conspiracy was timely discovered by the consul Cicero, whom he had resolved to murder; and Catiline, after he had declared his intentions in the full senate, and attempted to vindicate himself, on seeing five of his accomplices arrested, retired to Gaul, where his partisans were assembling an army; while Cicero at Rome punished the condemned conspirators. Petreius, the other consul's lieutenant, attacked Catiline's ill-disciplined troops, and routed them. Catiline was killed in the engagement, bravely fighting, about the middle of December, B. C. 63. To violence offered to a vestal, he added the murder of his own brother, for which he would have suffered death, had not friends and bribes prevailed over justice. It has been reported that Catiline and the other conspirators drank human blood, to make their oaths more firm and inviolable. Sallust has written an account of the conspiracy. Cic. in Catil.—Virg. Æn. 8, v. 668.

Catius, (M.) I. an Epicurean philosopher of Insubria, who wrote a treatise, in four books, on the nature of things, and the summum bonum, and an account of the doctrine and tenets of Epicurus. But as he was not a sound or faithful follower of the Epicurean philosophy, he has been ridiculed by Horat. 2, Sat. 4.—Quintil. 10, c. 1.——II. Vestinus, a military tribune in M. Antony's army. Cic. Div. c. 10, 23.

Cato, I. a surname of the Porcian family, rendered illustrious by M. Porcius Cato, a celebrated Roman, afterwards called Censorius, from his having exercised the office of censor. He rose to all the honours of the state; and the first battle he ever saw was against Annibal, at the age of seventeen, where he behaved with uncommon valour. In his quæstorship under Africanus against Carthage, and in his expedition in Spain against the Celtiberians, and in Greece, he displayed equal proofs of his courage and prudence. He was remarkable for his love of temperance; he never drank but water, and was always satisfied with whatever meats were laid upon his table by his servants, whom he never reproved with an angry word. He is famous for the great opposition which he made to the introduction of the finer arts of Greece into Italy; and he often observed to his son, that the Romans would be certainly ruined whenever they began to be infected with Greek. It appears, however, that he changed his opinion, and made himself remarkable for the knowledge of Greek which he acquired in his old age. He was universally deemed so strict in his morals, that Virgil makes him one of the judges of hell. He repented only of three things during his life: to have gone by sea when he could go by land, to have passed a day inactive, and to have told a secret to his wife. In Cicero's age there were 150 orations of his, besides letters, and a celebrated work called Origines, of which the first book gave a history of the Roman monarchy; the second and third, an account of the neighbouring cities of Italy; the fourth, a detail of the first, and the fifth of the second Punic war; and, in the others, the Roman history was brought down to the war of the Lusitanians, carried on by Ser. Galba. Some fragments of the Origines remain, supposed by some to be suppositious. Cato's treatise, De Re rustică, was edited by Aufon. Pompna, 8vo. Ant. Plant. 1590; but the best edition of Cato, &c. seems to be Gesner's, 2 vols. 4to. Lips. 1735. Cato died in an extreme old age, about 150 B. C.; and Cicero, to show his respect for him, has introduced him in his treatise on old age as the principal character. Plin. 7, c. 14.—Plutarch & C. Nepos have written an account of his life. Cic. Acad. & de Senect. &c.——II. Marcus, the son of the censor, married the daughter of P. Æmylius. He lost his sword in a battle, and, though wounded and tired, he went to his friends, and with their assistance renewed the battle, and recovered his sword. Plut. in Cat.——III. A courageous Roman, grandfather to Cato the censor. He had five horses killed under him in battles. Plut. in Cat.——IV. Valerius, a grammarian of Gallia Norbonensis, in the time of Sylla, who instructed at Rome many noble pupils, and wrote some poems. Ovid. 2, Trist. 1, v. 436.——V. Marcus, surnamed Uticensis from his death at Utica, was great grandson to the censor of the same name. The early virtues that appeared in his childhood seemed to promise a great man; and, at the age of fourteen, he earnestly asked his preceptor for a sword to stab the tyrant Sylla. He was austere in his morals, and a strict follower of the tenets of the stoics; he was careless of his dress, often appeared barefooted in public, and never travelled but on foot. When he was set over the troops in the capacity of a commander, his removal was universally lamented, and deemed almost a public loss by his affectionate soldiers. His fondness for candour was so great, that the veracity of Cato became proverbial. In his visits to his friends, he wished to give as little molestation as possible; and the importuning civilities of king Dejotarus so displeased him, when he was at his court, that he hastened away from his presence. He was very jealous of the safety and liberty of the republic, and watched carefully over the conduct of Pompey, whose power and influence were great. He often expressed his dislike to serve the office of a tribune; but when he saw a man of corrupted principles apply for it, he offered himself a candidate to oppose him, and obtained the tribuneship. In the conspiracy of Catiline he supported Cicero, and was the chief cause that the conspirators were capitally punished. When the provinces of Gaul were decreed for five years to Cæsar, Cato observed to the senators that they had introduced a tyrant into the capitol. He was sent to Cyprus against Ptolemy, who had rebelled, by his enemies, who hoped that the difficulty of the expedition would injure his reputation. But his prudence extricated him from every danger. Ptolemy submitted, and, after a successful campaign, Cato was received at Rome with the most distinguishing honours, which he, however, modestly declined. When the first triumvirate was formed between Cæsar, Pompey, and Crassus, Cato opposed them with all his might; and with an independent spirit foretold to the Roman people all the misfortunes which soon after followed. After repeated applications he was made prætor, but he seemed rather to disgrace than support the dignity of that office by the meanness of his dress. He applied for the consulship, but could never obtain it. When Cæsar had passed the Rubicon, Cato advised the Roman senate to deliver the care of the republic into the hands of Pompey; and when his advice had been complied with, he followed him with his son to Dyrrachium, where, after a small victory there, he was intrusted with the care of the ammunition and 15 cohorts. After the battle of Pharsalia, Cato took the command of the Corcyrean fleet; and when he heard of Pompey's death, on the coast of Africa, he traversed the deserts of Libya to join himself to Scipio. He refused to take the command of the army in Africa, a circumstance of which he afterwards repented. When Scipio had been defeated, partly for not paying regard to Cato's advice, Cato fortified himself in Utica; but, however, not with the intention of supporting a siege. When Cæsar approached near the city, Cato disdained to fly; and rather than fall alive into the conqueror's hands, he stabbed himself, after he had read Plato's treatise on the immortality of the soul, B. C. 46, in the 59th year of his age. He had first married Attilia, a woman whose licentious conduct obliged him to divorce her. Afterwards he united himself to Martia, daughter of Philip. Hortensius, his friend, wished to raise children by Martia, and therefore obtained her from Cato. After the death of Hortensius, Cato took her again. This conduct was ridiculed by the Romans, who observed that Martia had entered the house of Hortensius very poor, but returned to the bed of Cato loaded with treasures. It was observed that Cato always appeared in mourning, and never laid down at his meals since the defeat of Pompey, but always sat down, contrary to the custom of the Romans, as if depressed with the recollection that the supporters of republican liberty were decaying. Plutarch has written an account of his life. Lucan. 1, v. 128, &c.—Val. Max. 2, c. 10.—Horat. 3, od. 21.—Virg. Æn. 6, v. 841, l. 8, v. 670.——VI. A son of Cato of Utica, who was killed in a battle after he had acquired much honour. Plut. in Cat. Min.

Catullus, C. or Q. Valerius, I. was nearly contemporary with Lucretius, having come into the world a few years after him, and having survived him but a short period. This elegant poet was born of respectable parents, in the territory of Verona, but whether at the town so called, or on the peninsula of Sirmio, which projects into the Lake Benacus, has been a subject of much controversy. The former opinion has been maintained by Maffei and Bayle, and the latter by Gyraldus, Schoell, Fuhrmann, and most modern writers. The precise period, as well as place, of the birth of Catullus, is a topic of debate and uncertainty. According to the Eusebian Chronicle, he was born in 666, but, according to other authorities, in 667 or 668. With a view of improving his pecuniary circumstances, he adopted the usual Roman mode of re-establishing a diminished fortune, and accompanied Caius Memmius, the celebrated patron of Lucretius, to Bithynia, when he was appointed prætor of that province. His situation, however, was but little meliorated by this expedition, and, in the course of it, he lost a beloved brother, who was long with him; and whose death he has lamented in verses never surpassed in delicacy or pathos. He came back to Rome with a shattered constitution and a lacerated heart. From the period of his return to Italy till his decease, his time appears to have been chiefly occupied with the prosecution of licentious amours, in the capital or among the solitudes of Sirmio. The Eusebian Chronicle places his death in 696, and some writers fix it in 705. It is evident, however, that he must have survived at least till 708, as Cicero, in his letters, talks of his verses against Cæsar and Mamurra as newly written, and first seen by Cæsar in that year. The distracted and unhappy state of his country, and his disgust at the treatment which he had received from Memmius, were perhaps sufficient excuse for shunning political employments; but when we consider his taste and genius, we cannot help regretting that he was merely an idler and a debauchee. His poems are chiefly employed in the indulgence and commemoration of his various passions. Ad Passerem Lesbiæ.—This address of Catullus to the favourite sparrow of his mistress, Lesbia, is well known, and has been always celebrated as a model of grace and elegance. In Nuptias Juliæ et Manlii. These are the three very celebrated epithalamiums of Catullus. The first is in honour of the nuptials of Julia and Manlius, who is generally supposed to have been Aulus Manlius Torquatus, an intimate friend of the poet, and a descendant of one of the most noble patrician families in Rome. This poem has been entitled an epithalamium in most of the ancient editions, but Muretus contends that this is an improper appellation, and that it should be inscribed Carmen Nuptiale. 'An epithalamium,' he says, 'was supposed to be sung by the virgins when the bride had retired to the nuptial chamber, whereas in this poem an earlier part of the ceremony is celebrated and described.' Carmen Nuptiale.—Some parts of this epithalamium have been taken from Theocritus, particularly from his eighteenth Idyl, where the Lacedæmonian maids, companions of Helen, sing before the bridal-chamber of Menelaus. This second nuptial hymn of Catullus may be regarded as a continuation of the above poem, being also in honour of the marriage of Manlius and Julia. The stanzas of the former were supposed to be sung or recited in the person of the poet, who only exhorted the chorus of youths and virgins to commence the nuptial strain. But here these bands contend, in alternate verses; the maids descanting on the beauty and advantages of a single life, and the lads on those of marriage. The young men, companions of the bridegroom, are supposed to have left him at the rising of the evening star of love. The maids who had accompanied the bride to her husband's house, approached the youths who had just left the bridegroom, and they commence a very elegant contention concerning the merits of the star, which the chorus of virgins is pleased to characterize as a cruel planet. They are silenced, however, by the youths hinting that they are not such enemies to Hesper as they pretend to be. Then the maids draw a beautiful, and, with Catullus, a favourite comparison between an unblemished virgin and a delicate flower in a garden:—

'Ut flos in septis secretus nascitur hortis,
Ignotus pecori, nullo convulsus aratro,
Quem mulcent auræ, firmat sol, educat imber;
Multi illum pueri, multæ optavere puellæ.
Idem cum tenui carptus defloruit ungui,
Nulli illum pueri, nullæ optavere puellæ.
Sic virgo dum intacta manet, tum cara suis; sed
Cum castum amisit, polluto corpore, florem,
Nec pueris jucunda manet, nec cara puellis.'

The greatest poets have not disdained to transplant this exquisite flower of song. Perhaps the most successful imitation is one by the prince of the romantic bards of Italy, in the first canto of his Orlando. De Atì.—The story of Atis is one of the most mysterious of the mythological emblems. The fable was explained by Porphyry; and the emperor Julian afterwards invented and published an allegory of this mystic tale. According to them, the voluntary emasculation of Atis was typical of the revolution of the sun between the tropics, or the separation of the human soul from vice and error. In the literal acceptation in which it is presented by Catullus, the fable seems an unpromising and rather a peculiar subject for poetry: indeed, there is no example of a similar event being celebrated in verse, except the various poems on the fate of Abelard. It is likewise the only specimen we have in Latin of the Galliambic measure; so called, because sung by Galli, the effeminate votaries of Cybele. The Romans, being a more sober and severe people than the Greeks, gave less encouragement than they to the celebration of the rites of Bacchus, and have poured forth but few dithyrambic lines. The genius of their language and of their usual style of poetry, as well as their own practical and imitative character, were unfavourable to the composition of such bold, figurative, and discursive strains. They have left no verses which can be strictly called dithyrambic, except, perhaps, the nineteenth ode of the second book of Horace, and a chorus in the Œdipus of Seneca. If not perfectly dithyrambic, the numbers of the Atis of Catullus are, however, strongly expressive of distraction and enthusiasm. The violent bursts of passion are admirably aided by the irresistible torrent of words, and by the cadence of a measure powerfully denoting mental agony and remorse. In this production, now unexampled in every sense of the word, Catullus is no longer the light agreeable poet, who counted the kisses of his mistress, and called on the Cupids to lament her sparrow. His ideas are full of fire, and his language of wildness: he pours forth his thoughts with an energy, rapidity, and enthusiasm, so different from his usual tone, and, indeed, from that of all Latin poets, that this production has been supposed to be a translation from some ancient Greek dithyrambic, of which it breathes all the passions and poetic phrensy. The employment of long compound epithets, which constantly recur in the Atis, is also a strong mark of imitation of the Greek dithyrambics; it being supposed that such sonorous and new-invented words were most befitting intoxication or religious enthusiasm. Anacreon, in his thirteenth ode, alludes to the lamentations and transports of Atis, as to a well-known poetical tradition. Atis, it appears from the poem of Catullus, was a beautiful youth, probably of Greece, who, forsaking his home and parents, sailed with a few companions, to Phrygia, and having landed, hurried to the grove consecrated to the great goddess Cybele; there, struck with superstitious phrensy, he qualified himself for the service of that divinity; and, snatching the musical instruments used in her worship, he exhorted his companions, who had followed his example, to ascend to the temple of Cybele. At this part of the poem, we follow the new votary of the Phrygian goddess through all his wild traversing of woods and mountains, till at length, having reached the temple, Atis and his companions drop asleep, exhausted by fatigue and mental distraction. Being tranquillized in some measure by a night's repose, Atis becomes sensible of the misery of his situation; and, struck with horror at his rash deed, he returns to the seashore. There he cast his eyes, bathed in tears, over the ocean homeward; and comparing his former happiness with his present wretched condition, he pours forth a complaint unrivalled in energy and pathos. Gibbon talks of the different emotions produced by the transition of Atis from the wildest enthusiasm to sober pathetic complaint for his irretrievable loss; but, in fact, his complaint is not soberly pathetic—to which the Galliambic measure would be little suited: it is, on the contrary, the most impassioned expression of mental agony and bitter regret in the wide compass of Roman literature. Epithalamium Pelei et Thetidis.—This is the longest and most elaborate of the productions of Catullus. It displays much accurate description, as well as pathetic and impassioned incident. Catullus was a Greek scholar, and all his commentators seem determined that his best poems should be considered as of Greek invention. I do not believe, however, that the whole of this epithalamium was taken from any one poet of Greece, as the Coma Berenices was from Callimachus; but the author undoubtedly borrowed a great deal from various writers of that country. The proper subject of this epithalamium is the festivals held in Thessaly in honour of the nuptials of Peleus and Thetis; but it is chiefly occupied with a long episode, containing the story of Ariadne. De Coma Berenices, is translated from a production of Callimachus, of which, only two distichs remain, one preserved by Theon, a scholiast on Aratus, and another in the Scholia on Apollonius Rhodius. The poem of Catullus has some faults, which may be fairly attributed to his pedantic model—a certain obscurity in point of diction, and that ostentatious display of erudition, which characterized the works of the Alexandrian poets. The Greek original, however, being lost, except two distichs, it is impossible to institute an accurate comparison; but the Latin appears to be considerably more diffuse than the Greek. The Latin poem, like its Greek original, is in elegiac verse, and is supposed to be spoken by the constellation called Coma Berenices. It relates how Berenice, the queen and sister of Ptolemy, (Euergetes,) vowed the consecration of her locks to the immortals, provided her husband was restored to her, safe and successful, from a military expedition on which he had proceeded against the Assyrians. The king having returned according to her wish, and her shorn locks having disappeared, it is supposed, by one of those fictions which poetry alone can admit, that Zephyrus, the son of Aurora, and brother of Memnon, had carried them up to heaven, and thrown them into the lap of Venus, by whom they were set in the sky, and were soon afterwards discovered among the constellations by Conon, a court astronomer. But though the poem of Callimachus may have been seriously written, and gravely read by the court of Ptolemy, the lines of Catullus often approach to something like pleasantry or persiflage: and seem intended as a sort of mock-heroic, and remind us strongly of the Rape of the Lock. Much dispute has existed with regard to the comparative merit of the epigrammatic productions of Catullus, and those of Martial, who sharpened the Latin epigram, and endeavoured to surprise, by terminating an ordinary thought with some word or expression, which formed a point. Of the three great triumvirs of Latin literature, Joseph Scaliger, Lipsius, and Muretus, the last considers Catullus as far superior to his successor, as the wit of a gentleman to that of a scoffer and buffoon, while the two former award the palm to Martial. There can, I think, be no doubt, that as an epigrammatist, Martial is infinitely superior to Catullus; but it is not on his epigrams that the fame of Catullus rests; he owes his reputation to about a dozen pieces, in which every word, like a note of music, thrills on the heart-strings. It is this felicitous selection of the most appropriate and melodious expressions, which seem to flow from the heart without study or premeditation, which has rendered him the most graceful of poets.——II. A man surnamed Urbicarius, was a mimographer. Juv. 13, v. 111.

Catŭlus, Q. Luctatius, I. went with 300 ships during the first Punic war against the Carthaginians, and destroyed 600 of their ships under Hamilcar, near the Ægates. This celebrated victory put an end to the war.——II. An orator, distinguished also as a writer of epigrams, and admired for the neatness, elegance, and polished style of his compositions. He is supposed to be the same as the colleague of Marius, when a consul the fourth time; and he shared with him the triumph over the Cimbri. He was, by his colleague's order, suffocated in a room filled with the smoke of burning coals. Lucan. 2, v. 174.—Plut. in Mario.——III. A Roman sent by his countrymen to carry a present to the god of Delphi, from the spoils taken from Asdrubal. Liv. 27.

Cebes, a Theban philosopher, one of the disciples of Socrates, B. C. 405. He attended his learned preceptor in his last moments, and distinguished himself by three dialogues that he wrote; but more particularly by his tables, which contain a beautiful and affecting picture of human life, delineated with accuracy of judgment and great splendour of sentiment. Little is known of the character of Cebes from history. Plato mentions him once, and Xenophon the same; but both in a manner which conveys most fully the goodness of his heart and the purity of his morals. The best editions of Cebes are those of Gronovius, 8vo. 1689; and Glasgow, 12mo. 1747.

Cecinna, A. a Roman knight in the interest of Pompey, who used to breed up young swallows, and send them to carry news to his friends as messengers. He was a particular friend of Cicero, with whom he corresponded. Some of his letters are still extant in Cicero. Plin. 10, c. 24.—Cic. 15, ep. 66. Orat. 29.

Cecrŏpĭdæ, an ancient name of the Athenians, more particularly applied to those who were descended from Cecrops, the founder of Athens. The honourable name of Cecropidæ was often conferred as a reward for some virtuous action in the field of battle. Virg. Æn. 6, v. 21.—Ovid. 7, Met. 671.

Cecrops, I. a native of Sais in Egypt, who led a colony to Attica, about 1556 years before the Christian era, and reigned over part of the country, which was called from him Cecropia. He softened and polished the rude and uncultivated manners of the inhabitants, and drew them from the country to inhabit twelve small villages which he had founded. He gave them laws and regulations, and introduced among them the worship of those deities which were held in adoration in Egypt. He married the daughter of Actæus, a Grecian prince, and was deemed the first founder of Athens. He taught his subjects to cultivate the olive, and instructed them to look upon Minerva as the watchful patroness of their city. It is said that he was the first who raised an altar to Jupiter in Greece, and offered him sacrifices. After a reign of 50 years, spent in regulating his newly-formed kingdom, and in polishing the minds of his subjects, Cecrops died; leaving three daughters, Aglaurus, Herse, and Pandrosos. He was succeeded by Cranaus, a native of the country. Some time after, Theseus, one of his successors on the throne, formed the twelve villages which he had established into one city, to which the name of Athens was given. Vid. Athenæ. Some authors have described Cecrops as a monster, half a man and half a serpent; and this fable is explained by the recollection that he was master of two languages, the Greek and Egyptian; or that he had command over two countries, Egypt and Greece. Others explain it by an allusion to the regulations which Cecrops made amongst the inhabitants concerning marriage and the union of the two sexes. Paus. 1, c. 5.—Strab. 9.—Justin. 2, c. 6.—Herodot. 8, c. 44.—Apollod. 3, c. 14.—Ovid. Met. 11, v. 561.—Hygin. fab. 166.——II. The second of that name was the seventh king of Athens, and the son and successor of Erechtheus. He married Metiadusa, the sister of Dædalus, by whom he had Pandion. He reigned 40 years, and died 1307 B. C. Apollod. 3, c. 15.—Paus. 1, c. 5.

Celer, I. a man who, with Severus, undertook to rebuild Nero's palace after the burning of Rome. Tacit. Ann. 15, c. 42.——II. A man called Fabius, who killed Remus when he leaped over the walls of Rome, by order of Romulus. Ovid. Fast. 4, v. 837.—Plut. in Romul.

Celĕres, 300 of the noblest and strongest youths at Rome, chosen by Romulus to be his body guards, to attend him wherever he went, and to protect his person. The chief or captain was called Tribunus Celerum. Liv. 1, c. 15.

Celsus, I. an Epicurean philosopher in the second century, to whom Lucian dedicated one of his compositions. He wrote a treatise against the Christians, to which an answer was returned by Origen.——II. Corn. a physician in the age of Tiberius, who wrote eight books on medicine, besides treatises on agriculture, rhetoric, and military affairs. The best editions of Celsus de medicinâ are the 8vo. L. Bat. 1746, and that of Vallart, 12mo. Paris apud Didot, 1772.——III. Albinovanus, a friend of Horace, warned against plagiarism, 1, ep. 3, v. 15, and pleasantly ridiculed in the eighth epistle for his foibles. Some of his elegies have been preserved.——IV. Juventius, a lawyer, who conspired against Domitian.——V. Titus, a man proclaimed emperor, A. D. 265, against his will, and murdered seven days after.

Censores, two magistrates of great authority at Rome, first created B. C. 443. Their office was to number the people, estimate the possessions of every citizen, reform and watch over the manners of the people, and regulate the taxes. Their power was also extended over private families; they punished irregularity, and inspected the management and education of the Roman youth. They could inquire into the expenses of every citizen, and even degrade a senator from all his privileges and honours, if guilty of any extravagance. This punishment was generally executed in passing over the offender's name in calling the list of the senators. The office of public censor was originally exercised by the kings. Servius Tullius, the sixth king of Rome, first established a census, by which every man was obliged to come to be registered, and give in writing the place of his residence, his name, his quality, the number of his children, of his tenants, estates, and domestics, &c. The ends of the census were very salutary to the Roman republic. They knew their own strength, their ability to support a war, or to make a levy of troops, or raise a tribute. It was required that every knight should be possessed of 400,000 sesterces, to enjoy the rights and privileges of his order; and a senator was entitled to sit in the senate, if he was really worth 800,000 sesterces. This laborious task of numbering and reviewing the people was, after the expulsion of the Tarquins, one of the duties and privileges of the consuls. But when the republic was become more powerful, and when the number of its citizens was increased, the consuls were found unable to make the census, on account of the multiplicity of business. After it had been neglected for 16 years, two new magistrates, called censors, were elected. They remained in office for five years, and every fifth year they made a census of all the citizens in the Campus Martius, and offered a solemn sacrifice, and made a lustration in the name of all the Roman people. This space of time was called a lustrum, and ten or twenty years were commonly expressed by two or four lustra. After the office of censors had remained for some time unaltered, the Romans, jealous of their power, abridged the duration of their office; and a law was made, A. U. C. 420, by Mamercus Æmilius, to limit the time of the censorship to 18 months. After the second Punic war, they were always chosen from such persons as had been consuls; their office was more honourable, though less powerful, than that of the consuls; the badges of their office were the same, but the censors were not allowed to have lictors to walk before them as the consuls. When one of the censors died, no one was elected in his room till the five years were expired, and his colleague immediately resigned. This circumstance originated from the death of a censor before the sack of Rome by Brennus, and was ever after deemed an unfortunate event to the republic. The emperors abolished the censors, and took upon themselves to execute their office.

Censorīnus, I. (Ap. Cl.) was compelled, after many services to the state, to assume the imperial purple by the soldiers, by whom he was murdered some days after, A. D. 270.——II. A grammarian of the 3d century, whose book, De die natali, is extant, best edited in 8vo. by Havercamp, L. Bat. 1767. It treats of the birth of man, of years, months, and days.

Census, the numbering of the people of Rome, performed by the censors, a censeo, to value. Vid. Censores.——A god worshipped at Rome, the same as Consus.

Centumvīri, the members of a court of justice at Rome. They were originally chosen, three from the 35 tribes of the people, and, though 105, they were always called Centumvirs. They were afterwards increased to the number of 180, and still kept their original name. The prætor sent to their tribunal causes of the greatest importance, as their knowledge of the law was extensive. They were generally summoned by the Decemviri, who seemed to be the chiefest among them; and they assembled in the Basilica, or public court, and had their tribunal distinguished by a spear with an iron head; whence a decree of their court was called Hastæ judicium; their sentences were very impartial, and without appeal. Cic. de Orat. 1, c. 38.—Quintil. 4, 5, and 11.—Plin. 6. ep. 33.

Centŭria, a division of the people among the Romans, consisting of a hundred. The Roman people were originally divided into three tribes, and each tribe into 10 curiæ. Servius Tullius made a census: and when he had the place of habitation, name, and profession of every citizen, which amounted to 80,000 men, all able to bear arms, he divided them into six classes, and each class into several centuries or companies of a hundred men. The first class consisted of 80 centuries, 40 of which were composed of men from the age of 45 and upwards, appointed to guard the city. The 40 others were young men from 17 to 45 years of age, appointed to go to war, and fight the enemies of Rome. They were to be worth 1,100,000 asses, a sum equivalent to 1800 pounds English money. The second, third, and fourth classes, consisted each of twenty centuries, ten of which were composed of the more aged, and the others of the younger sort of people. They were to be worth, in the second class, 75,000 asses, or about 121*l*. In the third, 50,000, about 80*l*.; and in the fourth, 25,000, or about 40*l*. The fifth class consisted of 30 centuries, three of which were carpenters by trade, and the others of different professions, such as were necessary in a camp. They were to be worth 11,000 asses, or about 18*l*. The sixth class contained only one centuria, comprising the whole body of the poorest citizens, who were called Proletarii, as their only service to the state was procreating children. They were also called capite censi, as the censor took notice of their person, not of their estate. In the public assemblies in the Campus Martius, at the election of public magistrates, or at the trial of capital crimes, the people gave their vote by centuries; whence the assembly was called comitia centuriata. In these public assemblies, which were never convened only by the consuls at the permission of the senate, or by the dictator, in the absence of the consuls, some of the people appeared under arms for fear of an attack from some foreign enemy. When a law was proposed in the public assemblies, its advantages were enlarged upon in a harangue; after which it was exposed in the most conspicuous parts of the city three market-days, that the people might see and consider. Exposing it to public view, was called proponere legem, and explaining it, promulgare legem. He who merely proposed it, was called lator legis; and he who dwelt upon its importance and utility, and wished it to be enforced, was called auctor legis. When the assembly was to be held, the auguries were consulted by the consul, who, after haranguing the people, and reminding them to have in view the good of the republic, dismissed them to their respective centuries, that their votes might be gathered. They gave their votes vivâ voce, till the year of Rome A. U. C. 615, when they changed the custom, and gave their approbation or disapprobation by ballots thrown into an urn. If the first class was unanimous, the others were not consulted, as the first was superior to all the others in number; but if they were not unanimous, they proceeded to consult the rest, and the majority decided the question. This advantage of the first class gave offence to the rest, and it was afterwards settled that one class of the six should be drawn by lot, to give its votes first, without regard to rank or priority. After all the votes had been gathered, the consul declared aloud, that the law which had been proposed was duly and constitutionally approved. The same ceremonies were observed in the election of consuls, prætors, &c. The word Centuria is also applied to a subdivision of one of the Roman legions, which consisted of a hundred men, and was the half of a manipulus, the sixth part of a cohort, and the sixtieth part of a legion. The commander of a centuria was called centurion, and he was distinguished from the rest by the branch of a vine which he carried in his hand.

CEPHĂLON, a Greek of Ionia, who wrote a history of Troy, besides an epitome of universal history from the age of Ninus to Alexander, which he divided into nine books, inscribed with the name of the nine muses. He affected not to know the place of his birth, expecting it would be disputed like Homer's. He lived in the reign of Adrian.

CĔPHĂLUS. Vid. Part III.

CEPHISODŌRUS, I. a tragic poet of Athens in the age of Æschylus.——II. An historian who wrote an account of the Phocian war.

CERCOPS, a Milesian, author of a fabulous history, mentioned by Athenæus.

CERĔĂLIA, festivals in honour of Ceres; first instituted at Rome by Memmius the edile, and celebrated on the 19th of April. Persons in mourning were not permitted to appear at the celebration; therefore they were not observed after the battle of Cannæ. They are the same as the Thesmophoria of the Greeks. Vid. Thesmophoria.

CESTIUS, an Epicurean of Smyrna, who taught rhetoric at Rhodes, in the age of Cicero.

CETHĒGUS, the surname of one of the branches of the Cornelii.——I. Marcus, a consul in the second Punic war. Cic. in Brut.——II. A tribune at Rome of the most corrupted morals, who joined Catiline in his conspiracy against the state, and was commissioned to murder Cicero. He was apprehended, and, with Lentulus, put to death by the Roman senate. Plut. in Cic. &c.——III. P. Corn. a powerful Roman, who embraced the party of Marius against Sylla. His mistress had obtained such an ascendency over him, that she distributed his favours, and Lucullus was not ashamed to court her smiles when he wished to be appointed general against Mithridates.

CĒYX. Vid. Part III.

CHABRIAS, an Athenian general and philosopher, who chiefly signalized himself when he assisted the Bœotians against Agesilaus. In this celebrated campaign he ordered his soldiers to put one knee on the ground, and firmly to rest their spears upon the other, and cover themselves with their shields, by which means he daunted the enemy and had a statue raised to his honour in that same posture. He assisted also Nectanebus, king of Egypt, and conquered the whole island of Cyprus: but he at last fell a sacrifice to his excessive courage, and despised to fly from his ship when he had it in his power to save his life like his companions, B. C. 376. C. Nep. in vitâ.—Diod. 16.—Plut. in Phoc.

CHÆREAS, an officer who murdered Caligula, A. D. 41, to prevent the infamous death which was prepared against himself.

CHÆRĒMON, I. a comic poet, and disciple of Socrates.——II. A stoic, who wrote on the Egyptian priests.

Chærephon, a tragic poet of Athens in the age of Philip of Macedonia.

Charesadas, an Athenian general, sent with 20 ships to Sicily during the Peloponnesian war. He died 426 B. C. &c. Thucyd. 3, c. 86.

Charax, a philosopher of Pergamus, who wrote a history of Greece in 40 books.

Charaxes, and Charaxus, a Mitylenean, brother to Sappho, who became passionately fond of Rhodope, upon whom he squandered all his possessions, and reduced himself to poverty and the necessity of piratical excursions. Ovid. Heroid. 15, v. 117.—Herodot. 2, c. 135, &c.

Chares, I. a statuary of Lindus, who was 12 years employed in making the famous Colossus at Rhodes. Plin. 34, c. 7.——II. An historian of Mitylene, who wrote a life of Alexander.

Charicles, one of the 30 tyrants set over Athens by the Lacedæmonians. Xenoph. Memor. 1.—Arist. Polit. 5, c. 6.——II. A famous physician under Tiberius. Tacit. Ann. 6, c. 50.

Charila, a festival observed once in nine years by the Delphians. It owes its origin to this circumstance. In a great famine the people of Delphi assembled and applied to their king to relieve their wants. He accordingly distributed a little corn he had among the noblest; but as a poor little girl, called Charila, begged the king with more than common earnestness, he beat her with his shoe, and the girl, unable to bear his treatment, hanged herself in her girdle. The famine increased; and the oracle told the king, that to relieve his people he must atone for the murder of Charila. Upon this, a festival was instituted with expiatory rites. The king presided over this institution, and distributed pulse and corn to such as attended. Charila's image was brought before the king, who struck it with his shoe; after which, it was carried to a desolate place, where they put a halter round its neck, and buried it where Charila was buried. Plut. in Quæst. Græc.

Chrysilaus, and Charillus, a son of Polydectes, king of Sparta, educated and protected by his uncle Lycurgus. He made war against Argos and attacked Tegea. He was taken prisoner, and released on promise that he would cease from war, an engagement he soon broke. He died in the 64th year of his age. Paus. 2, 36, l. 6, c. 48.

Charisia, a festival in honour of the Graces, with dances which continued all night. He who continued awake the longest was rewarded with a cake.

Charistia, festivals at Rome, celebrated on the 20th of February, by the distribution of mutual presents, with the intention of reconciling friends and relations. Val. Max. 2, c. 1.—Ovid. Fast. 1.

Chariton, a writer of Aphrodisium, at the latter end of the fourth century. He composed a Greek romance, called, The Loves of Chæreas and Callirrhoe, which has been much admired for its elegance, and the originality of the characters it describes. There is a very learned edition of Chariton, by Reiske, with D'Orville's notes, 2 vols. 4to. Amst. 1750.

Charmides, a philosopher of the third academy, B. C. 95.

Charmis, a physician of Marseilles in Nero's age, who used cold baths for his patients, and prescribed medicines contrary to those of his contemporaries. Plin. 21, c. 1.

Charmus, a poet of Syracuse, some of whose fragments are found scattered in Athenæus.

Charon, I. a Theban, who received into his house Pelopidas and his friends, when they delivered Thebes from tyranny, &c. Plut. in Pelop.——II. An historian of Lampsacus, son of Pytheus, who wrote two books on Persia, besides other treatises, B. C. 479.——III. An historian of Naucratis, who wrote a history of his country and Egypt.

Charondas, a man of Catana, who gave laws to the people of Thurium, and made a law that no man should be permitted to come armed into the assembly. He inadvertently broke this law, and when told of it, he fell upon his sword, B. C. 446. Val. Max. 6, c. 5.

Charops, and Charopes, I. a powerful Epirot, who assisted Flaminius when making war against Philip, the king of Macedonia. Plut. in Flam.——II. The first decennial archon at Athens. Paterc. 1, c. 8.

Chelæ, a Greek word, (χηλη,) signifying claws, which is applied to the Scorpion, one of the signs of the zodiac, and lies, according to the ancients, contiguous to Virgo. Virg. G. 1, v. 33.

Chelidonia, a festival at Rhodes, in which it was customary for boys to go begging from door to door, and singing certain songs, &c. Athen.——The wind Favonius was called also Chelidonia, from the 6th of the ides of February to the 7th of the calends of March, the time when swallows first made their appearance. Plin. 2, c. 47.

Chelonis, a daughter of Leonidas, king of Sparta, who married Cleombrotus. She accompanied her father, whom her husband had expelled, and soon after went into banishment with her husband, who had in his turn been expelled by Leonidas. Plut. in Agid. & Cleom.

Cheops, and Cheospes, a king of Egypt after Rhampsinitus, who built famous pyramids, upon which 1060 talents were expended only in supplying the workmen with leeks, parsley, garlick, and other vegetables. Herodot. 2, c. 124.

Chepheren, a brother of Cheops, who also built a pyramid. The Egyptians so inveterately hated these two royal brothers, that they publicly reported that the pyramids which they had built had been erected by a shepherd. Herodot. 2, c. 127.

Cherisophus, a commander of 800 Spartans, in the expedition which Cyrus undertook against his brother Artaxerxes. Diod. 14.

Chilo, a Spartan philosopher, who has been called one of the seven wise men of Greece. Plin. 7, c. 33.—Laert.

Chionides, was the first comic writer among the Athenians. His representations date from Olymp. 73d. 2, B. C. 487. The names of three of his comedies are recorded:—Ἡρῶες, Πέρσαι ἢ Ἀσσύριοι, and Πτωχοί. The two latter do not apparently bear any reference to mythology, and therefore it is probable that comedy was beginning to adopt subjects of a different nature; or rather, that the Attic comedy did, from its earliest times, incline, as in the days of Aristophanes, to personality and satire.

Chilonus, (Constantine,) one of the Cæsars, in Diocletian's age who reigned two years after the emperor's abdication, and died July 25, A. D. 306.

Chœrilus, I. a tragic poet of Athens, who wrote many tragedies, of which 13 obtained the prize. The dramas of Chœrilus appear originally to have been of a satiric character, like those of Thespis. In his later days he naturally copied the improvements of Phrynichus, and we find him accordingly contending for the tragic prizes against Phrynichus, Pratinas, and Æschylus, Olymp. 70th, B. C. 499; the time when Æschylus first exhibited. His pieces are said to have amounted to a hundred and fifty: not a fragment however remains; and, if we may trust Hermeas and Proclus, the commentators on Plato, the loss is not very great.—— II. An historian of Samos.——Two other poets, one of whom was very intimate with Herodotus. He wrote a poem on the victory which the Athenians had obtained over Xerxes, and, on account of the excellence of the composition, he received a piece of gold for each verse from the Athenians, and was publicly ranked with Homer as a poet. The other was one of Alexander's flatterers and friends. It is said the prince promised him as many pieces of gold as there should be good verses in his poetry, and as many slaps on his forehead as there were bad; and in consequence of this, scarce six of his verses in each poem were entitled to gold, while the rest were rewarded with the castigation. Plut. in Alex.—Horat. 2, ep. 1, v. 232.

Chonnidas. Vid. Part III.

Chromius, an Argive, who, alone with Alcenor, survived a battle between 300 of his countrymen and 300 Spartans. Herodot. 1, c. 62.

Chrysanthius, a philosopher in the age of Julian, known for the great number of volumes he wrote.

Chrysermus, a Corinthian, who wrote a history of Peloponnesus, and of India, besides a treatise on rivers. Plut. in Parali.

Chrysippus, a stoic philosopher of Tarsus, who wrote about 311 treatises. Among his curious opinions was his approbation of a parent's marriage with his child, and his wish that dead bodies should be eaten rather than buried. He died through excess of wine, or, as others say, from laughing too much on seeing an ass eating figs on a silver plate, 207, B. C. in the 80th year of his age. Val. Max. 8, c. 7.—Diod.—Horat. 2. Sat. 3, v. 40.

Chrysostom, a bishop of Constantinople, who died A. D. 407, in his 53d year. He was a great disciplinarian, and by severely lashing the vices of his age, he procured himself many enemies. He was banished for opposing the raising a statue to the empress, after having displayed his abilities as an elegant preacher, a sound theologian, and a faithful interpreter of Scripture. Chrysostom's works were nobly and correctly edited, without a Latin version, by Saville, 8 vols. fol. Etonæ. 1613. They have appeared with a translation, at Paris, edit. Benedict. Montfaucon, 13 vols. fol. 1718.

Cicero, M. T. born at Arpinum, was son of a Roman knight, and lineally descended from the ancient kings of the Sabines. His mother's name was Helvia. After displaying many promising abilities at school, he was taught philosophy at Piso, and law by Mutius Scævola. The vehemence with which he had attacked Clodius proved injurious to him; and when his enemy was made tribune, Cicero was banished from Rome, though 20,000 young men were supporters of his innocence. After sixteen months absence, he entered Rome with universal satisfaction, and when he was sent, with the power of proconsul, to Cilicia, his integrity and prudence made him successful against the enemy, and at his return he was honoured with a triumph, which the factions prevented him to enjoy. After much hesitation during the civil commotions between Cæsar and Pompey, he joined himself to the latter, and followed him to Greece. When victory had declared in favour of Cæsar, at the battle of Pharsalia, Cicero went to Brundusium, and was reconciled to the conqueror, who treated him with great humanity. From this time Cicero retired into the country, and seldom visited Rome. When Cæsar had been stabbed in the senate, Cicero recommended a general amnesty, and was the most earnest to decree the provinces to Brutus and Cassius. But when he saw the interest of Cæsar's murderers decrease, and Antony come into power, he retired to Athens. He soon after returned, but lived in perpetual fear of assassination. Augustus courted the approbation of Cicero, and expressed his wish to be his colleague in the consulship. But his wish was not sincere; he soon forgot his former professions of friendship; and when the two consuls had been killed at Mutina, Augustus joined his interest to that of Antony, and the triumvirate was soon after formed. The great enmity which Cicero bore to Antony was fatal to him; and Augustus, Antony, and Lepidus, the triumvirs, to destroy all cause of quarrel, and each to despatch his enemies, produced their list of proscription. About two hundred were doomed to death, and Cicero was among the number upon the list of Antony. Augustus yielded a man to whom he partly owed his greatness, and Cicero was pursued by the emissaries of Antony, among whom was Popilius, whom he had defended upon an accusation of parricide. He had fled in a liter towards the sea of Caieta, and when the assassins came up to him, he put his head out of the litter, and it was severed from the body by Herennius. This memorable event happened in December, 43 B. C. after the enjoyment of life for 63 years, 11 months, and 5 days. The head and the right hand of the orator were carried to Rome, and hung up in the Roman forum; and Fulvia, the triumvir's wife, drew the tongue out of the mouth, and bored it through repeatedly with a gold bodkin, verifying, in this act of inhumanity, what Cicero had once observed, that no animal is more revengeful than a woman. Cicero has acquired more real fame by his literary compositions than by his spirited exertions as a Roman senator. The first oration which Cicero pronounced, at least of those which are extant, was delivered in presence of four judges appointed by the prætor, and with Hortensius for his opponent. It was in the case of Quintius, which was pleaded in the year 672, when Cicero was 26 years of age, at which time he came to the bar much later than was usual, after having studied civil law under Mucius Scævola, and having further qualified himself for the exercise of his profes-tion by the study of polite literature under the poet Archias, as also of philosophy under the principal teachers of each sect who had resorted to Rome. This case was undertaken by Cicero, at the request of the celebrated comedian Roscius, the brother-in-law of Quintius: but it was not of a nature well adapted to call forth or display any of the higher powers of eloquence. In the year following that in which he pleaded the case of Quintius, Cicero undertook the defence of Roscius of Ameria, which was the first public or criminal trial in which he spoke. The father of Roscius had two mortal enemies, of his own name and district. During the proscriptions of Sylla, he was assassinated one evening at Rome, while returning home from supper; and, on pretext that he was in the list proscribed, his estate was purchased for a mere nominal price by Chrysogonus, a favourite slave, to whom Sylla had given freedom, and whom he had permitted to buy the property of Roscius as a forfeiture. Part of the valuable lands thus acquired, were made over by Chrysogonus to the Roscii. The case seems to have been pleaded with much animation and spirit, but the oration was rather too much in that florid Asiatic taste, which Cicero at this time had probably adopted from imitation of Hortensius, who was considered as the most perfect model of eloquence in the Forum; and hence the celebrated passage on the punishment of parricide (which consisted in throwing the criminal, tied up in a sack, into a river) was condemned by the severer taste of his more advanced years. Cicero's courage in defending and obtaining the acquittal of Roscius, under the circumstances in which the case was undertaken, was applauded by the whole city. By this public opposition to the avarice of an agent of Sylla, who was then in the plenitude of his power, and by the energy with which he resisted an oppressive proceeding, he fixed his character for a fearless and zealous patron of the injured, as much as for an accomplished orator. Immediately after the decision of this cause, Cicero, partly on account of his health, and partly for improvement, travelled into Greece and Asia, where he spent two years in the assiduous study of philosophy and eloquence, under the ablest teachers of Athens and Asia Minor. Nor was his style alone formed and improved by imitation of the Greek rhetoricians: his pronunciation also was corrected, by practising under Greek masters, from whom he learned the art of commanding his voice, and of giving it greater compass and variety than it had hitherto attained. The first cause which he pleaded after his return to Rome, was that of Roscius, the celebrated comedian, in a dispute, which involved a mere matter of civil right, and was of no peculiar interest or importance. All the orations which he delivered during the five following years, are lost, of which number were those for Marcus Tullius and L. Varenus, mentioned by Priscian as extant in his time. At the end of that period, however, and when Cicero was now in the thirty-seventh year of his age, a glorious opportunity was afforded for the display of his eloquence, in the prosecution instituted against Verres, the prætor of Sicily, a criminal infinitely more hateful than Catiline or Clodius, and to whom the Roman republic, at least, never produced an equal in turpitude and crime. He was now accused by the Sicilians of many flagrant acts of injustice, rapine, and cruelty, committed by him during his triennial government of their island, which he had done more to ruin than all the arbitrary acts of their native tyrants, or the devastating wars between the Carthaginians and Romans. This arduous task he was earnestly solicited to undertake, by a petition from all the towns of Sicily, except Syracuse and Messina, both which cities had been occasionally allowed by the plunderer to share the spoils of the province. Having accepted this trust, so important in his eyes to the honour of the republic, neither the far-distant evidence, nor irritating delays of all those guards of guilt with which Verres was environed, could deter or slacken his exertions. The first device on the part of the criminal, or rather of his counsel, Hortensius, to defeat the ends of justice, was an attempt to wrest the conduct of the trial from the hands of Cicero, by placing it in those of Cæcilius, who was a creature of Verres, and who now claimed a preference to Cicero, on the ground of personal injuries received from the accused, and a particular knowledge of the crimes of his pretended enemy. The judicial claims of these competitors had therefore to be first decided in that kind of process called Divinatio, in which Cicero delivered his oration, entitled Contra Cæcilium, and showed, with much power of argument and sarcasm, that he himself was in every way best fitted to act as the impeacher of Verres. Having succeeded in convincing the judges that Cæcilius only wished to get the cause into his own hands, in order to betray it, Cicero was appointed to conduct the prosecution, and was allowed 110 days to make a voyage to Sicily, in order to collect information for supporting his charge. He finished his progress through the island in less than half the time which had been granted him. On his return he found that a plan had been laid by the friends of Verres, to procrastinate the trial at least till the following season, when they expected to have magistrates and judges who would prove favourable to his interests. In this design they so far succeeded, that time was not left to go through the cause according to the ordinary forms and practice of oratorical discussion in the course of the year: Cicero, therefore, resolved to lose no time by enforcing or aggravating the several articles of charge, but to produce at once all his documents and witnesses, leaving the rhetorical part of the performance till the whole evidence was concluded. The first oration, therefore, against Verres, which is extremely short, was merely intended to explain the motives which had induced him to adopt this unusual mode of procedure. He accordingly exposes the devices by which the culprit and his cabal were attempting to pervert the course of justice, and unfolds the eternal disgrace that would attach to the Roman law, should their stratagems prove successful. This oration was followed by the deposition of the witnesses, and recital of the documents, which so clearly established the guilt of Verres, that, driven to despair, he submitted, without awaiting his sentence, to a voluntary exile. It therefore appears, that of the six orations against Verres, only one was pronounced. The other five, forming the series of harangues which he intended to deliver after the proof had been completed, were subsequently published in the same shape as if the delinquent had actually stood his trial, and was to have made a regular defence. It is much to be regretted, that the oration for Fonteius, the next which Cicero delivered, has descended to us incomplete. It was the defence of an unpopular governor, accused of oppression by the province intrusted to his administration; and, as such, would have formed an interesting contrast to the accusation of Verres. Pro Cæcina.—This was a mere question of civil right, turning on the effect of a prætorian edict. Pro Lege Manilia.—Hitherto Cicero had only addressed the judges in the forum in civil suits or criminal prosecutions. The oration for the Manilian law, which is accounted one of the most splendid of his productions, was the first in which he spoke to the whole people from the rostrum. It was pronounced in favour of a law proposed by Manilius, a tribune of the people, for constituting Pompey sole general, with extraordinary powers, in the war against Mithridates and Tigranes, in which Lucullus at the time commanded. The chiefs of the senate regarded this law as a dangerous precedent in the republic; and all the authority of Catullus, and eloquence of Hortensius, were directed against it. The glare of glory that surrounded Pompey, concealed from Cicero his many and great imperfections, and seduced an honest citizen, and finest genius in Rome, a man of unparalleled industry, and that generally applied to the noblest purposes, into the prostitution of his abilities and virtues, for exalting an ambitious chief, and investing him with such exorbitant and unconstitutional powers, as virtually subverted the commonwealth. Pro Cluentio.—This is a pleading for Cluentius, who, at his mother's instigation, was accused of having poisoned his stepfather, Oppianicus. Great part of the harangue appears to be but collaterally connected with the direct subject of the prosecution. The whole oration discloses such a scene of enormous villany—of murders, by poison and assassination—of incest, and subornation of witnesses, that the family history of Cluentius may be regarded as the counterpart in domestic society, of what the government of Verres was in public life. Though very long, and complicated too, in the subject, it is one of the most correct and forcible of all Cicero's judicial orations; and under the impression that it comes nearer to the strain of a modern pleading than any of the others, it has been selected by Dr. Blair as the subject of a minute analysis and criticism. De Lege Agraria contra Rullum.—In his discourse Pro Lege Manilia, the first of the deliberative kind addressed to the assembly of the people, Cicero had the advantage of speaking for a favourite of the multitude, and against the chiefs of the senate; but he was placed in a very different situation when he came to oppose the Agrarian law. This had been for 300 years the darling object of the Roman tribes—the daily attraction and rallying word of the populace—the signal of discord, and most powerful engine of the seditious tribunate. The first of the series of orations against the Agrarian law, now proposed by Rullus, was delivered by Cicero in the senate-house, shortly after his election to the consulship: the second and third were addressed to the people from the rostrum. Pro Rabirio.—About the year 654, Saturninus, a seditious tribune, had been slain by a party attached to the interests of the senate. Thirty-six years afterwards, Rabirius was accused of accession to this murder, by Labienus, subsequently well known as Cæsar's lieutenant in Gaul. Hortensius had pleaded the cause before the Duumvirs, Caius and Lucius Cæsar, by whom Rabirius being condemned, appealed to the people, and was defended by Cicero in the Comitia. Cicero's oration on this contention between the senatorial and tribunitial power, gives us more the impression of prompt and unstudied eloquence than most of his other harangues. Contra Catilinam.—The detection and suppression of that nefarious plot form the most glorious part of the political life of Cicero: and the orations he pronounced against the chief conspirators, are still regarded as the most splendid monuments of his eloquence. The conspiracy of Catiline tended to the utter extinction of the city and government. Cicero, having discovered his designs, summoned the senate to meet in the temple of Jupiter Stator, with the intention of laying before it the whole circumstances of the plot. But Catiline having unexpectedly appeared in the midst of the assembly, his audacity impelled the consular orator into an abrupt invective, which is directly addressed to the traitor, and commenced without the preamble by which most of his other harangues are introduced. The great object of the whole oration, was to drive Catiline into banishment; and it appears somewhat singular, that so dangerous a personage, and who might have been so easily convicted, should thus have been forced, or even allowed, to withdraw to his army, instead of being seized and punished. Catiline having escaped unmolested to his camp, the conduct of the consul in not apprehending, but sending away this formidable enemy, had probably excited some censure and discontent; and the second Catilinarian oration was in consequence delivered by Cicero, in an assembly of the people, in order to justify his driving the chief conspirator from Rome. Manifest proofs of the whole plot having been at length obtained, by the arrest of the ambassadors from the Allobroges, with whom the conspirators had tampered, and who were bearing written credentials from them to their own country, Cicero, in his third oration, laid before the people all the particulars of the discovery, and invited them to join in celebrating a thanksgiving, which had been decreed by the senate to his honour, for the preservation of his country. The last Catilinarian oration was pronounced in the senate, on the debate concerning the punishment to be inflicted on the conspirators. Cicero does not precisely declare for any particular punishment; but he shows that his mind evidently inclined to the severest, by dwelling on the enormity of the conspirators' guilt, and aggravating all their crimes with much acrimony and art. His sentiments finally prevailed; and those conspirators who had remained in Rome, were strangled under his immediate superintendence. In these four orations, the tone and style of each of them, particularly of the first and last, is very different, and accommodated with a great deal of judgment to the occasion, and to the circumstances under which they were delivered. Through the whole series of the Catilinarian orations, the language of Cicero is well calculated to overawe the wicked, to confirm the good, and encourage the timid. It is of that description which renders the mind of one man the mind of a whole assembly, or a whole people. Pro Muræna.—The Comitia being now held in order to choose consuls for the ensuing year, Junius Silanus and Muræna were elected. The latter candidate had for his competitor the celebrated jurisconsult Sulpicius Rufus; who, being assisted by Cato, charged Muræna with having prevailed by bribery and corruption. This case was one of great expectation, from the dignity of the prosecutors, and eloquence of the advocates of the accused. Before Cicero spoke, it had been pleaded by Hortensius, and Crassus the triumvir; and Cicero, in engaging in the cause, felt the utmost desire to surpass these rivals of his eloquence. Such was his anxiety, that he slept none during the whole night which preceded the hearing of the cause; and being thus exhausted with care, his eloquence on this occasion fell short of that of Hortensius. He shows, however, much delicacy and art in the manner in which he manages the attack on the philosophy of Cato, and profession of Sulpicius, both of whom were his particular friends, and high in the estimation of the judges he addressed. Pro Cornelio Sylla.—Sylla, who was afterwards a great partisan of Cæsar's, was prosecuted for having been engaged in Catiline's conspiracy; but his accuser, Torquatus, digressing from the charge against Sylla, turned his raillery on Cicero; alleging, that he had usurped the authority of a king; and asserting, that he was the third foreign sovereign who had reigned at Rome after Numa and Tarquin. Cicero, therefore, in his reply had not only to defend his client, but to answer the petulant raillery by which his antagonist attempted to excite envy and odium against himself. For this defence of Cornelius Sylla, Cicero privately received from his client the sum of 20,000 sesterces, which chiefly enabled him to purchase his magnificent house on the Palatine Hill. Pro Archia.—This is one of the orations of Cicero on which he has succeeded in bestowing the finest polish, and it is, perhaps, the most pleasing of all his harangues. Archias was a native of Antioch, and, having come to Italy in early youth, was rewarded for his learning and genius with the friendship of the first men in the state, and with the citizenship of Heraclea, a confederate and enfranchised town of Magna Græcia. A few years afterwards, a law was enacted conferring the rights of Roman citizens on all who had been admitted to the freedom of federate states, provided they had a settlement in Italy at the time when the law was passed, and had asserted the privilege before the prætor within sixty days from the period at which it was promulgated. After Archias had enjoyed the benefit of this law for more than twenty years, his claims were called in question by one Gracchus, who now attempted to drive him from the city, under the enactment expelling all foreigners who usurped, without due title, the name and attributes of Roman citizens. The loss of records, and some other circumstances, having thrown doubts on the legal right of his client, Cicero chiefly enlarged on the dignity of literature and poetry, and the various accomplishments of Archias, which gave him so just a claim to the privileges he enjoyed. The whole oration is interspersed with beautiful maxims and sentences, which have been quoted with delight in all ages. Pro Cælio.—Middleton has pronounced this to be the most entertaining of the orations which Cicero has left us, from the vivacity of wit and humour with which he treats the gallantries of Clodia, her commerce with Cælius, and in general the gayeties and licentiousness of youth. Cælius was a young man of considerable talents and accomplishments, who had been intrusted to the care of Cicero on his first introduction to the Forum; but having imprudently engaged in an intrigue with Clodia, the well-known sister of Clodius, and having afterwards deserted her, she accused him of an attempt to poison her, and of having borrowed money from her in order to procure the assassination of Dio, the Alexandrian ambassador. De Provinciis Consularibus.—The government of Gaul was continued to Cæsar, in consequence of this oration, so that it may be considered as one of the immediate causes of the ruin of the Roman republic, which it was incontestably the great wish of Cicero to protect and maintain inviolate. In Pisonem.—Piso having been recalled from his government of Macedon, in consequence of Cicero's oration, De Provinciis Consularibus, he complained, in one of his first appearances in the senate, of the treatment he had received, and attacked the orator, particularly on the score of his poetry, ridiculing the well-known line:—

'Cedant arma togæ—concedat laurea linguæ.'

Cicero replied in a bitter invective, in which he exposed the whole life and conduct of his enemy to public contempt and detestation. The most singular feature of this harangue is the personal abuse and coarseness of expression it contains, which appear the more extraordinary when we consider that it was delivered in the senate-house, and directed against an individual of such distinction and consequence as Piso. Pro Milone.—The speech which Cicero actually delivered, was taken down in writing, and is mentioned by Asconius Pedianus as still extant in his time. But that beautiful harangue which we now possess, is one which was retouched and polished, as a gift for Milo, after he had retired in exile to Marseilles. Pro Ligario.—This oration was pronounced after Cæsar, having vanquished Pompey in Thessaly and destroyed, the remains of the republican party in Africa, assumed the supreme administration of affairs at Rome. Merciful as the conqueror appeared, he was understood to be much exasperated against those who, after the rout at Pharsalia, had renewed the war in Africa. Ligarius, when on the point of obtaining a pardon, was formerly accused by his old enemy Tubero, of having borne arms in that contest. The dictator himself presided at the trial of the case, much prejudiced against Ligarius, as was known from his having previously declared, that his resolution was fixed, and was not to be altered by the charms of eloquence. Cicero, however, overcame his prepossessions, and extorted from him a pardon. The countenance of Cæsar, it is said, changed, as the orator proceeded in his speech; but when he touched on the battle of Pharsalia, and described Tubero as seeking his life, amid the ranks of the army, the dictator became so agitated, that his body trembled, and the papers which he held dropped from his hand. This oration is remarkable for the free spirit which it breathes, even in the face of that power to which it was addressed for mercy. But Cicero, at the same time, shows much art in not overstepping those limits, within which he knew he might speak without offence, and in seasoning his freedom with appropriate compliments to Cæsar, of which, perhaps, the most elegant is, that he forgot nothing but the injuries done to himself. This was the person whom, in the time of Pompey, he characterized as monstrum et portentum tyrannum, and whose death he soon afterwards celebrated as divinum in rempublicam beneficium! Philippica.—The chief remaining orations of Cicero are those directed against Antony, of whose private life and political conduct they present us with a full and glaring picture. The character of Antony, next to that of Sylla, was the most singular in the annals of Rome, and in some of its features bore a striking resemblance to that of the fortunate dictator. The philipics against Antony, like those of Demosthenes, derive their chief beauty from the noble expression of just indignation, which, indeed, composes many of the most splendid and admired passages of ancient eloquence. They were all pronounced during the period which elapsed between the assassination of Cæsar and the defeat of Antony at Modena. Cicero was not only a great orator, but had also left the fullest instructions and the most complete historical details on the art which he so gloriously practised. His precepts are contained in the dialogue De Oratore and the Orator; while the history of Roman eloquence is comprehended in the dialogue entitled, Brutus, sive De Claris Oratoribus. Cicero, in his youth, also wrote the Rhetorica, seu de Inventione Rhetorica, of which there are still extant two books, treating of the part of rhetoric that relates to invention. This is the work mentioned by Cicero, in the commencement of the treatise De Oratore, as having been published by him in his youth. It is generally believed to have been written in 666, when Cicero was only twenty years of age, and to have originally contained four books. Schütz, however, the German editor of Cicero, is of opinion, that he never wrote, or at least, never published, more than the two books we still possess. Cicero, who was unquestionably the first orator, was as decidedly the most learned philosopher of Rome; and while he eclipsed all his contemporaries in eloquence, he acquired, towards the close of his life, no small share of reputation as a writer on ethics and metaphysics. His wisdom, however, was founded entirely on that of the Greeks, and his philosophic writings were chiefly occupied with the discussion of questions which had been agitated in the Athenian schools, and from them had been transmitted to Italy. The disquisition respecting the certainty or uncertainty of human knowledge, with that concerning the supreme good and evil, were the inquiries which he chiefly pursued; and the notions which he entertained of these subjects, were all derived from the Portico, Academy, or Lyceum. Cicero was in many respects well qualified for the arduous but noble task which he had undertaken, of naturalizing philosophy at Rome, and exhibiting her, according to the expression of Erasmus, on the stage of life. He was a man of fertile genius, luminous understanding, sound judgment, and indefatigable industry—qualities adequate for the cultivation of reason, and sufficient for the supply of subjects of meditation. Never was philosopher placed in a situation more favourable for gathering the fruits of an experience employed on human nature and civil society, or for observing the effects of various qualities of the mind on public opinion and on the actions of men. In the writings of Cicero, accordingly, every thing deduced from experience and knowledge of world—every observation on the duties of society, is clearly expressed, and remarkable for justness and acuteness. But neither Cicero, nor any other Roman author, possessed sufficient subtilty and refinement of spirit, for the more abstruse discussions, among the labyrinths of which the Greek philosophers delighted to find a fit exercise of their ingenuity. Hence, all that required research into the ultimate foundation of truths, or a more exact analysis of common ideas and perceptions—all, in short, that related to the subtilties of the Greek schools, is neither so accurately expressed nor so logically connected. In the form of dialogue, Cicero has successively treated of law, metaphysics, theology, and morals. When Cæsar had attained the supremacy at Rome, and Cicero no longer gave law to the senate, he became the head of a sort of literary or philosophical society. Filelfo, who delivered public lectures at Rome, on the Tusculan disputations, attempted to prove that he had stated meetings of learned men at his house, and opened a regular academy at Tusculum. The most valuable editions of the works complete, are that of Verburgius, 2 vols. fol. Amst. 1724.—That of Olivet, 9 vols. 4to. Geneva, 1758.—The Oxford edition in 10 vols. 4to. 1782—and that of Lallemand, 12mo. 14 vols. Paris apud Barbou, 1768. Plutarch. in vitâ.—Quintil.—Dio. Cass.—Appian.—Florus.—C. Nep. in Attic.—Eutrop.—Cic. &c.——II. Marcus, the son of Cicero, was taken by Augustus as his colleague in the consulship. He revenged his father's death by throwing public dishonour upon the memory of Antony. He disgraced his father's virtues, and was so fond of drinking, that Pliny observes he wished to deprive Antony of the honour of being the greatest drunkard in the Roman empire. Plut. in Cic.——III. Quintus, the brother of the orator, was Cæsar's lieutenant in Gaul, and proconsul of Asia for three years. He was proscribed with his son at the same time as his brother Tully. Plut. in Cic.—Appian.

Cilles, a general of Ptolemy, conquered by Demetrius. Diod. 19.

Cilo, Jun. an oppressive governor of Bithynia and Pontus. The provinces carried their complaints against him to Rome; but such was the noise of the flatterers that attended the emperor Claudius, that he was unable to hear them; and when he asked what they had said, he was told by one of Cilo's friends, that they returned thanks for his good administration; upon which the emperor said, Let Cilo be continued two years longer in his province. Dio. 60.—Tacit. Ann. 12, c. 21.

CIMBER, TULL., one of Cæsar's murderers. He laid hold of the dictator's robe which was a signal for the rest to strike. Plut. in Cæs.

CIMBRICUM BELLUM, was begun by the Cimbri and Teutones, by an invasion of the Roman territories, B. C. 109. These barbarians were so courageous, and even desperate, that they fastened their first ranks each to the other with cords. In the first battle they destroyed 80,000 Romans, under the consuls Manlius and Servilius Cæpio. But when Marius, in his second consulship, was chosen to carry on the war, he met the Teutones at Aquæ Sextiæ, where, after a bloody engagement, he left dead on the field of battle 20,000, and took 90,000 prisoners, B. C. 102. The Cimbri, who had formed another army, had already penetrated into Italy, where they were met at the river Athesis, by Marius and his colleague Catulus, a year after. An engagement ensued, and 140,000 of them were slain. The last battle put an end to this dreadful war, and the two consuls entered Rome in triumph. Flor. 3, c. 3.—Plin. 7, c. 23, l. 17, c. 1.—Mela, 3, c. 3.—Paterc. 2, c. 12. —Plut. in Mario.

CIMON, I. an Athenian, son of Miltiades and Hegisipyle, famous for his debaucheries in his youth, and the reformation of his morals when arrived to years of discretion. When his father died, he was imprisoned, because unable to pay the fine laid upon him by the Athenians; but he was released from confinement by his sister and wife Elpinice. Vid. Elpinice. He behaved with great courage at the battle of Salamis, and rendered himself popular by his munificence and valour. He defeated the Persian fleet, and took 200 ships, and totally routed their land army the very same day. The money he obtained by his victories was not applied to his own private use; but with it he fortified and embellished the city. He, some time after, lost all his popularity, and was banished by the Athenians, who declared war against the Lacedæmonians. He was recalled from his exile, and, at his return, he made a reconciliation between Lacedæmon and his countrymen. He was afterwards appointed to carry on the war against Persia in Egypt and Cyprus, with a fleet of 200 ships; and on the coast of Asia he gave battle to the enemy and totally ruined their fleet. He died as he was besieging the town of Citium in Cyprus, B. C. 449, in the 21st year of his age. He may be called the last of the Greeks, whose spirit and boldness defeated the armies of the barbarians. He was such an inveterate enemy to the Persian power, that he formed a plan of totally destroying it; and in his wars he had so reduced the Persians, that they promised in a treaty not to pass the Chelidonian islands with their fleet, or to approach within a day's journey of the Grecian seas. The munificence of Cimon has been highly extolled by his biographers; and he has been deservedly praised for leaving his gardens open to the public. Thucyd. 1, c. 100 and 112.—Justin. 2, c. 13.—Diod. 11.—Plut. & C. Nep. in vitâ.——II. An Athenian, father of Miltiades. Herodot. 6, c. 34.——III. A Roman, supported in prison by the milk of his daughter. ——IV. An Athenian, who wrote an account of the war of the Amazons against his country.

CINCIA LEX, was enacted by M. Cincius, tribune of the people, A. U. C. 549. By it no man was permitted to take any money as a gift or a fee in judging a cause. Liv. 34, c. 4.

CINCINNATUS, L. Q. a celebrated Roman, who was informed, as he ploughed his field, that the senate had chosen him dictator. Upon this he left his ploughed land with regret, and repaired to the field of battle, where his countrymen were closely besieged by the Volsci and Æqui. He conquered the enemy, and returned to Rome in triumph; and 16 days after his appointment, he laid down his office and retired back to plough his fields. In his 80th year he was again summoned against Præneste as dictator; and after a successful campaign, he resigned the absolute power he had enjoyed only 21 days, nobly disregarding the rewards that were offered him by the senate. He flourished about 460 years before Christ. Liv. 3, c. 26.—Flor. 1, c. 11.—— Cic. de Finib. 4.—Plin. 18, c. 3.

CINCIUS ALIMENTUS, (L.) I. a prætor of Sicily in the second Punic war, who wrote annals in Greek. Dionys. Hal. 1.——II. Marcus, a tribune of the people, A. U. C. 594, author of the Cincia Lex.

CINEAS, a Thessalian, minister and friend to Pyrrhus, king of Epirus. He was sent to Rome by his master to sue for a peace, which he, however, could not obtain. He told Pyrrhus that the Roman senate were a venerable assembly of kings; and observed, that to fight with them was to fight against another Hydra. He was of such a retentive memory, that the day after his arrival at Rome he could salute every senator and knight by his name. Plin. 7, c. 24.—Cic. ad Fam. 9, ep. 25.

CINESIAS, a Greek poet of Thebes in Bœotia, who composed some dithyrambic verses. Athen.

CINNA, L. CORN. I. a Roman who oppressed the republic with his cruelties, and was banished by Octavius for attempting to make the fugitive slaves free. He joined himself to Marius; and with him, at the head of 30 legions, he filled Rome with blood, defeated his enemies, and made himself consul even to a fourth time. He massacred so many citizens at Rome that his name became odious; and one of his officers assassinated him at Ancona, as he was preparing war against Sylla. His daughter Cornelia married Julius Cæsar, and became mother of Julia. Plut. in Mar. Pomp. & Syll.—Lucan. 4, v. 822.—Appian. Bell. Civ. 1.—Flor. 3, c. 21.—Paterc. 2, c. 20, &c.—Plut. in Cæs.—— II. One of Cæsar's murderers.——III. C. Helvius Cinna, a poet, intimate with Cæsar. He went to attend the obsequies of Cæsar, and, being mistaken by the populace for the other Cinna, he was torn to pieces. He had been eight years in composing an obscure poem called Smyrna, in which he made mention of the incest of Cinyras. Plut. in Cæs.——IV. A grandson of Pompey. He conspired against Augustus, who pardoned him and made him one of his most intimate friends. He was consul, and made Augustus his heir. Dio.—Seneca de Clem. c. 9.

CINNADON, a Lacedæmonian youth, who resolved to put to death the Ephori, and seize upon the sovereign power. His conspiracy was discovered, and he was put to death. Aristot.

Circenses Ludi, games performed in the Circus at Rome. They were dedicated to the god Consus, and were first established by Romulus at the rape of the Sabines. They were in imitation of the Olympian games among the Greeks, and, by way of eminence, were often called the great games. Their original name was Consualia, and they were first called Circensians by Tarquin the elder, after he had built the Circus. They were not appropriated to one particular exhibition, but were equally celebrated for leaping, wrestling, throwing the quoit and javelin, races on foot as well as in chariots, and boxing. Like the Greeks, the Romans gave the name of Pentathlum or Quinquertium to these five exercises. The celebration continued five days, beginning on the 15th of September. All games in general that were exhibited in the Circus, were soon after called Circensian games. Some sea-fights and skirmishes, called by the Romans Naumachiæ, were afterwards exhibited in the Circus. Virg. Æn. 8, v. 636.

Circus, a large and elegant building at Rome, where plays and shows were exhibited. There were about eight at Rome; the first, called Maximus Circus, was the grandest, raised and embellished by Tarquin Priscus. Its figure was oblong, and it was filled all round with benches, and could contain, as some report, about 300,000 spectators. It was about 2187 feet long, and 960 broad. All the emperors vied in beautifying it, and J. Cæsar introduced in it large canals of water, which, on a sudden, could be covered with an infinite number of vessels, and represent a sea-fight.

Claudia, a patrician family at Rome, descended from Clausus, a king of the Sabines. It gave birth to many illustrious patriots in the republic; and it is particularly recorded that there were not less than 28 of that family who were invested with the consulship, five with the office of dictator, and seven with that of censor, besides the honour of six triumphs. Sueton. in Tib. 1.

Claudia, I. a vestal virgin, accused of incontinence. To show her innocence, she offered to remove a ship which had brought the image of Vesta to Rome, and had stuck in one of the shallow places of the river. This had already baffled the efforts of a number of men; and Claudia, after addressing her prayers to the goddess, untied her girdle, and with it easily dragged after her the ship to shore, and by this action was honourably acquitted. Val. Max. 5, c. 4. —Propert. 4, el. 19, v. 52.—Ital. 17, v. 35.—Ovid. Fast. 4, v. 315, ex Ponto. 1, ep. 2, v, 144. ——II. A stepdaughter of M. Antony, whom Augustus married. He dismissed her undefiled, immediately after the contract of marriage, on account of a sudden quarrel with her mother Fulvia. Sueton. in Aug. 62.——III. The wife of the poet Statius. Stat. 3, Sylv. 5.——IV. A daughter of Appius Claudius, betrothed to Tib. Gracchus.——V. The wife of Metellus Celer, sister to P. Clodius and to Appius Claudius. ——IV. Pulcra, a cousin of Agrippina, accused of adultery and criminal designs against Tiberius. She was condemned. Tacit. Ann. 4, c. 52.——VII. Antonia, a daughter of the emperor Claudius, married Cn. Pompey, whom Messalina caused to be put to death. Her second husband Sylla Faustus, by whom she had a son, was killed by Nero, and she shared his fate when she refused to marry his murderer.

Claudia Lex, de comitiis, was enacted by M. Cl. Marcellus, A. U. C. 702. It ordained that at public elections of magistrates, no notice should be taken of the votes of such as were absent.——Another, de usura, which forbade people to lend money to minors on condition of payment after the decease of their parents.——Another, de negotiatione, by Q. Claudius, the tribune, A. U. C. 535. It forbade any senator, or father of a senator, to have any vessel containing above 300 amphoræ, for fear of their engaging themselves in commercial schemes. The same law also forbade the same thing to the scribes and the attendants of the quæstors, as it was naturally supposed that the people who had any commercial connexions could not be faithful to their trust, nor promote the interest of the state.——Another, A. U. C. 576, to permit the allies to return to their respective cities, after their names were enrolled. Liv. 41, c. 9.——Another, to take away the freedom of the city of Rome from the colonists which Cæsar had carried to Novicomum. Sueton. in Jul. 28.

Claudiæ Aquæ, the first water brought to Rome by means of an aqueduct of 11 miles, erected by the censor Appius Claudius, A. U. C. 441. Eutrop. 2, c. 4.—Liv. 9, c. 29.

Claudianus, a celebrated poet, born at Alexandria in Egypt, in the age of Honorius and Arcadius, who seems to possess all the majesty of Virgil, without being a slave to the corrupted style which prevailed in his age. Scaliger observes, that he has supplied the poverty of his matter by the purity of his language, the happiness of his expressions, and the melody of his numbers. As he was the favourite of Stilicho, he removed from the court when his patron was disgraced, and passed the rest of his life in retirement and learned ease. His poems on Rufinus and Eutropius seem to be the best of his compositions. The best editions of his works are that of Burman, 4to. 2 vols. Amst. 1760, and that of Gesner, 2 vols. 8vo. Lips. 1758.

Claudius, I. (Tiber. Drusus Nero,) son of Drusus, Livia's second son, succeeded as emperor of Rome, after the murder of Caligula, whose memory he endeavoured to annihilate. He made himself popular for a while, passed over into Britain, and obtained a triumph for victories which his generals had won; and suffered himself to be governed by favourites, whose licentiousness and avarice plundered the state and distracted the provinces. He married four wives, one of whom, called Messalina, he put to death on account of debauchery. He was at last poisoned by another called Agrippina, who wished to raise her son Nero to the throne. The poison was conveyed in mushrooms; but as it did not operate fast enough, his physician, by order of the empress, made him swallow a poisoned feather. He died in the 63d year of his age, October 13, A. D. 54, after a reign of 13 years, debased by weakness and irresolution. He was succeeded by Nero. Tacit. Ann. 11, &c.—Dio. 60.—Juv. 6, v. 619.—Suet. in vitâ.—— The second emperor of that name was a Dalmatian, who succeeded Gallienus. He conquered the Goths, Scythians, and Heruli, and killed no less than 300,000 in a battle; and after a reign of about two years, died of the plague in Pan-nonia. The excellence of his character, marked with bravery and tempered with justice and benevolence, is well known by these words of the senate addressed to him: Claudi Auguste, tu frater, tu pater, tu amicus, tu bonus senator, tu vere princeps.——III. Nero, a consul with Liv. Salinator, who defeated and killed Asdrubal near the river Metaurum, as he was passing from Spain into Italy, to go to the assistance of his brother Annibal. Liv. 27, &c.—Horat. 4, od. 4, v. 37.—Suet. in Tib.——IV. The father of the emperor Tiberius, quæstor to Cæsar in the wars of Alexandria.——V. Pollos, an historian. Plin. 7, ep. 51.——VI. Pontius, a general of the Samnites, who conquered the Romans at Furcæ Caudinæ, and made them pass under the yoke. Liv. 9, c. 1, &c.——VII. Petilius, a dictator, A. U. C. 442.——VIII. App. Cæcus, a Roman censor, who built an aqueduct, A. U. C. 441, which brought water to Rome from Tusculum, at the distance of seven or eight miles. The water was called Appia, and it was the first that was brought to the city from the country. Before his age the Romans were satisfied with the waters of the Tiber or of the fountains and wells in the city. Vid. Appius. Liv. 9, c. 29.—Ovid. Fast. 6, v. 203.—Cic. de sen. 6.——IX. Pulcher, a consul. He was unsuccessful in his expeditions against the Carthagenians in Sicily, and disgraced on his return to Rome.——X. Tiberius Nero, was the elder brother to Drusus, and son of Livia Drusilla, who married Augustus after his divorce of Scribonia. He married Livia, the emperor's daughter by Scribonia, and succeeded in the empire by the name of Tiberius. Vid. Tiberius. Horat. 4, ep. 3, v. 2.——The name of Claudius is common to many Roman consuls and other officers of state; but nothing is recorded of them.

Cleadas, a man of Platæa, who raised tombs over those who had been killed in the battle against Mardonius. Herodot. 9, c. 85.

Cleander, I. one of Alexander's officers, who killed Parmenio by the king's command. Curt. 7, c. 2, l. 10, c. 1.——II. The first tyrant of Gela. Aristot. 5, Polit. c. 12.——III. A favourite of the emperor Commodus, who was put to death A. D. 190, after abusing public justice and his master's confidence.

Cleanthes, a stoic philosopher of Assos in Troas, successor of Zeno. He was so poor, that to maintain himself he used to draw out water for a gardener in the night, and study in the daytime. Cicero calls him the father of the stoics; and, out of respect for his virtues, the Roman senate raised a statue to him in Assos. It is said that he starved himself in his 90th year, B. C. 240. Strab. 13.—Cic. de Finib. 2, c. 69, l. 4, c. 7.

Clearchus, I. a tyrant of Heraclea in Pontus, who was killed by Chion and Leonidas, Plato's pupils, during the celebration of the festivals of Bacchus, after the enjoyment of the sovereign power during twelve years, 353 B. C. Justin. 16, c. 4.—Diod. 15.——II. The second tyrant of Heraclea of that name, died B. C. 288.——III. A Lacedæmonian sent to quiet the Byzantines. He was recalled, but refused to obey, and fled to Cyrus the younger, who made him captain of 13,000 Greek soldiers. He obtained a victory over Artaxerxes, who was so enraged at the defeat, that when Clearchus fell into his hands by the treachery of Tissaphernes, he put him to immediate death. Diod. 14.

Clemens Romanus, I. one of the fathers of the church, said to be contemporary with St. Paul. Several spurious compositions are ascribed to him, but the only thing extant is his epistle to the Corinthians, written to quiet the disturbances that had arisen there. It has been much admired. The best edition is that of Wotton, 8vo. Cantab. 1718.——II. Another of Alexandria, called from thence Alexandrinus, who flourished 206 A. D. His works are various, elegant, and full of erudition; the best edition of which is Potter's, 2 vols. fol. Oxon. 1715.

Cleobis and Biton, two youths, sons of Cydippe, the priestess of Juno at Argos. When oxen could not be procured to draw their mother's chariot to the temple of Juno, they put themselves under the yoke, and drew it 45 stadia to the temple, amidst the acclamations of the multitude, who congratulated the mother on account of the filial affection of her sons. Cydippe entreated the goddess to reward the piety of her sons with the best gift that could be granted to a mortal. They went to rest and awoke no more: and by this the goddess showed that death is the only true happy event that can happen to man. The Argives raised them statues at Delphi. Cic. Tusc. 1, c. 47.—Val. Max. 5, c. 4.—Herodot. 1, c. 31.—Plut. de Cons. ad Apol.

Cleobŭlina, a daughter of Cleobulus, remarkable for her genius, learning, judgment, and courage. She composed enigmas, some of which have been preserved. One of them runs thus: "A father had 12 children, and these 12 children had each 30 white sons and 30 black daughters, who were immortal, though they die every day." In this there is no need of an Œdipus to discover that there are 12 months in the year, and that every month consists of 30 days and of the same number of nights. Laert.

Cleobŭlus, one of the seven wise men of Greece, son of Evagoras of Lindos, famous for the beautiful shape of his body. He wrote some few verses, and died in the 70th year of his age, B. C. 564. Diog. in vitâ.—Plut. in Symp.

Cleomēdes, a famous athlete of Astypalæa, above Crete. In a combat at Olympia he killed one of his antagonists by a blow with his fist. On account of this accidental murder he was deprived of the victory, and he became delirious. In his return to Astypalæa, he entered a school, and pulled down the pillars which supported the roof, and crushed to death 60 boys. He was pursued with stones, and he fled for shelter into a tomb, whose doors he so strongly secured that his pursuers were obliged to break them for access. When the tomb was opened, Cleomedes could not be found either dead or alive. The oracle of Delphi was consulted, and gave this answer: Ultimus heroum Cleomedes Astypalæa. Upon this they offered sacrifices to him as a god. Paus. 6, c. 9.—Plut. in Rom.

Cleomēnes 1st, king of Sparta, conquered the Argives, and burnt 5000 of them by setting fire to a grove where they had fled, and freed Athens from the tyranny of the Pisistratim. By bribing the oracle, he pronounced Demaratus, his colleague on the throne, illegitimate, because he refused to punish the people of Ægina, who had deserted the Greeks. He killed himself in a fit of madness, 491 B. C. Herodot. 5, 6 and 7.—Paus. 8, c. 3, &c.——The 2d, succeeded his brother Agesipolis 2d. He reigned 61 years in the greatest tranquillity, and was father to Acrotatus and Cleonymus, and was succeeded by Areus 1st, son of Acrotatus. Paus. 3, c. 6.——The 3d, succeeded his father Leonidas. He was of an enterprising spirit, and resolved to restore the ancient discipline of Lycurgus in its full force by banishing luxury and intemperance. He killed the Ephori, and removed by poison his royal colleague Eurydamides, and made his own brother, Euclidas, king, against the laws of the state, which forbade more than one of the same family to sit on the throne. He made war against the Achæans, and attempted to destroy their league. Aratus, the general of the Achæans, who supposed himself inferior to his enemy, called Antigonus to his assistance; and Cleomenes, when he had fought the unfortunate battle of Sellasia, B. C. 222, retired into Egypt, to the court of Ptolemy Evergetes, where his wife and children had fled before him. Ptolemy received him with great cordiality; but his successor, weak and suspicious, soon expressed his jealousy of this noble stranger, and imprisoned him. Cleomenes killed himself, and his body was flayed and exposed on a cross, B. C. 219. Polyb. 6.—Plut. in vitâ.—Justin. 28, c. 4.

Cleon, an Athenian, who, though originally a tanner, became general of the armies of the state by his intrigues and eloquence. He took Thoron in Thrace, and after distinguishing himself in several engagements, he was killed at Amphipolis, in a battle with Brasidas the Spartan general, 422 B. C. Thucyd. 3, 4, &c.—Diod. 12.

Cleonĭca, a young virgin of Byzantium, whom Pausanias, king of Sparta, invited to his bed. She was introduced into his room when he was asleep, and unluckily overturned a burning lamp which was by the side of the bed. Pausanias was awakened at the sudden noise, and thinking it to be some assassin, he seized his sword, and killed Cleonica before he knew who it was. Paus. 7, c. 17.—Plut. in Cim.

Cleonȳmus, I. a son of Cleonemes 2d, who called Pyrrhus to his assistance, because Areus, his brother's son, had been preferred to him in the succession; but the measure was unpopular, and even the women united to repel the foreign prince. His wife was unfaithful to his bed, and committed adultery with Acrotatus. Plut. in Pyrrh.—Paus. 1, c. 3.——II A person so cowardly, that Cleonymo timidior became proverbial.

Cleŏpātra, I. the grand-daughter of Attalus, betrothed to Philip of Macedonia, after he had divorced Olympias. When Philip was murdered by Pausanias, Cleopatra was seized by order of Olympias, and put to death. Diod. 16.—Justin. 9, c. 7.—Plut. in Pyrrh.——II. A sister of Alexander the Great, who married Perdiccas, and was killed by Antigonus as she attempted to fly to Ptolemy in Egypt. Diod. 16 and 20.—Justin. 9, c. 6, l. 13, c. 6.——III. A wife of Tigranes, king of Armenia, sister of Mithridates. Justin. 38, c. 3.——IV. A daughter of Ptolemy Philometor, who married Alexander Bala, and afterwards Nicanor. She killed Seleucus, Nicanor's son, because he ascended the throne without her consent. She was suspected of preparing poison for Antiochus her son, and compelled to drink it herself, B. C. 120.——V. A wife and sister of Ptolemy Evergetes, who raised her son Alexander, a minor, to the throne of Egypt, in preference to his elder brother, Ptolemy Lathurus, whose interest the people favoured. As Alexander was odious, Cleopatra suffered Lathurus to ascend the throne, on condition, however, that he should repudiate his sister and wife, called Cleopatra, and married Seleuca, his younger sister. She afterwards raised her favourite, Alexander, to the throne; but her cruelties were so odious that he fled to avoid her tyranny. Cleopatra laid snares for him; and when Alexander heard it, he put her to death. Justin. 39, c. 3 and 4.——VI. A queen of Egypt, daughter of Ptolemy Auletes, and sister and wife to Ptolemy Dionysius, celebrated for her beauty and her cunning. She admitted Cæsar to her arms, to influence him to give her the kingdom in preference to her brother, who had expelled her, and had a son by him called Cæsarion. As she had supported Brutus, Antony, in his expedition to Parthia, summoned her to appear before him. She arrayed herself in the most magnificent apparel, and appeared before her judge in the most captivating attire. Her artifice succeeded: Antony, became enamoured of her, and publicly married her, forgetful of his connexion with Octavia, the sister of Augustus. He gave her the greatest part of the eastern provinces of the Roman empire. This behaviour was the cause of a rupture between Augustus and Antony; and these two celebrated Romans met at Actium, where Cleopatra, by flying with sixty sail, ruined the interest of Antony, and he was defeated. Cleopatra had retired to Egypt, where soon after Antony followed her. Antony killed himself upon the false information that Cleopatra was dead; and as his wound was not mortal, he was carried to the queen, who drew him up by a cord from one of the windows of the monument where she had retired and concealed herself. Antony soon after died of his wounds; and Cleopatra, after she had received pressing invitations from Augustus, and even pretended declarations of love, destroyed herself by the bite of an asp, not to fall into the conqueror's hands. Her beauty has been greatly commended, and her mental perfections so highly celebrated, that she has been described as capable of giving audience to the ambassadors of seven different nations, and of speaking their various languages as fluently as her own. In Antony's absence she improved the public library of Alexandria, with the addition of that of Pergamus. Two treatises, de medicamine faciei epistolæ eroticæ, and de morbis mulierum, have been falsely attributed to her. She died B. C. 30 years, after a reign of 21 years, aged 39. Egypt became a Roman province at her death. Flor. 4, c. 11.—Appian. 5, Bell. Civ.—Plut. in Pomp. & Ant.—Horat. 1, od. 37, v. 21, &c.—Strab. 17.

Cleophes, a queen of India, who submitted to Alexander, by whom, as some suppose, she had a son. Curt. 8, c. 10.

Cleophon, was contemporary with Critias. His style was perspicuous, but not elevated, and sometimes the addition of a lofty-sounding epithet to a trifling noun made it ridiculous. His characters were drawn with an accurate but unpoetic adherence to reality. Ten tragedies of his are enumerated by Suidas and Eudocia, and a piece called Μανδρόβουλος by Aristotle, from its name a comedy or other light poem.

Cleora, the wife of Agesilaus. Plut. in Ages.

Cleostratus, I. a youth devoted to be sacrificed to a serpent among the Thespians, &c. Paus. 9, c. 26.——II. An ancient philosopher and astronomer of Tenedos, about 536 years before Christ. He first found the constellations of the zodiac, and reformed the Greek calender.

Clesides, a Greek painter, about 276 years before Christ, who revenged the injuries he had received from queen Stratonice, by representing her in the arms of a fisherman. However indecent the painter might represent the queen, she was drawn with such personal beauty, that she preserved the piece and liberally rewarded the artist.

Clinias, I. a Pythagorean philosopher and musician, 520 years before the Christian era. Plut. Symp.—Ælian. V. H. 14, c. 23.——II. A son of Alcibiades, the bravest man in the Greecian fleet that fought against Xerxes. Herodot. 8, c. 7.——III. The father of Alcibiades, killed at the baule of Coronea. Plut. in Alc. ——IV. The father of Aratus, killed by Abantidas, B. C. 263. Plut. in Arat.

Clinus of Cos, was general of 7000 Greeks in the pay of king Nectanebus. He was killed with some of his troops, by Nicostratus and the Argives, as he passed the Nile. Diod. 16.

Clisthenes, I. the last tyrant of Sicyon. Aristot.——II. An Athenian, of the family of Alcmæon. It is said that he first established ostracism, and that he was the first who was banished by that institution. He banished Isagoras, and was himself soon after restored. Plut. in Arist.—Herodot. 5, c. 66, &c.

Clitarchus, I. a man who made himself absolute at Eretria, by means of Philip of Macedonia. He was ejected by Phocion.——II. An historian, who accompanied Alexander the Great, of whose life he wrote the history. Curt. 9, c. 5.

Clitomachus, a Carthaginian philosopher of the third academy, who was pupil and successor to Carneades at Athens, B. C. 128. Diog. in vitâ.

Clitus, I. a familiar friend and foster-brother of Alexander. He had saved the king's life in a bloody battle. Alexander killed him with a javelin, in a fit of anger, because, at a feast, he preferred the actions of Philip to those of his son. Alexander was inconsolable for the loss of a friend, whom he had sacrificed in the hour of drunkenness and dissipation. Justin. 12, c. 6.—Plut. in Alex.—Curt. 4, &c.——II. An officer sent by Antipater, with 240 ships, against the Athenians, whom he conquered near Echinades. Diod. 18.

Clodia, I. the wife of Lucullus, repudiated for her lasciviousness. Plut. in Lucull.——II. An opulent matron at Rome, mother of D. Brutus. Cic. ad. Attic.——III. A vestal virgin, who successfully repressed the rudeness of a tribune that attempted to stop the procession of her father in his triumph through the streets of Rome. Cic. pro M. Cæl.——IV. A woman who married Q. Metellus, and afterwards disgraced herself by her amours with Cœlius.

Clodia Lex, de Cypro, was enacted by the tribune Clodius, A. U. C. 695, to reduce Cyprus into a Roman province, and expose Ptolemy king of Egypt to sale in his regal ornaments. It empowered Cato to go with the prætorian power, and see the auction of the king's goods, and commissioned him to return the money to Rome.——Another, de Magistratibus, A. U. C. 695, by Clodius the tribune. It forbade the censors to put a stigma or mark of infamy upon any person who had not been actually accused and condemned by both the censors.——Another, de Religione, by the same, A. U. C. 696, to deprive the priest of Cybele, a native of Pessinus, of his office, and confer the priesthood upon Brotigonus, a Gallo-grecian.——Another, de Provinciis, A. U. C. 695, which nominated the provinces of Syria, Babylon, and Persia, to the consul Gabinus; and Achaia, Thessaly, Macedon, and Greece, to his colleague Piso, with pro-consular power. It empowered them to defray the expenses of their march from their public treasury.——Another, A. U. C. 695, which required the same distribution of corn among the people gratis, as had been given them before at six asses and a triens the bushel.——Another, A. U. C. 695, by the same, de Judiciis. It called to an account such as had executed a Roman citizen without a judgment of the people, and all the formalities of a trial.——Another, by the same, to pay no attention to the appearances of the heavens, while any affair was before the people. ——Another, to make the power of the tribunes free, in making and proposing laws.——Another, to re-establish the companies of artists, which had been instituted by Numa; but since his time abolished.

Clodius, Pb. a Roman descended from an illustrious family, and remarkable for his licentiousness, avarice, and ambition. He introduced himself in women's clothes into the house of J. Cæsar, whilst Pompeia, Cæsar's wife, of whom he was enamoured, was celebrating the mysteries of Ceres, where no man was permitted to appear. He was accused for this violation of human and divine laws; but he corrupted his judges, and by that means screened himself from justice. He descended from a patrician into a plebeian family to become a tribune. He was an enemy to Cato, and also to Cicero; and by his influence he banished him from Rome, partly on pretence that he had punished with death, and without trial, the adherents of Catiline. He wreaked his vengeance upon Cicero's house, which he burnt, and set all his goods to sale; which, however, to his great mortification, no one offered to buy. In spite of Clodius, Cicero was recalled, and all his goods restored to him. Clodius was some time after murdered by Milo, whose defence Cicero took upon himself. Plut. in Cic.—Appian. de Civ. 2.—Cic. pro Milon. & pro Domo.—Dio.

Cloelia, I. a Roman virgin, given with other maidens as hostages to Porsenna, king of Etruria. She escaped from her confinement, and swam across the Tiber to Rome. Her unprecedented virtue was rewarded by her countrymen with an equestrian statue in the Via Sa-era. Liv. 2, c. 13.—Virg. Æn. 8, v. 651.—Dionys. Hal. 5.—Juv. 8, v. 265.——II. A patrician family, descended from Cloelias, one of the companions of Æneas. Dionys.

Cloelius Gracchus, I. a general of the Volsci and Sabines against Rome, conquered by Q. Cincinnatus the dictator.——II. Tullus, a Roman ambassador put to death by Tolumnius, king of the Veientes.

Cluentius, a Roman citizen, accused by his mother of having murdered his father, 54 years B. C. He was ably defended by Cicero, in an oration still extant. The family of the Cluentii was descended from Cloanthus, one of the companions of Æneas. Virg. Æn. 5, v. 122.—Cic. pro Cluent.

Clusia, a daughter of an Etrurian king, of whom V. Torquatus, the Roman general, became enamoured. He asked her of her father, who slighted his addresses; upon which he besieged and destroyed his town. Clusia threw herself down from a high tower, and came to the ground unhurt. Plut. in Parall.

Clymēnus, a king of Orchomenos, son of Presbon, and father of Erginus, Stratius, Arrhon, and Axius. He received a wound from a stone thrown by a Theban, of which he died. His son Erginus, who succeeded him, made war against the Thebans to revenge his death. Paus. 9, c. 37.

Clytemnestra, a daughter of Tyndarus, king of Sparta, by Leda. She was born, together with her brother Castor, from one of the eggs which her mother brought forth after her amour with Jupiter, under the form of a swan. Clytemnestra married Agamemnon king of Argos. She had before married Tantalus, son of Thyestes, according to some authors. When Agamemnon went to the Trojan war, he left his cousin Ægysthus to take care of his wife, of his family, and all his domestic affairs. Besides this, a certain favourite musician was appointed by Agamemnon to watch over the conduct of the guardian as well as that of Clytemnestra. In the absence of Agamemnon, Ægysthus made his court to Clytemnestra, and publicly lived with her. Her infidelity reached the ears of Agamemnon before the walls of Troy, and he resolved to take full revenge upon the adulterers at his return. He was prevented from putting his schemes into execution; Clytemnestra, with her adulterer, murdered him at his arrival, as he came out of the bath, or, according to other accounts, as he sat down at a feast prepared to celebrate his happy return. After this murder, Clytemnestra publicly married Ægysthus, and he ascended the throne of Argos. Orestes, after an absence of seven years, returned to Mycenæ, resolved to avenge his father's murder. He concealed himself in the house of his sister Electra, who had been married by the adulterers to a person of mean extraction and indigent circumstances. His death was publicly announced; and when Ægysthus and Clytemnestra repaired to the temple of Apollo, to return thanks to the god for the death of the surviving son of Agamemnon, Orestes, who, with his faithful friend Pylades, had concealed himself in the temple, rushed upon the adulterers and killed them with his own hand. They were buried without the walls of the city, as their remains were deemed unworthy to be laid in the sepulchre of Agamemnon. Vid. Ægysthus, Agamemnon, Orestes, Electra. Diod. 4.—Homer. Od. 11.—Apollod. 3, c. 10.—Paus. 2, c. 18 and 23.—Euripid. Iphig. in Aul.—Hygin. fab. 117 and 140.—Propert. 3, el. 19.—Virg. Æn. 4, v. 471.—Philostr. Icon. 2, c. 9.

Cnemus, a Macedonian general, unsuccessful in an expedition against the Acarnanians. Diod. 12.—Thucyd 2, c. 66, &c.

Cneus, or Cnæus, a prænomen common to many Romans.

Cnopus, one of the descendants of Codrus, who went to settle a colony. Polyæn. 8.

Cocceius Nerva, I. a friend of Horace and Mecænas, and grandfather to the emperor Nerva. He was one of those who settled the disputes between Augustus and Antony. He afterwards accompanied Tiberius in his retreat in Campania, and starved himself to death. Tacit. Ann. 4, c. 58, and 6, c. 26.—Horat. 1, Sat. 5, v. 27.——II. An architect of Rome, one of whose buildings is still in being, the present cathedral of Naples.——III. A man to whom Nero granted a triumph, after the discovery of the Pisonian conspiracy. Tacit. 15, Ann. c. 72.

Cocles, Pub. Horat. a celebrated Roman, who, alone, opposed the whole army of Porsenna at the head of a bridge, while his companions behind him were cutting off the communication with the other shore. When the bridge was destroyed, Cocles, though severely wounded in the leg by the darts of the enemy, leapt into the Tiber, and swam across with his arms. A brazen statue was raised to him in the temple of Vulcan, by the consul Publicola, for his eminent services. He had the use only of one eye, as Cocles signifies. Liv. 2, c. 10.—Val. Max. 3, c. 2.—Virg. Æn. 8, v. 650.

Codomānus, a surname of Darius the third, king of Persia.

Codrīdæ, the descendants of Codrus, who went from Athens at the head of several colonies. Paus. 7, c. 2.

Codrus, I. the 17th and last king of Athens, son of Melanthus. When the Heraclidæ made war against Athens, the oracle declared that the victory would be granted to that nation whose king was killed in battle. The Heraclidæ upon this gave strict orders to spare the life of Codrus, but the patriotic king disguised himself, and attacked one of the enemy, by whom he was killed. The Athenians obtained the victory, and Codrus was deservedly called the father of his country. He reigned 22 years, and was killed 1070 years before the Christian era. To pay greater honour to his memory, the Athenians made a resolution that no man after Codrus should reign in Athens under the name of king, and therefore the government was put into the hands of perpetual archons. Paterc. 1, c. 2.—Justin. 2, c. 6 and 7.—Paus. 1, c. 19, l. 7, c. 25.—Val. Max. 5, c. 6.——II. Another, in the reign of Domitian, whose poverty became a proverb. Juv. 3, v. 203.

Cœlia, the wife of Sylla. Plut. in Syll. The Cœlian family, which was plebeian, but honoured with the consulship, was descended from Vibenna Cœles, an Etrurian, who came to settle at Rome in the age of Romulus.

Cœlius, I. a Roman, defended by Cicero.——II. Two brothers of Tarracina, accused of having murdered their father in his bed. They were acquitted, when it was proved that they were both asleep at the time of the murder. Val. Max. 8, c. 1.—Plut. in Cic.——III. A man who, after spending his all in dissipation and luxury, became a public robber with his friend Birrhus. Horat. 1, Sat. 4, v. 69.

Cœnus, an officer of Alexander, son-in-law to Parmenio. He died of a distemper, in his return from India. Curt. 9, c. 3.—Diod. 17.

Coes, a man of Mitylene, made sovereign master of his country by Darius. His countrymen stoned him to death. Herodot. 5, c. 11 and 38.

Cohors, a division in the Roman armies, consisting of about 600 men. It was the sixth part of a legion, and consequently its number was under the same fluctuations as that of the legions, being sometimes more, and sometimes less.

Colænus, a king of Attica, before the age of Cecrops, according to some accounts. Paus. 1, c. 31.

Collatinus, L. Tarquinius, a nephew of Tarquin the Proud, who married Lucretia, to whom Sext. Tarquin offered violence. He, with Brutus, drove the Tarquins from Rome, and were made first consuls. As he was one of the Tarquins, so much abominated by all the Roman people, he laid down his office of consul, and retired to Alba in voluntary banishment. Liv. 1, c. 57, l. 2, c. 2.—Flor. 1, c. 9.

Colo, Jun. a governor of Pontus, who brought Mithridates to the emperor Claudius. Tacit. 12, Ann. c. 21.

Colossus, a celebrated brazen image at Rhodes, which passed for one of the seven wonders of the world. Its feet were upon the two moles which formed the entrance of the harbour, and ships passed in full sail between its legs. It was 70 cubits, or 105 feet high, and every thing in equal proportion, and few could clasp round its thumb. It was the work of Chares, the disciple of Lysippus, and the artist was 12 years in making it. It was begun 300 years before Christ; and after it had remained unhurt during 56 or 58 years, it was partly demolished by an earthquake, 224 B. C. A winding staircase ran to the top, from which could easily be discerned the shores of Syria, and the ships that sailed on the coast of Egypt, by the help of glasses, which were hung on the neck of the statue. It remained in ruins for the space of 894 years; and the Rhodians, who had received several large contributions to repair it, divided the money among themselves, and frustrated the expectations of the donors, by saying that the oracle of Delphi forbade them to raise it up again from its ruins. In the year 672 of the Christian era, it was sold by the Saracens, who were masters of the island, to a Jewish merchant of Edessa, who loaded 900 camels with the brass, whose value has been estimated at 36,000 pounds English money.

Colotes, a Teian painter, disciple of Phidias. Plin. 36, c. 8.

Columella, (L. Jun. Moderatus) a native of Gades, who wrote, among other works, twelve books on agriculture, of which the tenth, on gardening, is in verse. The style is elegant, and the work displays the genius of a naturalist and the labours of an accurate observer. The best edition of Columella is that of Gesner, 2 vols. 4to. Lips. 1735, and reprinted there 1772.

Coluthus, a native of Lycopolis in Egypt, who wrote a short poem on the rape of Helen, in imitation of Homer. The composition remained long unknown, till it was discovered at Lycopolis, in the 15th century, by the learned cardinal Bessarion. Coluthus was, as some suppose, a contemporary of Tryphiodorus.

Cominius, (Q.) a Roman knight, who wrote some illiberal verses against Tiberius. Tacit. 4, Ann. c. 31.

Comitia, (orum,) an assembly of the Roman people. The word is derived from Comitium, the place where they were convened, quasi a cum eundo. The Comitium was a large hall, which was left uncovered at the top, in the first ages of the republic; so that the assembly was often dissolved in rainy weather. The Comitia were called, some consularia, for the election of the consuls; others prætoria, for the election of prætors, &c. These assemblies were more generally known by the name of Comitia, Curiata, Centuriata, and Tributa. The Curiata was when the people gave their votes by curiæ. The Centuriata were not convened in later times. (Vid. Centuria.) Another assembly was called Comitia Tributa, where the votes were received from the whole tribes together. At first the Roman people were divided only into three tribes; but as their numbers increased, the tribes were at last swelled to 35. The object of these assemblies was the electing of magistrates, and all the public officers of state. They could be dissolved by one of the tribunes, if he differed in opinion from the rest of his colleagues. If one among the people was taken with the falling sickness, the whole assembly was immediately dissolved; whence that disease is called morbis comitalis. After the custom of giving their votes vivâ voce had been abolished, every one of the assembly, in the enacting of a law, was presented with two ballots, on one of which were the letters U. R. that is, uti rogas, be it as it is required: on the other was an A, that is, antiquo, which bears the same meaning as antiquam volo, I forbid it, the old law is more preferable. If the number of ballots with U. R. was superior to the A's the law was approved constitutionally; if not, it was rejected. Only the chief magistrates, and sometimes the pontifices, had the privilege of convening these assemblies. There were only these eight of the magistrates who had the power of proposing a law, the consuls, the dictator, the prætor, the interrex, the decemvirs, the military tribunes, the kings, and the triumvirs. These were called majores magistratus: to whom one of the minores magistratus was added, the tribune of the people.

Comius, a man appointed king over the Atrebates, by J. Cæsar, for his services. Cæs. Bell. G. 4, c. 21.

Commodus, (L. Aurelius Antoninus) son of M. Antoninus, succeeded his father in the Roman empire. He was naturally cruel, and fond of indulging his licentious propensities; and regardless of the instructions of philosophers and of the decencies of nature, he corrupted his own sisters, and kept 300 women, and as many boys, for his illicit pleasures. Desirous to be called Hercules, like that hero, he adorned his shoulders with a lion's skin, and armed his hand with a knotted club. He showed himself naked in public, and fought with the gladiators, and boasted of his dexterity in killing the wild beasts in the amphitheatre. He required divine honours from the senate, and they were granted, He was wont to put such an immense quantity of gold dust in his hair, that when he appeared bareheaded in the sunshine, his head glittered as if surrounded with sunbeams. Martia, one of his concubines, whose death he had prepared, poisoned him; but as the poison did not quickly operate, he was strangled by a wrestler. He died in the 31st year of his age, and the 13th of his reign, A. D. 192. It has been observed, that he never trusted himself to a barber, but always burnt his beard in imitation of the tyrant Dionysius. Herodian.

Compĭtălia, festivals celebrated by the Romans the 12th of January and the 6th of March, in the cross ways, in honour of the household gods called Lares. Tarquin the Proud, or, according to some, Servius Tullius, instituted them, on account of an oracle which ordered him to offer heads to the Lares. He sacrificed to them human victims; but J. Brutus, after the expulsion of the Tarquins, thought it sufficient to offer them only poppy heads and men of straw. The slaves were generally the ministers, and, during the celebration, they enjoyed their freedom. Varro. de L. L. 5, c. 3.—Ovid. Fast. 5, v. 140.—Dionys. Hal. 4.

Conetodūnus and Cotuatus, two desperate Gauls, who raised their countrymen against Rome, &c. Cæs. Bell. G. 7, c. 3.

Confucius, a Chinese philosopher, as much honoured among his countrymen as a monarch. He died about 479 years B. C.

Conon, I. a famous general of Athens, son of Timotheus. He was made governor of all the islands of the Athenians, and was defeated in a naval battle by Lysander, near the Ægospotamos. He retired in voluntary banishment to Evagoras, king of Cyprus, and afterwards to Artaxerxes king of Persia, by whose assistance he freed his country from slavery. He defeated the Spartans near Cnidos, in an engagement where Pisander, the enemy's admiral, was killed. By his means the Athenians fortified their city with a strong wall, and attempted to recover Ionia and Æolia. He was perfidiously betrayed by a Persian, and died in prison, B. C. 393. C. Nep. in vitâ.—Plut. in Lys. & Artax.—Isocrates.——II. A Greek astronomer of Samos, who, to gain the favour of Ptolemy Evergetes, publicly declared that the queen's locks, which had been dedicated in the temple of Venus, and had since disappeared, were become a constellation. He was intimate with Archimedes, and flourished 247 B. C. Catul. 67.—Virg. Ecl. 3, v. 40.——III. A Grecian mythologist, in the age of Julius Cæsar, who wrote a book which contained 40 fables, still extant, preserved by Photius.——There was a treatise written on Italy by a man of the same name.

Considius Æquus, I. a Roman knight, &c. Tacit.——II. Caius, one of Pompey's adherents, &c. Cæs Bell. Civ. 2, c. 23.

Constans, a son of Constantine. Vid. Constantinus.

Constantia, a grand-daughter of the great Constantine, who married the emperor Gratian.

Constantĭnus, I. surnamed the Great, from the greatness of his exploits, was son of Constantius. As soon as he became independent, he assumed the title of Augustus, and made war against Licinius, his brother-in-law and colleague on the throne, because he was cruel and ambitious. He conquered him, and obliged him to lay aside the imperial power. It is said, that as he was going to fight against Maxentius, one of his rivals, he saw a cross in the sky, with this inscription, ἐν τούτῳ νίκα, in hoc vince. From this circumstance he became a convert to Christianity, and obtained an easy victory, ever after adopting a cross or labarum as his standard. After the death of Diocletian, Maximian, Maxentius, Maximinus, and Licinius, who had reigned together, though in a subordinate manner, Constantine became sole emperor, and began to reform the state. He founded a city where old Byzantium formerly stood, and called it by his own name, Constantinopolis. Thither he transported part of the Roman senate; and by keeping his court there, he made it the rival of Rome in population and magnificence. From that time the two imperial cities began to look upon each other with an eye of envy; and soon after the age of Constantine, a separation was made of two empires, and Rome was called the capital of the western, and Constantinopolis was called the capital of the eastern dominions of Rome. The emperor has been distinguished for personal courage, and praised for the protection he extended to the Christians. He at first persecuted the Arians, but afterwards inclined to their opinions. His murder of his son Crispus has been deservedly censured. By removing the Roman legions from the garrisons on the rivers, he opened an easy passage to the barbarians, and rendered his soldiers unwarlike. He defeated 100,000 Goths, and received into his territories 300,000 Sarmatians, who had been banished by their slaves, and allowed them land to cultivate. Constantine was learned, and preached, as well as composed, many sermons, one of which remains. He died A. D. 337, after a reign of 31 years of the greatest glory and success. He left three sons, Constantinus, Constans, and Constantius, among whom he divided his empire. The first, who had Gaul, Spain, and Britain, for his portion, was conquered by the armies of his brother Constans, and killed in the 25th year of his age, A. D. 340. Magnentius, the governor of the provinces of Rhætia, murdered Constans in his bed, after a reign of 13 years over Italy, Africa, and Illyricum; and Constantius, the only surviving brother, now became the sole emperor, A. D. 353, punished his brother's murderer, and gave way to cruelty and oppression. He visited Rome, where he displayed a triumph, and died in his march against Julian, who had been proclaimed independent emperor by his soldiers.—The name of Constantine was very common to the emperors of the east in a later period. ——II. A private soldier in Britain, raised on account of his name to the imperial dignity.——III. A general of Belisarius.

Constantius Chlorus, I. son of Eutropius, and father of the great Constantine, merited the title of Cæsar, which he obtained, by his victories in Britain and Germany. He became the colleague of Galerius on the abdication of Dio-cletian; and after bearing the character of a humane and benevolent prince, he died at York, and made his son his successor, A. D. 306.—II. The second son of Constantine the Great. Vid. Constantinus.—III. The father of Julian and Gallus, was son of Constantius by Theodora, and died A. D. 337.—IV. A Roman general of Nyssa, who married Placidia, the sister of Honorius, and was proclaimed emperor, an honour he enjoyed only seven months. He died, universally regretted, 421 A. D. and was succeeded by his son Valentinian in the west.

Consuales Ludi, or Consualia, festivals at Rome in honour of Consus, the god of counsel, whose altar Romulus discovered under the ground. This altar was always covered, except at the festival, when a mule was sacrificed, and games and horseraces exhibited in honour of Neptune. It was during these festivals that Romulus carried away the Sabine women who had assembled to be spectators of the games. They were first instituted by Romulus. Some say, however, that Romulus only regulated and re-instituted them after they had been before established by Evander. During the celebration, which happened about the middle of August, horses, mules, and asses, were exempted from all labours, and were led through the streets adorned with garlands and flowers. Auson. 69, v. 9.—Ovid. Fast. 3, v. 199.—Liv. 1, c. 9.—Dionys. Hal.

Consul, a magistrate at Rome, with regal authority for the space of one year. There were two consuls, a consulendo, annually chosen in the Campus Martius. The two first consuls were L. Jun. Brutus, and L. Tarquinius Collatinus, chosen A. U. C. 244, after the expulsion of the Tarquins. In the first ages of the republic, the two consuls were always chosen from patrician families or noblemen; but the people obtained the privilege, A. U. C. 388, of electing one of the consuls from their own body; and sometimes both were plebeians. The first consul among the plebeians was L. Sextius. It was required that every candidate for the consulship should be 43 years of age, called legitimum tempus. He was always to appear at the election as a private man, without a retinue; and it was requisite, before he canvassed for the office, to have discharged the inferior functions of quæstor, edile, and prætor. Sometimes these qualifications were disregarded. Val. Corvinus was made a consul in his 23d year, and Scipio in his 24th. Young Marius, Pompey, and Augustus, were also under the proper age when they were invested with the office, and Pompey had never been quæstor or prætor. The power of the consuls was unbounded, and they knew no superior but the gods and the laws: but after the expiration of their office, their conduct was minutely scrutinized by the people, and misbehaviour was often punished by the laws. The badge of their office was the prætexta, a robe fringed with purple, afterwards exchanged for the toga picta or palmata. They were preceded by 12 lictors, carrying the fasces or bundle of sticks, in the middle of which appeared an axe. The axe, being the characteristic rather of tyranny than of freedom, was taken away from the fasces by Valerius Publicola, but it was restored by his successor. The consuls took it by turns, monthly, to be preceded by the lictors while at Rome, lest the appearance of two persons with the badges of royal authority should raise apprehensions in the multitude. While one appeared publicly in state, only a crier walked before the other, and the lictors followed behind without the fasces. Their authority was equal; yet the Valerian law gave the right of priority to the older, and the Julian law to him who had the most children, and he was generally called consul major or prior. As their power was absolute, they presided over the senate, and could convene and dismiss it at pleasure. The senators were their counsellors; and among the Romans, the manner of reckoning their years was by the name of the consuls; and by M Tull. Cicerone & L. Antonio Consulibus, for instance, the year of Rome 691 was always understood. This custom lasted from the year of Rome 244 till the year 1294, or 541st year of the Christian era, when the consular office was totally suppressed by Justinian. In public assemblies the consuls sat in ivory chairs, and held in their hands an ivory wand, called scipio eburneus, which had an eagle on its top, as a sign of dignity and power. When they had drawn by lot the provinces over which they were to preside during their consulship, they went to the capitol to offer their prayers to the gods, and entreat them to protect the republic: after this they departed from the city, arrayed in their military dress, and preceded by the lictors. Sometimes the provinces were assigned them, without drawing by lot, by the will and appointment of the senators. At their departure, they were provided by the state with whatever was requisite during their expedition. In their provinces they were both attended by the 12 lictors, and equally invested with legal authority. They were not permitted to return to Rome without the special command of the senate, and they always remained in the province till the arrival of their successor. At their return they harangued the people, and solemnly protested that they had done nothing against the laws or interests of their country, but had faithfully and diligently endeavoured to promote the greatness and welfare of the state. No man could be consul two following years, yet this institution was sometimes broken; and we find Marius re-elected consul, after the expiration of his office, during the Cimbrian war. The office of consul, so dignified during the times of the commonwealth, became a mere title under the emperors, and retained nothing of its authority but the useless ensigns of original dignity. Even the office of consul, which was originally annual, was reduced to two or three months by J. Cæsar: but they who were admitted on the first of January denominated the year, and were called ordinarii. Their successors, during the year, were distinguished by the name of suffecti. Tiberius and Claudius abridged the time of the consulship, and the emperor Commodus made no less than 25 consuls in one year. Constantine the Great renewed the original institution, and permitted them to be a whole year in office. The two first consuls, A. U. C. 244, were L. Jun. Brutus and L. Tarq. Collatinus. Collatinus retired from Rome, and Pub. Valerius was chosen in his room. When Brutus was killed in battle, Sp. Lucretius was elected to succeed him; and after the death of Lucretius, Marcus Horatius was chosen for the rest of the year with Valerius Publicola. The first consulship lasted about 16 months, during which the Romans fought against the Tarquins, and the capitol was dedicated. From the time of Augustus the consular authority may be considered at an end, though consuls continued to be elected till the latest days of the empire. The Italians always retained a fondness for this name, and the principal officers of the republics of the middle ages were generally called consuls.

Corax, an ancient rhetorician of Sicily, who first demanded salary of his pupils. Cic. in Brut. 12, de orat. 1, c. 20.—Aul. Gell. 5, c. 10.—Quintil. 3, c. 1.

Corbŭlo, (Domitius,) a prefect of Belgium, who, when governor of Syria, routed the Parthians, destroyed Artaxata, and made Tigranes king of Armenia. Nero, jealous of his virtues, ordered him to be murdered; and Corbulo, hearing this, fell upon his sword, exclaiming, I have well deserved this! A. D. 66. His name was given to a place (Monumentum) in Germany, which some suppose to be modern Groningen. Tacit. Ann. 11, c. 18.

Cordus. Vid. Cremutius.

Corinna, I. a celebrated woman of Tanagra, near Thebes, disciple to Myrtis. Her father's name was Archelodorus. It is said that she obtained five times a poetical prize, in which Pindar was her competitor; but it must be acknowledged that her beauty greatly contributed to defeat her rivals. She had composed 50 books of epigrams and odes, of which only some few verses remain. Propert. 2, el. 3.—Paus. 9, c. 22.——II. Corinna, a wanton, enticing beauty, whose real name and family the commentators and biographers have ineffectually laboured to discover. From the elegies of Ovid, it appears that she was a married woman, but it does not seem to have been known even at Rome in the poet's time, who the lady was that he sung under that fictitious name; and others than the true Corinna advanced their vain pretensions to the celebrity which his verses conferred. It is quite improbable that Corinna denoted Julia, the daughter of Augustus, and impossible that she represented Julia his grand-daughter, who was but an infant when Ovid recorded his amours with Corinna. It is evident, however, that she was a lady of some distinction, and of a rank superior to his own. She was attended not only by a waiting-maid, but a watchful eunuch. The poet compares her to Semiramis, and speaks of her condescension towards him as resembling that of the goddess Calypso in loving Ulysses. Corinna, whoever she may have been, always held the first place among his mistresses, and his passion for her is the chief subject of his amatory poems. But even she, with all her charms and fascinations, was compelled to share his affections not only with the legal partners of his heart, but with her own attendant; which, however, he perhaps justified, as one of the arts practised for gaining the affections of the mistress.

Corinnus, an ancient poet in the time of the Trojan war, on which he wrote a poem. Homer, as some suppose, took his subject from the poem of Corinnus.

Cornelianus, the surname of C. Martius, from his victory over Corioli. When master of the place, he accepted, as the only reward, the surname of Coriolanus, a horse, and prisoners, and his ancient host, to whom he immediately gave his liberty. After a number of military exploits, and many services to his country, he was refused the consulship by the people, when his scars had for a while influenced them in his favour. This raised his resentment; and when the Romans had received a present of corn from Gelo, king of Sicily, Coriolanus insisted that it should be sold for money and not be given gratis. Upon this the tribunes raised the people against him, and even wished to put him to death. This rigorous sentence was stopped by the influence of the senators, and Coriolanus submitted to a trial. He was banished by a majority of three tribes, and he immediately retired among the Volsci, to Tullus Aufidius, his greatest enemy, from whom he met a most friendly reception. He advised him to make war against Rome, and he marched at the head of the Volsci as general. The approach of Coriolanus greatly alarmed the Romans, who sent him several embassies to reconcile him to his country and to solicit his return. He was deaf to all proposals, and bade them prepare for war. He pitched his camp only at the distance of five miles from the city; and his enmity against his country would have been fatal, had not his mother Volumnia, and his wife Vergilia, been prevailed upon by the Romon matrons to go and appease his resentment. The meeting of Coriolanus with his family was tender and affecting. He remained long inexorable; but at last the tears and entreaties of a mother and a wife prevailed over the stern and obstinate resolutions of an enemy, and Coriolanus marched the Volsci from the neighbourhood of Rome. To show their sense of Volumnia's merit and patriotism, the Romans dedicated a temple to Female Fortune. The behaviour of Coriolanus, however, displeased the Volsci. He was summoned to appear before the people of Antium, and was murdered on the place appointed for his trial, B. C. 488. His body was honoured with a magnificent funeral by the Volsci, and the Roman matrons put on mourning for his loss. Some historians say that he died in exile, in an advanced old age. Plut. in vitâ.—Flor. 2, c. 22.

Cornelia Lex, de Civitate, was enacted A. U. C. 670, by L. Corn. Sylla. It confirmed the Sulpician law, and required that the citizens of the eight newly elected tribes should be divided among the 35 ancient tribes.——Another, de Judiciis, A. U. C. 673, by the same. It ordained that the prætor should always observe the same invariable method in judicial proceedings, and that the process should not depend upon his will.——Another, de Sumptibus, by the same. It limited the expenses which generally attended funerals.——Another, de Religione, by the same, A. U. C. 677. It restored to the college of priests the privilege of choosing the priests, which, by the Domitian law, had been lodged in the hands of the people.——Another, de Municipiis, by the same; which revoked all the privileges which had been some time before granted to the several towns that had assisted Marius and Cinna in the civil wars.——Another, de Magistratibus, by the same; which gave the power of bearing honours and being promoted before the legal age, to those who had followed the interest of Sylla, while the sons and partisans of his enemies, who had been proscribed, were deprived of the privilege of standing for any office of the state. ——Another, de Magistratibus, by the same, A. U. C. 673. It ordained that no person should exercise the same office within ten years' distance, or be invested with two different magistracies in one year.——Another, de Magistratibus, A. U. C. 673. It divested the tribunes of the privilege of making laws, interfering, holding assemblies, and receiving appeals. All such as had been tribunes were incapable of holding any other office in the state by that law. ——Another, de Majestate, by the same, A. U. C. 670. It made it treason to send an army out of a province, or engage in a war without orders, to influence the soldiers to spare or ransom a captive general of the enemy, to pardon the leaders of robbers or pirates, or for the absence of a Roman citizen to a foreign court, without previous leave. The punishment was aquæ et ignis interdictio.——Another, by the same, which gave the power to a man accused of murder, either by poison, weapons, or false accusations, and the setting fire to buildings, to choose whether the jury that tried him should give their verdict clam or palam vivâ voce, or by ballots.——Another, by the same, which made it aquæ et ignis interdictio to such as were guilty of forgery, concealing and altering of wills, corruption, false accusations, and the debasing or counterfeiting of the public coin; all such as were accessary to this offence, were deemed as guilty as the offender.——Another, de pecuniis repetundis, by which a man convicted of peculation or extortion in the provinces, was condemned to suffer the aquæ et ignis interdictio.—— Another, by the same, which gave the power to such as were sent into the provinces with any government, of retaining their command and appointment without a renewal of it by the senate, as was before observed.——Another, by the same, which ordained that the lands of proscribed persons, should be common, especially those about Volaterræ and Fesulæ in Etruria, which Sylla divided among his soldiers.—— Another, by C. Cornelius, tribune of the people, A. U. C. 686; which ordained that no person should be exempted from any law, according to the general custom, unless 200 senators were present in the senate; and no person thus exempted, could hinder the bill of his exemption from being carried to the people for their concurrence.——Another, by Nasica, A. U. C. 582, to make war against Perseus, son of Philip, king of Macedonia, if he did not give proper satisfaction to the Roman people.

Cornēlia, I. a daughter of Cinna, who was the first wife of J. Cæsar. She became mother of Julia, Pompey's wife, and was so affectionately loved by her husband, that at her death he pronounced a funeral oration over her body. Plut. in Cæs.——II. A daughter of Metellus Scipio, who married Pompey after the death of her husband P. Crassus. She has been praised for her great virtues. Plut. in Pomp.——III. A daughter of Scipio Africanus, who married Sempronius Gracchus, and was the mother of Tiberius and Caius Gracchus. She was courted by a king, but she preferred being the wife of a Roman citizen to that of a monarch. Her virtues have been deservedly commended, as well as the wholesome principles she inculcated in her two sons. When a Campanian lady made once a show of her jewels at Cornelia's house, and entreated her to favour her with a sight of her own, Cornelia produced her two sons, saying, These are the only jewels of which I can boast. A statue was raised to her, with this inscription, Cornelia mater Gracchorum. Some of her epistles are preserved. Plut. in Gracch.—Juv. 6, v. 167.—Val. Max. 4, c. 4.—Cic. in Brut. 58, de El. Or. 58.

Cornēlii, Cossus, I. a military tribune during the time that there were no consuls in the republic. He offered to Jupiter the spoils called opima. Liv. 4, c. 19.——II. Scipio, a man appointed master of the horse, by Camillus, when dictator.——III. C. Nepos, an historian. Vid. Nepos.——IV. Merula, a consul, sent against the Boii in Gaul. He killed 1400 of them. His grandson followed the interest of Sylla; and when Marius entered the city, he killed himself by opening his veins.——V. Severus, an epic poet in the age of Augustus, of great genius. He wrote a poem on mount Ætna, and on the death of Cicero. Quintil. 10, v. 1.——VI. Aur. Celsus, wrote eight books on medicine, still extant, and highly valued.——VII. Cn. and Publ. Scipio. Vid. Scipio.

Cornificius, I. a poet and general in the age of Augustus, employed to accuse Brutus, &c. His sister Cornificia was also blessed with a poetical genius. Plut. in Brut.——II. A lieutenant of J. Cæsar. Id. in Cæs.——III. A friend of Cicero and his colleague in the office of augur.

Cornūtus, I. A stoic philosopher of Africa, preceptor to Persius, the satirist. He wrote some treatises on philosophy and rhetoric. Pers. 5, v. 36.——II. A Roman, saved from the proscription of Marius by his servants, who hung a dead man in his room, and said it was their master. Plut. in Mario.

Corœbus, I. a Phrygian, son of Mygdon and Anaximena. He assisted Priam in the Trojan war, with the hopes of being rewarded with the hand of Cassandra. Cassandra advised him in vain to retire from the war. He was killed by Peneleus. Paus. 10, c. 27.—Virg. Æn. 2, v. 341, &c.——II. A courier of Elis, killed by Neoptolemus. He obtained a prize at Olympia, B. C. 776, in the 28th olympiad, from the institution of Iphitus; but this year has generally been called the first olympiad. Paus. 5, c. 8.

Corvinus, I. a name given to M. Valerius from a crow, which assisted him when he was fighting against a Gaul.——II. Messala, an eloquent orator in the Augustan age, distinguished for integrity and patriotism, yet ridiculed for his frequent quotations of Greek in his orations. In his old age he became so forgetful as not even to remember his own name.

Coruncānus, T. the first plebeian who was made high-priest at Rome.——The family of the Coruncani was famous for the number of great men which it supplied for the service of the republic. Cic. pro Domo.

Cossus, a surname given to the family of the Cornelii.——A Roman, who killed Volumnius, king of Veii, and obtained the Spolia Opima, A. U. C. 317. Virg. Æn. 6, v. 841.

Cossutii, a family at Rome, of which Cossutia, Cæsar's wife, was descended. Suet. in Cæs. 1.—One of the family was distinguished as an architect about 200 B. C. He first introduced into Italy the more perfect models of Greece.

Cŏtĭso, a king of the Daci, whose army invaded Pannonia, and was defeated by Corn. Lentulus, the lieutenant of Augustus. It is said that Augustus solicited his daughter in marriage. Suet. in Aug. 63.—Horat. 3, od. 8, v. 18.

Cotta, M. Aurelius, I. a Roman who opposed Marius. He was consul with Lucullus; and when in Asia, he was defeated by sea and land by Mithridates. He was surnamed Pontĭcus, because he took Heraclea of Pontus by treachery. Plut. in Lucull.——II. An orator, greatly commended by Cicero de Orat. In his manner he was soft and relaxed; but every thing he said was sober, and in good taste, and he often led the judges to the same conclusion to which Sulpicius impelled them. "No two things," says Cicero, "were ever more unlike than they are to each other. The one, in a polite, delicate manner, sets forth his subject in well-chosen expressions. He still keeps to his point; and, as he sees with the greatest penetration what he has to prove to the court, he directs to that the whole strength of his reasoning and eloquence, without regarding other arguments. But Sulpicius, endued with irresistible energy, with a full strong voice, with the greatest vehemence and dignity of action, accompanied with so much weight and variety of expression, seemed, of all mankind, the best fitted by nature for eloquence." It was supposed that Cotta wished to resemble Antony, as Sulpicius obviously imitated Crassus; but the latter wanted the agreeable pleasantry of Crassus, and the former the force of Antony. None of the orations of Sulpicius remained in the time of Cicero—those circulated under his name have been written by Canutius after his death. The oration of Cotta for himself, when accused on the Varian law, was composed, it is said, at his request by Lucius Ælius; and, if this be true, nothing can appear to us more extraordinary, than that so accomplished a speaker as Cotta should have wished any of the trivial harangues of Ælius to pass for his own.

Cotys, I. a king of Thrace, who divided the kingdom with his uncle, by whom he was killed. It is the same to whom Ovid writes from his banishment. Tacit. 2, Ann. 64.—Ovid. 2, de Pont. ep. 9.——II. A king of Armenia Minor, who fought against Mithridates in the age of Claudius. Tacit. Ann. 11 and 13.

Cranaus, the second king of Athens, who succeeded Cecrops, and reigned nine years, B. C. 1497. Paus. 1, c. 2.

Crantor, a philosopher of Soli.

Crassus, I. a grandfather of Crassus the Rich, who never laughed. Plin. 7, c. 19.——II. Publ. Licinius, a Roman high-priest, about 131 years B. C., who went into Asia with an army against Aristonicus, where he was killed, and buried at Smyrna.——III. M. Licinius, a celebrated Roman, surnamed Rich on account of his opulence. The cruelties of Cinna obliged him to leave Rome, and he retired to Spain. After Cinna's death he passed into Africa, and thence to Italy, where he served Sylla, and ingratiated himself in his favour. When the gladiators, with Spartacus at their head, had spread a universal alarm in Italy, and defeated some of the Roman generals, Crassus was sent against them. A battle was fought, in which Crassus slaughtered 12,000 of the slaves, and by this decisive blow he soon put an end to the war, and was honoured with an ovatio at his return. He was soon after made consul with Pompey; and in this high office he displayed his opulence, by entertaining the populace at 10,000 tables. He was afterwards censor, and formed the first triumvirate with Pompey and Cæsar. As his love of riches was more predominant than that of glory, Crassus never imitated the ambitious conduct of his colleagues, but was satisfied with the province of Syria, which seemed to produce an inexhaustible source of wealth. With hopes of enlarging his possessions he set off from Rome, though the omens proved unfavourable, and every thing seemed to threaten his ruin. He crossed the Euphrates, and, forgetful of the rich cities of Babylon and Seleucia, he hastened to make himself master of Parthia. He was betrayed in his march by the delay of Artavasdes, king of Armenia, and the perfidy of Ariamnes. He was met in a large plain by Surena, the general of the forces of Orodes, king of Parthia; and a battle was fought, in which 20,000 Romans were killed, and 10,000 taken prisoners. The darkness of the night favoured the escape of the rest, and Crassus, forced by the mutiny and turbulence of his soldiers, and the treachery of his guides, trusted himself to the general of the enemy, on pretence of proposing terms of accommodation, and he was put to death, B. C. 53. His head was cut off, and sent to Orodes, who poured melted lead down his throat, and insulted his misfortunes. The firmness with which Crassus received the news of his son's death, who perished in that expedition, has been deservedly commended; and the words that he uttered when he surrendered himself into the hands of Surena, equally claim our admiration. He was wont often to say, that no man ought to be accounted rich if he could not maintain an army. Though he has been called avaricious, yet he showed himself always ready to lend money to his friends without interest. He was fond of philosophy, and his knowledge of history was great and extensive. Plutarch has written his life. Flor. 3, c. 11.——IV. Publius, the son of the rich Crassus, went into Parthia with his father. When he saw himself surrounded by the enemy, and without any hope of escape, he ordered one of his men to run him through. His head was cut off, and shown with insolence to his father by the Parthians. Plut. in Crass.——V. L. Licinius, a celebrated Roman orator, commended by Cicero, and introduced in his book de Oratore as the principal speaker.——VI. A son of Crassus the Rich, killed in the civil wars, after Cæsar's death.

Cratĕrus, I. one of Alexander's generals. He rendered himself conspicuous by his literary fame, as well as by his valour in the field, and wrote the history of Alexander's life. He was greatly respected and loved by the Macedonian soldiers, and Alexander always trusted him with unusual confidence. After Alexander's death, he subdued Greece with Antipater, and passed with his colleague into Asia, where he was killed in a battle against Eumenes, B. C. 321. He had received for his share of Alexander's kingdoms, Greece and Epirus. Nep. in Eumen. 2. —Justin. 12 and 13.—Curt. 3.—Arrian.—Plut. in Alex.——II. An Athenian, who collected into one body all the decrees which had passed in the public assemblies at Athens.

Crates, I. a philosopher of Bœotia, son of Ascondus and disciple of Diogenes the cynic, B. C. 324. He sold his estates, and gave the money to his fellow-citizens. He was naturally deformed, and he rendered himself more hideous by sewing sheepskins to his mantle, and by the singularity of his manners. He clothed himself as warm as possible in the summer; but in the winter his garments were uncommonly thin, and incapable to resist the inclemency of the season. Hipparchia, the sister of a philosopher, became enamoured of him; and, as he could not cool her passion by representing himself as poor and deformed, he married her. Some of his letters are extant. Diog. in vitâ.——II. A stoic, son of Timocrates, who opened a school at Rome, where he taught grammar. Sueton.——III. A native of Pergamus, who wrote an account of the most striking events of every age, B. C. 165. Ælian. de Anim. 17, c. 9.——IV. A philosopher of Athens, who succeeded in the school of his master Polemon.——V. He was originally an actor, and performed the principal parts in the plays of Cratinus. Afterwards, about B. C. 450, he began to compose comedies himself. Crates, according to Aristotle, was the first Athenian poet who abandoned the iambic or satiric form of comedy, and made use of invented and general stories or fables. Perhaps the law, mentioned below (Vid. Cratinus) might have some share in giving his plays this less offensive turn. His style is said to have been gay and facetious; yet the few fragments of his writings which remain are of a serious cast. From the expressions of Aristophanes, in the parabasis of the Equites, the comedies of Crates seem to have been marked by elegance of language and ingenious ideas. Yet, with all his endeavours to please his fastidious authors, the poet had, in common with his rivals, to endure many contumelies and vexations. He nevertheless, with unwearied resolution, continued to compose and exhibit during a varied career of success and reverses.

Cratinus, the son of Callimedes, an Athenian, was born Olymp. 65th, 2, B. C. 519. It was not till late in life that he directed his attention to comic composition. The first piece of his on record is the Ἀρχίλοχοι, which was represented about Olymp. 83d, B. C. 448; at which time he was in his 71st year. Soon after this, comedy became so licentious and virulent in its personalities, that the magistracy were obliged to interfere. A decree was passed, Olymp. 85th, 1, B. C. 440, prohibiting the exhibitions of comedy; which law continued in force only during that year and the two following, being repealed in the archonship of Euthymenes. Three victories of Cratinus stand recorded after the recommencement of comic performances. With the Χειμαζόμενοι he was second, B. 425, when the Ἀχαρνῆς of Aristophanes won the prize, and the third place was adjudged to the Νουμηνίαι of Eupolis. In the succeeding year he was again second with the Σάτυροι, and Aristophanes again first with the Ἱππῆς. In a parabasis of this play, that young rival makes mention of Cratinus; where, after having noticed his former successes, he insinuates under the cloak of an equivocal pity, that the veteran was become doting and superannuated. The old man, now in his 95th year, indignant at this insidious attack, exerted his remaining vigour, and composed against the contests of the following season a comedy entitled Πυτίνη, or The Flagon, which turned upon the accusations brought against him by Aristophanes. The aged dramatist had a complete triumph. He was first; whilst his humbled antagonist was also vanquished by Ameipsias with the Κόννις, though the play of Aristophanes was his favourite Νεφέλαι. Notwithstanding his notorious excesses, Cratinus lived to an extreme old age, dying B. C. 422, in his 97th year. The titles of 38 of his comedies have been collected by Meursius, Kœnig, &c. His style was bold and animated; and, like his younger brethren, Eupolis and Aristophanes, he fearlessly and unsparingly directed his satire against the iniquitous public officer and the profligate of private life. Nor yet are we to suppose that the comedies of Cratinus and his contemporaries contained nothing beyond broad jests or coarse invective and lampoon. They were, on the contrary, marked by elegance of expression and purity of language; elevated sometimes into philosophical dignity by the sentiments which they introduced, and graced with many a passage of beautiful idea and high poetry: so that Quinctilian deems the Old comedy, after Homer, the most fitting and beneficial object for a young pleader's study. In short, the character of this stage in the comic drama cannot be more happily defined than by the words of the chorus in the Ranæ; its duty was—

> πεῖν πολλὰ δὲ σπουδαῖα.—389.

Cratippus, I. a philosopher of Mitylene, who, among others, taught Cicero's son at Athens. After the battle of Pharsalia, Pompey visited the house of Cratippus, where their discourse chiefly turned upon Providence, which the warrior blamed and the philosopher defended. Phil. in Pomp.—Cic. in Offic. 1.——II. An historian contemporary with Thucydides: Dionys. Hal.

Cratylus, a philosopher, preceptor to Plato after Socrates.

Cremutius Cordus. He wrote during the reign of Augustus, and is said to have read to that prince a history, in which he styled Brutus and Cassius the last of the Romans. Augustus did not take pleasure, like Caligula or Nero, in cruel or arbitrary acts; and he was so skilful a politician, that he never, like Tiberius, suspected a plot or apprehended a danger, when none in fact existed. He knew that his throne was then too firmly established to be shaken by the empty echoes of liberty, and he heard, perhaps, with secret satisfaction, that Brutus and Cassius would have no successors among his subjects. The writings of Cordus, however, were suppressed under the reign of Tiberius; but his daughter Marcia saved a copy which was extant in the time of Seneca. The appellation of the last of the Romans which he bestowed on Brutus and Cassius, was made the pretext of a capital charge during the administration of Sejanus, who had taken umbrage at an observation which had escaped him with regard to a statue of that minister, placed in the theatre of Pompey. Two infamous informers, Satrius Secundus and Pinarius Natta, came forward as his accusers. Their connexion with the minister of Tiberius was itself ominous of his fate. The emperor heard his defence in person, in the senate, with a stern countenance, which announced to him the sentence he was about to receive. Certain of death, he pleaded his cause with a spirit and eloquence which he perhaps might not have exerted had any hope of safety remained. He justified himself by the example of Livy, Pollio, and Messala, he mentioned Cicero's panegyric of Cato, which Cæsar contented himself with answering by a similar production, and also a number of other compositions, as the epistles of Antony, and the harangues of Brutus, all filled with opprobrious defamations of Augustus; after which, having left the senate-house, he returned home, and resolved to perish by abstaining from sustenance. He retired to his own chamber, where he partly exhausted his strength by the excessive use of the warm bath. That he might deceive his daughter, he pretended that he ate in his own apartment; and, in order to carry on the deception, he concealed, or threw over the window, part of the provisions which were brought to him. While at supper with his family, he excused himself from partaking of their meal, on the pretence that he had already eaten sufficiently in his own chamber. He persisted in this abstinence for three days; but on the fourth, the extreme exhaustion and weakness of his body became manifest. It was then that he embraced his daughter, announced to her his approaching end, and informed her that she neither could preserve his existence longer, nor ought to attempt it. Having shut himself up in his chamber, he ordered the light to be completely excluded, and expired at the very moment when his infamous accusers were deliberating in court on the forms and proceedings to be adopted at his trial.

Creon. Vid. Part III.

Creophilus, a Samian, who hospitably entertained Homer, from whom he received a poem in return. Some say that he was that poet's master, &c. Strab. 14.

Cresphontes, a son of Aristomachus, who, with his brothers Temenus and Aristodemus, attempted to recover the Peloponnesus. Paus. 4, c. 3, &c.

Creüsa, a daughter of Priam, king of Troy, by Hecuba. She married Æneas, by whom she had some children, among which was Ascanius. When Troy was taken, she fled in the night with her husband; but they were separated in the midst of the confusion, and Æneas could not recover her, nor hear where she was. Cybele saved her, and carried her to her temple, of which she became priestess, according to the relation of Virgil, who makes Creusa appear to her husband in a vision, while he was seeking her in the tumult of war. She predicted to Æneas the calamities that attended him, the fame he should acquire when he came to Italy, and his consequent marriage with a princess of the country. Paus. 10, c. 16.—Virg. Æn. 2, v. 562, &c. Vid. Part III.

Crispinus, I. a prætorian, who, though originally a slave in Egypt, was, after the acquisition of riches, raised to the honours of Roman knighthood by Domitian. Juv. 1, v. 26.——II. A stoic philosopher, as remarkable for his loquacity as for the foolish and tedious poem he wrote to explain the tenets of his own sect, to which Horace alludes in the last verses of 1, Sat. 1.

Crispus Sallustius. Vid. Sallustius.——Flav. Jul. a son of the great Constantine, made Cæsar by his father, and distinguished for valour and extensive knowledge. Fausta, his stepmother, wished to seduce him; and when he refused, she accused him before Constantine, who believed the crime and caused his son to be poisoned, A. D. 326.

Critias, one of the thirty tyrants set over Athens by the Spartans. He was eloquent and wellbred, but of dangerous principles; and he cruelly persecuted his enemies, and put them to death. He was killed in a battle against those citizens whom his oppression had banished. He had been among the disciples of Socrates, and had written elegies and other compositions, of which some fragments remain. Cic. 2, de Orat.

Crito, I. one of the disciples of Socrates, who attended his learned preceptor in his last moments, and composed some dialogues now lost. Diog.——II. A Macedonian historian, who wrote an account of Pallene of Persia, of the foundation of Syracuse, of the Getæ, &c.

Critobulus, I. a general of Phocis, at the battle of Thermopylæ between Antiochus and the Romans. Paus. 10, c. 20.——II. A son of Crito, disciple to Socrates. Diog. in Crit.

Critolaus, I. a citizen of Tegea in Arcadia, who, with two brothers, fought against the two sons of Demostratus of Pheneus, to put an end to a long war between their respective nations. The brothers of Critolaus were both killed, and he alone remained to withstand his three bold antagonists. He conquered them; and when, at his return, his sister deplored the death of one of his antagonists, to whom she was betrothed, he killed her in a fit of resentment. The offence deserved capital punishment; but he was pardoned, on account of the services he had rendered his country. He was afterwards general of the Achæans, and it is said that he poisoned himself, because he had been conquered at Thermopylæ by the Romans. Cic. de Nat. D.——II. A peripatetic philosopher of Athens, sent ambassador to Rome, &c. 140 B. C. Cic. 2, de Orat.

Crœsus, the fifth and last of the Mermnadæ, who reigned in Lydia, was son of Alyattes, and passed for the richest of mankind. He was the first who made the Greeks of Asia tributary to the Lydians. His court was the asylum of learning; and Æsop, the famous fable-writer, among others, lived under his patronage. In a conversation with Solon, Crœsus wished to be thought the happiest of mankind; but the philosopher apprized him of his mistake, and gave the preference to poverty and domestic virtue. Crœsus undertook a war against Cyrus, the king of Persia, and marched to meet him with an army of 420,000 men and 60,000 horse. After a reign of 14 years, he was defeated, B. C. 548; his capital was besieged, and he fell into the conqueror's hands, who ordered him to be burnt alive. The pile was already on fire, when Cyrus heard the conquered monarch three times exclaim, Solon! with lamentable energy. He asked him the reason of his exclamation, and Crœsus repeated the conversation he had once had with Solon on human happiness. Cyrus was moved at the recital, and at the recollection of the inconstancy of human affairs, he ordered Crœsus to be taken from the burning pile, and he became one of his most intimate friends. The kingdom of Lydia became extinct in his person, and the power was transferred to Persia. Crœsus survived Cyrus. The manner of his death is unknown. He is celebrated for the immensely rich presents which he made to the temple of Delphi, from which he received an obscure and ambiguous oracle, which he interpreted in his favour, and which was fulfilled in the destruction of his empire. Herodot. 1, c. 26, &c.—Plut. in Solon. 8, c. 26.—Justin. 1, c. 7.

Cronia, a festival at Athens, in honour of Saturn. The Rhodians observed the same festival, and generally sacrificed to the god a condemned malefactor.

Ctesias, I. a Greek historian and physician of Cnidos, taken prisoner by Artaxerxes Mnemon at the battle of Cunaxa. He cured the king's wounds, and was his physician for 17 years. He wrote a history of the Assyrians and Persians, which Justin and Diodorus have partially preferred to that of Herodotus. Some fragments of his compositions have been preserved by Photius, and are to be found in Wesseling's edition of Herodotus. Strab. 1.—Athen. 12.—Plut. in Artax.——II. A sycophant of Athens.——III. An historian of Ephesus.

Ctesibius, I. a mathematician of Alexandria, who flourished 135 years B. C. He was the inventor of the pump and other hydraulic instruments. He also invented a clepsydra, or a water-clock. This invention of measuring time by water, was wonderful and ingenious. Water was made to drop upon wheels, which it turned. The wheels communicated their regular motion to a small wooden image, which, by a gradual rise, pointed with a stick to the proper hours and months, which were engraved on a column near the machine. This artful invention gave rise to many improvements; and the modern manner of measuring time with an hour-glass is an imitation of the clepsydra of Ctesibius. Vitruv. de Archit. 9, c. 9.——II. An historian, who flourished 254 years B. C. and died in his 104th year. Plut. in Dem.

Ctesiphon, an Athenian, son of Leosthenes, who advised his fellow-citizens publicly to present Demosthenes with a golden crown for his probity and virtue. This was opposed by the orator Æschines, the rival of Demosthenes, who accused Ctesiphon of seditious views. Demosthenes undertook the defence of his friend, in a celebrated oration still extant, and Æschines was banished. Demost. and Æschin. de Corona.

Curia, a division of the Roman tribes. Romulus originally divided the people into three tribes, and each tribe into 10 Curiæ. Over each Curiæ was appointed a priest, who officiated at the sacrifices of his respective assembly. The sacrifices were called Curionia, and the priest Curio. He was to be above the age of fifty. His morals were to be pure and unexceptionable, and his body free from all defects. The Curiones were elected by their respective Curiæ, and above them was a superior priest called Curio maximus, chosen by all the Curiæ in a public assembly.——The word Curia was also applied to public edifices among the Romans. These were generally of two sorts, divine and civil. In the former were held the assemblies of the priests, and of every religious order, for the regulation of religious sacrifices and ceremonies. The other was appointed for the senate, where they assembled for the despatch of public business. The Curia were solemnly consecrated by the augurs before a lawful assembly could be convened there. There were three at Rome which more particularly claim our attention; Curia Hostilia, built by King Tullus Hostilius; Curia Pompeii, where Julius Cæsar was murdered; and Curia Augusti, the palace and court of the emperor Augustus.

Curia Lex, de Comitiis, was enacted by M. Curius Dentatus, the tribune. It forbade the convening of the Comitia, for the election of magistrates, without a previous permission from the senate.

Curiatii, a family of Alba, which was carried to Rome by Tullus Hostilius, and entered among the patricians. The three Curiatii, who engaged the Horatii, and lost the victory, were of this family. Flor. 1, c. 3.—Dionys. Hal. 5.—Liv. 1, c. 24.

Curio, (Q.) I. an excellent orator, who called Cæsar in full senate, Omnium mulierum virum, et omnium virorum mulierem. Tacit. 21. Ann. c. 7.—Suet. in Cæs. 49.—Cic. in Brut.——II. His son, C. Scribonius, was tribune of the people, and an intimate friend of Cæsar. He saved Cæsar's life as he returned from the senate-house after the debates concerning the punishments which ought to be inflicted on the adherents of Catiline. He killed himself in Africa. Flor. 4, c. 2.—Plut. in Pomp. & Cæs. 49.—Val. Max. 9, c. 1.—Lucan. v. 268.

Curius Dentatus Marcus Annius, a Roman, celebrated for his fortitude and frugality. He was three times consul, and was twice honoured with a triumph. He obtained decisive victories over the Samnites, the Sabines, and the Lucanians, and defeated Pyrrhus near Tarentum. The ambassadors of the Samnites visited his cottage while he was boiling some vegetables in an earthen pot, and they attempted to bribe him by the offer of large presents. He refused their offers with contempt, and said, I prefer my earthen pots to all your vessels of gold and silver; and it is my wish to command those who are in possession of money, while I am deprived of it and live in poverty. Plut. in Cat. Cens.—Horat. 1, od. 12, v. 41.—Flor. 1, c. 15.

Curtius, M. a Roman youth, who devoted himself to the gods Manes for the safety of his country, about 360 years B. C. A wide gap, called afterwards Curtius lacus, had suddenly opened in the forum, and the oracle had said that it never would close before Rome threw into it whatever it had most precious. Curtius immediately perceived that no less than a human sacrifice was required. He armed himself, mounted his horse, and solemnly threw himself into the gulf, which instantly closed over his head. Liv. 7, c. 6.—Val. Max. 5, c. 6.

Curŭlis Magistratus, a state officer at Rome, who had the privilege of sitting in an ivory chair in public assemblies. The dictator, the consuls, the censors, the prætors, and ediles, claimed that privilege, and therefore were called curules magistratus. The senators who had passed through the abovementioned offices were generally carried to the senate-house in ivory chairs, as all generals in their triumphant procession to the capital. When names of distinction began to be known among the Romans, the descendants of curule magistrates were called nobiles; the first of a family who discharged that office were known by the name of noti, and those that had never been in office were called ignobiles.

Cyaraxes, or Cyaxares, I. son of Phraortes, was king of Media and Persia. He bravely defended his kingdom, which the Scythians had invaded. He made war against Alyattes, king of Lydia, and subjected to his power all Asia beyond the river Halys. He died, after a reign of 40 years, B. C. 585. Diod. 2.—Herodot. 1, c. 73 and 103.——II. Another prince, supposed by some to be the same as Darius the Mede. He was the son of Astyages, king of Media. He added seven provinces to his father's dominions, and made war against the Assyrians, whom Cyrus favoured. Xenoph. Cyrop. 1.

Cydias, a painter who made a painting of the Argonauts. This celebrated piece was bought by the orator Hortensius for 164 talents. Plin. 34.

Cynægīrus, an Athenian, celebrated for his extraordinary courage. He was brother to the poet Æschylus. After the battle of Marathon, he pursued the flying Persians to their ships, and seized one of their vessels with his right hand, which was immediately severed by the enemy. Upon this he seized the vessel with his left hand, and when he had lost that also, he still kept his hold with his teeth. Herodot. 6, c. 114.—Justin. 2, c. 9.

Cynici, a sect of philosophers, founded by Antisthenes the Athenian. They received this name a caninâ mordacitate, from their canine propensity to criticise the lives and actions of men, or because, like dogs, they were not ashamed to gratify their criminal desires publicly. They were famous for their contempt of riches, for the negligence of their dress, and the length of their beards. Diogenes was one of their sect. They generally slept on the ground. Vid. Diogenes. Cic. 1, Off. 35 and 41. Vid. Antisthenes.

Cynisca, a daughter of Archidamus, king of Sparta, who obtained the first prize in the chariot races at the Olympic games. Paus. 3, c. 8.

Cyprianus, a native of Carthage, who, though born of heathen parents, became a convert to Christianity, and then bishop of his country. To be more devoted to purity and study, he abandoned his wife; and, as a proof of his charity, he distributed his goods to the poor. He wrote 81 letters, besides several treatises, de Dei gratiâ, de virginum habitu, &c. and rendered his compositions valuable by the information he conveys of the discipline of the ancient church, and by the soundness and purity of his theology. He died a martyr, A. D. 258. The best editions of Cyprian are, that of Fell, fol. Oxon. 1682, and that reprinted Amst. 1700.

Cypselides, the name of three princes as descendants of Cypselus, who reigned at Corinth during 73 years. Cypselus was succeeded by his son Periander, who left his kingdom, after a reign of 40 years, to Cypselus II.

Cypselus, I. a king of Arcadia, who married the daughter of Ctesiphon, to strengthen himself against the Heraclidæ. Paus. 4, c. 3.——II. A man of Corinth, son of Eetion and father of Periander. He destroyed the Bacchiadæ, and seized upon the sovereign power, about 659 years before Christ. He reigned 30 years, and was succeeded by his son. Periander had two sons, Lycophron and Cypselus, who was insane. Cypselus received his name from the Greek word κυψελος, a coffer, because when the Bacchiadæ attempted to kill him, his mother saved his life by concealing him in a coffer. Paus. 5, c. 17.—*Cic. Cyrenaïci, a sect of philosophers who followed the doctrine of Aristippus. They placed their summum bonum in pleasure, and said that virtue ought to be commended because it gave pleasure. Laert. in Arist.—Cic. de Nat. D. 3.

Cyriades, one of the thirty tyrants who harassed the Roman empire in the reign of Gallienus. He died A. D. 259.

Cyrillus, I. a bishop of Jerusalem, who died A. D. 386. Of his writings, composed in Greek, there remain 28 catacheses, and a letter to the emperor Constantine, the best edition of which is Milles, fol. Oxon. 1703.——II. A bishop of Alexandria, who died A. D. 444. The best edition of his writings, which are mostly controversial in Greek, is that of Paris, fol. 7 vols. 1638.

Cyrsilus, an Athenian, stoned to death by his countrymen because he advised them to receive the army of Xerxes, and to submit to the power of Persia. Demosth. de Corond.—Cic. de Offic. c. 11.

Cyrus, I. a king of Persia, son of Cambyses and Mandane, daughter of Astyages king of Media. His father was of an ignoble family, whose marriage with Mandane had been consummated on account of the apprehensions of Astyages. (Vid. Astyages.) Cyrus was exposed as soon as born; but he was preserved by a shepherdess, who educated him as her own son. As he was playing with his equals in years, he was elected king in a certain diversion, and he exercised his power with such an independent spirit, that he ordered one of his play companions to be severely whipped for disobedience. The father of the youth, who was a nobleman, complained to the king of the ill treatment which his son had received from a shepherd's son. Astyages ordered Cyrus before him, and discovered that he was Mandane's son, from whom he had so much to apprehend. He treated him with great coldness; and Cyrus, unable to bear his tyranny, escaped from his confinement, and began to levy troops to dethrone his grandfather. He was assisted and encouraged by the ministers of Astyages, who were displeased with the king's oppression. He marched against him, and Astyages was defeated in a battle and taken prisoner, B. C. 559. From this victory the empire of Media became tributary to the Persians. Cyrus subdued the eastern parts of Asia, and made war against Crœsus, king of Lydia, whom he conquered, B. C. 548. He invaded the kingdom of Assyria, and took the city of Babylon, by drying the channels of the Euphrates, and marching his troops through the bed of the river, while the people were celebrating a grand festival. He afterwards marched against Tomyris, the queen of the Messagetæ, a Scythian nation, and was defeated in a bloody battle, B. C. 530. The victorious queen, who had lost her son in a previous encounter, was so incensed against Cyrus, that she cut off his head, and threw it into a vessel filled with human blood, exclaiming, Satia te sanguine quem sitisti. Xenophon has written the life of Cyrus; but his history is not perfectly authentic. In the character of Cyrus, he delineates a brave and virtuous prince, and often puts in his mouth many of the sayings of Socrates. The chronology is false; and Xenophon, in his narration, has given existence to persons whom no other historian ever mentioned. The Cyropædia, therefore, is not to be looked upon as an authentic history of Cyrus the Great, but we must consider it as showing what every good and virtuous prince ought to be. Diod. 1.—Herodot. 1, c. 75, &c.—Justin, 1, c. 5 and 7.—— II. The younger Cyrus was the younger son of Darius Nothus, and the brother of Artaxerxes. He was sent by his father, at the age of sixteen, to assist the Lacedæmonians against Athens. Artaxerxes succeeded to the throne at the death of Nothus; and Cyrus, who was of an aspiring soul, attempted to assassinate him. He was discovered, and would have been punished with death, had not his mother, Parysatis, saved him from the hands of the executioner by her tears and entreaties. This circumstance did not in the least check the ambition of Cyrus; he was appointed over Lydia and the seacoast, where he secretly fomented rebellion, and levied troops under various pretences. At last, he took the field with an army of 100,000 barbarians, and 13,000 Greeks under the command of Clearchus. Artaxerxes met him with 900,000 men near Cunaxa. The battle was long and bloody, and Cyrus might have perhaps obtained the victory, had not his uncommon rashness proved his ruin. It is said that the two royal brothers met in person, and engaged with the most inveterate fury, and their engagement ended in the death of Cyrus, 401 years B. C. It is said that in the letter he wrote to Lacedæmon, to solicit auxiliaries, Cyrus boasted his philosophy, his royal blood, and his ability to drink more wine than his brother without being intoxicated. Plut. in Artax.—Diod. 14.—Justin. 5, c. 11.——III. A poet of Panopolis, in the age of Theodosius. Vid. Part I.

Dacĭcus, a surname assumed by Domitian on his pretended victory over the Dacians. Juv. 6, v. 204.

Dædăla, two festivals in Bœotia. One of these was observed at Alalcomenos by the Platæans, in a large grove, where they exposed, in the open air, pieces of boiled flesh, and carefully observed whither the crows that came to prey upon them directed their flight. All the trees upon which any of these birds alighted were immediately cut down, and with them statues were made called Dædala, in honour of Dædalus.—The other festival was of a more solemn kind. It was celebrated every sixty years, by all the cities of Bœotia, as a compensation for the intermission of the smaller festivals for that number of years, during the exile of the Platæans. Fourteen of the statues, called Dædala, were distributed by lot among the Platæans, Lebadæans, Coroneans, Orchomenians, Thespians, Thebans, Tanagræans, and Chæroneans, because they had effected a reconciliation among the Platæans, and caused them to be recalled from exile about the time that Thebes was restored by Cassander, the son of Antipater. During this festival, a woman in the habit of a bridemaid accompanied a statue which was dressed in female garments, on the banks of the Eurotas. This procession was attended to the top of mount Cithæron by many of the Bœotians, who had places assigned them by lot. Here an altar of square pieces of wood, cemented together like stones, was erected, and upon it were thrown large quantities of combustible materials. Afterwards a bull was sacrificed to Jupiter, and an ox or heifer to Juno, by every one of the cities of Bœotia, and by the most opulent that attended. The poorest citizens offered small cattle; and all these oblations, together with the Dædala, were thrown in the common heap and set on fire, and totally reduced to ashes.

Daĭdis, a solemnity observed by the Greeks. It lasted three days. The first was in commemoration of Latona's labour; the second in memory of Apollo's birth; and the third in honour of the marriage of Podalirius and the mother of Alexander. Torches were always carried at the celebration; whence the name.

Damagetus, a man of Rhodes, who inquired of the oracle what wife he ought to marry; and received for answer, the daughter of the bravest of the Greeks. He applied to Aristomenes, and obtained his daughter in marriage, B. C. 670. Paus. 4, c. 24.

Damascius, a stoic of Damascus, who wrote a philosophical history, the life of Isidorus, and four books on extraordinary events, in the age of Justinian. His works, which are now lost, were greatly esteemed according to Photius.

Damippus, a Spartan, taken by Marcellus as he sailed out of the port of Syracuse. He discovered to the enemy that a certain part of the city was negligently guarded, and in consequence of this discovery, Syracuse was taken. Polyæn.

Damis, a man who disputed with Aristodemus, the right of reigning over the Messenians. Paus. 4, c. 10.

Damnonii, a people of Britain, now supposed Devonshire.

Damo, a daughter of Pythagoras, who, by order of her father, devoted her life to perpetual celibacy, and induced others to follow her example. Pythagoras at his death intrusted her with all the secrets of his philosophy, and gave her the unlimited care of his compositions, under the promise that she never would part with them. She faithfully obeyed his injunctions; and though in the extremest poverty, she refused to obtain money by the violation of her father's commands. Laert. in Pythag.

Damŏcles, one of the flatterers of Dionysius

the elder, of Sicily. He admired the tyrant's wealth, and pronounced him the happiest man on earth. Dionysius prevailed upon him to undertake for a while the charge of royalty, and be convinced of the happiness which a sovereign enjoyed. Damocles ascended the throne, and while he gazed upon the wealth and splendour that surrounded him, he perceived a sword hanging over his head by a horse-hair. This so terrified him, that all his imaginary felicity vanished at once, and he begged Dionysius to remove him from a situation which exposed his life to such fears and dangers. Cic. in Tuscul. 5, c. 21.

Damocritus, I. a timid general of the Achæans, &c. Paus. 7, c. 13.——II. A Greek writer, who composed two treatises, one upon the art of drawing an army in battle array, and the other concerning the Jews.——III. A man who wrote a poetical treatise upon medicine.

Damon, I. a victor at Olympia. Olymp. 102. —Paus. 4, c. 27.——II. A poet and musician of Athens, intimate with Pericles, and distinguished for his knowledge of government and fondness of discipline. He was banished for his intrigues about 430 years before Christ. C. Nep. 15, c. 2.—Plut. in Pericl.——III. A Pythagorean philosopher, very intimate with Pythias. When he had been condemned to death by Dionysius, he obtained from the tyrant leave to go and settle his domestic affairs, on promise of returning at a stated hour to the place of execution. Pythias pledged himself to undergo the punishment which was to be inflicted on Damon, should he not return in time, and he consequently delivered himself into the hands of the tyrant. Damon returned at the appointed moment, and Dionysius was so struck with the fidelity of those two friends, that he remitted the punishment, and entreated them to permit him to share their friendship and enjoy their confidence. Val. Max. 4, c. 7.

Damophila, a poetess of Lesbos, wife of Pamphilus. She was intimate with Sappho, and not only wrote hymns in honour of Diana and of the gods, but opened a school, where the younger persons of her sex were taught the various powers of music and poetry. Philostr.

Danaus. Vid. Part III.

Daphnephoria, a festival in honour of Apollo, celebrated every ninth year by the Bœotians. It was then usual to adorn an olive bough with garlands of laurel and other flowers, and place on the top a brazen globe, on which were suspended smaller ones. In the middle was placed a number of crowns, and a globe of inferior size, and the bottom was adorned with a saffron-coloured garment. The globe on the top represented the sun, or Apollo, that in the middle was an emblem of the moon, and the others of the stars. The crowns, which were 65 in number, represented the sun's annual revolution. This bough was carried in solemn procession by a beautiful youth of an illustrious family, and whose parents were both living. The youth was dressed in rich garments, which reached to the ground; his hair hung loose and dishevelled, his head was covered with a golden crown, and he wore on his feet shoes called Iphicratidæ, from Iphicrates, an Athenian, who first invented them. He was called Δαφνηφορος, laurel-bearer, and at that time he executed the office of priest to Apollo. He was preceded by one of his nearest relations, bearing a rod adorned with garlands, and behind him followed a train of virgins with branches in their hands. In this order the procession advanced as far as the temple of Apollo, surnamed Ismenius, where supplicatory hymns were sung to the god.—This festival owed its origin to the following circumstance: when an oracle advised the Ætolians, who inhabited Arne and the adjacent country, to abandon their ancient possessions, and go in quest of a settlement, they invaded the Theban territories, which at that time were pillaged by an army of Pelasgians. As the celebration of Apollo's festivals was near, both nations, who religiously observed it, laid aside all hostilities, and, according to custom, cut down laurel boughs from mount Helicon and in the neighbourhood of the river Melas, and walked in procession in honour of the divinity. The day that this solemnity was observed, Polemates, the general of the Bœotian army, saw a youth in a dream that presented him with a complete suit of armour, and commanded the Bœotians to offer solemn prayers to Apollo, and walk in procession with laurel boughs in their hands every ninth year. Three days after this dream, the Bœotian general made a sally, and cut off the greater part of the besiegers, who were compelled by this blow to relinquish their enterprise. Polemates immediately instituted a novennial festival to the god who seemed to be the patron of the Bœotians. Paus. Bœtic., &c.

Daphnis, a shepherd of Sicily, son of Mercury by a Sicilian nymph. It is supposed he was the first who wrote pastoral poetry, in which his successor Theocritus so happily excelled. From the celebrity of this shepherd, the name of Daphnis has been appropriated by the poets, ancient and modern, to express a person fond of rural employments, and of the peaceful innocence which accompanies the tending of flocks. *Ælian. Dardanides, a name given to Æneas, as descended from Dardanus. The word, in the plural number, is applied to the Trojan women. Virg. Æn.

Dardanus, a son of Jupiter and Electra, who killed his brother Jasius to obtain the kingdom of Etruria, after the death of his reputed father Corytus, and fled to Samothrace, and thence to Asia Minor, where he married Batia, the daughter of Teucer, king of Teucria. Dardanus taught his subjects to worship Minerva; and he gave them two statues of the goddess, one of which is well known by the name of Palladium. *Virg. Dares, a Phrygian, who lived during the Trojan war, in which he was engaged, and of which he wrote the history in Greek. This history was extant in the age of Ælian; the Latin translation, now extant, is universally believed to be spurious, though it is attributed by some to Cornelius Nepos. The best edition is that of Smids cum not. var. 4to. and 8vo. Amst. 1702. Homer. Il. 5, v. 10 and 27.

Darius, a noble satrap of Persia, son of Hystaspes, who conspired with six other noblemen to destroy Smerdis, who usurped the crown of Persia after the death of Cambyses. On the murder of the usurper, the seven conspirators universally agreed that he whose horse neighed first should be appointed king. In consequence of this resolution, the groom of Darius previously led his master's horse to a mare at a place near which the seven noblemen were to pass. On the morrow, before sunrise, when they proceeded all together, the horse, recollecting the mare, suddenly neighed, and at the same time a clap of thunder was heard, as if in approbation of the choice. The noblemen dismounted from their horses, and saluted Darius king; and a resolution was made among them, that the king's wives and concubines should be taken from no other family but that of the conspirators, and that they should for ever enjoy the unlimited privilege of being admitted into the king's presence without previous introduction. Darius was 29 years old when he ascended the throne, and he soon distinguished himself by his activity and military accomplishments. He besieged Babylon, which he took, after a siege of 20 months, by the artifice of Zopyrus. From thence he marched against the Scythians, and in his way conquered Thrace. This expedition was unsuccessful, and after several losses and disasters in the wilds of Scythia, the king retired with shame, and soon after turned his arms against the Indians, whom he subdued. The burning of Sardis, which was a Grecian colony, incensed the Athenians, and a war was kindled between Greece and Persia. Darius was so exasperated against the Greeks, that a servant every evening, by his order, repeated these words: "Remember, O king, to punish the Athenians." Mardonius, the king's son-in-law, was intrusted with the care of the war, but his army was destroyed by the Thracians; and Darius, more animated by his loss, sent a more considerable force under the command of Datis and Artaphernes. They were conquered at the celebrated battle of Marathon, by 10,000 Athenians; and the Persians lost in that expedition no less than 206,000 men. Darius was not disheartened by this severe blow, but he resolved to carry on the war in person, and immediately ordered a still larger army to be levied. He died in the midst of his preparations, B. C. 485, after a reign of 36 years, in the 65th year of his age. Herodot. 1, 2, &c.—Diod. 1.—Justin. 1, c. 9.—Plut. in Arist.—C. Nep. in Miltiad.——The second king of Persia of that name, was also called Ochus or Nothus, because he was the illegitimate son of Artaxerxes by a concubine. Soon after the murder of Xerxes he ascended the throne of Persia, and married Parysatis, his sister, a cruel and ambitious woman, by whom he had Artaxerxes Memnon, Amestris, and Cyrus the younger. He carried on many wars with success, under the conduct of his generals, and of his son Cyrus. He died B. C. 404, after a reign of 19 years, and was succeeded by his son Artaxerxes, who asked him on his deathbed, what had been the guide of his conduct in the management of the empire, that he might imitate him? The dictates of justice and religion, replied the expiring monarch. Justin. 5, c. 11.—Diod. 12.——The third of that name was the last king of Persia, surnamed Codomanus. He was son of Arsanes and Sysigambis, and descended from Darius Nothus. The peace of Darius was early disturbed, and Alexander invaded Persia to avenge the injuries which the Greeks had suffered from the predecessors of Darius. The king of Persia met his adversary in person, at the head of 600,000 men. This army was remarkable more for its opulence and luxury than for the military courage of its soldiers; and Athenæus mentions that the camp of Darius was crowded with 277 cooks, 29 waiters, 87 cupbearers, 40 servants to perfume the king, and 66 to prepare garlands and flowers to deck the dishes and meats which appeared on the royal table. With these forces Darius met Alexander. A battle was fought near the Granicus, in which the Persians were easily defeated. Another was soon after fought near Issus; and Alexander left 110,000 of the enemy dead on the field of battle, and took among the prisoners of war, the mother, wife, and children of Darius. The darkness of the night favoured the retreat of Darius, and he saved himself by flying in disguise on the horse of his armour-bearer. These losses weakened but discouraged not Darius; he assembled another more powerful army, and the last decisive battle was fought at Arbela. The victory was long doubtful; but the intrepidity of Alexander, and the superior valour of the Macedonians, prevailed over the effeminate Persians; and Darius, sensible of his disgrace and ruin, fled towards Media. His misfortunes were now complete. Bessus, the governor of Bactriana, took away his life, in hopes of succeeding him on the throne; and Darius was found by the Macedonians in his chariot, covered with wounds and almost expiring, B. C. 331. He asked for water, and exclaimed, when he received it from the hand of a Macedonian: "It is the greatest of my misfortunes that I cannot reward thy humanity. Beg Alexander to accept my warmest thanks for the tenderness with which he has treated my wretched family, whilst I am doomed to perish by the hand of a man whom I have loaded with kindness." the elder, of Sicily. He admired the tyrant's wealth, and pronounced him the happiest man on earth. Dionysius prevailed upon him to undertake for a while the charge of royalty, and be convinced of the happiness which a sovereign enjoyed. Damocles ascended the throne, and while he gazed upon the wealth and splendour that surrounded him, he perceived a sword hanging over his head by a horse-hair. This so terrified him, that all his imaginary felicity vanished at once, and he begged Dionysius to remove him from a situation which exposed his life to such fears and dangers. Cic. in Tuscul. 5, c. 21.

Daphnephoria, a festival in honour of Apollo, celebrated every ninth year by the Bœotians. It was then usual to adorn an olive bough with garlands of laurel and other flowers, and place on the top a brazen globe, on which were suspended smaller ones. In the middle was placed a number of crowns, and a globe of inferior size, and the bottom was adorned with a saffron-coloured garment. The globe on the top represented the sun, or Apollo, that in the middle was an emblem of the moon, and the others of the stars. The crowns, which were 65 in number, represented the sun's annual revolution. This bough was carried in solemn procession by a beautiful youth of an illustrious family, and whose parents were both living. The youth was dressed in rich garments, which reached to the ground; his hair hung loose and dishevelled, his head was covered with a golden crown, and he wore on his feet shoes called Iphicratida, from Iphicrates, an Athenian, who first invented them. He was called Δαφνηφορος, laurel-bearer, and at that time he executed the office of priest to Apollo. He was preceded by one of his nearest relations, bearing a rod adorned with garlands, and behind him followed a train of virgins with branches in their hands. In this order the procession advanced as far as the temple of Apollo, surnamed Ismenius, where supplicatory hymns were sung to the god.—This festival owed its origin to the following circumstance: when an oracle advised the Ætolians, who inhabited Arne and the adjacent country, to abandon their ancient possessions, and go in quest of a settlement, they invaded the Theban territories, which at that time were pillaged by an army of Pelasgians. As the celebration of Apollo's festivals was near, both nations, who religiously observed it, laid aside all hostilities, and, according to custom, cut down laurel boughs from mount Helicon and in the neighbourhood of the river Melas, and walked in procession in honour of the divinity. The day that this solemnity was observed, Polemates, the general of the Bœotian army, saw a youth in a dream that presented him with a complete suit of armour, and commanded the Bœotians to offer solemn prayers to Apollo, and walk in procession with laurel boughs in their hands every ninth year. Three days after this dream, the Bœotian general made a sally, and cut off the greater part of the besiegers, who were compelled by this blow to relinquish their enterprise. Polemates immediately instituted a novennial festival to the god who seemed to be the patron of the Bœotians. Paus. Bœotic., &c.

Daphnis, a shepherd of Sicily, son of Mercury by a Sicilian nymph. It is supposed he was the first who wrote pastoral poetry, in which his successor Theocritus so happily excelled. Darius, a noble satrap of Persia, son of Hystaspes, who conspired with six other noblemen to destroy Smerdis, who usurped the crown of Persia after the death of Cambyses. On the murder of the usurper, the seven conspirators universally agreed that he whose horse neighed first should be appointed king. In consequence of this resolution, the groom of Darius previously led his master's horse to a mare at a place near which the seven noblemen were to pass. On the morrow, before sunrise, when they proceeded all together, the horse, recollecting the mare, suddenly neighed, and at the same time a clap of thunder was heard, as if in approbation of the choice. The noblemen dismounted from their horses, and saluted Darius king; and a resolution was made among them, that the king's wives and concubines should be taken from no other family but that of the conspirators, and that they should for ever enjoy the unlimited privilege of being admitted into the king's presence without previous introduction. Darius was 29 years old when he ascended the throne, and he soon distinguished himself by his activity and military accomplishments. He besieged Babylon, which he took, after a siege of 20 months, by the artifice of Zopyrus. From thence he marched against the Scythians, and in his way conquered Thrace. This expedition was unsuccessful, and after several losses and disasters in the wilds of Scythia, the king retired with shame, and soon after turned his arms against the Indians, whom he subdued. The burning of Sardis, which was a Grecian colony, incensed the Athenians, and a war was kindled between Greece and Persia. Darius was so exasperated against the Greeks, that a servant every evening, by his order, repeated these words: "Remember, O king, to punish the Athenians." Mardonius, the king's son-in-law, was intrusted with the care of the war, but his army was destroyed by the Thracians; and Darius, more animated by his loss, sent a more considerable force under the command of Datis and Artaphernes. They were conquered at the celebrated battle of Marathon, by 10,000 Athenians; and the Persians lost in that expedition no less than 200,000 men. With these forces Darius met Alexander. A battle was fought near the Granicus, in which the Persians were easily defeated. DECEMVIRI, ten magistrates of absolute authority among the Romans. The tribunes demanded that a code of laws might be framed for the use and benefit of the Roman people. This petition was complied with, and three ambassadors were sent to Athens, and all the other Grecian states, to collect the laws of Solon and of the other celebrated legislators of Greece. Upon the return of the commissioners, it was universally agreed that ten new magistrates, called Decemviri, should be elected from the senate to put the project into execution. Their power was absolute; all other offices ceased after their election, and they presided over the city with regal authority. They were invested with the badges of the consul, in the enjoyment of which they succeeded by turns, and only one was preceded by the fasces, and had the power of assembling the senate and confirming decrees. The first decemvirs were Appius Claudius, T. Genutius, P. Sextus, Sp. Veturius, C. Julius, A. Manlius, Ser. Sulpitius Pluriatius, T. Romulus, Sp. Posthumius, A. U. C. 303. Under them the laws which had been exposed to public view, that every citizen might speak his sentiments, were publicly approved of as constitutional, and ratified by the priests and augurs in the most solemn and religious manner. These laws were ten in number, and were engraved on tables of brass; two were afterwards added, and they were called the laws of the twelve tables, leges duodecim tabularum, and leges decemvirales. In the third year after their creation, the decemvirs became odious, on account of their tyranny; and the attempt of Ap. Claudius to ravish Virginia was followed by the total abolition of the office.——There were other officers in Rome, called decemvirs, who were originally appointed, in the absence of the prætor, to administer justice. Their appointment became afterwards necessary, and they generally assisted at sales called subhastationes, because a spear, hasta, was fixed at the door of the place where the goods were exposed to sale. They were called decemviri litibus judicandis.—The officers whom Tarquin appointed to guard the Sibylline books were also called decemviri. They were originally two in number, called duumviri, till the year of Rome 388, when their number was increased to ten, five of which were chosen from the plebeians and five from the patricians. Sylla increased their number to fifteen, called quindecemvirs.

DECIA LEX, was enacted by M. Decius the tribune, A. U. C. 442, to empower the people to appoint two proper persons to fit and repair the fleets.

DECIUS MUS, I. a celebrated Roman consul, who, after many glorious exploits, devoted himself to the gods Manes for the safety of his country, in a battle against the Latins, 338 years B. C. His son Decius imitated his example, and devoted himself in like manner, in his fourth consulship, when fighting against the Gauls and Samnites, B. C. 296. His grandson also did the same in the war against Pyrrhus and the Tarentines, B. C. 280.——II. Brutus, conducted Cæsar to the senate-house the day that he was murdered.——III. (Cn. Metius, Q. Trajanus,) a native of Pannonia, sent by the emperor Philip to appease a sedition in Mœsia. Instead of obeying his master's command, he assumed the imperial purple, and soon after marched against him, and at his death became the only emperor. He signalized himself against the Persians; and when he marched against the Goths, he pushed his horse in a deep marsh, from which he could not extricate himself, and he perished with all his army by the darts of the barbarians, A. D. 251, after a reign of two years. This monarch enjoyed the character of a brave man and of a great disciplinarian; and by his justice and exemplary life, merited the title of Optimus, which a servile senate lavished upon him.

DECURIO, a subaltern officer in the Roman armies. He commanded a decuria, which consisted of ten men, and was the third part of a turma, or the 30th part of a legio of horse, which was composed of 300 men. The badge of the centurions was a vine rod or sapling, and each had a deputy called optio. There were certain magistrates in the provinces, called decuriones municipales, who formed a body to represent the Roman senate in free and corporate towns. They consisted of ten, whence the name; and their duty extended to watch over the interest of their fellow-citizens, and to increase the revenues of the commonwealth. Their court was called curia decurionum and minor senatus; and their decrees, called decreta decurionum, were marked with two D. D. at the top. They generally styled themselves civitatum patres curiales, and honorati municipiorum, senatores. They were elected with the same ceremonies as the Roman senators; they were to be at least 25 years of age, and to be possessed of a certain sum of money. The election happened on the calends of March.

DEIŎCES, a son of Phraortes, by whose means the Medes delivered themselves from the yoke of the Assyrians. He presided as judge among his countrymen, and his great popularity and love of equity raised him to the throne, and he made himself absolute, B. C. 700. He was succeeded by his son Phraortes, after a reign of 53 years. He built Ecbatana, according to Herodotus, and surrounded it with seven different walls, in the middle of which was the royal palace. Herodot. 1, c. 96, &c.—Polyæn.

DEIOTĂRUS, a governor of Galatia, made king of that province by the Roman people. In the civil wars of Pompey and Cæsar, Deiotarus followed the interest of the former. After the battle of Pharsalia, Cæsar severely reprimanded Deiotarus for his attachment to Pompey, deprived him of part of his kingdom, and left him only the bare title of royalty. When he was accused by his grandson of attempts upon Cæsar's life, Cicero ably defended him in the Roman senate. He joined Brutus with a large army, and faithfully supported the republican cause. His wife was barren, but fearing that her husband might die without issue, she presented him with a beautiful slave, and tenderly educated, as her own, the children of this union. Deiotarus died in an advanced old age. Strab. 12.—Lucan. 5, v. 55.

Dĕiphŏbus, a son of Priam and Hecuba, who, after the death of his brother Paris, married Helen. His wife unworthily betrayed him, and introduced into his chamber her old husband Menelaus, to whom she wished to reconcile herself. He was shamefully mutilated and killed by Menelaus. He had highly distinguished himself during the war, especially in his two combats with Merion, and in that in which he slew Ascalaphus, son of Mars. Virg. Æn. 6, v. 495. —Homer. Il. 13.

Deldon, a king of Mysia, defeated by Crassus.

Dĕlia, a festival celebrated every fifth year in the island of Delos, in honour of Apollo. It was first instituted by Theseus, who, at his return from Crete, placed a statue there, which he had received from Ariadne. At the celebration, they crowned the statue of the goddess with garlands, appointed a choir of music, and exhibited horseraces. They afterwards led a dance, in which they imitated, by their motions, the various windings of the Cretan labyrinth, from which Theseus had extricated himself by Ariadne's assistance.——There was also another festival of the same name, yearly celebrated by the Athenians in Delos. It was also instituted by Theseus, who, when he was going to Crete, made a vow that if he returned victorious he would yearly visit, in a solemn manner, the temple of Delos. The person employed in this annual procession were called Deliastæ and Theori. The ship, the same which carried Theseus, and had been carefully preserved by the Athenians, was called Theoria and Delias. When the ship was ready for the voyage, the priest of Apollo solemnly adorned the stern with garlands, and a universal lustration was made all over the city. The Theori were crowned with laurel, and before them proceeded men armed with axes, in commemoration of Theseus, who had cleared the way from Trœzene to Athens, and delivered the country from robbers. When the ship arrived at Delos, they offered solemn sacrifices to the god of the island, and celebrated a festival in his honour. After this they retired to the ship, and sailed back to Athens, where all the people of the city ran in crowds to meet them. Every appearance of festivity prevailed at their approach, and the citizens opened their doors; and prostrated themselves before the Deliastæ as they walked in procession. During this festival, it was unawful to put to death any malefactor; and on that account the life of Socrates was prolonged for thirty days. Zenophon. Memor. & in Conv. —Plut. in Phæd.—Senec. ep. 70.

Delmatius, Fl. Jul. a nephew of Constantine the Great, honoured with the title of Cæsar, and put in possession of Thrace, Macedonia, and Achaia. His great virtues were unable to save him from a violent death, and he was assassinated by his own soldiers, &c.

Delphis, the priestess of Delphi. Martial. 9, ep. 43.

Demădes, an Athenian, who, from a sailor became an eloquent orator, and obtained much influence in the state. He was taken prisoner at the battle of Cheronæa, by Philip, and ingratiated himself into the favour of that prince, by whom he was greatly esteemed. He was put to death, with his son, on suspicion of treason, B. C. 322. One of his orations is extant. Diod. 16 and 17.—Plut. in Dem.

Demărătus, I. the son and successor of Ariston on the throne of Sparta, B. C. 526. He was banished by the intrigues of Cleomenes, his royal colleague, as being illegitimate. He retired into Asia, and was kindly received by Darius, son of Hystaspes, king of Persia. When the Persian monarch made preparations to invade Greece, Demaratus, though persecuted by the Lacedæmonians, informed them of the hostilities which hung over their head. Herodot. 5, c. 75, &c. l. 6, c. 50, &c.——II. A rich citizen of Corinth, of the family of the Bacchiadæ. When Cypselus had usurped the sovereign power of Corinth, Demaratus, with all his family, migrated to Italy; and settled at Tarquinii, 658 years before Christ. His son, Lucumon, was king of Rome, under the name of Tarquinius Priscus. Dionys. Hal.

Demariste, the mother of Timoleon.

Dēmătria, a Spartan mother, who killed her son because he returned from a battle without glory. Plut. Lac. Inst.

Demetria, a festival in honour of Ceres, called by the Greeks Demeter. It was then customary for the votaries of the goddess to lash themselves with whips made with the bark of trees. The Athenians had a solemnity of the same name, in honour of Demetrius Poliorcetes.

Dēmētrius, I. a son of Antigonus and Stratonice, surnamed Poliorcetes, destroyer of towns. At the age of 22, he was sent by his father against Ptolemy, who invaded Syria. He was defeated near Gaza; but he soon repaired his loss by a victory over one of the generals of the enemy. He afterwards sailed with a fleet of 250 ships to Athens, and restored the Athenians to liberty, by freeing them from the power of Cassander and Ptolemy, and expelling the garrison which was stationed there under Demetrius Phalereus. After this successful expedition, he besieged and took Munychia, and defeated Cassander at Thermopylæ. His reception at Athens, after these victories, was attended with the greatest servility; and the Athenians were not ashamed to raise altars to him as a god, and to consult his oracles. This uncommon success raised the jealousy of the successors of Alexander; and Seleucus, Cassander, and Lysimachus, united to destroy Antigonus and his son. Their hostile armies met at Ipsus, B. C. 301. Antigonus was killed in the battle; and Demetrius, after a severe loss, retired to Ephesus. His ill success raised him many enemies; and the Athenians, who had lately adored him as a god, refused to admit him into their city. He soon after ravaged the territories of Lysimachus, and reconciled himself to Seleucus, to whom he gave his daughter Stratonice in marriage. Athens now laboured under tyranny; and Demetrius relieved it, and pardoned the inhabitants. The loss of his possessions in Asia, recalled him from Greece, and he established himself on the throne of Macedonia, by the murder of Alexander, the son of Cassander. Here he was continually at war with the neighbouring states; and the superior power of his adversaries obliged him to leave Macedonia, after he had sat on the throne for seven years.

He passed into Asia, and attacked some of the provinces of Lysimachus with various success; but famine and pestilence destroyed the greatest part of his army, and he retired to the court of Seleucus for support and assistance. He met with a kind reception, but hostilities were soon begun; and after he had gained some advantages over his son-in-law, Demetrius was totally forsaken by his troops in the field of battle, and became an easy prey to the enemy. Though he was kept in confinement by his son-in-law, yet he maintained himself like a prince, and passed his time in hunting, and in every laborious exercise. His son Antigonus offered Seleucus all his possessions, and even his person, to procure his father's liberty; but all proved unavailing, and Demetrius died in the 54th year of his age, after a confinement of three years, 286 B. C. His remains were given to Antigonus, and honoured with a splendid funeral pomp at Corinth, and thence conveyed to Demetrias. His posterity remained in possession of the Macedonian throne till the age of Perseus, who was conquered by the Romans. Demetrius has rendered himself famous for his fondness of dissipation when among the dissolute, and his love of virtue and military glory in the field of battle. He has been commended as a great warrior; and his ingenious inventions, his warlike engines, and stupendous machines in his war with the Rhodians, justify his claims to that perfect character. He has been blamed for his voluptuous indulgences; and his biographer observes, that no Grecian prince had more wives and concubines than Poliorcetes. His obedience and reverence to his father have been justly admired; and it has been observed that Antigonus ordered the ambassadors of a foreign prince particularly to remark the cordiality and friendship which subsisted between him and his son. Plut. in vitâ.—Diod. 17.—Justin. 1, c. 17, &c.——II. A prince who succeeded his father Antigonus on the throne of Macedonia. He reigned 11 years, and was succeeded by Antigonus Doson. Justin. 26, c. 2.—Polyb. 2.——III. A son of Philip, king of Macedonia, delivered as a hostage to the Romans. His modesty delivered his father from a heavy accusation laid before the Roman senate. When he returned to Macedonia, he was falsely accused by his brother Perseus, who was jealous of his popularity, and his father too credulously consented to his death, B. C. 180. Liv. 40, c. 20.—Justin. 32, c. 2.——IV. A prince, surnamed Soter, was son of Seleucus Philopater, the son of Antiochus the Great, king of Syria. His father gave him as a hostage to the Romans. After the death of Seleucus, Antiochus Epiphanes, the deceased monarch's brother, usurped the kingdom of Syria, and was succeeded by his son Antiochus Eupator. This usurpation displeased Demetrius, who was detained at Rome; he procured his liberty, on pretence of going to hunt, and fled to Syria, where the troops received him as their lawful sovereign, B. C. 162. He put to death Eupator and Lysias, and established himself on his throne by cruelty and oppression. Alexander Bala, the son of Antiochus Epiphanes, laid claim to the crown of Syria, and defeated Demetrius in a battle, in the 12th year of his reign. Strab. 16.—Appian.—Justin. 34, c. 3.——V. The 2d, surnamed Nicanor, or Conqueror, was son of Soter, to whom he succeeded by the assistance of Ptolemy Philometer, after he had driven out the usurper Alexander Bala, B. C. 146. He married Cleopatra, daughter of Ptolemy; who was, before, the wife of the expelled monarch. Demetrius gave himself up to luxury and voluptuousness, and suffered his kingdom to be governed by his favourites. At that time a pretended son of Bala, called Diodorus Tryphon, seized a part of Syria; and Demetrius, to oppose his antagonist, made an alliance with the Jews, and marched into the east, where he was taken by the Parthians. Phraates, king of Parthia, gave him his daughter Rhodogyne in marriage; and Cleopatra was so incensed at this new connexion, that she gave herself up to Antiochus Sidetes, her brother-in-law, and married him. Sidetes was killed in a battle against the Parthians, and Demetrius regained the possession of his kingdom. His pride and oppression rendered him odious, and his subjects asked a king of the house of Seleucus, from Ptolemy Physcon, king of Egypt; and Demetrius, unable to resist the power of his enemies, fled to Ptolemais, which was then in the hands of his wife Cleopatra. The gates were shut up against his approach by Cleopatra; and he was killed by order of the governor of Tyre, whither he had fled for protection. He was succeeded by Alexander Zebina, whom Ptolemy had raised to the throne, B. C. 127. Justin. 36, &c.—Appian. de Bell. Syr.—Joseph.——VI. The 3d, surnamed Eucerus, was son of Antiochus Gryphus. After the example of his brother Philip, who had seized Syria, he made himself master of Damascus, B. C. 93, and soon after obtained a victory over his brother. He was taken in a battle against the Parthians, and died in captivity. Joseph. 1.——VII. Phalereus, a disciple of Theophrastus, who gained such an influence over the Athenians, by his eloquence and the purity of his manners, that he was elected decennial archon, B. C. 317. He so embellished the city, and rendered himself so popular by his munificence, that the Athenians raised 360 brazen statues to his honour. Yet in the midst of all this popularity, his enemies raised a sedition against him, and he was condemned to death, and all his statues thrown down, after maintaining the sovereign power for 10 years. He fled without concern or mortification to the court of Ptolemy Lagus, where he met with kindness and cordiality. The Egyptian monarch consulted him concerning the succession of his children; and Demetrius advised him to raise to the throne the children of Eurydice in preference to the offspring of Berenice. This counsel so irritated Philadelphus, the son of Berenice, that after his father's death he sent the philosopher into Upper Egypt, and there detained him in strict confinement. Demetrius, tired with his situation, put an end to his life by the bite of an asp, 284 B. C. According to some, Demetrius enjoyed the confidence of Philadelphus, and enriched his library at Alexandria with 200,000 volumes. All the works of Demetrius, on rhetoric, history, and eloquence, are lost. The last edition of the treatise on rhetoric, attributed improperly to him, is that of Glasgow, 8vo. 1743. Diog. in vitâ.—Cic. in Brut. & de Offic.—Plut. in Exil.——VIII. A cynic philosopher, disciple of Apollonius Thyaneus, in the age of Caligula. The emperor wished to gain the philosopher to his interest by a large present; but Demetrius refused it with indignation, and said, If Caligula wishes to bribe me, let him send me his crown. Vespasian was displeased with his insolence, and banished him to an island. The cynic derided the punishment, and bitterly inveighed against the emperor. He died in a great old age; and Seneca observes, that nature had brought him forth, to show mankind that an exalted genius can live securely without being corrupted by the vices of the surrounding world. Senec.—Philostr. in Apoll.——IX. A writer, who published a history of the irruptions of the Gauls into Asia.

Dēmocēdes, a celebrated physician of Crotona, son of Calliphon, and intimate with Polycrates. He was carried as a prisoner from Samos to Darius, king of Persia, where he acquired great riches and much reputation by curing the king's foot and the breast of Atossa. He was sent to Greece as a spy by the king, and fled away to Crotona, where he married the daughter of the wrestler Milo. Ælian. V. H. 8, c. 18.—Herodot. 3, c. 124, &c.

Dēmōchărēs, I. an Athenian, sent with some of his countrymen with an embassy to Philip, king of Macedonia. The monarch gave them audience; and when he asked them what he could do to please the people of Athens, Demochares replied, "Hang yourself." But Philip mildly dismissed them, and bade them ask their countrymen, which deserved most the appellation of wise and moderate, they who gave such ill language, or he who received it without any signs of resentment? Senec. de Ira. 3.—Ælian. V. H. 3, 7, 8, 12.—Cic. in Brut. 3, de Orat. 2.——II. A poet of Soli, who composed a comedy on Demetrius Poliorcetes. Plut. in Dem.——III. Dēmōcrītus, a celebrated philosopher of Abdera, disciple to Leucippus. He travelled over the greatest part of Europe, Asia, and Africa, in quest of knowledge, and returned home in the greatest poverty. There was a law at Abdera, which deprived of the honour of a funeral the man who had reduced himself to indigence; and Democritus, to avoid ignominy, repeated before his countrymen one of his compositions called Diacosmus. It was received with such uncommon applause, that he was presented with 500 talents; statues were erected in his honour; and a decree passed that the expenses of his funeral should be paid from the public treasury. He retired to a garden near the city, where he dedicated his time to study and solitude; and, according to some authors, he put out his eyes to apply himself more closely to philosophical inquiries. He was accused of insanity, and Hippocrates was ordered to inquire into the nature of his disorder. The physician had a conference with the philosopher, and declared that not Democritus, but his enemies were insane. He continually laughed at the follies and vanities of mankind, who distract themselves with care, and are at once a prey to hope and to anxiety. He told Darius, who was inconsolable for the loss of his wife, that he would raise her from the dead if he could find three persons who had gone through life without adversity, whose names he might engrave on the queen's monument. The king's inquiries to find such persons proved unavailing, and the philosopher in some manner soothed the sorrow of his sovereign. He taught his disciples that the soul died with the body; and therefore, as he gave no credit to the existence of ghosts, some youths, to try his fortitude, dressed themselves in a hideous and deformed habit, and approached his cave in the dead of night with whatever could create terror and astonishment. The philosopher received them unmoved; and without even looking at them, he desired them to cease making themselves such objects of ridicule and folly. He died in the 109th year of his age, B. C. 361. His father was so rich, that he entertained Xerxes, with all his army, as he was marching against Greece. All the works of Democritus are lost. He was the author of the doctrine of atoms, and first taught that the Milky-way was occasioned by a confused light from a multitude of stars. He may be considered as the parent of experimental philosophy, in the prosecution of which he showed himself so ardent, that he declared he would prefer the discovery of one of the causes of the works of nature to the diadem of Persia. He made artificial emeralds, and tinged them with various colours; he likewise dissolved stones and softened ivory. Euseb. 14, c. 27.—Diog. in vitâ.—Ælian. V. H. 4, c. 20.—Cic. de Finib.—Val. Max. 8, c. 7.—Strab. 1 and 15.

Dēmōdōcus, a musician at the court of Alcinous, who sang, in the presence of Ulysses, the secret amours of Mars and Venus, &c. Homer. Od. 8, v. 44.—Plut. de Mus.

Dēmon, an Athenian, nephew to Demosthenes. He was at the head of the government during the absence of his uncle, and obtained a decree that Demosthenes should be recalled, and that a ship should be sent to bring him back.

Dēmōnax, a celebrated philosopher of Crete in the reign of Adrian. He showed no concern about the necessaries of life; but when hungry, he entered the first house he met, and there satisfied his appetite. He died in his 100th year.

Dēmosthĕnes, a celebrated Athenian, son of a rich blacksmith, called Demosthenes, and of Cleobule. He was but seven years of age when his father died. His guardians negligently managed his affairs, and embezzled the greatest part of his possessions. His education was totally neglected; and for whatever advances he made in learning, he was indebted to his industry and application. He became the pupil of Isæus and Plato, and applied himself to study the orations of Isocrates. At the age of 17 he gave an early proof of his eloquence and abilities against his guardians, from whom he obtained the retribution of the greatest part of his estate. His rising talents were, however, impeded, by weak lungs, and a difficulty of pronunciation, especially of the letter ρ; but these obstacles were soon conquered by unwearied application. His abilities as an orator raised him to consequence at Athens, and he was soon placed at the head of the government. In this public capacity he roused his countrymen from their indolence, and animated them against the encroachments of Philip of Macedonia. In the battle of Cheronæa, however,

Demosthenes betrayed his pusillanimity, and saved his life by flight. After the death of Philip he declared himself warmly against his son and successor, Alexander, whom he branded with the appellation of boy; and when the Macedonians demanded of the Athenians their orators, Demosthenes reminded his countrymen of the fable of the sheep which delivered their dogs to the wolves. Though he had boasted that all the gold of Macedonia could not tempt him, yet he suffered himself to be bribed by a small golden cup from Harpalus. The tumults which this occasioned forced him to retire from Athens; and in his banishment, which he passed at Trœzene and Ægina, he lived with more effeminacy than true heroism. When Antipater made war against Greece, after the death of Alexander, Demosthenes was publicly recalled from his exile, and a galley was sent to fetch him from Ægina. His return was attended with much splendour, and all the citizens crowded at the Piræus to see him land. His triumph and popularity, however, were short. Antipater and Craterus were near Athens, and demanded all the orators to be delivered up into their hands. Demosthenes, with all his adherents, fled to the temple of Neptune in Calauria; and when he saw that all hopes of safety were banished, he took a dose of poison, which he always carried in a quill, and expired on the day that the Thesmophoria were celebrated, in the 60th year of his age, B. C. 322. The Athenians raised a brazen statue to his honour, with an inscription translated into this distich:

Si tibi par menti robur, Vir magne, fuisset,
Græcia non Macedæ succubuisset hero.

Demosthenes has been deservedly called the prince of orators; and Cicero, his successful rival among the Romans, calls him a perfect model, and such as he wished to be. These two great princes of eloquence have often been compared together; but the judgment hesitates to which to give the preference. They both arrived at perfection; but the measures by which they obtained it were diametrically opposite. Demosthenes has been compared, and with propriety, by his rival Æschines, to a siren, from the melody of his expression. No orator can be said to have expressed the various passions of hatred, resentment, or indignation, with more energy than he; and, as a proof of his uncommon application, it need only be mentioned, that he transcribed eight, or even ten times, the history of Thucydides, that he might not only imitate, but possess the force and energy of the great historian. The best editions of his works are that of Wolfius, fol. Frankof. 1604; that left unfinished by Taylor, Cantab. 4to. and that published in 12 vols. 8vo. 1720, &c. Lips. by Reiske and his widow. Plut. in vitâ.—Diod. 16.—Cic. in Orat. &c.—Paus. 1, c. 8, l. 2, c. 33. ——II. An Athenian general, sent to succeed Alcibiades in Sicily. He attacked Syracuse with Nicias, but his efforts were ineffectual. After many calamities, he fell into the enemy's hands, and his army was confined to hard labour. The accounts about the death of Demosthenes are various; some believe that he stabbed himself, whilst others suppose that he was put to death by the Syracusans, B. C. 413. Plut. in Nic.—Thucyd. 4, &c.—Diod. 12.——III. The father of the orator Demosthenes. Deodātus, an Athenian who opposed the cruel resolutions of Cleon against the captive prisoners of Mitylene.

Dercyllĭdas, a general of Sparta, celebrated for his military exploits. He took nine different cities in eight days, and freed Chersonesus from the inroads of the Thracians by building a wall across the country. He lived B. C. 399. Diod. 14.—Xenoph. Hist. Græc. 1, &c.

Diăgŏras, I. an Athenian philosopher. His father's name was Teleclytus. From the greatest superstition, he became a most unconquerable atheist: because he saw a man, who laid a false claim to one of his poems, and who perjured himself, go unpunished. His great impiety and blasphemies provoked his countrymen, and the Areopagites promised one talent to him who brought his head before their tribunal, and two if he were produced alive. He lived about 416 years before Christ. Cic. de Nat. D. 1, c. 23, l. 3, c. 37, &c.—Val. Max. 1, c. 1.——II. An athlete of Rhodes, 460 years before the Christian era. Pindar celebrated his merit in a beautiful ode, still extant, which was written in golden letters in a temple of Minerva. He saw his three sons crowned the same day at Olympia, and died through excess of joy. Cic. Tusc. 5.—Plut. in Pel.—Paus. 6, c. 7.

Diălis, a priest of Jupiter at Rome, first instituted by Numa. He was never permitted to swear, even upon public trials. Varro. L. L. 4, c. 15.—Dionys. 2.—Liv. 1, c. 20.

Diamastigōsis, a festival at Sparta, in honour of Diana Orthia, which received that name ἀπὸ τοῦ μαστίγουν, from whipping, because boys were whipped before the altar of the goddess. These boys, called Bomonicæ, were originally freeborn Spartans; but, in the more delicate ages, they were of mean birth, and generally of a slavish origin. This operation was performed by an officer, in a severe and unfeeling manner; and that no compassion should be raised, the priest stood near the altar with a small light statue of the goddess, which suddenly became heavy and insupportable if the lash of the whip was more lenient or less rigorous. The parents of the children attended the solemnity, and exhorted them not to commit any thing, either by fear or groans, that might be unworthy of Laconian education. These flagellations were so severe, that the blood gushed in profuse torrents, and many expired under the lash of the whip without uttering a groan, or betraying any marks of fear. Such a death was reckoned very honourable, and the corpse was buried with much solemnity, with a garland of flowers on its head. The origin of this festival is unknown. Some suppose that Lycurgus first instituted it. Orestes first introduced that barbarous custom, after he had brought the statue of Diana Taurica into Greece. There is another tradition, which mentions that Pausanias, as he was offering prayers and sacrifices to the gods, before he engaged with Mardonius, was suddenly attacked by a number of Lydians, who disturbed the sacrifice, and were at last repelled with staves and stones, the only weapons with which the Lacedæmonians were provided at that moment. In commemoration of this, therefore, that whipping of boys was instituted at Sparta, and after that the Lydian procession.

Diasia, festivals in honour of Jupiter, at Athens. They received their name, απο του Διος και της σωτης, from Jupiter and misfortune, because, by making applications to Jupiter, men obtained relief from their misfortunes, and were delivered from dangers. During this festival things of all kinds were exposed to sale.

Dicearchus, a Messenian, famous for his knowledge of philosophy, history, and mathematics. He was one of Aristotle's disciples. Nothing remains of his numerous compositions. He had composed a history of the Spartan republic, which was publicly read over every year by order of the magistrates, for the improvement and instruction of youth.

Digenes, an Egyptian philosopher in the age of Augustus, who travelled into Scythia, where he ingratiated himself with the king of the country, and by his instructions softened the wildness and rusticity of his manners. He also gained such an influence over the multitude, that they destroyed all the vines which grew in their country, to prevent the riot and dissipation which the wine occasioned among them. He wrote all his maxims and his laws in a book, that they might not lose the benefit of them after his death.

Dictator, a magistrate at Rome, invested with regal authority. This officer, whose magistracy seems to have been borrowed from the customs of the Albans or Latins, was first chosen during the Roman wars against the Latins. The consuls being unable to raise forces for the defence of the state, because the plebeians refused to enlist if they were not discharged from all the debts they had contracted with the patricians, the senate found it necessary to elect a new magistrate, with absolute and uncontrollable power, to take care of the state. The dictator remained in office for six months; after which he was again elected, if the affairs of the state seemed to be desperate; but if tranquillity was re-established, he generally laid down his power before the time was expired. He knew no superior in the republic, and even the laws were subjected to him. He was called dictator, because dictus, named by the consul, or quoniam dictis ejus parebat populus, because the people implicitly obeyed his command. He was named by the consul in the night, vivâ voce, and his election was confirmed by the auguries, though sometimes he was nominated or recommended by the people. As his power was absolute, he could proclaim war, levy forces, conduct them against an enemy, and disband them at pleasure. He punished as he pleased: and from his decision there was no appeal, at least till later times. He was preceded by 24 lictors, with the fasces; during his administration, all other officers except the tribunes of the people, were suspended, and he was the master of the republic. But amidst all this independence he was not permitted to go beyond the borders of Italy, and he was always obliged to march on foot in his expeditions; and he never could ride, in difficult and laborious marches, without previously obtaining a formal leave from the people. This office, so respectable and illustrious in the first ages of the republic, became odious by the perpetual usurpations of Sylla and J. Cæsar; and after the death of the latter, the Roman senate, on the motion of the consul Antony, passed a decree, which for ever after forbade a dictator to exist in Rome. The dictator, as soon as elected, chose a subordinate officer, called his master of horse, magister equitum. This officer was respectable, but he was totally subservient to the will of the dictator, and could do nothing without his express order, though he enjoyed the privilege of using a horse, and had the same insignia as the prætors. This subordination, however, was some time after removed; and during the second Punic war the master of the horse was invested with a power equal to that of the dictator. A second dictator was also chosen for the election of magistrates at Rome, after the battle of Cannæ. The dictatorship was originally confined to the patricians, but the plebeians were afterwards admitted to share it. Titus Latius Flavus was the first dictator, A. U. C. 253. *Dionys. Dictys, a Cretan, who went with Idomeneus to the Trojan war. It is supposed that he wrote a history of this celebrated war, and that at his death he ordered it to be laid in his tomb, where it remained, till a violent earthquake in the reign of Nero opened the monument where he had been buried. This convulsion of the earth threw out his history of the Trojan war, which was found by some shepherds, and afterwards carried to Rome. This mysterious tradition is deservedly deemed fabulous; and the history of the Trojan war, which is now extant as the composition of Dictys of Crete, was composed in the 15th century, or, according to others, in the age of Constantine, and falsely attributed to one of the followers of Idomeneus. The edition of Dictys is by Masellus Venia, 4to. Mediol. 1477.

Didia Lex, de Sumptibus, by Didius, A. U. C. 606, to restrain the expenses that attended public festivals and entertainments, and limit the number of guests which generally attended them, not only at Rome, but in all the provinces of Italy. By it, not only those who received guests in these festive meetings, but the guests themselves, were liable to be fined. It was an extension of the Oppian and Fannian laws.

Didius, I. a governor of Spain, conquered by Sertorius. Plut. in Sert.——II. A man who brought Cæsar the head of Pompey's eldest son. Plut.——III. A governor of Britain, under Claudius.——IV. Julianus, a rich Roman, who, after the murder of Pertinax, bought the empire which the prætorians had exposed to sale, A. D. 192. His great luxury and extravagance rendered him odious; and when he refused to pay the money which he had promised for the imperial purple, the soldiers revolted against him, and put him to death, after a short reign. Severus was made emperor after him.

Dido, called also Elissa, a daughter of Belus, king of Tyre, who married Sichæus, or Sicharbas, her uncle, who was priest of Hercules. Pygmalion, who succeeded to the throne of Tyre after Belus, murdered Sichæus, to get possession of the immense riches which he possessed; and Dido, disconsolate for the loss of a husband whom she tenderly loved, and by whom she was equally esteemed, set sail in quest of a settlement, with a number of Tyrians, to whom the cruelty of the tyrant became odious. According to some accounts, she threw into the sea the riches of her husband, which Pygmalion so greatly desired; and by that artifice compelled the ships to fly with her, that had come by order of the tyrant to obtain the riches of Sichæus. A storm drove her fleet on the African coast, and she bought of the inhabitants as much land as could be covered by a bull's hide cut into thongs. Upon this piece of land she built a citadel called Byrsa, (Vid. Byrsa,) and the increase of population, and the rising commerce among her subjects, soon obliged her to enlarge her city and the boundaries of her dominions. Her beauty, as well as the fame of her enterprise, gained her many admirers; and her subjects wished to compel her to mary Iarbas, king of Mauretania, who threatened them with a dreadful war. Dido begged three months to give her decisive answer; and during that time she erected a funeral pile, as if wishing, by a solemn sacrifice, to appease the manes of Sichæus, to whom she had promised eternal fidelity. When all was prepared, she stabbed herself on the pile in presence of her people, and by this uncommon action obtained the name of Dido, valiant woman, instead of Elissa. According to Virgil and Ovid, the death of Dido was caused by the sudden departure of Æneas, of whom she was deeply enamoured, and whom she could not obtain as a husband. This poetical fiction represents Æneas as living in the age of Dido, and introduces an anachronism of near 300 years. Dido left Phœnicia 247 years after the Trojan war, or the age of Æneas, that is, about 953 years B. C. This chronological error proceeds not from the ignorance of the poets, but it is supported by the authority of Horace:—

"Aut famam sequere, aut sibi convenientia finge."

While Virgil describes, in a beautiful episode, the desperate love of Dido, and the submission of Æneas to the will of the gods; he at the same time gives an explanation of the hatred which existed between the republics of Rome and Carthage, and informs his readers that their mutual enmity originated in their very first foundation, and was apparently kindled by a more remote cause than the jealousy and rivalship of two flourishing empires. Dido, after her death, was honoured as a deity by her subjects. Justin. 18, c. 4, &c.—Paterc. 1, c. 6.—Virg. Æn.—Ovid. Met. 14, fab. 2.—Heroid. 7.—*Appian. DĬDȳMUS, a scholiast on Homer, surnamed Χαλκεντερος, flourished B. C. 40. He wrote a number of books, which are now lost. The editions of his commentaries are, that in 2 vols. 8vo. Venut. apud. Ald. 1528, and that of Paris, 8vo. 1530.

DIĔNĔCES, a Spartan, who, upon hearing, before the battle of Thermopylæ, that the Persians were so numerous that their arrows would darken the light of the sun, observed, that it would be a great convenience, for they then should fight in the shade. Herodot. 7, c. 226.

DIMARCHUS, a Greek orator, son of Sostratus, and disciple to Theophrastus, at Athens. He acquired much money by his compositions, and suffered himself to be bribed by the enemies of the Athenians, 307 B. C. Of 64 of his orations, only three remain. Cic. de Orat. 2, c. 53.

DINŌCHĂRES, an architect, who finished the temple of Diana at Ephesus, after it had been burnt by Erostratus.

DINŌCRĂTES, I. an architect of Macedonia, who proposed to Alexander to cut mount Athos in the form of a statue, holding a city in one hand, and in the other a basin, into which all the waters of the mountain should empty themselves. This project Alexander rejected as too chimerical, but he employed the talents of the artist in building and beautifying Alexandria. He began to build a temple in honour of Arsinoe, by order of Ptolemy Philadelphus, in which he intended to suspend a statue of the queen by means of loadstones. His death, and that of his royal patron, prevented the execution of a work which would have been the admiration of future ages. Plin. 7, c. 37.—Marcell. 22, c. 40.—Plut. in Alex.——II. DINOLŌCHUS, a Syracusan, who composed 14 comedies. Ælian. de Anim. 6, c. 52.

DINON, the father of Clitarchus, who wrote a history of Persia in Alexander's age. He is esteemed a very authentic historian by C. Nep. in Conon.—Plut. in Alex.—Diog.

DIŌCLEA, festivals in the spring at Megara, in honour of Diocles, who died in the defence of a certain youth to whom he was tenderly attached. There was a contention on his tomb, and the youth who gave the sweetest kiss was publicly rewarded with a garland. Theocritus has described them in his 12 Idyll. v. 27.

DIOCLES, I. a general of Athens, &c. Polyæn. 5.——II. A comic poet of Athens.——III. An historian, the first Grecian who ever wrote concerning the origin of the Romans and the fabulous history of Romulus. Plut. in Rom.—— IV. One of the four brothers placed over the citadel of Corinth by Archelaus, &c. Polyæn. 6.

DIOCLETIĂNUS, I. (Caius Valerius Jovius) a celebrated Roman emperor, born of an obscure family in Dalmatia. He was first a common soldier, and by merit and success he gradually rose to the office of a general, and, at the death of Numerian, he was invested with the imperial purple. In his high station he rewarded the virtues and fidelity of Maximian, who had shared with him all the subordinate officers in the army, by making him his colleague on the throne. He created two subordinate emperors, Constantius and Galerius, whom he called Cæsars, whilst he claimed for himself and his colleague the superior title of Augustus. Diocletian has been celebrated for his military virtues; and though he was naturally unpolished by education and study, yet he was the friend and patron of learning with true genius. His cruelty, however, against the followers of Christianity has been deservedly branded with the appellation of unbounded tyranny and insolent wantonness. After he had reigned 21 years in the greatest prosperity, he publicly abdicated the crown at Nicomedia, on the first of May, A. D. 304, and retired to a private station at Salona. Maximian, his colleague, followed his example, but not from voluntary choice; and when he some time after endeavoured to rouse the ambition of Diocletian, and persuade him to reassume the imperial purple, he received for answer, that Diocletian took now more delight in cultivating his little garden, than he formerly enjoyed in a palace when his power was extended over all the earth. He lived nine years after his abdication, in the greatest security and enjoyment at Salona, and died in the 68th year of his age. Diocletian is the first sovereign who voluntarily resigned his power; a philosophical resolution, which, in a later age, was imitated by the emperor Charles the fifth, of Germany.

Diŏdōrus, I. an historian, surnamed Siculus, because he was born in Sicily. He wrote a history of Egypt, Persia, Syria, Media, Greece, Rome, and Carthage, which was divided into 40 books, of which only 15 are extant, with some few fragments. This valuable composition was the work of an accurate inquirer, and it is said that he visited all the places of which he has made mention in his history. It was the labour of 30 years, though the greater part may be considered as nothing more than a judicious compilation from Berosus, Timæus, Theopompus, Callisthenes, and others. The author, however, is too credulous in some of his narrations, and often wanders far from the truth. His style is neither elegant nor too laboured; but of great simplicity and unaffected correctness. He often dwells too long upon fabulous reports and trifling incidents, while events of the greatest importance to history are treated with brevity, and sometimes passed over in silence. His manner of reckoning, by the Olympiads and the Roman consuls, will be found very erroneous. The historian flourished about 44 years B. C. He spent much time at Rome to procure information and authenticate his historical narrations. The best edition of his works is that of Wesseling, 2 vols. fol. Amst. 1746.——II. A stoic philosopher, preceptor to Cicero. He lived and died in the house of his pupil, whom he instructed in the various branches of Greek literature. Cic. in Brut.

Diŏgĕnes, I. a celebrated cynic philosopher of Sinope, banished from his country for coining false money. From Sinope he retired to Athens, where he became the disciple of Antisthenes, who was at the head of the cynics. Antisthenes, at first, refused to admit him into his house, and even struck him with a stick. Diogenes calmly bore the rebuke, and said, Strike me, Antisthenes, but never shall you find a stick sufficiently hard to remove me from your presence while there is any thing to be learnt, any information to be gained from your conversation and acquaintance. Such firmness recommended him to Antisthenes, and he became his most devoted pupil. He dressed himself in the garment which distinguished the cynics, and walked about the streets with a tub on his head, which served him as a house and a place of repose. Such singularity, joined to the greatest contempt for riches, soon gained him reputation; and Alexander the Great condescended to visit the philosopher in his tub. He asked Diogenes if there was any thing in which he could gratify or oblige him. Get out of my sunshine, was the only answer which the philosopher gave. Such an independence of mind so pleased the monarch, that he turned to his courtiers, and said, "Were I not Alexander, I would wish to be Diogenes." He was once sold as a slave; but his magnanimity so pleased his master, that he made him the preceptor of his children and the guardian of his estates. After a life spent in the greatest misery and indigence, he died B. C. 324, in the 96th year of his age. ——II. A stoic of Babylon, disciple of Chrysippus. He went to Athens, and was sent as ambassador to Rome, with Carneades and Critolaus, 155 years before Christ. He died in the 88th year of his age, after a life of the most exemplary virtue. Some suppose that he was strangled by order of Antiochus, king of Syria, for speaking disrespectfully of his family in one of his treatises. Quintil. 1, c. 1.—Athen. 5, c. 11.—Cic. de Offic. 3, c. 51.——III. Laertius, an Epicurean philosopher, born in Cilicia. He wrote the lives of the philosophers, in ten books, still extant. This work contains an accurate account of the ancient philosophers, and is replete with all their anecdotes and particular opinions. It is compiled, however, without any plan, method, or precision, though much neatness and conciseness are observable through the whole. In this multifarious biography, the author does not seem particularly partial to any sect, except, perhaps, it be that of Potamon, of Alexandria. Diogenes died A. D. 222. The best editions of his works are that of Meibomius, 2 vols. 4to. Amst. 1692, and that of Lips. 8vo. 1759.

Diognetus, a philosopher who instructed Marcus Aurelius in philosophy and in writing dialogues.

Diŏmēdes, son of Tydeus and Deiphyle, was king of Ætolia, and one of the bravest of the Grecian chiefs in the Trojan war. He engaged Hector and Æneas, and by repeated acts of valour obtained much military glory. He went with Ulysses to steal the Palladium from the temple of Minerva at Troy, and assisted in murdering Rhesus, king of Thrace, and carrying away his horses. At his return from the siege of Troy, he lost his way in the darkness of the night, and landed in Attica, where his companion plundered the country, and lost the Trojan Palladium. During his long absence, his wife Ægiale forgot her marriage vows, and Diomedes resolved to abandon his native country. He came to that part of Italy which has been called Magna Græcia, where he built a city, called Argyripa, and married the daughter of Daunus, the king of the country. He died there in extreme old age, or, according to a certain tradition, he perished by the hand of his father-in-law. His death was greatly lamented by his companions, who, in the excess of their grief, were changed into birds resembling swans. These birds took flight into a neighbouring island in the Adriatic, and became remarkable for the tameness with which they approached the Greeks, and for the horror with which they shunned all other nations. They are called the birds of Diomedes. Altars were raised to Diomedes, as to a god, one of which Strabo mentions at Timavus. Virg. Æn. 1, v. 756, l. 11, v. 243, &c.—Ovid. Met. 14, fab. 10.—Apollod. 1, c. 8, l. 3, c. 7.—Hygin. fab. 97, 112, and 113.—Paus. 2, c. 30.

Dion, I. a Syracusan, son of Hipparinus, famous for his power and abilities. He was related to Dionysius, and often advised him, together with the philosopher Plato, who, at his request, had come to reside at the tyrant's court, to lay aside the supreme power. His great popularity rendered him odious in the eyes of the tyrant, who banished him to Greece. There he collected a numerous force, and, encouraged by the influence of his name and the hatred of his enemy, he resolved to free his country from tyranny. He entered the port of Syracuse only with two ships, and in three days reduced under his power an empire which had already subsisted for fifty years, and which was guarded by 500 ships of war, and 100,000 foot and 10,000 horse. The tyrant fled to Corinth, and Dion kept the power in his own hands, fearful of the aspiring ambition of some of the friends of Dionysius. He was, however, shamefully betrayed and murdered by one of his familiar friends, called Callicrates, or Callipus, 354 years before the Christian era, in the 55th year of his age, and four years after his return from Peloponnesus. His death was universally lamented by the Syracusans, and a monument was raised to his memory. Diod. 16.—C. Nep. in vitâ.——II. Cassius, a native of Nicæa in Bithynia. His father's name was Apronianus. He was raised to the greatest offices of state in the Roman empire by Pertinax and his three successors. Naturally fond of study, he improved himself by unwearied application, and was ten years in collecting materials for a history of Rome, which he made public in 80 books, after a laborious employment of 12 years in composing it. This valuable history began with the arrival of Æneas in Italy, and was continued down to the reign of the emperor Alexander Severus. The 34 first books are totally lost, the 20 following are mutilated, and fragments are all that we possess of the last 20. In the compilation of his extensive history, Dion proposed to himself Thucydides for a model; but he is not perfectly happy in his imitation. His style is pure and elegant, and his narrations are judiciously managed, and his reflections learned; but upon the whole he is credulous, and the bigoted slave of partiality, satire, and flattery. He inveighs against the republican principles of Brutus and Cicero, and extols the cause of Cæsar. Seneca is the object of his satire, and he represents him as debauched and licentious in his morals. Dion flourished about the 230th year of the Christian era. The best edition of his works is that of Reimarus, 2 vols. fol. Hamb. 1750.——III. A famous Christian writer, surnamed Chrysostom, &c.

Διονύσια, festivals in honour of Bacchus among the Greeks. Their form and solemnity were first introduced into Greece from Egypt by a certain Melampus, and if we admit that Bacchus is the same as Isis, the Dionysia of the Greeks are the same as the festivals celebrated by the Egyptians in honour of Isis. They were observed at Athens with more splendour and ceremonious superstition than in any other part of Greece. The years were numbered by their celebration, the archon assisted at the solemnity, and the priests that officiated were honoured with the most dignified seats at the public games. At first they were celebrated with great simplicity, and the time was consecrated to mirth. It was then usual to bring a vessel of wine adorned with a vine branch, after which followed a goat, a basket of figs, and the φαλλοι. The worshippers imitated in their dress and actions the poetical fictions concerning Bacchus. They clothed themselves in fawnskins, fine linen, and mitres; they carried thyrsi, drums, pipes, and flutes, and crowned themselves with garlands of ivy, vine, fir, &c. Some imitated Silenus, Pan, and the Satyrs, by the uncouth manner of their dress and their fantastical motions. Some rode upon asses, and others drove the goats to slaughter for the sacrifice. In this manner both sexes joined in the solemnity, and ran about the hills and country, nodding their heads, dancing in ridiculous postures, and filling the air with hideous shrieks and shouts, and crying aloud, Evoe Bacche! Io! Io! Evoe! Iacche! Iobacche! Evohe! Besides these, there were a number of persons called λικνοφοροι, who carried the λικνον or musical van of Bacchus; without their attendance none of the festivals of Bacchus were celebrated with due solemnity, and on that account the god is often called λικνιτης. The festivals of Bacchus were almost innumerable. The name of the most celebrated were the Dionysia αρχαιοτερα, at Limnæ in Attica. The chief persons that officiated were fourteen women, called γεραιραι, venerable. They were appointed by one of the archons, and before their appointment they solemnly took an oath, before the archon or his wife, that their body was free from all pollution.——The greater Dionysia, sometimes called αστικα or τα κατ' αστυ, as being celebrated within the city, were the most famous. They were supposed to be the same as the preceding.——The less Dionysia, sometimes called τα κατ' αγρους, because celebrated in the country, or ληναια, from ληνος a winepress, were to all appearance a preparation for the greater festivals. They were celebrated in autumn.——The Dionysia βραυρωνια, observed at Brauron in Attica, were a scene of lewdness, extravagance, and debauchery.——The Dionysia νυκτηλια were observed by the Athenians in honour of Bacchus Nyctelius. It was unlawful to reveal whatever was seen or done during the celebration.——The Dionysia called ωμοφαγια, because human victims were offered to the god, or because the priests imitated the eating of raw flesh, were celebrated with much solemnity. The priests put serpents in their hair, and by the wildness of their looks, and the oddity of their actions, they feigned insanity.——The Dionysia αοκαδικα were yearly observed in Arcadia, and the children who had been instructed in the music of Philoxenus and Timotheus, were introduced in a theatre, where they celebrated the festivals of Bacchus by entertaining the spectators with songs, dances, and different exhibitions. There were, besides these, others of inferior note. There was also one observed every three years, called Dionysia τριετηρικα, and it is said that Bacchus instituted it himself in commemoration of his Indian expedition, in which he spent three years. There is also another, celebrated every fifth year, as mentioned by the scholiast of Aristophanes.——All these festivals in honour of the god of wine, were celebrated by the Greeks with great licentiousness, and they contributed much to the corruption of morals among all ranks of people. They were also introduced into Tuscany, and from thence to Rome. Among the Romans both sexes promiscuously joined in the celebration during the darkness of night. The drunkenness, the debauchery, and impure actions and indulgences, which soon prevailed at the solemnity, called aloud for the interference of the senate; and the consuls Sp. Posthumius Albinus and Q. Martius Philippus, made a strict examination concerning the propriety and superstitious forms of the Bacchanalia. The disorder and pollution which was practised with impunity by no less than 7000 votaries of either sex, was beheld with horror and astonishment by the consuls; and the Bacchanalia were for ever banished from Rome by a decree of the senate. They were again reinstituted there in length of time, but not with such licentiousness as before. Eurip. in Bacc.—Virg. Æn. 11, v. 737.—Diod. 4.—Ovid. Met. 3, v. 533, l. 4. v. 391, l. 6, v. 587.

Dionysius, 1st, or the elder, was son of Hermocrates. He signalized himself in the wars which the Syracusans carried on against the Carthaginians, and taking advantage of the power lodged in his hands, he made himself absolute at Syracuse. To strengthen himself in his usurpation, and acquire popularity, he increased the pay of the soldiers, and recalled those that had been banished. He vowed eternal enmity against Carthage, and experienced various successes in his wars against that republic. He was ambitious of being thought a poet, and his brother Theodorus was commissioned to go to Olympia, and repeat there some verses in his name, with other competitors, for the poetical prizes. His expectations were frustrated, and his poetry was received with groans and hisses. He was not, however, so unsuccessful at Athens, where a poetical prize was publicly adjudged to one of his compositions. This victory gave him more pleasure than all the victories he had ever obtained in the field of battle. His tyranny and cruelty at home rendered him odious in the eyes of his subjects, and he became so suspicious, that he never admitted his wife or children to his private apartments without a previous examination of their garments. He never trusted his head to a barber, but always burnt his beard. He made a subterraneous cave in a rock, said to be still extant, in the form of a human ear, which measured 80 feet in height and 250 in length. It was called the ear of Dionysius. The sounds of this subterraneous cave were all necessarily directed to one common tympanum, which had a communication with an adjoining room where Dionysius spent the greater part of his time to hear whatever was said by those whom his suspicions and cruelty had confined in the apartments above. The artists that had been employed in making this cave were all put to death by order of the tyrant, for fear of their revealing to what purpose a work of such uncommon construction was to be appropriated. His impiety and sacrilege were as conspicuous as his suspicious credulity. He took a golden mantle from the statue of Jupiter, observing that the son of Saturn had too warm a covering for the summer, and too cold for the winter, and he placed one of wool instead. He also robbed Æsculapius of his golden beard, and plundered the temple of Proserpine. He died of an indigestion, in the 63d year of his age, B. C. 368, after a reign of 38 years. Authors, however, are divided about the manner of his death, and some are of opinion that he died a violent death. Some suppose that the tyrant invented the catapulta, an engine which proved of infinite service for the discharging of showers of darts and stones in the time of a siege. Diod. 13, 14, &c.—Justin. 20, c. 1, &c.—Xenoph. Hist. Græc.—C. Nep. Timol.—Plut. in Diod.——The second of that name, surnamed the younger, was son of Dionysius the 1st, by Doris. He succeeded his father as tyrant of Sicily, and by the advice of Dion, his brother-in-law, he invited the philosopher Plato to his court, under whom he studied for a while. The philosopher advised him to lay aside the supreme power, and in his admonitions he was warmly seconded by Dion. Dionysius refused to consent, and soon after Plato was seized and publicly sold as a slave. Dion likewise, on account of his great popularity, was severely abused and insulted in his family, and his wife given in marriage to another. Such a violent behaviour was highly resented; Dion, who was banished, collected some forces in Greece, and in three days rendered himself master of Syracuse, and expelled the tyrant B. C. 357. (Vid. Dion.) Dionysius retired to Locri, where he behaved with the greatest oppression, and was ejected by the citizens. He recovered Syracuse ten years after his expulsion; but his triumph was short, and the Corinthians, under the conduct of Timoleon, obliged him to abandon the city. He fled to Corinth, where, to support himself, he kept a school, as Cicero observes, that he might still continue to be tyrant; and as he could not command over men, that he might still exercise his power over boys. It is said that he died from an excess of joy when he heard that a tragedy of his own composition had been awarded with a poetical prize. Dionysius was as cruel as his father, but he did not, like him, possess the art of retaining his power. This was seen and remarked by the old man, who, when he saw his son attempting to debauch the wives of some of his subjects, asked him, with the greatest indignation, whether he had ever heard of his having acted so brutal a part in his younger days? No, (answered the son) because you were not the son of a king. Well, my son, (replied the old man,) never shalt thou be the father of a king. Justin. 21, c. 1, 2, &c.—Diod. 15, &c.—Ælian. V. H. 9, c. 8.—Quintil. 8, c. 6.—C. Nep. in Dion.—Cic. Tusc. 5, c. 2.——III. An historian of Halicarnassus, who left his country and came to reside at Rome, that he might carefully study all the Greek and Latin writers, whose compositions treated of the Roman history. He formed an acquaintance with all the learned of the age, and derived much information from their company and conversation. After an unremitted application during 24 years, he gave to the world his Roman antiquities, in 20 books, of which only the 11 first are now extant, nearly containing the account of 312 years. His composition has been greatly valued by the ancients as well as the moderns for the easiness of his style, the fidelity of his chronology, and the judiciousness of his remarks and criticism. Like a faithful historian, he never mentioned any thing but what was authenticated, and totally disregarded the fabulous traditions which fill and disgrace the pages of both his predecessors and followers. To the merits of the elegant historian, Dionysius, as may be seen in his treatises, has also added the equally respectable character of the eloquent orator, the critic, and the politician. He lived during the Augustan age, and came to Rome about 30 years before the Christian era. The best editions of his works are that of Oxford, 2 vols. fol. 1704, and that of Reiske, 6 vols. 8vo. Lips. 1774. ——IV. A tyrant of Heraclea in Pontus, in the age of Alexander the Great. After the death of the conqueror and of Perdiccas, he married Amestris, the niece of king Darius, and assumed the title of king. He was of such an uncommon corpulence that he never exposed his person in public; and when he gave audience to foreign ambassadors, he always placed himself in a chair, which was conveniently made to hide his face and person from the eyes of the spectators. When he was asleep it was impossible to wake him without boring his flesh with pins. He died in the 55th year of his age. As his reign was remarkable for mildness and popularity, his death was severely lamented by his subjects. He left two sons and a daughter, and appointed his widow queen regent.——V. A writer in the Augustan age, called Periegetes. He wrote a very valuable geographical treatise in Greek hexameters, still extant. The best edition of his treatise is that of Henry Stephens, 4to. 1577, with the scholia, and that of Hill, 8vo. Lond. 1688.——VI. A Christian writer, A. D. 492, called Areopagita. The best edition of his works is that of Antwerp, 2 vols. fol. 1634.——VII. The music master of Epaminondas. C. Nep.——VIII. A celebrated critic. Vid. Longinus.

Diŏphantus, I. an Athenian general of the Greek mercenary troops in the service of Nectanebus, king of Egypt. Diod. 16.——II. A Greek orator of Mitylene, preceptor to Tib. Gracchus. Cic. in Brut.——III. A native of Alexandria, in the fourth century. He wrote 13 books of arithmetical questions, of which six are still extant, the best edition of which is that in folio, Tolosæ, 1670. He died in his 84th year, but the age in which he lived is uncertain. Some place him in the reign of Augustus, others under Nero and the Antonines.

Dioscorĭdes, I. a native of Cilicia, who was physician to Antony and Cleopatra, or lived, as some suppose, in the age of Nero. He was originally a soldier, but afterwards he applied himself to study, and wrote a book upon medicinal herbs, of which the best edition is that of Saracenus, fol. Francof. 1598.——II. A man who wrote an account of the republic of Lacedæmon. A nephew of Antigonus. Diod. 19.

Diotĭme, a woman who gave lectures upon philosophy, which Socrates attended. Plut. in Symp.

Diphĭlus, I. the contemporary of Menander, was born at Sinope in Pontus, and died at Smyrna in Ionia. His comedies were celebrated for their wit, sense, and pleasantness; though some accused them of occasional dullness and insipidity. Plautus took his Casina from the Κληρούμενοι of Diphilus.——II. An Athenian general, A. U. C. 371.——III. An architect, so slow in finishing his works, that Diphilo tardior became a proverb. Cic. ad fratr. 3.

Docimus, a man of Tarentum, deprived of his military dignity by Philip, son of Amyntas, for indulging himself with hot baths. Polyæn. 4.

Dŏdōnĭdes, the priestesses who gave oracles in the temple of Jupiter in Dodona. According to some traditions, the temple was originally inhabited by seven daughters of Atlas, who nursed Bacchus. Their names were Ambrosia, Eudora, Pasithoe, Pytho, Plexaure, Coronis, Tythe or Tyche. In the latter ages, the oracles were always delivered by three old women, which custom was first established when Jupiter enjoyed the company of Dione, whom he permitted to receive divine honours in his temple at Dodona. The Bœotians were the only people of Greece who received their oracles at Dodona from men, for reasons which Strabo 1. 9, fully explains.

Dolabella, (P. Corn.) I. a Roman who married the daughter of Cicero. During the civil wars he warmly espoused the interest of J. Cæsar, whom he accompanied at the famous battles at Pharsalia, Africa, and Munda. He was made consul by his patron, though M. Antony, his colleague, opposed it. After the death of J. Cæsar, he received the government of Syria as his province. Cassius opposed his views, and Dolabella, for violence, and for the assassination of Trebonius, one of Cæsar's murderers, was declared an enemy to the republic of Rome. He was besieged by Cassius in Laodicea, and when he saw that all was lost, he killed himself, in the 27th year of his age. He was of a small stature, which gave occasion to his father-in-law to ask him once, when he entered his house, who had tied him so cleverly to his sword.——II. Another, who conquered the Gauls, Etrurians, and Boii, at the lake Vadimonis, B. C. 283.——The family of the Dolabellæ distinguished themselves at Rome, and one of them (L. Corn.) conquered Lusitania, B. C. 99.

Dŏlon, I. a Trojan, son of Eumedes, famous for his swiftness. Being sent by Hector to spy the Grecian camp by night, he was seized by Diomedes and Ulysses, to whom he revealed the situation, schemes, and resolutions of his countrymen, with the hope of escaping with his life. He was put to death by Diomedes, as a traitor. Homer. Il. 10, v. 314.—Virg. Æn. 12, v. 349, &c. ——II. A poet. Vid. Susarion.

Domĭnica, a daughter of Petronius, who married the emperor Valens.

Domitia Lex, de Religione, was enacted by Domitius Ahenobarbus, the tribune, A. U. C. 650. It transferred the right of electing priests from the college to the people.

Domitia Longīna, a Roman lady, who boasted of her debaucheries. She was the wife of the emperor Domitian.

Domitiānus, Titus Flavius, son of Vespasian and Flavia Domatilla, made himself emperor of Rome at the death of his brother Titus, whom, according to some accounts, he destroyed by poison. The beginning of his reign promised tranquillity to the people, but their expectations were soon frustrated. Domitian became cruel, and gave way to incestuous and unnatural indulgences. He commanded himself to be called God and Lord in all the papers which were presented to him. He passed the greatest part of the day in catching flies, and killing them with a bodkin: so that it was wittily answered by Vibius to a person who asked him who was with the emperor, Nobody, not even a fly. In the latter part of his reign, Domitian became suspicious, and his anxieties were increased by the predictions of astrologers, but still more poignantly by the stings of remorse. He was so distrustful, even when alone, that round the terrace, where he usually walked, he built a wall with shining stone, that from them he might perceive, as in a looking-glass, whether any body followed him. All these precautions were unavailing; he perished by the hand of an assassin, the 8th of September, A. D. 96, in the 45th year of his age and the 15th of his reign. He was the last of the twelve Cæsars. He distinguished himself for his love of learning; and in a little treatise which he wrote upon the great care which ought to be taken of the hair, to prevent baldness, he displayed much taste and elegance, according to the observations of his biographers. After his death he was publicly deprived by the senate of all the honours which had been profusely heaped upon him, and even his body was left in the open air without the honours of a funeral. This disgrace might proceed from the resentment of the senators, whom he had exposed to terror as well as to ridicule. He once assembled that august body to know in what vessel a turbot might be most conveniently dressed. At another time they received a formal invitation to a feast, and when they arrived at the palace, they were introduced into a large gloomy hall hung with black, and lighted with a few glimmering tapers. In the middle were placed a number of coffins, on each of which was inscribed the name of some one of the invited senators. On a sudden a number of men burst into the room, clothed in black, with drawn swords and flaming torches, and after they had for some time terrified the guests, they permitted them to retire. Such were the amusements and cruelties of a man who, in the first part of his reign, was looked upon as the father of his people and the restorer of learning and liberty. Suet. in vitâ.—Eutrop. 7.

Domitilla, I. (Flavia,) a woman who married Vespasian, by whom she had Titus a year after her marriage, and 11 years after Domitian. ——II. A niece of the emperor Domitian, by whom she was banished.

Domitius Domitianus, I. a general of Diocletian in Egypt. He assumed the imperial purple at Alexandria, A. D. 268, and supported the dignity of emperor for about two years. He died a violent death.——II. Lucius. Vid. Ænobarbus.——III. Cn. Ænobarbus, a Roman consul, who conquered Bituitus the Gaul, and left 20,000 of the enemy on the field of battle, and took 3000 prisoners.——IV. A grammarian in the reign of Adrian. He was remarkable for his virtues and his melancholy disposition. —— V. A Roman who revolted from Antony to Augustus. He was at the battle of Pharsalia, and forced Pompey to fight by the mere force of his ridicule. ——VI. The father of Nero, famous for his cruelties and debaucheries. Suet. in Ner.—— VII. A tribune of the people, who conquered the Allobroges. Plut.——VIII. A consul, during whose consulate peace was concluded with Alexander king of Epirus. Liv. 8, c. 17.—— IX. A consul under Caligula. He wrote some few things now lost.——X. A Latin poet, called also Marsus, in the age of Horace. He wrote epigrams, remarkable for little besides their indelicacy. Ovid. de Pont. 4, el. 16, v. 5.——XI. Afer, an orator, who was preceptor to Quintilian. He disgraced his talents by his adulation, and by practising the arts of an informer under Tiberius and his successors. He was made a consul by Nero, and died A. D. 59.

Donatus, Ælius, I. a grammarian who flourished A. D. 353.——II. A bishop of Numidia, a promoter of the Donatists, A. D. 311. —— III. A bishop of Africa, banished from Carthage A. D. 356.

Dorso, (C. Fabius,) a Roman, who, when Rome was in the possession of the Gauls, issued from the capitol, which was then besieged, to go and offer a sacrifice, which was to be offered on mount Quirinalis. He dressed himself in sacerdotal robes, and carrying on his shoulders the statues of his country gods, passed through the guards of the enemy without betraying the least signs of fear. When he had finished his sacrifice, he returned to the capitol unmolested by the enemy, who were astonished at his boldness, and did not obstruct his passage or molest his sacrifice. Liv. 5, c. 46.

Dorus, a son of Hellen and Orseis, or, according to others, of Deucalion, who left Phthiotis, where his father reigned, and went to make a settlement with some of his companions near mount Ossa. The country was called Doris, and the inhabitants Dorians. Herodot. 1, c. 56, &c.

Dosiadas, a poet who wrote a piece of poetry in the form of an altar (βωμος) which Theocritus has imitated.

Draco, I. a celebrated lawgiver of Athens. When he exercised the office of archon, he made a code of laws, B. C. 623, for the use of the citizens, which, on account of their severity, were said to be written in letters of blood. By them, idleness was punished with as much severity as murder, and death was denounced against the one as well as the other. Such a code of rigorous laws gave occasion to a certain Athenian to ask of the legislator why he was so severe in his punishments; and Draco gave for answer, that as the smallest transgression had appeared to him deserving death, he could not find any punishment more rigorous for more atrocious crimes. These laws were at first enforced, but they were often neglected on account of their extreme severity, and Solon totally abolished them, except that one which punished a murderer with death. The popularity of Draco was uncommon, but the gratitude of his admirers proved fatal to him. When once he appeared on the theatre, he was received with repeated applause, and the people, according to the custom of the Athenians, showed their respect to their lawgiver by throwing garments upon him. This was done in such profusion, that Draco was soon hid under them, and smothered by the too great veneration of his citizens. Plut. in Sol.——II. A man who instructed Plato in music. Id. de Music.

Drances. Vid. Part III.

Drimachus, a famous robber of Chios. When a price was set upon his head, he ordered a young man to cut it off and go and receive the money. Such an uncommon instance of generosity so pleased the Chians, that they raised a temple to his memory and honoured him as a god. Athen. 13.

Drusilla Livia, a daughter of Germanicus and Agrippina, famous for her debaucheries and licentiousness. Her brother Caligula was so tenderly attached to her, that in a dangerous illness he made her heiress of all his possessions, and commanded that she should succeed him in the Roman empire. She died A. D. 38, in the 23d year of her age, and was deified by her brother Caligula, who survived her for some time.

Drūso, an unskilful historian and mean usurer, who obliged his debtors, when they could not pay him, to hear him read his compositions, to draw from them praises and flattery. Horat. 1, Sat. 3, v. 86.

Drusus, I. a son of Tiberius and Vipsania, who made himself famous by his intrepidity and courage in the provinces of Illyricum and Pannonia. He was raised to the greatest honours of the state by his father, but a blow which he gave to Sejanus, an audacious libertine, proved his ruin. Sejanus corrupted Livia, the wife of Drusus, and in conjunction with her he caused him to be poisoned by a eunuch, A. D. 23.——II. A son of Germanicus and Agrippina, who enjoyed offices of the greatest trust under Tiberius. His enemy Sejanus, however, effected his ruin by his insinuations; Drusus was confined by Tiberius, and deprived of all aliment. He was found dead nine days after his confinement, A. D. 33.——III. A son of the emperor Claudius, who died by swallowing a pear thrown in the air.——IV. An ambitious Roman, grandfather to Cato. He was killed for his seditious conduct. Paterc. 1, c. 13.——V. Livius, father of Julia Augusta, was intimate with Brutus, and killed himself with him after the battle of Philippi. Paterc. 2, c. 71.——VI. M. Livius, a celebrated Roman, who renewed the proposals of the Agrarian laws, which had proved fatal to the Gracchi. He was murdered as he entered his house, though he was attended with a number of clients and Latins, to whom he had proposed the privileges of Roman citizens, B. C. 190. Cic. ad Her. 4, c. 12.——VII. Nero Claudius, a son of Tiberius Nero and Livia, adopted by Augustus. He was brother to Tiberius, who was afterwards made emperor. He greatly signalized himself in his wars in Germany and Gaul, against the Rhœti and Vindelici, and was honoured with a triumph. He died of a fall from his horse in the 30th year of his age, B. C. 9. He left three children, Germanicus, Livia, and Claudius, by his wife Antonia. Dion.——VIII. Caius, an historian, who being one day missed from the cradle, was found the next on the highest part of the house, with his face turned towards the sun.——The plebeian family of the Drusi produced eight consuls, two censors, and one dictator. The surname of Drusus was given to the family of the Livii, as some suppose, because one of them killed a Gaulish leader of that name. Virg. in 6. Æn. v. 824, mentions the Drusi among the illustrious Romans, and that perhaps more particularly because the wife of Augustus was of that family.

Duillia Lex, was enacted by M. Duillius, a tribune, A. U. C. 304. It made it a capital crime to leave the Roman people without its tribunes, or to create any new magistrate without a sufficient cause. Liv. 3, c. 55.——Another, A. U. C. 392, to regulate what interest ought to be paid for money lent.

Duillius Nepos, C. a Roman consul, the first who obtained a victory over the naval power of Carthage, B. C. 260. He took 50 of the enemy's ships, and was honoured with a naval triumph, the first that ever appeared at Rome. The senate rewarded his valour by permitting him to have music playing and torches lighted, at the public expense, every day while he was at supper. There were some medals struck in commemoration of this victory, and there still exists a column at Rome, which was erected on the occasion. Cic. de Senec.—Tacit. Ann. 1, c. 12.

Dumnorix, a powerful chief among the Ædui. Cæs. Bell. G. 1, c. 9.

Duris, an historian of Samos, who flourished B. C. 257. He wrote the life of Agathocles of Syracuse, a treatise on tragedy, a history of Macedonia, &c. Strab. 1.

Duumviri, two noble patricians at Rome, first appointed by Tarquin to keep the Sybilline books, which were supposed to contain the fate of the Roman empire. These sacred books were placed in the capitol, and secured in a chest under the ground. They were consulted but seldom, and only by an order of the senate, when the armies had been defeated in war, or when Rome seemed to be threatened by an invasion or by secret seditions. These priests continued in their original institution till the year U. C. 388, when a law was proposed by the tribunes to increase the number to ten. Some time after Sylla increased them to fifteen, known by the name of Quindecemviri.——There were also certain magistrates at Rome, called Duumviri perduelliones sive capitales. They were first created by Tullus Hostilius, for trying such as were accused of treason. This office was abolished as unnecessary, but Cicero complains of their revival by Labienus the tribune. Orat. pro Rabir. Some of the commanders of the Roman vessels were also called Duumviri, especially when there were two together. They were first created A. U. C. 542. There were also in the municipal towns in the provinces two magistrates called Duumviri municipales. They were chosen from the Centurions, and their office was much the same as that of the two consuls at Rome. They were sometimes preceded by two lictors with the fasces. Their magistracy continued for five years, on which account they have been called Quinquennales magistratus.

Dymnus, one of Alexander's officers. He conspired with many of his fellow-soldiers against his master's life. The conspiracy was discovered, and Dymnus stabbed himself before he was brought before the king. Curt. 6, c. 7.

Dyscinētus, an Athenian archon. Paus. 4.

E.

Eddŏme, a festival in honour of Apollo at Athens, on the seventh day of every lunar month. It was usual to sing hymns in honour of the god, and to carry about boughs of laurel.——There was also another of the same name, celebrated by private families the seventh day after the birth of every child.

Echecrátes, a Thessalian, who offered violence to Phœbas, the priestess of Apollo's temple of Delphi. From this circumstance a decree was made, by which no woman was admitted to the office of priestess before the age of fifty. Diod. 4.

Echémus, I. an Arcadian, who conquered the Dorians when they endeavoured to recover Peloponnesus under Hyllus. Paus. 8, c. 5.——II. A king of Arcadia, who joined Aristomenes against the Spartans.

Echestrátus, a son of Agis 1st, king of Sparta, who succeeded his father, B. C. 1058. Herodot. 7, c. 204.

Eétion, I. the father of Andromache, and of seven sons, was king of Thebes in Cilicia. He was killed by Achilles. From him the word Eetioneus is applied to his relations or descendants. Homer. Il. 12.——II. The commander of the Athenian fleet conquered by the Macedonians under Clytus, near the Echinades. Diod. 18.

Egnátia Maximilla, a woman who accompanied her husband into banishment under Nero, &c. Tacit. Ann. 15, c. 71.

Elaphebólia, a festival in honour of Diana the Huntress. In the celebration a cake was made in the form of a deer, ελαφος, and offered to the goddess. It owed its institution to the following circumstance: when the Phocians had been severely beaten by the Thessalians, they resolved, by the persuasion of a certain Deiphantus, to raise a pile of combustible materials, and burn their wives, children, and effects, rather than submit to the enemy. This resolution was unanimously approved by the women, who decreed Deiphantus a crown for his magnanimity. When every thing was prepared, before they fired the pile, they engaged their enemies, and fought with such desperate fury, that they totally routed them, and obtained a complete victory. In commemoration of this unexpected success, this festival was instituted to Diana, and observed with the greatest solemnity, so that even one of the months of the year, March, was called Elaphebolion from this circumstance.

Electra, a daughter of Agamemnon, king of Argos. She first incited her brother Orestes to revenge his father's death by assassinating his mother Clytemnestra. Orestes gave her in marriage to his friend Pylades, and she became mother of two sons, Strophius and Medon. Her adventures and misfortunes form one of the interesting tragedies of the poet Sophocles. Hygin. fab. 122.—Paus. 2, c. 16.—Ælian. V. H. 4, c. 26, &c.

Electryon. Vid. Part III.

Eleusínia, a great festival observed every fourth year by the Celeans, Phliasians, as also by the Pheneatæ, Lacedæmonians, Parrhasians, and Cretans; but more particularly by the people of Athens, every fifth year, at Eleusis in Attica, where it was introduced by Eumolpus, B. C. 1356. It was the most celebrated of all the religious ceremonies of Greece; whence it is often called by way of eminence μυστηρια, the mysteries. If any one ever revealed it, it was supposed that he had called divine vengeance upon his head, and it was unsafe to live in the same house with him. Such a wretch was publicly put to an ignominious death. This festival was sacred to Ceres and Proserpine; every thing contained a mystery, and Ceres herself was known only by the name of αχθεια, from the sorrow and grief (αχθος) which she suffered for the loss of her daughter. This mysterious secrecy was solemnly observed, and enjoined to all the votaries of the goddess; and if any one ever appeared at the celebration, either intentionally or through ignorance, without proper introduction, he was immediately punished with death. Persons of both sexes and all ages were initiated at this solemnity; and it was looked upon as so heinous a crime to neglect this sacred part of religion, that it was one of the heaviest accusations which contributed to the condemnation of Socrates. The initiated were under the more particular care of the deities, and therefore their life was supposed to be attended with more happiness and real security than that of other men. This benefit was not only granted during life, but it extended beyond the grave; and they were honoured with the first places in the Elysian fields, while others were left to wallow in perpetual filth and ignominy. Such as were guilty of murder, though against their will, and such as were convicted of witchcraft, or any heinous crime, were not admitted; and the Athenians suffered none to be initiated but such as were members of their city. This regulation, which compelled Hercules, Castor, and Pollux, to become citizens of Athens, was strictly observed in the first ages of the institution, but afterwards, all persons, barbarians excepted, were freely initiated. The festivals were divided into greater and less mysteries. The less were instituted from the following circumstance: Hercules passed near Eleusis while the Athenians were celebrating the mysteries, and desired to be initiated. As this could not be done because he was a stranger, and as Eumolpus was unwilling to displease him on account of his great power, and the services which he had done to the Athenians, another festival was instituted without violating the laws. It was called μικρα, and Hercules was solemnly admitted to the celebration and initiated. These less mysteries were observed at Agræ near the Ilissus. The greater were celebrated at Eleusis, from which place Ceres has been called Eleusinia. In later times the smaller festivals were preparatory to the greater, and no person could be initiated at Eleusis without a previous purification at Agræ. This purification they performed by keeping themselves pure, chaste, and unpolluted during nine days, after which they came and offered sacrifices and prayers, wearing garlands of flowers, called ιερεια or ιμερα and having under their feet Διος Κωδιον, Jupiter's skin, which was the skin of a victim offered to that god. The person who assisted was called νεφανος from νεω, water, which was used at the purification, and they themselves were called, μυσαι, the initiated. A year after the initiation at the less mysteries, they sacrificed a sow to Ceres, and were admitted in the greater, and the secrets of the festivals were solemnly revealed to them, from which they were called εφοροι and σκοπται, inspectors. After this the priest, called Ιεροφαντης, proposed to them certain questions, to which they readily answered. After this, strange and amazing objects presented themselves to their sight, hideous noises and howlings were heard, and the trembling spectators were alarmed by sudden and dreaded apparitions. This was called αυτοψια, intuition. After this, the initiated were dismissed with the barbarious words of κογξ ομπαξ. The garments in which they were initiated were held sacred, and of no less efficacy to avert evils than charms and incantations. From this circumstance, therefore, they were never left off before they were totally unfit for wear, after which they were appropriated for children or dedicated to the goddess. The chief person that attended at the initiation was called Ιεροφαντης, the revealer of sacred things. He was a citizen of Athens, and held his office during life; though among the Celeans and Phliasians it was limited to the period of four years. He was obliged to devote himself totally to the service of the deities; his life was chaste and single, and he usually anointed his body with the juice of hemlock, which is said, by its extreme coldness, to extinguish, in a great degree, the natural heat. The Hierophantes had three attendants; the first was called δαδουχος, torch-bearer, and was permitted to marry. The second was called κηρυξ, a cryer. The third administered at the altar, and was called εστι βωμος.——This festival was observed in the month Boedromion or September, and continued nine days, from the 15th till the 23d. During that time it was unlawful to arrest any man, or present any petition, on pain of forfeiting a thousand drachmas, or, according to others, on pain of death. It was also unlawful for those who were initiated to sit upon the cover of a well; to eat beans, mullets, or weasels. If any woman rode to Eleusis in a chariot, she was obliged by an edict of Lycurgus to pay 6000 drachmas. The design of this law was to destroy all distinction between the richer and poorer sorts of citizens. The first day of the celebration was called αγυρμος, assembly, as it might be said that the worshippers first met together. The second day was called αλαδε μυσαι, to the sea, you that are initiated, because they were commanded to purify themselves by bathing in the sea. On the third day sacrifices, and chiefly a mullet, were offered; as also barley from a field of Eleusis. These oblations were called θυα, and held so sacred, that the priests themselves were not, as in other sacrifices, permitted to partake of them. On the fourth day, they made a solemn procession, in which the καλαθον, holy basket of Ceres, was carried about in a consecrated cart, while on every side the people shouted χαιρε Δημητερ Hail, Ceres! After these followed women, called κιστοφοροι, who carried baskets, in which were sesamum, carded wool, grains of salt, a serpent, pomegranates, reeds, ivy boughs, certain cakes, &c. The fifth was called Η των λαμπαδων ημερα, the torch-day, because on the following night the people run about with torches in their hands. It was usual to dedicate torches to Ceres, and contend which should offer the biggest in commemoration of the travels of the goddess, and of her lighting a torch in the flames of mount Ætna. The sixth day was called Ιακχος, from Iacchus, the son of Jupiter and Ceres, who accompanied his mother in her search of Proserpine, with a torch in his hand. From that circumstance his statue had a torch in his hand, and was carried in solemn procession from the Ceramicus to Eleusis. The statue, with those that accompanied it, called Ιακχαγωγοι, were crowned with myrtle. In the way, nothing was heard but singing and the noise of brazen kettles, as the votaries danced along. The way through which they issued from the city was called Ιερα οδος, the sacred way; the resting place, Ιερα συκη, from a fig-tree which grew in the neighbourhood. They also stopped on a bridge over the Cephisus, where they derided those that passed by. After they had passed this bridge, they entered Eleusis by a place called μυστικη εισοδος, the mystical entrance. On the seventh day were sports, in which the victors were rewarded with a measure of barley, as that grain had been first sown in Eleusis. The eighth day was called Επιδαυριων ημερα, because once Æsculapius, at his return from Epidaurus to Athens, was initiated by the repetition of the less mysteries. It became customary, therefore, to celebrate them a second time upon this, that such as had not hitherto been initiated, might be lawfully admitted. The ninth and last day of the festival was called Πλη μυχοαι, earthen vessels, because it was usual to fill two such vessels with wine, one of which being placed towards the east, and the other towards the west; which, after the repetition of some mystical words, were both thrown down; and the wine being spilt on the ground, was offered as a libation. Such was the manner of celebrating the Eleusinian mysteries, which have been deemed the most sacred and solemn of all the festivals observed by the Greeks. Some have supposed them to be obscene and abominable, and that from thence proceeded all the mysterious secrecy. They were carried from Eleusis to Rome in the reign of Adrian, where they were observed with the same ceremonies as before, though perhaps with more freedom and licentiousness. They lasted about 1800 years, and were at last abolished by Theodosius the Great. Ælian. V. H. 12, c. 24. Cic. de Leg. 2, c. 14.—Paus. 10, c. 21, &c.—Plut.

Eleutheria, a festival celebrated at Platæa in honour of Jupiter Eleutherius, or the asserter of liberty, by delegates from almost all the cities of Greece. Its institution originated in this: after the victory obtained by the Grecians under Pausanias over Mardonius, the Persian general in the country of Platæa, an altar and statue were erected to Jupiter Eleutherius, who had freed the Greeks from the tyranny of the barbarians. It was further agreed upon, in a general assembly, by the advice of Aristides the Athenian, that deputies should be sent every fifth year from the different cities of Greece to celebrate Eleutheria, festivals of liberty. The Platæans celebrated also an aniversary festival in memory of those who had lost their lives in that famous battle. There was also a festival of the same name observed by the Samians, in honour of the god of love. Slaves also, when they obtained their liberty, kept a holiday, which they called Eleutheria.

Eliensis. and Eliaca, a sect of philosophers founded by Phædon of Elis, who was originally a slave, but restored to liberty by Alcibiades. Diog.—Strab.

Elpinice, a daughter of Miltiades, who married a man that promised to release from confinement her brother and husband, whom the laws of Athens had made responsible for the fine imposed on his father. C. Nep. in Cim.

EMPEDOCLES, a philosopher, poet, and historian of Agrigentum in Sicily, who flourished 444 B. C. He was the disciple of Telauges the Pythagorean, and warmly adopted the doctrine of transmigration. He wrote a poem upon the opinions of Pythagoras, very much commended, in which he spoke of the various bodies which nature had given him. He was first a girl, afterwards a boy, a shrub, a bird, a fish, and lastly Empedocles. His poetry was bold and animated, and his verses were so universally esteemed, that they were publicly recited at the Olympic games with those of Homer and Hesiod. Empedocles was no less remarkable for his humanity and social virtues than for his learning. He showed himself an inveterate enemy to tyranny, and refused to become the sovereign of his country. He taught rhetoric in Sicily, and often alleviated the anxieties of his mind as well as the pains of his body with music. It is reported that his curiosity to visit the flames of the crater of Ætna proved fatal to him. Some maintain that he wished it to be believed that he was a god, and, that his death might be unknown, he threw himself into the crater and perished in the flames. His expectations, however, were frustrated, and the volcano, by throwing up one of his sandals, discovered to the world that Empedocles had perished by fire. Others report that he lived to an extreme old age, and that he was drowned in the sea. Horat. 1, ep. 12, v. 20.—Cic. de Orat. 1, c. 50, &c.—Diog. in vitâ.

ENNIUS, Q. This poet, who has generally received the glorious appellation of the Father of Roman song, was a native of Rudiæ, a town in Calabria, and lived from the year of Rome 515 to 585. In his early youth he went to Sardinia; and, if Silius Italicus may be believed, he served in the Calabrian levies, which, in the year 538, followed Titus Manlius to the war which he waged in that island against the favourers of the Carthaginian cause. After the termination of the campaign, he continued to live for twelve years in Sardinia. He was at length brought to Rome by Cato the censor, who, in 550, visited Sardinia, on returning as questor from Africa. At Rome he fixed his residence on the Aventine hill, where he lived in a very frugal manner, having only a single servant-maid as an attendant. He instructed, however, the patrician youth in Greek, and acquired the friendship of many of the most illustrious men in the state. Being distinguished (like Æschylus, the great father of Grecian tragedy) in arms as well as letters, he followed M. Fulvius Nobilior during his expedition to Ætolia in 564; and in 569 he obtained the freedom of the city, through the favour of Quintus Fulvius Nobilior, the son of his former patron, Marcus. He was also protected by the elder Scipio Africanus, whom he is said to have accompanied in all his campaigns. In his old age he obtained the friendship of Scipio Nasica; and the degree of intimacy subsisting between them has been characterized by the well-known anecdote of their successively feigning to be from home. He is said to have been intemperate in drinking, which brought on the disease called Morbus Articularis, a disorder resembling the gout, of which he died at the age of seventy, just after he had exhibited his tragedy of Thyestes. There is still extant an epitaph on this poet, reported to have been written by himself, strongly characteristic of that overweening conceit and that high estimation of his own talent, which are said to have formed the chief blemish of his character:—

Hic vestrum panxit maxuma facta patrum.
Nemo me lacrumis decoret, nec funera fletu
Faxit—cur? volito vivus per ora virûm.'

To judge by the fragments of his works which remain, Ennius greatly surpassed his predecessors, not only in poetical genius, but in the art of versification. By his time, indeed, the best models of Greek composition had begun to be studied at Rome. Ennius particularly professed to have imitated Homer, and tried to persuade his countrymen that the soul and genius of that great poet had revived in him, through the medium of a peacock, according to the process of Pythagorean transmigration. Accordingly, we find in the fragments of Ennius many imitations of the Iliad and Odyssey. It is, however, the Greek tragic writers whom Ennius has chiefly imitated; and indeed it appears from the fragments which remain, that all his plays were rather translations from the dramas of Sophocles and Euripides, on the same subjects which he has chosen, than original tragedies. They are founded on the old topics of Priam and Paris, Hector and Hecuba; and truly Ennius, as well as most other Latin tragedians, seems to have anticipated Horace's maxim:—

'Rectius Iliacum carmen deducis in actus,
Quam si proferres ignota indictaque primus.'

The great work, however, of Ennius, and of which we have still considerable remains, was his Annals, or metrical chronicles, devoted to the celebration of Roman exploits, from the earliest periods to the conclusion of the Istrian war. These Annals were written by our poet in his old age: at least, Aulus Gellius informs us, on the authority of Varro, that the twelfth book was finished by him in his sixty-seventh year. The Annals of Ennius were partly founded on those ancient traditions and old heroic ballads, which Cicero, on the authority of Cato's Origines, mentions as having been sung at feasts by the guests, many centuries before the age of Cato, in praise of the heroes of Rome. Niebuhr has attempted to show, that all the memorable events of Roman history had been versified in ballads, or metrical chronicles, in the Saturnian measure, before the time of Ennius; who, according to him, merely expressed in the Greek hexameter, what his predecessors had delivered in a ruder strain, and then maliciously depreciated these ancient compositions, in order that he himself might be considered as the founder of Roman poetry. The poem of Ennius, entitled Phagetica, is curious,—as one would hardly suppose, that in this early age, luxury had made such progress, that the culinary art should have been systematically or poetically treated. All that we know, however, of the manner in which it was prepared or served up, is from the Apologia of Apuleius. It was, which its name imports, a didactic poem on eatables, particularly fish, as Apuleius testifies:

—' Q. Ennii edeo phagetica, quæ versibus scripsit, innumerabilia piscium genera enumerat, quæ scilicet curiose cognorat.' It is well known, that previous to the time of Ennius, this subject had been discussed both in prose and verse by various Greek authors, and was particularly detailed in the poem of Archestratus, the Epicurean :—

———' The bard
Who sang of poultry, venison, and lard,
Poet and cook———';

It appears from a passage of Apuleius, that the work of Ennius was a digest of all the previous books on this subject. Another poem of Ennius, entitled Epicharmus, was so called because it was translated from the Greek work of Epicharmus, the Pythagorean, on the Nature of Things, in the same manner as Plato gave the name of Timæus to the book which he translated from Timæus the Locrian. On the whole, the works of Ennius are rather pleasing and interesting, as the early blossoms of that poetry which afterwards opened to such perfection, than estimable from their own intrinsic beauty. This applies to the poetical productions of Ennius; but the most curious point connected with his literary history is his prose translation of the celebrated work of Euhemerus, entitled, Ἱερὰ Ἀναγραφή. Euhemerus is generally supposed to have been an inhabitant of Messene, a city of Peloponnesus. Being sent, as he represented, on a voyage of discovery by Cassander, king of Macedon, he came to an island called Panchaia, in the capital of which, Panara, he found a temple of the Tryphilian Jupiter, where stood a column inscribed with a register of the births and deaths of many of the gods. Among these, he specified Uranus, his sons Pan and Saturn, and his daughters Rhea and Ceres; as also Jupiter, Juno, and Neptune, who were the offspring of Saturn. Accordingly, the design of Euhemerus was to show, by investigating their actions, and recording the places of their births and burials, that the mythological deities were mere mortal men, raised to the rank of gods on account of the benefits which they had conferred on mankind,—a system which, according to Meiners and Warburton, formed the grand secret revealed at the initiation into the Eleusinian mysteries. The translation by Ennius, as well as the original work, is lost; but many particulars concerning Euhemerus, and the object of his history, are mentioned in a fragment of Diodorus Siculus, preserved by Eusebius. Some passages have also been saved by St. Augustine; and long quotations have been made by Lactantius, in his treatise De Falsa Religione. These, so far as they extend, may be regarded as the truest and purest sources of mythological history, though not much followed in our modern Pantheons.

Entellus, a famous athlete among the friends of Æneas. He was intimate with Eryx, and entered the lists against Dares, whom he conquered in the funeral games of Anchises in Sicily. Virg. Æn. 5, v. 387, &c.

Epaminondas, a famous Theban, descended from the ancient kings of Bœotia. His father's name was Polymnus. He has been celebrated for his private virtues and military accomplishments. His love of truth was so great, that he never disgraced himself by falsehood. He formed a most sacred and inviolable friendship with Pelopidas, whose life he saved in a battle. By his advice Pelopidas delivered Thebes from the power of Lacedæmon. This was the signal of war. Epaminondas was set at the head of the Theban armies, and defeated the Spartans at the celebrated battle of Leuctra, about 371 years B. C. Epaminondas made a proper use of this victorious campaign, and entered the territories of Lacedæmon with 50,000 men. Here he gained many friends and partisans; but at his return to Thebes he was seized as a traitor for violating the laws of his country. When he was making the Theban arms victorious on every side, he neglected the law which forbade any citizen to retain in his hands the supreme power more than one month, and all his eminent services seemed unable to redeem him from death. He paid implicit obedience to the laws of his country, and only begged his judges that it might be inscribed on his tomb that he had suffered death for saving his country from ruin. This animated reproach was felt; he was pardoned, and invested again with the sovereign power. He was successful in a war in Thessaly, and assisted the Eleans against the Lacedæmonians. The hostile armies met near Mantinea, and while Epaminondas was bravely fighting in the thickest of the enemy, he received a fatal wound in the breast, and expired, exclaiming that he died unconquered, when he heard that the Bœotians obtained the victory, in the 48th year of his age, 363 years before Christ. The Thebans severely lamented his death; in him their power was extinguished, for only during his life they had enjoyed freedom and independence among the Grecian states. Epaminondas was frugal as well as virtuous, and he refused with indignation the rich presents which were offered to him by Artaxerxes, the king of Persia. He is represented by his biographer as an elegant dancer and a skilful musician, accomplishments highly esteemed among his countrymen. *Plut. in Parall.—C. Nep. in vitâ.—Xenoph. Quæst. Ephetæ, a number of magistrates at Athens, first instituted by Demophoon, the son of Theseus. They were reduced to the number of 51 by Draco, who, according to some, first established them. They were superior to the Areopagites, and their privileges were great and numerous. Solon, however, lessened their power, and intrusted them only with the trial of manslaughter and conspiracy against the life of a citizen. They were all more than fifty years old, and it was required that their manners should be pure and innocent, and their behaviour austere and full of gravity.

Ephori, powerful magistrates at Sparta, who were first created by Lycurgus; or, according to some, by Theopompus, B. C. 760. They were five in number. Like censors in the state, they could check and restrain the authority of the kings, and even imprison them if guilty of irregularities. They fined Archidamus for marrying a wife of small stature, and imprisoned Agis for his unconstitutional behaviour. They were much the same as the tribunes of the people at Rome, created to watch with a jealous eye over the liberties and rights of the populace. They had the management of the public money, and were the arbiters of peace and war. Their office was annual, and they had the privilege of convening, proroguing, and dissolving the greater and less assemblies of the people. The former was composed of 9000 Spartans, all inhabitants of the city; the latter of 30,000 Lacedæmonians, inhabitants of the inferior towns and villages. C. Nep. in Paus. 3.—Aristot. Pol. 2, 7.

Ephŏrus, an orator and historian of Cumæ in Æolia, about 352 years before Christ. He was disciple of Isocrates, by whose advice he wrote a history which gave an account of all the actions and battles that had happened between the Greeks and barbarians for 750 years. It was greatly esteemed by the ancients. It is now lost. Quintil. 10, c. 1.

Epicharmus, the first comic writer of whom we have any certain account, was a Syracusan by birth or emigration. It was about Olymp. 70th, 1, B. C. 500,—thirty-five years after Thespis began to exhibit, eleven years after the commencement of Phrynichus, and just before the appearance of Æschylus as a tragedian,—that Epicharmus produced the first comedy properly so called. Before him this department of the drama was, as we have every reason to believe, nothing but a series of licentious songs and satiric episodes, without plot, connexion, or consistency. He gave to each exhibition one single and unbroken fable, and converted the loose interlocutions into regular dialogue. The subjects of his comedies, as we may infer from the extant titles of thirty-five of them, were chiefly mythological. Tragedy had, some few years before the era of Epicharmus, begun to assume its staid and dignified character. The woes of heroes and the majesty of the gods had, under Phrynichus, become its favourite theme. The Sicilian poet seems to have been struck with the idea of exciting the mirth of his audience, by the exhibition of some ludicrous matter dressed up in all the grave solemnity of the newly-invented art. Discarding, therefore, the low drolleries and scurrilous invectives of the ancient κωμωδία, he opened a novel and less invidious source of amusement, by composing a set of burlesque dramas upon the usual tragic subjects. They succeeded; and the turn thus given to comedy long continued; so that when it once more returned to personality and satire, as it speedily did, tragedy and tragic poets were the constant objects of its parody and ridicule. The great changes thus effected by Epicharmus justly entitled him to be called the inventor of comedy. But his merits rest not here: he was distinguished for elegance in composition, as well as originality of conception. So many were his dramatic excellencies, that Plato terms him the first of comic writers; and, in a later age and foreign country, Plautus chose him as his model. The plays of Epicharmus, to judge from the fragments still left us, abounded in apothegms, little consistent with the idea we might otherwise have entertained of their nature, from our knowledge of the buffooneries whence his comedy sprung, and the writings of Aristophanes, his partially-extant successor. But Epicharmus was a philosopher and a Pythagorean. In the midst of merriment he failed not to inculcate, in pithy gnomæ, the otherwise distasteful lessons of morality to the gay and thoughtless; and, sheltered by comic license, to utter offensive political truths, which, promulged under any other circumstances, might have subjected the sage to the vengeance of a despotic government. We find Epicharmus still composing comedies, B. C. 485; and again during the reign of Hiero, B. C. 477. He died at the age of ninety or ninety-seven years.

Epiclĭdes, a Lacedæmonian of the family of the Eurysthenidæ. He was raised to the throne by his brother Cleomenes 3d, in the place of Agis, against the laws and constitution of Sparta. Paus. 2, c. 9.

Epicrates, was a native of Ambracia in Epirus, and the imitator, accordi g to Athenæus, of Antiphanes. He made Plato the subject of his ridicule; and a long and curious fragment is preserved, where the disciples of that philosopher are described as engaged in deep discussion over a cucumber.

Epictētus, a stoic philosopher of Hieropolis in Phrygia, originally the slave of Epaphroditus, the freedman of Nero. Though driven from Rome by Domitian, he returned after the emperor's death, and gained the esteem of Adrian and Marcus Aurelius. Like the stoics, he supported the doctrine of the immortality of the soul, but he declared himself strongly against suicide, which was so warmly adopted by his sect. He died in a very advanced age. The earthen lamp of which he made use, was sold some time after his death at 3000 drachmas. His Enchiridion is a faithful picture of the stoic philosophy; and his dissertations, which were delivered to his pupils, were collected by Arrian. His style is concise, and devoid of all ornament, full of energy and useful maxims. The value of his compositions is well known from the saying of the emperor Antoninus, who thanked the gods he could collect from the writings of Epictetus wherewith to conduct life with honour to himself and advantage to his country.

Epĭcurus, a celebrated philosopher, son of Neocles and Cherestrata, born at Gargettus in Attica. He was early sent to school, where he distinguished himself by the brilliancy of his genius, and at the age of 12, when his preceptor repeated to him this verse from Hesiod:—

Ητοι μεν πρωτιστα χαος γενετ', &c.
In the beginning of things the Chaos was created,

Epicurus earnestly asked him who created it. To this the teacher answered, that he knew not, but only philosophers. "Then," says the youth, "philosophers henceforth shall instruct me." After having improved himself, and enriched his mind by travelling, he visited Athens, which was then crowded by the followers of Plato, the cynics, the peripatetics, and the stoics. Here he established himself, and soon attracted a number of followers by the sweetness and gravity of his manners, and by his social virtues. He taught them that the happiness of mankind consisted in pleasure, not such as arises from sensual gratification or from vice, but from the enjoyments of the mind and the sweets of virtue. This doctrine was warmly attacked by the philosophers of the different sects, and particularly by the stoics. When Leontium, one of his female pupils, was accused of prostituting herself to her master and to all his disciples, the philosopher proved the falsity of the accusation by silence and an exemplary life. His health was at last impaired by continual labour, and he died of a retention of urine, which long subjected him to the most excrutiating torments, and which he bore with unparalleled fortitude. His death happened 270 years before Christ, in the 72d year of his age. His disciples showed their respect for the memory of their learned preceptor by the unanimity which prevailed among them. While philosophers in every sect were at war with mankind and among themselves, the followers of Epicurus enjoyed perfect peace, and lived in the most solid friendship. The day of his birth was observed with universal festivity, and during a month all his admirers gave themselves up to mirth and innocent amusement. Of all the philosophers of antiquity, Epicurus is the only one whose writings deserve attention for their number. He wrote no less than 300 volumes according to Diogenes Laertius; and Chrysippus was so jealous of the fecundity of his genius, that no sooner had Epicurus published one of his volumes than he immediately composed one, that he might not be overcome in the number of his productions. Epicurus, however, advanced truths and arguments unknown before; but Chrysippus said what others long ago had said, without showing any thing which might be called originality. The followers of Epicurus were numerous in every age and country, his doctrines were rapidly disseminated over the world, and when the gratification of the sense was substituted to the practice of virtue, the morals of mankind were undermined and destroyed. No philosopher has been the subject of so much eulogium, and, at the same time, of so much reproach, because his doctrines were calculated to divide the opinions of mankind in regard to their influence upon the moral constitution of society, and do actually contain within themselves the elements of contradiction; but moreover because the opinions of his later disciples, and still more their conduct, deduced from one of these contrary interpretations of his dogmas, have been too generally received for those of Epicurus himself. Diog. in vitâ.—Ælian. V. H. 4, c. 13.—Cic. de Nat. D. 1, c. 24 and 25.—Tusc. 3, 49, de finib. 2, c. 22.

Epidauria, a festival at Athens in honour of Æsculapius.

Epigŏni, the sons and descendants of the Grecian heroes who were killed in the first Theban war. The war of the Epigoni is famous in ancient history. It was undertaken ten years after the first. The sons of those who had perished in the first war resolved to avenge the death of their fathers, and marched against Thebes, under the command of Thersander; or, according to others, of Alcmæon, the son of Amphiaraus. The Argives were assisted by the Corinthians, the people of Messenia, Arcadia, and Megara. The Thebans had engaged all their neighbours in their quarrel, as in one common cause, and the two hostile armies met and engaged on the banks of the Glissas. The fight was obstinate and bloody, but victory declared for the Epigoni, and some of the Thebans fled to Illyricum with Leodamus their general, while others retired into Thebes, where they were soon besieged and forced to surrender. In this war Ægialeus alone was killed, and his father Adrastus was the only person who escaped alive in the first war. This whole war, as Pausanias observes, was written in verse; and Callinus, who quotes some of the verses, ascribes them to Homer, which opinion has been adopted by many writers. For my part, continues the geographer, I own that, next to the Iliad and Odyssey of Homer, I have never seen a finer poem. Paus. 9, c. 9 and 25.—Apollod. 1 and 3.—Diod. 4. This name has been applied to the sons of those Macedonian veterans, who, in the age of Alexander, formed connexions with the women of Asia.

Epimenĭdes, an epic poet of Crete, contemporary with Solon. His father's name was Agiasarchus, and his mother's Blasta. He is reckoned one of the seven wise men by those who exclude Periander from the number. While he was tending his flocks one day, he entered into a cave, where he fell asleep. His sleep continued for 40, or 47, or, according to Pliny, 57 years; and when he awoke, he found every object so considerably altered, that he scarce knew where he was. His brother apprized him of the length of his sleep to his great astonishment. It is supposed that he lived 289 years. After death he was revered as a god, and greatly honoured by the Athenians, whom he had delivered from a plague, and to whom he had given many good and useful counsels. He is said to be the first who built temples in the Grecian communities. Cic. de Div. 1, c. 34.—Diog. in vitâ.—Paus. 1, c. 14.—Plut. in Sol.—*Val. Epiŏchus, a son of Lycurgus, who received divine honours in Arcadia.

Epiphănes, (illustrious,) a surname given to the Antiochuses, kings of Syria.——A surname of one of the Ptolemies, the fifth of the house of the Lagidæ. Strab. 17.

Epiphanius, a bishop of Salamis, who was active in refuting the writings of Origen, but his compositions are more valuable for the fragments which they preserve than for their own intrinsic merit. The only edition is by Dionys. Petavius, 2 vols. Paris, 1622. The bishop died A. D. 403.

Epitades, a man who first violated a law of Lycurgus, which forbade laws to be made. Plut. in Agid.

Erasistrătus, a celebrated physician, grandson to the philosopher Aristotle. He discovered by the motion of the pulse the love which Antiochus had conceived for his mother-in-law Stratonice, and was rewarded with 100 talents for the cure by the father of Antiochus. He was a great enemy to bleeding and violent physic. He died B. C. 257. Val. Max. 5, c. 7.—Plut. in Demetr.

Eratosthĕnes, son of Aglaus, was a native of Cyrene, and the second intrusted with the care of the Alexandrian library. He dedicated his time to grammatical criticism and philosophy, but more particularly to poetry and mathematics. He has been called a second Plato, the cosmographer, and the geometer of the world. He is supposed to be the inventor of the armillary sphere. With the instruments with which the munificence of the Ptolemies supplied the library of Alexandria, he was enabled to measure the obliquity of the ecliptic, which he called 20 1-2 degrees. He also measured a degree of the meridian, and determined the extent and circumference of the earth with great exactness, by means adopted by the moderns. He starved himself after he had lived to his 82d year, B. C. 194. Some few fragments remain of his compositions. He collected the annals of the Egyptian kings by order of one of the Ptolemies. Cic. ad Attic. 2, ep. 6.—Varro. de R. R. 1, c. 2.

Eratostrătus, an Ephesian, who burnt the famous temple of Diana, the same night that Alexander the Great was born. Thi burning, as some writers have observed, was not prevented or seen by the goddess of the place, who was then present at the labours of Olympias and the birth of the conqueror of Persia. Eratostratus did this villany merely to eternize his name by so uncommon an action. Plut. in Alex.—Val. Max. 8, c. 14.

Eriphănis, a Greek woman, famous for her poetical compositions. She was extremely fond of the hunter Melampus, and, to enjoy his company, she accustomed herself to live in the woods. Athen. 14.

Erixo, a Roman knight, condemned by the people for having whipped his son to death. Senec. 1, de Clem. 14.

Erŏpus, or Æropas, a king of Macedonia, who, when in the cradle, succeeded his father Philip 1st, B. C. 602. He made war against the Illyrians, whom he conquered. Justin. 7, c. 2.

Eros, a servant of whom Antony demanded a sword to kill himself. Eros produced the instrument, but instead of giving it to his master, he killed himself in his presence. Plut. in Anton.

Erōtia, a festival in honour of Eros, the god of love. It was celebrated by the Thespians every fifth year with sports and games, when musicians and others contended. If any quarrels or seditions had arisen among the people, it was then usual to offer sacrifices and prayers to the god that he would totally remove them.

Estiata, solemn sacrifices to Vesta, of which it was unlawful to carry away any thing or communicate it to any body.

Etearchus, a king of Oaxus in Crete. After the death of his wife, he married a woman who made herself odious for her tyranny over her step-daughter Phronima. Etearchus gave ear to all the accusations which were brought against his daughter, and ordered her to be thrown into the sea. She had a son called Battus, who led a colony to Cyrene. Herodot. 4, c. 154.

Eteŏcles. Vid. Part III.

Eteonicus, a Lacedæmonian general, who, upon hearing that Callicratidas was conquered at Arginusæ, ordered the messengers of this news to be crowned, and to enter Mitylene in triumph. This so terrified Conon, who besieged the town, that he concluded that the enemy had obtained some advantageous victory, and he raised the siege. Diod. 13.—Polyæn. 1.

Etesiæ, periodical northern winds of a gentle and mild nature, very common for five or six weeks in the months of spring and autumn. Lucret. 5, v. 741.

Evăgŏras, a king of Cyprus, who retook Salamis, which had been taken from his father by the Persians. He made war against Artaxerxes, the king of Persia, with the assistance of the Egyptians, Arabians, and Tyrians, and obtained some advantage over the fleet of his enemy. The Persians, however, soon repaired their losses, and Evagoras saw himself defeated by sea and land, and obliged to be tributary to the power of Artaxerxes, and to be stripped of all his dominions except the town of Salamis. He was assassinated soon after this fatal change of fortune, by a eunuch, 374 B. C. He left two sons, Nicocles, who succeeded him, and Protagoras, who deprived his nephew Evagoras of his possessions. Evagoras deserves to be commended for his sobriety, moderation, and magnanimity; and if he was guilty of any political error in the management of his kingdom, it may be said that his love of equity was a full compensation. His grandson bore the same name, and succeeded his father Nicocles. He showed himself oppressive, and his uncle Protagoras took advantage of his unpopularity to deprive him of his power. Evagoras fled to Artaxerxes Ochus, who gave him a government more extensive than that of Cyprus, but his oppression rendered him odious, and he was accused before his benefactor, and by his orders put to death. *C. Evander, a son of the prophetess Carmente, king of Arcadia. An accidental murder obliged him to leave his country, and he came to Italy, where he drove the Aborigines from their ancient possessions, and reigned in that part of the country where Rome was afterwards founded. It is said that he first brought the Greek alphabet into Italy, and introduced there the worship of the Greek deities. He was honoured as a god after death by his subjects, who raised him an altar on mount Aventine. Paus. 8, c. 43.—Liv. 1, c. 7.—Ital. 7. v. 18.—Dionys. Hal. 1, c. 7.—*Ovid. Evax, an Arabian prince, who wrote to Nero concerning jewels, &c. Plin. 25, c. 2.

Eubule, an Athenian virgin, daughter of Leon, sacrificed with her sisters, by order of the oracle of Delphi, for the safety of her country, which laboured under a famine. Ælian. V. H. 12, c. 18.

Eubŭlides, a philosopher of Miletus, pupil and successor of Euclid. Demosthenes was one of his pupils, and by his advice and encouragement to perseverance he was enabled to conquer the difficulty he felt in pronouncing the letter R. He severely attacked the doctrines of Aristotle. Diog.

Eubŭlus, I. an Athenian orator, rival to Demosthenes.——II. A comic poet.——III. An historian who wrote a voluminous account of Mithras.

Euchides, an Athenian who went to Delphi and returned the same day, a journey of about 107 miles. The object of his journey was to obtain some sacred fire.

Euclides, I. a native of Megara, disciple of Socrates, B. C. 404. When the Athenians had forbidden all the people of Megara on pain of death to enter their city, Euclides disguised himself in woman's clothes to introduce himself into the presence of Socrates. Diog. in Socrate. ——II. A mathematician of Alexandria, who flourished 300 B. C. He distinguished himself by his writings on music and geometry, but particularly by 15 books on the elements of mathematics, which consist of problems and theorems with demonstrations. This work has been greatly mutilated by commentators. Euclid was so respected in his lifetime, that king Ptolemy became one of his pupils. Euclid established a school at Alexandria, which became so famous, that from his age to the time of the Saracen conquest, no mathematician was found but what had studied at Alexandria. He was so respected, that Plato, himself a mathematician, being asked concerning the building of an altar at Athens, referred his inquiries to the mathematician of Alexandria. *Val. Eudamidas, I. a son of Archidamus 4th, brother to Agis 4th. He succeeded on the Spartan throne, after his brother's death, B. C. 330. Paus. 3, c. 10.——II. A son of Archidamus, king of Sparta, who succeeded B. C. 268.——III. The commander of a garrison stationed at Trœzene by Craterus.

Eudocia, the wife of the emperor Theodosius the younger, who gave the public some compositions. She died A. D. 460.

Eudoxia, I. the wife of Arcadius, &c.——II. A daughter of Theodosius the younger, who married the emperor Maximus, and invited Genseric the Vandal into Italy.

Eudoxus, I. a son of Æschines of Cnidus, who distinguished himself by his knowledge of astrology, medicine, and geometry. He was the first who regulated the year among the Greeks, among whom he first brought from Egypt the celestial sphere and regular astronomy. He spent a great part of his life on the top of a mountain, to study the motion of the stars, by whose appearance he pretended to foretell the events of futurity. He died in his 53d year, B. C. 352. Lucan. 10, v. 187.—Diog.—Petron. 88.——II. A native of Cyzicus, who sailed all round the coast of Africa from the Red Sea, and entered the Mediterranean by the columns of Hercules.——III. A Sicilian, son of Agathocles.

Euemerus, an ancient historian of Messenia, intimate with Cassander. He travelled over Greece and Arabia, and wrote a history of the gods, in which he proved that they all had been upon earth as mere mortal men. Ennius translated it into Latin. It is now lost.

Evephenus, a Pythagorean philosopher, whom Dionysius condemned to death because he had alienated the people of Metapontum from his power. The philosopher begged leave of the tyrant to go and marry his sister, and promised to return in six months. Dionysius consented by receiving Eucritus, who pledged himself to die if Evephenus did not return in time. Evephenus returned at the appointed moment, to the astonishment of Dionysius, and delivered his friend Eucritus from the death which threatened him. The tyrant was so pleased with these two friends, that he pardoned Evephenus, and begged to share their friendship and confidence. Polyæn. 5.

Evergetes, a surname signifying benefactor, given to Philip of Macedonia, and to Antigonus Doson and Ptolemy of Egypt. It was also commonly given to the kings of Syria and Pontus; and we often see among the former an Alexander Evergetes, and among the latter a Mithridates Evergetes. Some of the Roman emperors also claimed that epithet, so expressive of benevolence and humanity.

Eugenius, a usurper of the imperial title after the death of Valentinian the 2d, A. D. 392.

Eumæus, a herdsman and steward to Ulysses, who knew his master at his return home from the Trojan war after 20 years' absence, and assisted him in removing Penelope's suiters. He was originally the son of the king of Scyros, and, upon being carried away by pirates, he was sold as a slave to Laertes, who rewarded his fidelity and services. Homer. Od. 13, v. 403, l. 14, v. 3, l. 15, v. 288, l. 16 and 17.

Eumelus, I. one of the Bacchiadæ, who wrote, among other things, a poetical history of Corinth, B. C. 750, of which a small fragment is still extant. Paus. 2, c. 1.——II. A king of the Cimmerian Bosphorus, who died B. C. 304.

Eumenes, I. a Greek officer in the army of Alexander, son of a charioteer. He was the most worthy of all the officers of Alexander to succeed after the death of his master. He conquered Paphlagonia and Cappadocia, of which he obtained the government, till the power and jealousy of Antigonus obliged him to retire. He joined his forces to those of Perdiccas, and defeated Craterus and Neoptolemus. Neoptolemus perished by the hands of Eumenes. When Craterus had been killed during the war, his remains received an honourable funeral from the hand of the conqueror; and Eumenes, after weeping over the ashes of a man who once was his dearest friend, sent his remains to his relations in Macedonia. Eumenes fought against Antipater, and conquered him; and after the death of Perdiccas, his ally, his arms were directed against Antigonus, by whom he was conquered chiefly by the treacherous conduct of his officers. This fatal battle obliged him to disband the greatest part of his army to secure himself a retreat; and he fled with only 700 faithful attendants to Nora, a fortified place on the confines of Cappadocia, where he was soon besieged by the conqueror. He supported the siege for a year with courage and resolution, but some disadvantageous skirmishes so reduced him, that his soldiers, grown desperate, and bribed by the offers of the enemy, had the infidelity to betray him into the hands of Antigonus. The conqueror, from shame or remorse, had not the courage to visit Eumenes; but when he was asked by his officers in what manner he wished him to be kept, he answered, Keep him as carefully as you would keep a lion. This severe command was obeyed; but the asperity of Antigonus vanished in a few days, and Eumenes, delivered from the weight of chains, was permitted to enjoy the company of his friends. Even Antigonus hesitated whether he should not restore to his liberty a man with whom he had lived in the greatest intimacy while both were subservient to the command of Alexander; and these secret emotions of pity and humanity were not a little increased by the petitions of his son Demetrius for the release of Eumenes. But the calls of ambition prevailed; and when Antigonus recollected what an active enemy he had in his power, he ordered Eumenes to be put to death in the prison; (though some imagine he was murdered without the knowledge of his conqueror.) His bloody commands were executed B. C. 315. Such was the end of a man who raised himself to power by merit alone. His skill in public exercises first recommended him to the notice of Philip; and under Alexander his attachment and fidelity to the royal person, and particularly his military accomplishments, promoted him to the rank of a general. Even his enemies revered him; and Antigonus, by whose orders he perished, honoured his remains with a splendid funeral, and conveyed his ashes to his wife and family in Cappadocia. It has been observed that Eumenes had such a universal influence over the successors of Alexander, that none, during his lifetime, dared to assume the title of king; and it does not a little reflect to his honour, to consider that the wars he carried on were not from private or interested motives, but for the good and welfare of his deceased benefactor's children. Plut. & C. Nep. in vitâ.—Diod. 19.—Justin. 13.—Curt. 10.—Arrian.——II. A king of Pergamus, who succeeded his uncle Philetærus on the throne, B. C. 263. He made war against Antiochus, the son of Seleucus, and enlarged his possessions by seizing upon many of the cities of the kings of Syria. He lived in alliance with the Romans, and made war against Prusias, king of Bithynia. He was a great patron of learning, and given much to wine. He died of an excess in drinking, after a reign of 22 years. He was succeeded by Attalus. Strab. 15.——III. The second of that name, succeeded his father Attalus on the throne of Asia and Pergamus. His kingdom was small and poor; but he rendered it powerful and opulent; and his alliance with the Romans did not a little contribute to the increase of his dominions after the victories obtained over Antiochus the Great. He carried his arms against Prusias and Antigonus, and died B. C. 159, after a reign of 38 years, leaving the kingdom to his son Attalus second. He had been admired for his benevolence and magnanimity, and his love of learning greatly enriched the famous library of Pergamus, which had been founded by his predecessors, in imitation of the Alexandrian collection of the Ptolemies. His brothers were so attached to him, and devoted to his interest, that they enlisted among his body-guards, to show their fraternal fidelity. Strab. 13.—Justin. 31 and 34.—Polyb.——IV. A celebrated orator of Athens, about the beginning of the fourth century. Some of his harangues and orations are extant.——V. An historical writer in Alexander's army.

Eumēnĭdia, festivals in honour of the Eumenides, called by the Athenians σεμναι θεαι, venerable goddesses. They were celebrated once every year with sacrifices of pregnant ewes, with offerings of cakes made by the most eminent youths, and libations of honey and wine. At Athens none but freeborn citizens were admitted, such as had led a life the most virtuous and unsullied. Such only were accepted by the goddesses, who punished all sorts of wickedness in a severe manner.

Eumolpĭdæ, the priests of Ceres, at the celebration of her festivals of Eleusis. All causes relating to impiety or profanation were referred to their judgment; and their decisions, though occasionally severe, were considered as generally impartial. The Eumolpidæ were descended from Eumolpus, a king of Thrace, who was made priest of Ceres by Erechtheus, king of Athens. He became so powerful after his appointment to the priesthood that he maintained a war against Erechtheus. This war proved fatal to both; Erechtheus and Eumolpus were both killed, and peace was re-established among their descendants, on condition that the priesthood should ever remain in the family of Eumolpus, and the regal power in the house of Erechtheus. The priesthood continued in the family of Eumolpus for 1200 years; and this is still more remarkable, because he who was once appointed to the holy office was obliged to remain in perpetual celibacy. Paus. 2, c. 14.

Eumolpus. Vid. Part III.

Eunapius, a physician, sophist, and historian, born at Sardis. He flourished in the reign of Valentinian and his successors, and wrote a history of the Cæsars, of which few fragments remain. His life of the philosophers of his age is still extant. It is composed with fidelity and elegance, precision and correctness.

Eunus, a Syrian slave, who inflamed the minds of the servile multitude by pretended inspiration and enthusiasm. He filled a nut with sulphur in his mouth, and by artfully conveying fire to it, he breathed out flames to the astonishment of the people, who believed him to be a god or something more than human. Oppression and misery compelled 2000 slaves to join his cause, and he soon saw himself at the head of 50,000 men. With such a force he defeated the Roman armies, till Perponna obliged him to surrender by famine, and exposed on a cross the greatest part of his followers, B. C. 132. Plut. in Sert.

Eupător, a son of Antiochus.——The surname of Eupator was given to many of the Asiatic princes, such as Mithridates, &c. Strab. 12.

Eupeithes. Vid. Part III.

Euphaes, succeeded Androcles on the throne of Messenia, and in his reign the first Messenian war began. He died B. C. 730. Paus. 4, c. 5 and 6.

Euphantus, a poet and historian of Olynthus, son of Eubulides and preceptor to Antigonus, king of Macedonia. Diog. in Eucl.

Euphorbus, I. a famous Trojan, son of Panthous, the first who wounded Patroclus, whom Hector killed. He perished by the hand of Menelaus, who hung his shield in the temple of Juno at Argos. Pythagoras, the founder of the doctrine of the metempsychosis, or transmigration of souls, affirmed that he had been once Euphorbus, and that his soul recollected many exploits which had been done while it animated that Trojan's body. As a further proof of his assertion, he showed at first sight the shield of Euphorbus in the temple of Juno. Ovid. Met. 15, v. 160.—Paus. 2, c. 17.—Homer. Il. 16 and 17.——II. A physician of Juba, king of Mauretania.

EUPHORION, I. a Greek poet of Chalcis in Eubœa, in the age of Antiochus the Great. Tiberius took him for his model for correct writing, and was so fond of him that he hung his pictures in all the public libraries. His father's name was Polymnetus. He died in his 56th year, B. C. 220. Cicero. de Nat. D. 2, c. 64, calls him Obscurum.——II. The son of Æschylus. He conquered four times with posthumous tragedies of his father's composition; and also wrote several dramas himself. One of his victories is commemorated in the argument to the Medea of Euripides; where we are told that Euphorion was first, Sophocles second, and Euripides third with the Medea. Olymp. 87th, 2, 431.

EUPHRÄTES, I. a disciple of Plato, who governed Macedonia with absolute authority in the reign of Perdiccas, and rendered himself odious by his cruelty and pedantry. After the death of Perdiccas, he was murdered by Parmenio.——II. A stoic philosopher in the age of Adrian, who destroyed himself, with the emperor's leave, to escape the miseries of old age, A. D. 118. Dio. Vid. Part III.

EUPOLIS, was nearly of the same age with Aristophanes, and probably exhibited for the first time B. C. 429. In B. C. 425, he was third with his Νουμηνίαι, when Cratinus was second, and Aristophanes first. In B. C. 421, he brought out his Μαρικᾶς and his Κόλακες; one at the Dionysia ἐν Ἀγραύλοις, the other at those ἐν ἄστει; and in a similar way his Ἀστρατεύτους and Ἀστράτευτοι the following year. The titles of more than twenty of his comedies have been collected by Meursius. A few fragments remain. Eupolis was a bold and severe satirist on the vices of his day and city. In the Μαρικᾶς he attacked Hyperbolus, in the Ἀστρατεύτους an Athenian so named, in the Ἀστράτευτοι Melanthius. In the Βάπται he inveighed against the effeminacy of his countrymen; in his Δαιταλῆς he assailed Cimon, accusing him, amongst other charges, of an unpatriotic bias towards every thing Spartan. His death was generally ascribed to the vengeance of Alcibiades, whom he had lampooned, probably in the Βάπται. By his orders, according to the common account, Eupolis was thrown overboard during the passage of the Athenian armament to Sicily, B. C. 415. Cicero, however, calls this story a vulgar error; since Eratosthenes, the Alexandrian librarian, had shown that several comedies were composed by Eupolis some time after the date assigned to this pseudo-assassination. His tomb, too, according to Pausanias, was erected on the banks of the Æsopus by the Sicyonians, which makes it most probable that this was the place of his death.

EURIPIDES, was the son of Mnesarchus and Clito, of the borough Phlya, and the Cecropid tribe. He was born, Olymp. 75th, 1. B. C. 480, in Salamis (whither his parents had retired during the occupation of Attica by Xerxes,) on the very day of the Grecian victory near that island. Aristophanes repeatedly imputes meanness of extraction, by the mother's side, to Euripides. He asserts that she was an herb-seller; and, according to Aulus Gellius, Theopompus confirms the comedian's sarcastic insinuations. Philochorus, on the contrary, in a work no longer extant, endeavoured to prove that the mother of our poet was a lady of noble ancestry. That there was some ground for the gibes of Aristophanes can hardly be questioned. In a city like Athens, where every person and every movement were exposed to the remark and the gossip of a prying and loquacious population the birth and parentage of a distinguished dramatist must have been known to every spectator in the comedian's audience. Hence there could have been neither point nor poignancy in these endless jeerings, had not the fact, in which they turned, been matter of public notoriety. The mother of Euripides then was probably of humble station. His father, to whom the malicious Aristophanes never alludes, was, doubtless, a man of wealth and respectability; for the costly education which the young Euripides received intimates a certain degree of wealth and consequence in his family. The pupil of Anaxagoras, Protagoras, and Prodicus (an instructer so notorious for the extravagant terms which he demanded for his lessons) could not have been the son of persons at that time very mean or very poor. In early life we are told that his father made him direct his attention chiefly to gymnastic exercises, and that in his seventeenth year he was crowned in the Eleusinian and Thesean contests. It does not appear, however, that Euripides was ever actually a candidate in the Olympian games. The genius of the young poet was not dormant whilst he was occupied in these mere bodily accomplishments; and even at this early age he is said to have attempted dramatic composition. He seems to have also cultivated a natural taste for painting; and some of his pictures were long afterwards preserved at Megara. At length, quitting the gymnasium, he applied himself to philosophy and literature. Under the celebrated rhetorician Prodicus, one of the instructers of Pericles, he acquired that oratorical skill for which his dramas are so remarkably distinguished; and from Anaxagoras he imbibed those philosophical notions which are occasionally brought forward in his works. Here too Pericles was his fellow-disciple. With Socrates, who had studied under the same master, Euripides was on terms of the closest intimacy; and from him he derived those moral gnomæ so frequently interwoven into his speeches and narrations. Indeed Socrates was even suspected of largely assisting the tragedian in the composition of his plays. Euripides began his public career, as a dramatic writer, Olymp. 81st, 2, B. C. 455, in the twenty-fifth year of his age. On this occasion he was the third with a play entitled Pleiades. In Olymp. 84th, 4, B. C. 441, he won the prize. In Olymp. 87th, 2, B. C. 431, he was third with the Medea, the Philoctetes, the Dictys, and the Therisiæ, a satiric drama. His competitors were Euphorion and Sophocles. He was first with the Hippolytus, Olymp. 88th, 1, B. C. 428, the year of his master Anaxagoras's death: second, Olymp. 91st, 2, B. C. 415, with the Alexander (or Paris,) the Palamedes, the Troades, and the Sisyphus, a satiric drama. It was in this contest that Xenocles was first. Two years after this the Athenians sustained the total loss of their armament before Syracuse. In his narration of this disaster Plutarch gives an anecdote, which, if true, bears a splendid testimony to the high reputation in which Euripides was then held. Those amongst the captives, he tells us, who could repeat any portion of that poet's works, were treated with kindness, and even set at liberty. The same author also informs us that Euripides honoured the soldiers who had fallen in that siege with a funeral poem, two lines of which he has preserved. The Andromeda was exhibited Olymp. 92d, 1, B. C. 412, the Orestes, Olymp. 93d, 1, B. C. 408. Soon after this time the poet retired into Magnesia, and from thence into Macedonia, to the court of Archelaus. As in the case of Æschylus, the motives for this self-exile are obscure and uncertain. We know, indeed, that Athens was by no means the most favourable residence for distinguished literary merit. The virulence of rivalry raged unchecked in a licentious democracy, and the caprice of a petulant multitude would not afford the most satisfactory patronage to a high-minded and talented man. Report, too, insinuates that Euripides was unhappy in his own family. His first wife, Melito, he divorced for adultery; and in his second, Chærila, he was not more fortunate. Envy and enmity amongst his fellow-citizens, infidelity and domestic vexations at home, would prove no small inducements for the poet to accept the invitation of Archelaus. In Macedonia he is said to have written a play in honour of that monarch, and to have inscribed it with his patron's name, who was so pleased with the manners and abilities of his guest as to appoint him one of his ministers. No further particulars are recorded of Euripides, except a few apocryphal letters, anecdotes, and apothegms. His death, which took place Olymp. 93d, 2, B. C. 406, if the popular account be true, was, like that of Æschylus, in its nature extraordinary. Either from chance or malice, the aged dramatist was exposed to the attack of some ferocious hounds, and by them so dreadfully mangled as to expire soon afterwards in his seventy-fifth year. The Athenians entreated Archelaus to send the body to the poet's native city for interment. The request was refused; and, with every demonstration of grief and respect, Euripides was buried at Pella. A cenotaph, however, was erected to his memory at Athens, bearing the following inscription:—

Μνῆμα μὲν Ἑλλὰς ἅπασ' Εὐριπίδου· ὀστέα δ' ἴσχει
Τῆ Μακεδῶν· ἡ γὰρ δέξατο τέρμα βίου.
Πατρὶς δ' Ἑλλάδος Ἑλλὰς Ἀθῆναι· πλεῖστα δὲ Μούσᾳς
Τέρψας, ἐκ πολλῶν καὶ τὸν ἔπαινον ἔχει.

Euripides, in the estimation of the ancients, certainly held a rank much inferior to that of his two great rivals. The caustic wit of Aristophanes, whilst it fastens but slightly on the failings of the giant Æschylus, and keeps respectfully aloof from the calm dignity of Sophocles, assails with merciless malice every weak point in the genius, character, and circumstances of Euripides. He banters or reproaches him for lowering the dignity of tragedy, by exhibiting so many heroes as whining tattered beggars; by introducing the vulgar affairs of ordinary life; by the sonorous unmeaningness of his choral odes; the meretricious voluptuousness of his music; the feebleness of his verses; and by the loquacity of all his personages, however low their rank or unsuitable their character might be. He laughs at the monotonous construction of his clumsy prologues. He charges his dramas with an immoral tendency, and the poet himself with contempt of the gods and a fondness for new-fangled doctrines. He jeers his affectation of rhetoric and philosophy. In short, Aristophanes seems to regard Euripides with a most sovereign contempt, bordering even upon disgust. The attachment of Socrates and the admiration of Archelaus may perhaps serve as a counterpoise to the insinuations of Aristophanes against the personal character of Euripides. As to his poetic powers, there is a striking diversity of opinion between the later comedians and the author of the Ranæ; for Menander and Philemon held him in high esteem. Yet the exact Aristotle, whilst allowing to Euripides a pre-eminence in the excitement of sorrowful emotion, censures the general arrangement of his pieces, the wanton degradation of his personages, and the unconnected nature of his choruses. Longinus, like Aristotle, ascribes to Euripides great power in working upon the feelings by depiction of love and madness, but he certainly did not entertain the highest opinion of his genius. He even classes him among those writers, who, far from possessing originality of talent, strive to conceal the real meanness of their conceptions, and assume the appearance of sublimity by studied composition and laboured language. Diod. 13.—*Val. EURYĂLUS. Vid. Nisus.

EURYBĬADES, a Spartan general of the Grecian fleet at the battles of Artemisium and Salamis against Xerxes. He has been charged with want of courage, and with ambition. He offered to strike Themistocles when he wished to speak about the manner of attacking the Persians; upon which the Athenian said, Strike me, but hear me. Herodot. 8, c. 2, 74, &c.—Plut. in Them.—*C. EURYCLĒS, I. an orator of Syracuse, who proposed to put Nicias and Demosthenes to death, and to confine to hard labour all the Athenian soldiers in the quarries. Plut.——II. A Lacedæmonian at the battle of Actium on the side of Augustus. Id. in Anton.

EURYDĂMUS, a wrestler of Cyrene, who, in a combat, had his teeth dashed to pieces by his antagonist, which he swallowed without showing any signs of pain or discontinuing the fight. Ælian. V. H. 10, c. 19.

EURŸDĪCE, I. the wife of Amyntas, king of Macedonia. She had by her husband, Alexander, Perdiccas, and Philip, and one daughter called Euryone. A criminal partiality for her daughter's husband, to whom she offered her hand and the kingdom, made her conspire against Amyntas, who must have fallen a victim to her infidelity, had not Euryone discovered it. Amyntas forgave her. Alexander ascended the throne after his father's death, and perished by the ambition of his mother. Perdiccas, who succeeded him, shared his fate; but Philip, who was the next in succession, secured himself against all attempts from his mother, and ascended the throne with peace and universal satisfaction. Eurydice fled to Iphicrates, the Athenian general, for protection. The manner of her death is unknown. C. Nep. in Iphic. 3.——II. A daughter of Amyntas, who married her uncle Aridæus, the illegitimate son of Philip. After the death of Alexander the Great, Aridæus ascended the throne of Macedonia, but he was totally governed by the intrigues of his wife, who called back Cassander, and joined her forces with his to march against Polyperchon and Olympias. Eurydice was forsaken by her troops, Aridæus was pierced through with arrows by order of Olympias, who commanded Eurydice to destroy herself either by poison, the sword, or the halter. She chose the latter. Vid. Part III.——III. A daughter of Antipater, who married one of the Ptolemies. Paus. 1, c. 7.

Eurymĕdon, a man who accused Aristotle of propagating profane doctrines in the Lyceum.

Eurypon, a king of Sparta, son of Sous. His reign was so glorious, that his descendants were called Eurypontidæ. Paus. 3, c. 7.

Eurysthĕnes, a son of Aristodemus, who lived in perpetual dissention with his twin brother Procles, while they both sat on the Spartan throne. It was unknown which of the two was born first; the mother, who wished to see both her sons raised on the throne, refused to declare it, and they were both appointed kings of Sparta, by order of the oracle of Delphi, B. C. 1102. After the death of the two brothers, the Lacedæmonians, who knew not to what family the right of seniority and succession belonged, permitted two kings to sit on the throne, one of each family. The descendants of Eurysthenes were called Eurysthenidæ; and those of Procles, Proclidæ. It was inconsistent with the laws of Sparta for two kings of the same family to ascend the throne together, yet that law was sometimes violated by oppression and tyranny. Eurysthenes had a son called Agis, who succeeded him. His descendants were called Agidæ. There sat on the throne of Sparta 31 kings of the family of Eurysthenes, and only 24 of the Proclidæ. The former were the more illustrious. Herodot. 4, c. 147, l. 6, c. 52.—Paus. 3, c. 1.—C. Nep. in Ages.

Eurўtion, and Eurytion, a man of Heraclea convicted of adultery. His punishment was the cause of the abolition of the oligarchical power there. Aristot. 5, Polit.

Eusebia, an emperess, wife to Constantine, &c. She died A. D. 360, highly and deservedly lamented.

Eusebius, a bishop of Cæsarea in great favour with the emperor Constantine. He was concerned in the theological disputes of Arius and Athanasius, and distinguished himself by his writings, which consisted of an ecclesiastical history, the life of Constantine, Chronicon, Evangelical preparations, and other numerous treatises, most of which are now lost. The best edition of his Preparatio and Demonstratio Evangelica, is by Vigerus, 2 vols. folio; Rothomagi, 1628; and of his ecclesiastical history by Reading, folio Cantab. 1720.

Eustathius, I. a Greek commentator on the works of Homer. It is to be lamented the design of Alexander Politus, begun at Florence in 1735, and published in the first five books of the Iliad, is not executed, as a Latin translation of these excellent commentaries is among the desiderata of the present day.——II. A man who wrote a very foolish Romance in Greek, entitled de Ismeniæ and Ismenes amoribus, edited by Gaulminus, 8vo. Paris, 1617.

Euthycrătes, I. a sculptor of Sicyon, son of Lysippus. He was peculiarly happy in the proportions of his statues. Those of Hercules and Alexander were in general esteem, and particularly that of Medea, which was carried on a chariot by four horses. Plin. 34, c. 8.——II. A man who betrayed Olynthus to Philip.

Euthydēmus, an orator and rhetorician, who greatly distinguished himself by his eloquence, &c. Strab. 14.

Eutropius, I. a Latin historian in the age of Julian, under whom he carried arms in the fatal expedition against the Persians. His origin, as well as his dignity, are unknown; yet some suppose, from the epithet of Clarissimus prefixed to his history, that he was a Roman senator. He wrote an epitome of the history of Rome, from the age of Romulus to the reign of the emperor Valens, to whom the work was dedicated. He wrote a treatise on medicine without being acquainted with the art. Of all his works, the Roman history alone is extant. It is composed with conciseness and precision, but without elegance. The best edition of Eutropius is that of Haverkamp, Cum notis variorum, 8vo. L. Bat. 1729 and 1760.——II. A famous eunuch at the court of Arcadius, the son of Theodosius the Great, &c.

Eutyclīde, a woman who was thirty times brought to bed, and carried to the grave by twenty of her children. Plin. 7, c. 3.

Euxēnus, a man who wrote a poetical history of the fabulous ages of Italy. Dionys. Hal. 1.

Euxippe, a woman who killed herself because the ambassadors of Sparta had offered violence to her virtue, &c.

Exagōnus, the ambassador of a nation in Cyprus, who came to Rome and talked so much of the power of herbs, serpents, &c. that the consuls ordered him to be thrown into a vessel full of serpents. These venomous creatures, far from hurting him, caressed him, and harmlessly licked him with their tongues. Plin. 28, c. 3.

Fabaria, festivals at Rome in honour of Carna, wife of Janus, when beans (fabæ) were presented as an oblation.

Fabia Lex, de ambitu, was to circumscribe the number of Sectatores, or attendants, which were allowed to candidates in canvassing some high office. It was proposed, but did not pass.

Fabii, a noble and powerful family at Rome. They were once so numerous, that they took upon themselves to wage war against the Veientes. They came to a general engagement near the Cremera, in which all the family, consisting of 306 men, were totally slain, B. C. 447. There only remained one, whose tender age had detained him at Rome, and from him arose the noble Fabii in the following ages. The family was divided into six different branches, the Ambusti, the Maximi, the Vibulani, the Buteones, the Dorsones, and the Pictores; the three first of which are frequently mentioned in the Roman history, but the others seldom. Dionys. 9, c. 5.

Fabius, I. (Maximus Rullianus) was the first of the Fabii who obtained the surname of Maximus, for lessening the power of the populace at elections. He was master of horse, and his victories over the Samnites in that capacity nearly cost him his life, because he engaged the enemy without the command of the dictator. He was five times consul, twice dictator, and once censor. He triumphed over seven different nations in the neighbourhood of Rome, and rendered himself illustrious by his patriotism.——II. Rusticus, an historian in the age of Claudius and Nero. He was intimate with Seneca; and the encomiums which Tacitus passes upon his style make us regret the loss of his compositions.——III. Q. Maximus, a celebrated Roman, first surnamed Verrucosus, from a wart on his lip, and Agnicula, from his inoffensive manners. From a dull and unpromising childhood he burst into deeds of valour and heroism, and was gradually raised by merit to the highest offices of the state. In his first consulship he obtained a victory over Liguria; and the fatal battle of Thrasymenus occasioned his election to the dictatorship. In this important office, he began to oppose Annibal, not by fighting him in the open field, like his predecessors, but he continually harassed his army by countermarches and ambuscades, for which he received the surname of Cunctator, or delayer. Such operations for the commander of the Roman armies gave offence to some, and Fabius was even accused of cowardice. He, however, still pursued the measures which prudence and reflection seemed to dictate as most salutary to Rome; and he patiently bore to see his master of horse raised to share the dictatorial dignity with himself, by means of his enemies at home. Tarentum was obliged to surrender to his arms after the battle of Cannæ; and on that occasion the Carthaginian enemy observed, that Fabius was the Annibal of Rome. When he had made an agreement with Annibal for the ransom of the captives, which was totally disapproved by the Roman senate, he sold all his estates to pay the money, rather than forfeit his word to the enemy. The bold proposal of young Scipio, to go and carry the war from Italy to Africa, was rejected by Fabius as chimerical and dangerous. He did not, however, live to see the success of the Roman arms under Scipio, and the conquest of Carthage by measures which he treated with contempt and heard with indignation. He died in the 100th year of his age, after he had been five times consul, and twice honoured with a triumph. Plut. in vitâ.—Flor. 2, c. 6.—Liv.—Polyb.——IV. His son bore the same name, and showed himself worthy of his noble father's virtues. During his consulship, he received a visit from his father on horseback in the camp: the son ordered the father to dismount, and the old man cheerfully obeyed, embracing his son, and saying, I wished to know whether you knew what it was to be consul. He died before his father; and the Cunctator, with the moderation of a philosopher, delivered a funeral oration over the dead body of his son. Plut. in Fabio.——V. Pictor, the first Roman who wrote an historical account of his country, from the age of Romulus to the year of Rome 536. He flourished B. C. 225. The sentiments expressed by Dionysius of Halicarnassus, concerning Fabius Pictor's relation of events, in the early ages of Rome, and those of Polybius, on the occurrences of which he was himself an eyewitness, enable us to form a pretty accurate estimate of the credit due to his whole history. Dionysius having himself written on the antiquities of Rome, was competent to deliver an opinion as to the works of those who had preceded him in the same undertaking; and it would rather have been favourable to the general view which he has adopted, to have established the credibility of Fabius. We may also safely rely on the judgment which Polybius has passed, concerning this old annalist's relation of the events of the age in which he lived, since Polybius had spared no pains to be thoroughly informed of whatever could render his own account of them complete and unexceptionable. The work which is now extant, and which is attributed to him, is a spurious composition.——VI. A Roman consul, surnamed Ambustus, because he was struck with lightning.——VII. Fabricianus, a Roman assassinated by his wife Fabia, that she might more freely enjoy the company of a favourite youth. His son was saved from his mother's cruelties, and when he came of age he avenged his father's death by murdering his mother and her adulterer. The senate took cognizance of the action, and patronised the parricide. Plut. in Parall.——VIII. A son of Paulus Æmilius, adopted into the family of the Fabii.

Fabricius, I. a Latin writer in the reign of Nero, who employed his pen in satirizing and defaming the senators. His works were burnt by order of Nero.——II. Caius Luscinus, a celebrated Roman, who, in his first consulship, obtained several victories over the Samnites and Lucanians, and was honoured with a triumph. Two years after, Fabricius went as ambassador to Pyrrhus, and refused with contempt the presents, and heard with indignation the offers, which might have corrupted the fidelity of a less virtuous citizen. Pyrrhus had occasion to admire the magnanimity of Fabricius; but his astonishment was more powerfully awakened when he opposed him in the field of battle, and when he saw him make a discovery of the perfidious offer of his physician, who pledged himself to the Roman general for a sum of money to poison his royal master. A contempt of luxury and useless ornaments Fabricius wished to inspire among the people; and, during his censorship, he banished from the senate Cornelius Rufinus, who had been twice consul and dictator, because he kept in his house more than ten pound weight of silver plate. He lived and died in the greatest poverty. His body was buried at the public charge, and the Roman people were obliged to give a dowry to his two daughters when they arrived at marriageable years. Val. Max. 2, c. 9, l. 4, c. 4.—Flor. 1, c. 18.—Cic. 3, de Offic.—Plut. in Pyrrh.—Virg. Æn. 6, v. 844.

Fannia, a woman of Minturnæ, who hospitably entertained Marius in his flight, though he had formerly sat in judgment upon her, and divorced her from her husband.

Fannia Lex, de Sumptibus, by Fannius the consul, A. U. C. 593. It enacted that no person should spend more than 100 asses a day at the great festivals, and 30 asses on other days, and ten at all other times.

Fannius, (Caius,) an author in Trajan's reign, whose history of the cruelties of Nero is greatly regretted.

Faunus. Vid. Part III.

Fausta, I. a daughter of Sylla, &c. Horat. 1. Sat. 2, v. 64.——II. The wife of the emperor Constantine, disgraced for her cruelties and vices.

Faustina, I. the wife of the emperor Antoninus, famous for her debaucheries. Her daughter of the same name, blessed with beauty, liveliness, and wit, became the most abandoned of her sex. She married M. Aurelius.——II. The third wife of the emperor Heliogabalus bore that name.

Faustŭlus, a shepherd ordered to expose Romulus and Remus. He privately brought them up at home. Liv. 1, c. 4.—Justin. 43, c. 2.—Plut. in Rom.

Feciales, a number of priests at Rome, employed in declaring war and making peace. When the Romans thought themselves injured, one of the sacerdotal body was empowered to demand redress, and, after the allowance of 33 days to consider the matter, war was declared if submissions were not made, and the Fecialis hurled a bloody spear into the territories of the enemy in proof of intended hostilities. Liv. 1, c. 3, l. 4, c. 30.

Felix, M. Antonius, a freedman of Claudius Cæsar, made governor of Judæa, Samaria, and Palestine. He is called by Suetonius the husband of three queens, as he married the two Drusillæ, one grand-daughter of Antony and Cleopatra, and the other a Jewish princess, sister to Agrippa. The name of his third wife is unknown. Suet. in Cl. 18.—Tacit. Ann. 12, c. 14.

Ferălia, a festival in honour of the dead, observed at Rome the 17th or 21st of February. It continued for 11 days, during which time presents were carried to the graves of the deceased, marriages were forbidden, and the temples of the gods were shut.

Feriæ Latinæ, festivals at Rome, instituted by Tarquin the Proud. The principal magistrates of 47 towns in Latium usually assembled on the mount near Rome, where they altogether with the Roman magistrates offered a bull to Jupiter Latialis, of which they carried home some part after the immolation, after they had sworn mutual friendship and alliance. It continued but one day originally, but in process of time four days were dedicated to its celebration. Dionys. Hal. 4, c. 49.—Cic. Ep. 6.—Liv. 21, &c. The feriæ among the Romans were certain days set apart to celebrate festivals, and during that time it was unlawful for any person to work. They were either public or private. The public were of four different kinds. The feriæ stativæ were certain immoveable days always marked in the calendar, and observed by the whole city with much festivity and public rejoicing. The feriæ conceptivæ were moveable feasts, and the day appointed for the celebration was always previously fixed by the magistrates or priests. Among these were the feriæ Latinæ, which were first established by Tarquin, and observed by the consuls regularly before they set out for the provinces; the Compitalia, &c. The feriæ imperativæ were appointed only by the command of the consul, dictator, or prætor, as a public rejoicing for some important victory gained over the enemy of Rome. The feriæ Nundinæ were regular days, in which the people of the country and neighbouring towns assembled together, and exposed their respective commodities to sale. They were called Nundinæ, because kept every ninth day. The feriæ privatæ were observed only in families, in commemoration of birthdays, marriages, funerals, and the like. The days on which the feriæ were observed were called by the Romans festi dies, because dedicated to mirth, relaxation, and festivity.

Fimbria, a Roman officer who besieged Mithridates in Pritane, and failed in his attempts to take him prisoner. He was deserted by his troops for his cruelty, upon which he killed himself. Plut. in Lucull.

Firmius, M., a powerful native of Seleucia, who proclaimed himself emperor, and was at last conquered by Aurelian.

Flaccus, (Verrius,) a grammarian, tutor to the two grandsons of Augustus, and supposed author of the Capitoline marbles.——A name of Horace. Vid. Horatius.

Flacilla, Ælia, the mother of Arcadius and Honorius, was daughter of Antonius, a prefect of Gaul.

Flāmĭnia Lex, agraria, by C. Flaminius the tribune, A. U. C. 525. It required that the lands of Picenum, from which the Gauls Senones had been expelled, should be divided among the Roman people.

Flāmĭnius, C., a Roman consul of a turbulent disposition, who was drawn into a battle, near the lake of Thrasymenus, by the artifice of Annibal. Cic. de Inv. 2, c. 17.—Liv. 22, c. 3, &c.—Polyb. Vid. Flaminia Lex.

Flāmĭnius, or Flamĭnius, (T. Q.) I. a celebrated Roman, raised to the consulship A. U. C. 556. He was sent at the head of the Roman troops against Philip, king of Macedonia, and in his expedition he met with uncommon success. The Greeks gradually declared themselves his firmest supporters, and he totally defeated Philip on the confines of Epirus, and made all Locris, Phocis, and Thessaly, tributary to the Roman power. He granted peace to the conquered monarch, and proclaimed all Greece free and independent at the Isthmian games. He was afterwards sent ambassador to king Prusias, who had given refuge to Annibal, and there his prudence and artifice hastened out of the world a man who had long been the terror of the Romans. Flaminius was found dead in his bed, after a life spent in the greatest glory, in which he had imitated with success the virtues of his model Scipio. Plut. in vitâ.—Flor.——II. Lucius, the brother of the preceding, signalized himself in the wars of Greece. He was expelled from the senate for killing a Gaul. Plut. in Flam.——III. Calp. Flamma, a tribune, who, at the head of 300 men, saved the Roman army in Sicily, B. C. 258, by engaging the Carthaginians and cutting them to pieces.

Flavius, I. a Roman who informed Gracchus of the violent measures of the senate against him.——II. A brother of Vespasian, &c.——One of the names of the emperor Domitian. Juv. 4, v. 37.

Florălia, games in honour of Flora at Rome.

They were instituted about the age of Romulus, but they were not celebrated with regularity and proper attention till the year U. C. 580. They were observed yearly, and exhibited a scene of the most unbounded licentiousness. It is reported that Cato wished once to be present at the celebration, and that when he saw that the deference for his presence interrupted the feast, he retired. This behaviour so captivated the degenerate Romans, that the venerable senator was treated with the most uncommon applause as he retired. Val. Max. 2, c. 10.—Varro. de L. L. 1.—Paterc. c. 1.—Plin. 18, c. 29.

Florus, (L. Annæus Julius,) a Latin historian of the same family which produced Seneca and Lucan, A. D. 116. He wrote an abridgment of Roman Annals in four books, composed in a florid and poetic style, and rather a panegyric on many of the great actions of the Romans than a faithful and correct recital of their history. He also wrote poetry, and entered the lists against the emperor Adrian.

Fonteius Capito, a man who conducted Cleopatra into Syria by order of Antony. Plut. in Ant.

Frontinus, Sex. Jul. a celebrated geometrician, who made himself known by the books he wrote on aqueducts and stratagems, dedicated to Trajan. He ordered at his death that no monument should be raised to his memory, saying, Memoria nostri durabit, si vitam meruimus. The best edition of Frontinus is that of Oudendorp, 8vo. L. Bat. 1779.

Fronto, a preceptor of M. Antoninus, by whom he was greatly esteemed.

Fulvia Lex was proposed but rejected, A. U. C. 628, by Flaccus Fulvius. It tended to make all the people of Italy citizens of Rome.

Fulvia, I. a bold and ambitious woman, who married the tribune Clodius, and afterwards Curio, and at last M. Antony. She took a part in all the intrigues of her husband's triumvirate, and showed herself cruel as well as revengeful. Antony divorced her to marry Cleopatra, upon which she attempted to avenge her wrongs by persuading Augustus to take up arms against her husband. When this scheme did not succeed, she raised a faction against Augustus, in which she engaged L. Antonius, her brother-in-law; and when all her attempts proved fruitless, she retired into the east, where her husband received her with great coldness and indifference. This unkindness totally broke her heart, and she soon after died, about 40 years before the Christian era. Plut. in Cic. & Anton.——II. A woman who discovered to Cicero the designs of Catiline upon his life. Plut. in Cic.

Fulvius, I. a Roman senator, intimate with Augustus. He disclosed the emperor's secrets to his wife, who made it public to all the Roman matrons, for which he received so severe a reprimand from Augustus, that he and his wife hanged themselves.——II. A friend of C. Gracchus, who was killed in a sedition with his son. His body was thrown into the river, and his widow was forbidden to put on mourning for his death. Plut. in Gracch.——III. Flaccus Censor, a Roman who plundered a marble temple of Juno, to finish the building of one which he had erected to Fortune. Liv. 25, c. 2.——IV. Ser. Nobilior, a Roman consul who went to Africa after the defeat of Regulus. He was shipwrecked at his return with 200 Roman ships. His grandson Marcus was sent to Spain, where he greatly signalized himself. He was afterwards rewarded with the consulship.

Furii, a family which migrated from Medullia in Latium, and come to settle at Rome under Romulus, and was admitted among the patricians. Camillus was of this family, and it was he who first raised it to distinction. Plut. in Camill.

Furia Lex, de Testamentis, by C. Furius the tribune. It forbade any person to leave as a legacy more than a thousand asses, except to the relations of the master who manumitted, with a few more exceptions. Cic. 1. Verr. 42.—Liv. 35.

Furius, I. a military tribune with Camillus. He was sent against the Tuscans by his colleague.——II. A Roman slave who obtained his freedom, and applied himself with unremitted attention to cultivate a small portion of land which he had purchased. He was accused before a Roman tribunal of witchcraft, but honourably acquitted.——III. M. Bibaculus, a Latin poet of Cremona, who wrote annals in Iambic verse, and was universally celebrated for the wit and humour of his expressions. It is said that Virgil imitated his poetry, and even borrowed some of his lines. Horace, however, ridicules his verses. Quintil. 8, c. 6, &c.—Horat. 2, Sat. 5, v. 50.

Furnius, a friend of Horace, who was consul, and distinguished himself by his elegant historical writings. 1 Sat. 10, v. 36.

Fuscus, Aristius, a friend of Horace, as conspicuous for the integrity and propriety of his manners, as for his learning and abilities.

Fusius, a Roman actor, whom Horace ridicules. 2 Sat. 3, v. 60. He intoxicated himself; and when on the stage, he fell asleep whilst he personated Ilione, when he ought to have been roused and moved by the cries of a ghost.

G.

Gabbenus, a friend of Augustus, beheaded by order of Sext. Pompey. It is maintained that he spoke after death.

Gabinia Lex, de Comitiis, by A. Gabinius, the tribune, A. U. C. 614. It required that in the public assemblies for electing magistrates, the votes should be given by tablets and not vivâ voce.——Another, de Militiâ, by A. Gabinius the tribune, A. U. C. 685. It granted Pompey the power of carrying on the war against the pirates during three years, and of obliging all kings, governors, and states, to supply him with all the necessaries he wanted, over all the Mediterranean Sea, and in the maritime provinces, as far as 400 stadia from the sea.——Another, de Usurâ, by Aul. Gabinius the tribune, A. U. C. 685. It ordained that no action should be granted for the recovery of any money borrowed upon small interest to be lent upon larger. This was a usual practice at Rome, which obtained the name of versuram facere.

Gabinius Aulius, a Roman consul, who made war in Judæa, and re-established tranquillity there. He suffered himself to be bribed, and replaced Ptolemy Auletes on the throne of Egypt. He was accused, at his return, of receiving bribes. Cicero, at the request of Pompey, ably defended him. He was banished, and died about 40 years before Christ, at Salona.

Gastŭlicus, a poet who wrote some epigrams, in which he displayed great genius and wit.

Galba, I. a surname of the first of the Sulpitii, from the smallness of his stature. The word signifies a small worm, or, according to some, it implies, in the language of Gaul, fatness, for which the founder of the Sulpitian family was remarkable.——II. Servius Sulpitius, a Roman, who rose gradually to the greatest offices of the state, and exercised his power in the provinces with equity and unremitted diligence. He dedicated the greatest part of his time to solitary pursuits, chiefly to avoid the suspicions of Nero. His disapprobation of the emperor's oppressive command in the provinces was the cause of new disturbances. Nero ordered him to be put to death, but he escaped from the hands of the executioner, and was publicly saluted emperor. Irregularities in the emperor's ministers greatly displeased the people; and when Galba refused to pay the soldiers the money which he had promised them when he was raised to the throne, they assassinated him in the 73d year of his age, and in the eighth of his reign, and proclaimed Otho emperor in his room, January 16th, A. D. 69. The virtues which had shone so bright in Galba when a private man, totally disappeared when he ascended the throne; and he who showed himself the most impartial judge, forgot the duties of an emperor and of a father of his people. Sueton. & Plut. in vitâ.—Tacit.——III. A learned man, grandfather to the emperor of the same name. Suet. in Galb. 4.——IV. Sergius, a celebrated orator before the age of Cicero. He showed his sons to the Roman people and implored their protection, by which means he saved himself from the punishment which either his guilt or the persuasive eloquence of his adversaries, M. Cato and L. Scribonius, urged as due to him. Cic. de Orat. 1, c. 53. ad Her. 4, c. 5.

Galēnus Claudius, a celebrated physician in the age of M. Antoninus and his successors, born at Pergamus, the son of an architect. He applied himself with unremitted labour to the study of philosophy, mathematics, and chiefly of physic. He was very intimate with Marcus Aurelius, the emperor, after whose death he returned to Pergamus, where he died in his 90th year, A. D. 193. He wrote no less than 300 volumes, the greatest part of which were burnt in the temple of Peace at Rome, where they had been deposited. What remains of the works of Galen has been published, without a Latin translation, in five vols. fol. Basil. 1538. Galen was likewise edited, together with Hippocrates, by Charterius, 13 vols. fol. Paris, 1679, but very incorrect.

Galeria, I. the wife of Vitellius.——II. Fustinia, the wife of the emperor Antoninus Pius.

Gallienus, (Publ. Lucinius,) son of the emperor Valerian. He reigned conjointly with his father for seven years, and ascended the throne as sole emperor, A. D. 260. In his youth he showed his activity and military character, in an expedition against the Germans and Sarmatæ; but when he came to the purple, he delivered himself up to pleasure and indolence. His time was spent in the greatest debauchery. He often appeared with his hair powdered with golden dust; and enjoyed tranquillity at home, while his provinces abroad were torn by civil quarrels and seditions; and when he was apprized that Egypt had revolted, he only observed that he could live without the produce of Egypt. He was of a disposition naturally inclined to raillery; and when his wife had been deceived by a jeweller, Gallienus ordered the malefactor to be placed in the circus, in expectation of being exposed to the ferocity of a lion; when the executioner, by order of the emperor, let loose a capon upon him. An uncommon laugh was raised upon this, and the emperor observed, that he who had deceived others should expect to be deceived himself. The revolt of two of his officers roused him to exertion; he marched against his antagonists, and put all the rebels to the sword, without showing the least favour either to rank, sex, or age. These cruelties irritated the people and the army; emperors were elected, and no less than thirty tyrants aspired to the imperial purple. Gallienus resolved boldly to oppose his adversaries; but in the midst of his preparations, he was assassinated at Milan by one of his officers, in the 50th year of his age, A. D. 268.

Gallus (Caius,) I. a friend of the great Africanus, famous for his knowledge of astronomy, and his exact calculations of eclipses. Cic. de Senec.——II. Ælius, the 3d governor of Egypt in the age of Augustus.——III. Cornelius, a Roman knight, who rendered himself famous by his poetical as well as military talents. From the obscurity of his birth and of his original situation, little is known concerning the early years of Gallus. He is first mentioned in history as accompanying Octavius, when he marched to Rome, after the battle of Modena, to demand the consulship. He had soon so far ingratiated himself with this leader, that we find him among the number of his advisers after the battle of Philippi, and counselling him, along with Mæcenas, to write in gentle terms to the senate, with assurances that he would offer no violence to the city, but would regulate all things with clemency and moderation. On the partition of the lands, which followed the defeat of Brutus, Gallus was appointed to collect, from the cantons on the banks of the Po, a tribute which had been imposed on the inhabitants, in place of depriving them of their lands. After the battle of Actium, he was opposed to Antony in person, on the invasion of Egypt; and while Augustus took possession of Pelusium, its eastern key, Gallus was employed to make himself master of Paretonium, which was considered as its western barrier. Egypt having been reduced to complete submission, its conqueror directed his whole attention towards the administration of its internal affairs. He accordingly took into his own hands the whole administration, which, on his return to Rome, he determined to devolve on a viceroy, supported by a great military force stationed in different parts of the kingdom. Gallus was the person whom he first invested with this prefecture; and his long-tried fidelity, his attachment to his master, and his talents for conciliation, gave every prospect of a government which would be exercised with advantage to the prince who trusted him, and the people who were confided to his care; and so long as he acted under the direction of Augustus, he manifested no defect either in capacity or zeal. He opened new conduits from the Nile, and caused the old channels to be cleared; he restored the rigour of the laws, protected commerce, and encouraged arts; and he founded another Alexandrian library, the former magnificent collection of books having been accidentally burnt in the time of Julius Cæsar. By these means, Egypt for a while enjoyed, under the government of Gallus, a prosperity and happiness to which she had long been a stranger during the sway of the Ptolemies. But the termination of the rule of this first prefect of Egypt did not correspond to its auspicious commencement. Elated with power, he soon forgot the respect that was due to his benefactor. He ascribed every thing to his own merit—erecting statues to himself throughout all Egypt, and engraving a record of his exploits on the pyramids. In unguarded hours, and when under the influence of the double intoxication of prosperity and wine, he applied to his master the most opprobrious and insulting expressions. Indiscretion and vanity were quickly followed by acts of misgovernment and rapine. He plundered the ancient city of Thebes, and stripped it of its principal ornaments; and he is even said, though on no very certain authority, to have filled up the measure of his offences by conspiring against the life of the emperor. In consequence of his misconduct, and of those unguarded expressions, which were probably conveyed to his master, with exaggeration, by some false friend or enemy, he was recalled, in the fifth year of his government; and immediately after his return to Rome, one of his most intimate friends, called Largus, stood forth as his accuser. Augustus, in the meanwhile, forbade him his presence; and the charges, which now multiplied from every quarter, were brought before the senate. Though Gallus had many friends among the poets, he had few among the senators. No one could refuse verses to Gallus; but a fair hearing was probably denied him. He was sentenced to perpetual exile, and his whole property was confiscated. Unable to endure the humiliation, which presented such a contrast to his former brilliant fortune, he terminated his existence by a voluntary death. This sad conclusion to his once prosperous career took place in 727, when he was in the 43d year of his age. The guilt or the misfortunes of Gallus as a statesman, have been long since forgotten, and he is now remembered only as a distinguished patron of learning, and as an elegant poet. Gallus was the friend of Pollio and Mæcenas, and rivalled them, through life, as an eminent promoter of the interests of literature. He protected Parthenius Nicenus, a Greek author, who had been brought to Rome during the Mithridatic war, and who inscribed to him his collection of amorous mythological stories, entitled, Περι ἐρωτικων παθηματων, declaring in his dedication, that he addressed the work to Gallus, as likely to furnish incidents which might be employed by him in the poems he was then writing. But Gallus is best known to posterity as the patron of Virgil, whom he introduced to the notice of Mæcenas, and was also instrumental in obtaining for him restitution of his farm, after the partition of the lands among the soldiery. In gratitude for these and other favours conferred on him, the Mantuan bard has introduced an elegant compliment to Gallus in the sixth eclogue; and has devoted the tenth to the celebration of his passion for Lycoris. The elegies of Gallus consisted of four books, but they have now all perished; they were held, however, in high estimation so long as they survived. Ovid speaks of Tibullus as the successor of Gallus, and as his companion in the Elysian fields; and he oftener than once alludes to the extensive celebrity which his verses had procured for himself as well as his mistress. Quintilian ranks him as an elegiac poet with Tibullus and Propertius, though he thinks his style was somewhat harsher than that of either. Besides the four books of elegies, Gallus translated or imitated from the Greek of Euphronion, a poem on the Grynean Grove, written in the manner of Hesiod. Though scarcely a vestige of the writings of Gallus remains, his name is still celebrated. 'The praises,' says Berwick, 'bestowed on him by his contemporaries, particularly Virgil, have survived, and made posterity, at the distance of near two thousand years, anxious to hear his story. In vain did Augustus endeavour to suppress his fame—in vain did imperial resentment strive to obstruct his reputation. His name as a poet still lives, though his works, which gave celebrity to that name, have totally perished.' He was passionately fond of the slave Lycoris or Cytheris, and celebrated her beauty in his poetry. Quintil. 10, c. 1.—Virg. Ecl. 6 and 10.—Ovid. Amat. 3, el. 15, v. 29.——IV. Vibius Gallus, a celebrated orator of Gaul, in the age of Augustus, of whose orations Seneca has preserved some fragments.——V. A Roman who assassinated Decius, the emperor, and raised himself to the throne. He showed himself indolent and cruel, and beheld with the greatest indifference the revolt of his provinces and the invasion of his empire by the barbarians. He was at last assassinated by his soldiers, A. D. 253.—VI. Flavius Claudius Constantinus, a brother of the emperor Julian, raised to the imperial throne, under the title of Cæsar, by Constantius, his relation. He conspired against his benefactor, and was publicly condemned to be beheaded, A. D. 354.

Gellius, Aulus, a Roman grammarian in the age of M. Antoninus, about 130 A. D. He published a work which he called Noctes Atticæ, because he composed it at Athens during the long nights of the winter. It is a collection of incongruous matter, which contains many fragments from the ancient writers, and often serves to explain antique monuments. It was originally composed for the improvement of his children, and abounds with many grammatical remarks. The best editions of A. Gellius are, that of Gronovius, 4to. L. Bat. 1706, and that of Conrad, 2 vols. 8vo. Lips. 1762.

Gremĭnĭus, an inveterate enemy of Marius. He seized the person of Marius, and carried him to Minturnæ. Plut in Mario.

Genserĭc, a famous Vandal prince, who passed from Spain to Africa, where he took Carthage. He laid the foundation of the Van-del kingdom in Africa, and in the course of his military expeditions, invaded Italy, and sacked Rome in July 455.

Gentius, a king of Illyricum, who imprisoned the Roman ambassador at the request of Perseus, king of Macedonia. This offence was highly resented by the Romans, and Gentius was conquered by Anicius, and led in triumph with his family, B. C. 169. Liv. 43, c. 19, &c.

Georgica. Vid. Virgilius.

Germanicus Cæsar, a son of Drusus and Antonia, the niece of Augustus. He was adopted by his uncle Tiberius, and raised to the most important offices of the state. When his grandfather Augustus died, he was employed in a war in Germany, defeated the celebrated Arminius, and was rewarded with a triumph at his return to Rome. Tiberius declared him emperor of the east, and sent him to appease the seditions of the Armenians. But the success of Germanicus in the east was soon looked upon with an envious eye by Tiberius, and his death was meditated. He was secretly poisoned at Daphne, near Antioch, by Piso, A. D. 19, in the thirty-fourth year of his age. The news of his death was received with the greatest grief and the most bitter lamentations, and Tiberius seemed to be the only one who rejoiced in the fall of Germanicus. He had married Agrippina, by whom he had nine children, one of whom, Caligula, disgraced the name of his illustrious father. In the midst of war he devoted some moments to study, and he favoured the world with two Greek comedies, some epigrams, and a translation of Aratus in Latin verse. Sueton.——This name was common, in the age of the emperors, not only to those who had obtained victories over the Germans, but even to those who had entered the borders of their country at the head of an army. Domitian applied the name of Germanicus, which he himself had vainly assumed, to the month of September in honour of himself. Suet. in Dom. 13.—Martial. 9, ep. 2, v. 4.

Geta, I. a man who raised seditions at Rome in Nero's reign, &c. Tacit. Hist. 2, c. 72.—— II. Septimius, a son of the emperor Severus, brother to Caracalla. After his father's death he reigned at Rome conjointly with his brother; but Caracalla, who envied his virtues, and was jealous of his popularity, murdered him in the arms of his mother Julia, who, in the attempt of defending the fatal blows from his body, received a wound in her arm from the hand of her son, the 26th of March, A. D. 212. Geta had not reached the 23d year of his age, and the Romans had reason to lament the death of so virtuous a prince, while they groaned under the cruelties and oppression of Caracalla.

Gisco, son of Hamilcon, the Carthaginian general, was banished from his country by the influence of his enemies. He was afterwards recalled, and empowered by the Carthaginians to punish, in what manner he pleased, those who had occasioned his banishment. He was satisfied to see them prostrate on the ground, and to place his foot on their neck, showing that independence and forgiveness are two of the most brilliant virtues of a great mind. He was made a general soon after in Sicily, against the Corinthians, about 309 years before the Christian era; and by his success and intrepidity he obliged the enemies of his country to sue for peace.

Gladiatorii Ludi, combats originally exhibited on the grave of deceased persons at Rome. They were first introduced at Rome by the Bruti, upon the death of their father, A. U. C. 488. It was supposed that the ghosts of the dead were rendered propitious by human blood; therefore, at funerals, it was usual to murder slaves in cool blood. In succeeding ages it was reckoned less cruel to oblige them to kill one another like men, than to slaughter them like brutes; therefore the barbarity was covered by the specious show of pleasure and voluntary combat. Originally captives, criminals, or disobedient slaves, were trained up for combat; but when the diversion became more frequent, and was exhibited on the smallest occasion, to procure esteem and popularity many of the Roman citizens enlisted themselves among the gladiators, and Nero at one show exhibited no less than 400 senators and 600 knights. The people were treated with these combats not only by the great and opulent, but the very priests had their Ludi pontificales and Ludi sacerdotales. It is supposed that there were no more than three pair of gladiators exhibited by the Bruti. Their numbers, however, increased with the luxury and power of the city; and the gladiators became so formidable, that Spartacus, one of their body, had courage to take up arms, and the success to defeat the Roman armies, only with a train of his fellow-sufferers. When they were first brought upon the arena, they walked round the place with great pomp and solemnity, and after that they were matched in equal pairs with great nicety. They first had a skirmish with wooden files, called rudes or arma lusoria. After this the effective weapons, such as swords, daggers, &c. called arma decretoria, were given them, and the signal for the engagement was given by the sound of a trumpet. As they had all previously sworn to fight till death, or suffer death in the most excruciating torments, the fight was bloody and obstinate; and when one signified his submission by surrendering his arms, the victor was not permitted to grant him his life without the leer and approbation of the multitude. This was done by clenching the fingers of both hands between each other, and holding the thumbs upright close together, or bending back their thumbs. The first of these was called pollicem premere, and signified the wish of the people to spare the life of the conquered. The other sign, called pollicem vertere, signified their disapprobation, and ordered the victor to put his antagonist to death. The combats of gladiators were sometimes different, either in weapons or dress; whence they were generally distinguished. The secutores were armed with a sword and buckler, to keep off the net of their antagonists, the retiarii. The threces, originally Thracians, were armed with a falchion and small round shield. The myrmillones, called also galli, from their Gallic dress, were much the same as the secutores. They were, like them, armed with a sword, and on the top of their headpiece they wore the figure of a fish, embossed, called μορμυρος, whence their name. The hoplomachi, were completely armed from head to foot, as their name implies. The samnites, armed after the manner of the Samnites, wore a large shield, broad at the top, and growing more narrow at the bottom, more conveniently to defend the upper parts of the body. The essedarii, generally fought from the essedum, or chariot used by the ancient Gauls and Britons. The andabata ἀναβάται, fought on horseback, with a helmet that covered and defended their faces and eyes. Hence, andabatarum more pugnare, is to fight blindfolded. The meridiani, engaged in the afternoon. The postulatitii, were men of great skill and experience, and such as were generally produced by the emperors. The fiscales, were maintained out of the emperor's treasury, fiscus. The dimachari fought with two swords in their hands, whence their name. After these cruel exhibitions had been continued for the amusement of the Roman populace, they were abolished by Constantine the Great, near 600 years after their first institution. They were, however, revived under the reign of Constantius and his two successors, but Honorius for ever put an end to these cruel barbarities.

Glaucus, I. a physician, crucified because Hephæstion died while under his care. Plut. in Alex.——II. A son of Hippolytus, whose descendants reigned in Ionia.

Gobar, a governor of Mesopotamia, who checked the course of the Euphrates that it might not run rapidly through Babylon. Plin. 6, c, 26.

Gobryas, a Persian, one of the seven noblemen who conspired against the usurper Smerdis. Vid. Darius. Herodot. 3, c. 70.

Gordianus, M. Antonius Africanus, I. a son of Metius Marcellus, descended from Trajan by his mother's side. He applied himself to the study of poetry, and composed a poem in thirty books, upon the virtues of Titus Antoninus and M. Aurelius. After he had attained his 80th year in the greatest splendour and domestic tranquillity, he was roused from his peaceful occupations by the tyrannical reign of the Maximini, and he was proclaimed emperor by the rebellious troops of his province. He long declined to accept the imperial purple, but the threats of immediate death gained his compliance. Maximinus marched against him with the greatest indignation; and Gordian sent his son, with whom he shared the imperial dignity, to oppose the enemy. Young Gordian was killed, and the father, worn out with age, and grown desperate on account of his misfortunes, strangled himself at Carthage before he had been six weeks at the head of the empire, A. D. 236. He was universally lamented by the army and people.——II. M. Antoninus Africanus, son of Gordianus, was instructed by Serenus Samnoticus, who left him his library, which consisted of 62,000 volumes. He passed into Africa, in the character of lieutenant to his father, who had obtained that province, and seven years after he was elected emperor in conjunction with him. He marched against the partisans of Maximinus, his antagonist, in Mauretania, and was killed in a bloody battle on the 26th of June A. D. 236, after a reign of about six weeks. He was of an amiable disposition, but he has been justly blamed by his biographers on account of his lascivious propensities, which reduced him to the weakness and infirmities of old age, though he was but in his 46th year at the time of his death.——III. M. Antoninus Pius, grandson of the first Gordian, was but 12 years old when he was honoured with the title of Cæsar. He was proclaimed emperor in the 16th year of his age, and his election was attended with universal marks of approbation. In the 18th year of his age he married Furia Sabina Tranquilina, daughter of Misitheus, a man celebrated for his eloquence and public virtues. He conquered Sapor, and took many flourishing cities in the east from his adversary. In this success the senate decreed him a triumph, and saluted Misitheus as the guardian of the republic. Gordian was assassinated in the east, A. D. 244, by the means of Philip, who had succeeded to the virtuous Misitheus, and who usurped the sovereign power by murdering a warlike and amiable prince. The senate, sensible of his merit, ordered that the descendants of the Gordians should ever be free at Rome from all the heavy taxes and burdens of the state. During the reign of Gordianus, there was an uncommon eclipse of the sun, in which the stars appeared in the middle of the day.

Gordius, I. a Phrygian, who, though originally a peasant, was raised to the throne. During a sedition, the Phrygians consulted the oracle, and were told that all their troubles would cease as soon as they chose for their king the first man they met going to the temple of Jupiter mounted on a chariot. Gordius was the object of their choice, and he immediately consecrated his chariot in the temple of Jupiter. The knot which tied the yoke to the draught tree was made in such an artful manner that the ends of the cord could not be perceived. From this circumstance a report was soon spread that the empire of Asia was promised by the oracle to him that could untie the Gordian knot. Alexander, in his conquest of Asia, passed by Gordium; and, as he wished to leave nothing undone which might inspire his soldiers with courage, and make his enemies believe that he was born to conquer Asia, he cut the knot with his sword; and from that circumstance asserted that the oracle was really fulfilled, and that his claims to universal empire were fully justified. Justin. 11, c. 7.—Curt. 3, c. 1.—Arrian. 1.——II. A tyrant of Corinth. Aristot..

Gorgias, a celebrated sophist and orator, son of Carmantides, surnamed Leontinus, because born at Leontium in Sicily. He was sent by his countrymen to solicit the assistance of the Athenians against the Syracusans, and was successful in his embassy. He lived to his 108th year, and died B. C. 400. Only two fragments of his compositions are extant. Paus. 6, c. 17.—Cic. in Orat. 22, &c.—Senect. 15, in Brut. 15.—Quintil. 3 and 12.

Gorgus, the son of Aristomenes the Messenian. He was married, when young, to a virgin, by his father, who had experienced the greatest kindness from her humanity, and had been enabled to conquer seven Cretans who had attempted his life, &c. Paus. 4, c. 19.

Gracchus, (T. Sempronius,) I. father of Tiberius and Caius Gracchus, twice consul and once censor, was distinguished by his integrity, as well as his prudence and superior ability either in the senate or at the head of the armies. He made war in Gaul, and met with much success in Spain. He married Sempronia, of the family of the Scipios, a woman of great virtue, piety, and learning. Cic. de Orat. 1, c. 48. Their children, Tiberius and Caius, who had been educated under the watchful eye of their mother, rendered themselves famous for their eloquence, seditions, and an obstinate attachment to the interests of the populace, which at last proved fatal to them. With a winning eloquence, affected moderation, and uncommon popularity, Tiberius began to renew the Agrarian law, which had already caused such dissentions at Rome. (Vid. Agraria.) By the means of violence, his proposition passed into a law, and he was appointed commissioner, with his father-in-law Appius Claudius, and his brother Caius, to make an equal division of the lands among the people. The riches of Attalus, which were left to the Roman people by will, were distributed without opposition: and Tiberius enjoyed the triumph of his successful enterprise, when he was assassinated in the midst of his adherents by P. Nasica, while the populace were all unanimous to re-elect him to serve the office of tribune the following year. The death of Tiberius checked for a while the friends of the people; but Caius, spurred by ambition and furious zeal, attempted to remove every obstacle which stood in his way by force and violence. He supported the cause of the people with more vehemence than Tiberius; and his success served only to awaken his ambition, and animate his resentment against the nobles. With the privileges of a tribune, he soon became the arbiter of the republic, and treated the patricians with contempt. This behaviour hastened the ruin of Caius, and in the tumult he fled to the temple of Diana, where his friends prevented him from committing suicide. This increased the sedition, and he was murdered by order of the consul Opimius, B. C. 121, about 13 years after the unfortunate end of Tiberius. His body was thrown into the Tiber, and his wife forbidden to put on mourning for his death. Caius has been accused of having stained his hands in the blood of Scipio Africanus the younger, who was found murdered in his bed. Plut. in vitâ.—Cic. in Cat. 1.—Lucan. 6, v. 796.—Flor. 2, c. 17, l. 3, c. 14, &c.——II. Sempronius, a Roman, banished to the coast of Africa for his adulteries with Julia, the daughter of Augustus. He was assassinated by order of Tiberius, after he had been banished 14 years. Julia also shared his fate. Tacit. Ann. 1, c. 53.

Granius Petronius, I. an officer who, being taken by Pompey's general, refused the life which was tendered to him; observing that Cæsar's soldiers received not but granted life. He killed himself. Plut. in Cæs.——II. A son of the wife of Marius by a former husband.——III. Quintus, a man intimate with Crassus and other illustrious men of Rome, whose vices he lashed with an unsparing hand. Cic. Brut. 43 and 46. Orat. 2, c. 60.

Gratianus, I. a native of Pannonia, father to the emperor Valentinian 1st. He was raised to the throne, though only eight years old; and after he had reigned for some time conjointly with his father, he became sole emperor in the 16th year of his age. He soon after took, as his imperial colleague, Theodosius, whom he appointed over the eastern parts of the empire. His courage in the field is as remarkable as his love of learning and fondness for philosophy. He slaughtered 30,000 Germans in a battle, and supported the tottering state by his prudence and intrepidity. His enmity to the Pagan superstition of his subjects proved his ruin; and Maximinus, who undertook the defence of the worship of Jupiter and of all the gods, was joined by an infinite number of discontented Romans, and met Gratian near Paris in Gaul. Gratian was forsaken by his troops in the field of battle, and was murdered by the rebels, A. D. 383, in the 24th year of his age.——II. a Roman soldier, invested with the imperial purple by the rebellious army in Britain, in opposition to Honorius. He was assassinated four months after by those very troops to whom he owed his elevation, A. D. 407.

Gratius Faliscus, a Latin poet, contemporary with Ovid, and mentioned only by him among the more ancient authors. He wrote a poem on coursing, called Cynegeticon, much commended for its elegance and perspicuity. It may be compared to the Georgics of Virgil, to which it is nearly equal in the number of verses. The latest edition is that of Amst. 4to. 1728. Ovid. Pont. 4, el. 16, v. 34.

Gregorius, (Theod. Thaumaturgus,) I. a disciple of Origen, afterwards bishop of Neocæsarea, the place of his birth. He died A. D. 266, and it is said that he left only seventeen idolaters in his diocess, where he had found only seventeen Christians. Of his works are extant his gratulatory oration to Origen, a canonical epistle, and other treatises in Greek; the best edition of which is that of Paris, fol. 1623.——II. Nanzianzen, surnamed the Divine, was bishop of Constantinople, which he resigned on its being disputed. His writings rival those of the most celebrated orators of Greece, in eloquence, sublimity, and variety. His sermons are more for philosophers than common hearers, but replete with seriousness and devotion. Erasmus said that he was afraid to translate his works, from the apprehension of not transfusing into another language the smartness and acumen of his style, and the stateliness and happy diction of the whole. He died A. D. 389. The best edition is that of the Benedictines, the first volume of which, in fol. was published at Paris, 1778.——III. A bishop of Nyssa, author of the Nicene creed. His style is represented as allegorical and affected; and he has been accused of mixing philosophy too much with theology. His writings consist of commentaries on Scripture, moral discourses, sermons on mysteries, dogmatical treatises, panegyrics on saints; the best edition of which is that of Morell, 2 vols. fol. Paris, 1615. The bishop died A. D. 396.——IV. Another Christian writer, whose works were edited by the Benedictines, in four vols. fol. Paris, 1705.

Gryllus, a son of Xenophon, who killed Epaminondas, and was himself slain at the battle of Mantinea, B. C. 363. Vid. Xenophon.

Gyges, or Ges, a Lydian, to whom Candaules, king of the country, showed his wife naked. The queen was so incensed at this instance of imprudence and infirmity in her husband, that she ordered Gyges either to prepare for death himself or to murder Candaules.

He chose the latter, and married the queen, and ascended the vacant throne about 718 years before the Christian era. He was the first of the Mermnadæ who reigned in Lydia. He reigned 38 years, and distinguished himself by the immense presents which he made to the oracle of Delphi. Herodot. 1, c. 8.—Plat. dial. 10, de rep.—Val. Max. 7, c. 1.—Cic. Offic. 3, 9.

Gylippus, I. a Lacedæmonian, sent B. C. 414, by his countrymen to assist Syracuse against the Athenians. He obtained a celebrated victory over Nicias and Demosthenes, the enemy's generals, and obliged them to surrender. He accompanied Lysander in his expedition against Athens, and was intrusted by the conqueror with the money which had been taken in the plunder, which amounted to 1500 talents. As he conveyed it to Sparta, he had the meanness to unsew the bottom of the bags which contained it, and secreted about three hundred talents. His theft was discovered; and, to avoid the punishment which he deserved, he fled from his country, and by this act of meanness, tarnished the glory of his victorious actions. Tibull. 4, el. 1, v. 199.—Plut. in Nicia.——II. Gymnăsium. Vid. Part. I.

Gymnosophistæ, a certain sect of philosophers in India, who, according to some, placed their summum bonum in pleasure, and their summum malum in pain. They lived naked, as their name implies, and for 37 years they exposed themselves in the open air, to the heat of the sun, the inclemency of the seasons, and the coldness of the night. They were often seen in the fields fixing their eyes full upon the disk of the sun from the time of its rising till the hour of its setting. Sometimes they stood whole days upon one foot in burning sand, without moving or showing any concern for what surrounded them. Alexander was astonished at the sight of a sect of men who seemed to despise bodily pain, and who inured themselves to suffer the greatest tortures without uttering a groan or expressing any marks of fear. The conqueror condescended to visit them, and his astonishment was increased when he saw one of them ascend a burning pile with firmness and unconcern, to avoid the infirmities of old age, and stand upright on one leg and unmoved, when the flames surrounded him on every side. Vid. Calanus. The Brachmans were a branch of the sect of the Gymnosophistæ. Vid. Brachmanes.—Strab. 15, &c.—Plin. 7, c. 2.—Cic. Tusc. 5.—Lucan. 3, v. 240.—Curt. 8, c. 9.—Dign.

Harmodius, a friend of Aristogiton, who delivered his country from the tyranny of the Pisistratidæ, B. C. 510. (*Vid. Harpăgus, a general of Cyrus. He conquered Asia Minor after he had revolted from Astyages, who had cruelly forced him to eat the flesh of his son, because he had disobeyed his orders in not putting to death the infant Cyrus. Herodot. 1, c. 108.—Justin. 1, c. 5 and 6.

Harpălus, a man intrusted with the treasures of Babylon by Alexander. His hopes that Alexander would perish in his expedition, rendered him dissipated, negligent, and vicious. When he heard that the conqueror was returning with great resentment, he fled to Athens, where, with his money, he corrupted the orators, among whom was Demosthenes. When brought to justice, he escaped with impunity to Crete, where he was at last assassinated by Thimbro, B. C. 325. Plut. in Phoc.—Diod. 17.

Harpălyce, I. the daughter of Harpalycus, king of Thrace. When her father's kingdom was invaded by Neoptolemus, the son of Achilles, she repelled and defeated the enemy with manly courage. The death of her father, which happened soon after in a sedition, rendered her disconsolate; she fled the society of mankind, and lived in the forests upon plunder and rapine. After her death the people of the country disputed their respective right to the possessions she had acquired by rapine, and they soon after appeased her manes by proper oblations on her tomb. Virg. Æn. 1, v. 321.—Hygin. fab. 193 and 252.

Harpocration, I. a Platonic philosopher of Argos, from whom Stobæus compiled his eclogues.——II. A sophist, called also Ælius.——III. Valerius, a rhetorician of Alexandria, author of a Lexicon on ten orators.

Haruspex, a soothsayer at Rome, who drew omens by consulting the entrails of beasts that were sacrificed. He received the name of Aruspex, ab aris aspiciendis, and that of Extispex, ab extis inspiciendis. The order of Aruspices was first established at Rome by Romulus, and the first Aruspices were Tuscans by origin, as they were particularly famous in that branch of divination. (Vid. Tages.) They were originally three, but the Roman senate yearly sent six noble youths, or, according to others, twelve, to Etruria, to be instructed in all the mysteries of the art. The office of the Haruspices consisted in observing these four particulars; the beast before it was sacrificed; its entrails; the flames which consumed the sacrifice; and the flour, frankincense, &c. which was used. This custom of consulting the entrails of victims did not originate in Tuscany, but it was in use among the Chaldeans, Greeks, Egyptians, &c. and the more enlightened part of mankind well knew how to render it subservient to their wishes or tyranny. Agesilaus, when in Egypt, raised the drooping spirits of his soldiers by a superstitious artifice. He secretly wrote in his hand the word νικη, victory, in large characters, and holding the entrails of a victim in his hand till the impression was communicated to the flesh, he showed it to the soldiers, and animated them by observing, that the gods signified their approaching victories even by marking it in the body of the sacrificed animals. Cic. de Div.

Hecatæus, an historian of Miletus, born 549 years before Christ, in the reign of Darius Hystaspes. Herodot. 2, c. 143.

Hecatēsia, a yearly festival observed by the Stratonicenaians in honour of Hecate. The Athenians paid also particular worship to this goddess, who was deemed the patroness of families and of children. From this circumstance the statues of the goddess were erected before the doors of the houses, and upon every new moon a public supper was always provided at the expense of the richest people, and set in the streets, where the poorest of the citizens were permitted to retire and feast upon it while they reported that Hecate had devoured it..

Hecatombœa, a festival celebrated in honour of Juno, by the Argians and people of Ægina. It receives its name from εκατον, & βους, a sacrifice of a hundred bulls, which were always offered to the goddess, and the flesh distributed among the poorest citizens.

Hecatomphōnia, a solemn sacrifice offered by the Messenians to Jupiter, when any of them had killed an hundred enemies. Paus. 4, c. 19.

Hector, son of king Priam and Hecuba, was the most valiant of all the Trojan chiefs that fought against the Greeks. He married Andromache, the daughter of Eetion, by whom he had Astyanax. He was appointed captain of all the Trojan forces when Troy was besieged by the Greeks; and the valour with which he behaved showed how well qualified he was to discharge that important office. He engaged with the bravest of the Greeks, and according to Hyginus, no less than 31 of the most valiant of the enemy perished by his hand. When Achilles had driven back the Trojans towards the city, Hector, too great to fly, waited the approach of his enemy near the Scean gates, though his father and mother, with tears in their eyes, blamed their rashness, and entreated him to retire. The sight of Achilles terrified him, and he fled before him in the plain. The Greek pursued, and Hector was killed, and his body was dragged in cruel triumph by the conqueror round the tomb of Patroclus, whom Hector had killed. The body, after receiving the grossest insults, was ransomed by old Priam, and the Trojans obtained from the Greeks a truce of some days to pay the last offices to the greatest of their leaders. The Thebans boasted in the age of the geographer Pausanias that they had the ashes of Hector preserved in an urn, by order of an oracle; which promised them undisturbed felicity if they were in possession of that hero's remains. The epithet of Hectoreus is applied by the poets to the Trojans, as best expressive of valour and intrepidity. Homer. Il. 1, &c.—Virg. Æn. 1, &c.—Ovid. Met. 12 and 13.—Dictys Cret.—Dares Phryg.—Hygin. fab. 90 and 112.—Paus. 1, 3, and 9, c. 18.—Quintil. Smyrn. 1 and 3.

Hecŭba, a daughter of Dymas, a Phrygian prince, or, according to others, of Cisseis, a Thracian king, was the second wife of Priam, king of Troy, and proved the chastest of women, and the most tender and unfortunate of mothers. During the Trojan war she saw the greatest part of her children perish by the hands of the enemy, and, like a mother, she confessed her grief by her tears and lamentations, particularly at the death of Hector, her eldest son. When Troy was taken, Hecuba, as one of the captives, fell to the lot of Ulysses, and embarked with the conquerors for Greece. After this she threw herself into the sea, according to Hyginus, and the place was, from that circumstance, called Cyneum. Hecuba had a great number of children by Priam, among whom were Hector, Paris, Deiphobus, Pammon, Helenus, Polytes, Antiphon, Hipponous, Polydorus, Troilus; and among the daughters, Creusa, Ilione, Laodice, Polyxena, and Cassandra. *Ovid. Hegesilŏchus, I. one of the chief magistrates of Rhodes in the reign of Alexander and his father Philip.——II. Another native of Rhodes, 171 years before the Christian era. He engaged his countrymen to prepare a fleet of 40 ships to assist the Romans against Perseus, king of Macedonia.

Hegesipȳle, a daughter of Olorus king of Thrace, who married Miltiades and became mother of Cimon. Plut.

Hegetorides, a Thasian, who, upon seeing his country besieged by the Athenians, and a law forbidding any one on pain of death to speak of peace, went to the market-place with a rope about his neck, and boldly told his countrymen to treat him as they pleased, provided they saved the city from the calamities which the continuation of the war seemed to threaten. The Thasians were awakened, the law was abrogated, and Hegetorides pardoned, &c. Polyæn. 2.

Hĕlĕna, I. the most beautiful woman of her age, sprung from one of the eggs which Leda, the wife of king Tyndarus, brought forth after her amour with Jupiter metamorphosed into a swan. Vid. Leda. According to some authors, Helen was daughter of Nemesis by Jupiter, and Leda was only her nurse; and to reconcile this variety of opinions, some imagine that Nemesis and Leda are the same persons. Her beauty was so universally admired, even in her infancy, that Theseus, with his friend Pirithous, carried her away before she had attained her tenth year, and concealed her at Aphidnæ, under the care of his mother Æthra. Her brothers Castor and Pollux, recovered her by force of arms, and she returned safe and unpolluted to Sparta, her native country. The most celebrated of her suiters were Ulysses son of Laertes, Antilochus, son of Nestor, Sthenelus son of Capaneus, Diomedes son of Tydeus, Philoctetes son of Pæan, Protesilaus son of Iphiclus, Eurypilus son of Evemon, Ajax and Teucer sons of Telamon, Patroclus son of Mnœtius, Menelaus son of Atreus, Thoas, Idomeneus, and Merion. Tyndarus was rather alarmed than pleased at the sight of such a number of illustrious princes, who eagerly solicited each to become his son-in-law. Ulysses advised the king to bind, by a solemn oath, all the suitors, that they would approve of the uninfluenced choice which Helen should make of one among them; and engage to unite together and defend her person and character if ever any attempts were made to ravish her from the arms of her husband. The advice of Ulysses was followed, the princes consented, and Helen fixed her choice upon Menelaus, and married him. Hermione was the early fruit of this union, which continued for three years with mutual happiness. After this, Paris, son of Priam king of Troy, came to Lacedæmon on pretence of sacrificing to Apollo. He was kindly received by Menelaus, but shamefully abused his favours; and in his absence in Crete he corrupted the fidelity of his wife Helen, and persuaded her to follow him to Troy, B. C. 1198. The behaviour of Helen, during the Trojan war, is not clearly known. When Paris was killed, in the ninth year of the war, she married Deiphobus, one of Priam's sons; and when Troy was taken, she made no scruple to betray him, and to introduce the Greeks into his chamber, to ingratiate herself with Menelaus. She returned to Sparta, and the love of Menelaus forgave the errors which she had committed. After she had lived for some years at Sparta, Menelaus died, and she was driven from Peloponnesus by Magapenthes and Nicostratus, the illegitimate sons of her husband; she retired to Rhodes, where at that time Polyxo, a native of Argos, reigned over the country. Polyxo remembered that her widowhood originated in Helen, and that her husband Tlepolemus had been killed in the Trojan war, which had been caused by the debaucheries of Helen: therefore she meditated revenge. While Helen one day retired to bathe in the river, Polyxo disguised her attendants in the habits of furies, and sent them with orders to murder her enemy. Helen was tied to a tree and strangled, and her misfortunes were afterwards remembered, and the crimes of Polyxo expiated by the temple which the Rhodians raised to Helen Dendritis, or tied to a tree. There is a tradition mentioned by Herodotus, which says that Paris was driven, as he returned from Sparta, upon the coast of Egypt, where Proteus, king of the country, expelled him from his dominions for his ingratitude to Menelaus, and confined Helen. From that circumstance, therefore, Priam informed the Grecian ambassadors that neither Helen nor her possessions were in Troy, but in the hands of the king of Egypt. In spite of this assertion, the Greeks besieged the town, and took it after ten years siege; and Menelaus, by visiting Egypt as he returned home, recovered Helen at the court of Proteus, and was convinced that the Trojan war had been undertaken on very unjust and unpardonable grounds. Helen was honoured after death as a goddess, and the Spartans built her a temple at Therapne, which had power of giving beauty to all the deformed women who entered it. Helen, according to some, was carried into the island of Leuce after death, where she married Achilles, who had been one of her warmest admirers. Paus. 3, c. 19, &c.—Apollod. 3, c. 10, &c.—Hygin. fab. 77.—Herodot. 2, c. 112.—Plut. in Thes. &c.—Cic. de Offic. 3.—Horat. 3, od. 3.—Dictys Cret. 1, &c.—*Quint. As she was going to be sacrificed because the lot had fallen upon her, an eagle came and carried away the knife of the priest; upon which, she was released, and the barbarous custom of offering human victims was abolished.——III. A daughter of the emperor Constantine, who married Julian.——IV. The mother of Constantine. She died in her 80th year, A. D. 328.

Hĕlĕnus, a celebrated soothsayer, son of Priam and Hecuba, greatly respected by all the Trojans. When Deiphobus was given in marriage to Helen, in preference to himself, he resolved to leave his country, and he retired to mount Ida, where Ulysses took him prisoner by the advice of Chalcas. As he was well acquainted with futurity, the Greeks made use of prayers, threats, and promises, to induce him to reveal the secrets of the Trojans; and either the fear of death, or gratification of resentment, seduced him to disclose to the enemies of his country that Troy could not be taken whilst it was in possession of the Palladium, nor before Philoctetes came from his retreat at Lemnos, and assisted to support the siege. After the ruin of his country, he fell to the share of Pyrrhus, the son of Achilles, and saved his life by warning him to avoid a dangerous tempest, which in reality proved fatal to all those who set sail. This endeared him to Pyrrhus, and he received from his hand Andromache, the widow of his brother Hector, by whom he had a son called Cestrinus. This marriage, according to some, was consummated after the death of Pyrrhus, who lived with Andromache as his wife. Helenus was the only one of Priam's sons who survived the ruin of his country. After the death of Pyrrhus, he reigned over part of Epirus, which he called Chaonia, in memory of his brother Chaon, whom he had inadvertently killed. Helenus received Æneas as he voyaged towards Italy, and foretold him some of the calamities which attended his fleet. The manner in which he received the gift of prophecy is doubtful. *Vid. Hĕlĭcaon, a Trojan prince, son of Antenor. He married Laodice, the daughter of Priam, whose form Iris assumed to inform Helen of the state of the rival armies before Troy. Homer. Il. 2, v. 123.

Heliodōrus, I. one of the favourites of Seleucus Philopator, king of Syria. He attempted to plunder the temple of the Jews, about 176 years before Christ, by order of his master, &c. ——II. A Greek mathematician of Larissa.—— III. A famous sophist, the best editions of whose entertaining romance, called Æthiopica, are Commelin, 8vo. 1596, and Bourdelot, 8vo. Paris, 1619.

Heliogabălus, I. a deity among the Phœnicians.——II. M. Aurelius Antoninus, a Roman emperor, son of Varius Marcellus, called Heliogabalus, because he had been priest of that divinity in Phœnicia. After the death of Macrinus, he was invested with the imperial purple; and the senate, however unwilling to submit to a youth only fourteen years of age, approved of his election, and bestowed upon him the title of Augustus. Heliogabalus made his grandmother Mœsa and his mother Sœmias his colleagues on the throne; and to bestow more dignity upon the sex, he chose a senate of women, over which his mother presided, and prescribed all the modes and fashions which prevailed in the empire. Rome, however, soon displayed a scene of cruelty and debauchery; the imperial palace was full of prostitution, and the most infamous of the populace became the favourites of the prince. He raised his horse to the honours of the consulship, and obliged his subjects to pay adoration to the god Heliogabalus, which was no other than a large black stone, whose figure resembled that of a cone. To this ridiculous deity temples were raised at Rome, and the altars of the gods plundered to deck those of the new divinity. Such licentiousness soon displeased the populace, and Heliogabalus, unable to appease the seditions of the soldiers, whom his rapacity and debaucheries had irritated, hid himself in the filth and excrements of the camp, where he was found in the arms of his mother, His head was severed from his body, the 10th of March, A. D. 222, in the 18th year of his age, after a reign of three years, nine months, and four days. He was succeeded by Alexander Severus. His cruelties were as conspicuous as his licentiousness.

Hellanĭcus, I. a celebrated Greek historian, born at Mitylene. He wrote a history of the ancient kings of the earth, with an account of the founders of the most famous towns in every kingdom, and died B. C. 411, in the 85th year of his age. Paus. 2, c. 3.—Cic. de Orat. 2, c. 53.—Aul. Gel. 15, c. 23.——II. A brave officer rewarded by Alexander. Curt. 5, c. 2.——III. Hellōtia, two festivals, one of which was observed in Crete, in honour of Europa, whose bones were then carried in solemn procession, with a myrtle garland no less than twenty cubits in circumference, called ελλωτις. The other festival was celebrated at Corinth with games and races, where young men entered the lists, and generally ran with burning torches in their hands. It was instituted in honour of Minerva, surnamed Hellotis, απο του ελου, from a certain pond of Marathon, where one of her statues was erected, or απο του ελειν τον ιππον των Πεγασον, because by her assistance Bellerophon took and managed the horse Pegasus, which was the original cause of the institution of the festival. Others derive the name from Hellotis, a Corinthian woman, from the following circumstance: when the Dorians and the Heraclidæ invaded Peloponnesus, they took and burnt Corinth; the inhabitants, and particularly the women, escaped by flight, except Hellotis and her sister Eurytione, who took shelter in Minerva's temple, relying for safety upon the sanctity of the place. When this was known, the Dorians set fire to the temple, and the two sisters perished in the flames. This wanton cruelty was followed by a dreadful plague; and the Dorians, to alleviate the misfortunes which they suffered, were directed by the oracle to appease the manes of the two sisters, and therefore they raised a new temple to the goddess Minerva, and established the festivals which bore the name of one of the unfortunate women.

Helōtæ, and Helōtes, the public slaves of Sparta, &c. Vid. Helos, Part I.

Helvia, the mother of Cicero.

Hephæstia, a festival in honour of Vulcan (φαιστος) at Athens. There was then a race with torches between three young men. Each in his turn run a race with a lighted torch in his hand, and whoever could carry it to the end of the course before it was extinguished, obtained the prize. They delivered it one to the other after they finished their course, and from that circumstance we see many allusions in ancient authors, who compare the vicissitudes of human affairs to this delivering of the torch, particularly in these lines of Lucretius 2:—

Inque brevi spatio mutantur sæcla animantum,
Et quasi cursores vitai lampada tradunt.

Hephæstio, a Greek grammarian of Alexandria, in the age of the emperor Verus. There remains of his compositions a treatise entitled Enchiridion de metris & poemate, the best edition of which is that of Pauw, 4to. Ultraj. 1726.

Hephæstion, a Macedonian, famous for his intimacy with Alexander. He died at Ecbatana, 325 years before the Christian era. Alexander was so inconsolable at the death of this faithful subject, that he shed tears at the intelligence, and ordered the sacred fire to be extinguished, which was never done but at the death of a Persian monarch. The physician who attended Hephæstion in his illness was accused of negligence, and by the king's order inhumanly put to death, and the games were interrupted. He was so like the king in features and stature, that he was often saluted by the name of Alexander. Curt. Arrian. 7, &c.—Plut. in Alex.—Ælian. V. H. 7, c. 8.

Heraclēia, a festival at Athens, celebrated every fifth year, in honour of Hercules. The Thisbians and Thebans in Bœotia observed a festival of the same name, in which they offered apples to the god.——There was also a festival at Sicyon in honour of Hercules. It continued two days, the first was called αγωναες, the second πραξεια.——At a festival of the same name at Cos, the priest officiated with a mitre on his head, and in women's apparel.——At Lindus, a solemnity of the same name was also observed, and at the celebration nothing was heard but execration and profane words, and whosoever accidentally dropped any other words, was accused of having profaned the sacred rites.

Heracleōtes, a surname of Dionysius the philosopher.——A philosopher of Heraclea, who, like his master Zeno and all the stoics, firmly believed that pain was not an evil. A severe illness, attended with the most acute pains, obliged him to renounce his principles, and at the same time the philosophy of the stoics, about 264 years before the Christian era. He became afterwards one of the Cyrenaic sect, which placed the summum bonum in pleasure. He wrote some poetry, and chiefly treatises of philosophy. Diod. in vit.

Heraclidæ, the descendants of Hercules, greatly celebrated in ancient history. Hercules at his death left to his son Hyllus all the rights and claims which he had upon the Peloponnesus, and permitted him to marry Iole as soon as he came of age. He soon after challenged to single combat Atreus, the successor of Eurystheus on the throne of Mycenæ; and it was mutually agreed that the undisturbed possession of the Peloponnesus should be ceded to whosoever defeated his adversary. Echemus accepted the challenge for Atreus, and Hyllus was killed, and the Heraclidæ a second time departed from the Peloponnesus. Cleodæus, the son of Hyllus, made a third attempt, and was equally unsuccessful; and his son Aristomachus, some time after, met with the same unfavourable reception, and perished in the field of battle. Aristodemus, Temenus, and Cresphontes, the three sons of Aristomachus, encouraged by the more expressive and less ambiguous word of an oracle, and desirous to revenge the death of their progenitors, assembled a numerous force, and with a fleet invaded all Peloponnesus. Their expedition was attended with success, and after some decisive battles they became masters of all the peninsula, which they divided among themselves two years after. The recovery of the Peloponnesus by the descendants of Hercules forms an interesting epoch in ancient history, which is universally believed to have happened 80 years after the Trojan war, or 1104 years before the Christian era. This conquest was totally achieved about 120 years after the first attempt of Hyllus. Apollod. 2, c. 7, &c.—Herodot. 9, c. 26.—Paus. 1, c. 17.—Paterc. 1, c. 2.—*Clemens. Alex. Heraclides, I. a philosopher of Heraclea in Pontus, for some time disciple of Speusippus and Aristotle. He lived about 335 years before the Christian era. Cic. Tusc. 5, ad Quint. 3. —Diog. in Pyth.——II. A man who, after the retreat of Dionysius the younger from Sicily, raised cabals against Dion, in whose hands the sovereign power was lodged. He fled to Rhodes on pretence of a quarrel with Philip, and set fire to the Rhodian fleet. Polyæn.

Heraclitus, I. a celebrated Greek philosopher of Ephesus, who flourished about 500 years before the Christian era. His father's name was Hyson, or Heracion. Naturally of a melancholy disposition, he passed his time in a solitary and unsocial manner, and received the appellation of the obscure philosopher, and the mourner, from his unconquerable custom of weeping at the follies, frailty, and vicissitude of human affairs. He employed his time in writing different treatises, and one particularly, in which he supported that there was a fatal necessity, and that the world was created from fire, which he deemed a god omnipotent and omniscient. His opinions about the origin of things were adopted by the stoics, and Hippocrates entertained the same notions of a supreme power. He retired to the mountains, where for some time he fed on grass in common with the wild inhabitants of the place. Such a diet was soon productive of a dropsical complaint, and the philosopher condescended to revisit the town. The enigmatical manner in which he consulted the physicians made his applications unintelligible, and he was left to depend for cure only upon himself. He fixed his residence on a dunghill, in hopes that the continual warmth which proceeded from it might dissipate the watery accumulation, and restore him to the enjoyment of his former health. Such a remedy proved ineffectual; and the philosopher, despairing of a cure by the application of ox-dung, suffered himself to die in the 60th year of his age. Some say that he was torn to pieces by dogs. Diog. in vitâ.—Clem. Alex. Str. 5.——II. A lyric poet.——III. a writer of Halicarnassus, intimate with Callimachus. He was remarkable for the elegance of his style.

Heraclius, I. a brother of Constantine, &c. ——II. A Roman emperor.

Heræa, festivals at Argos in honour of Juno, who was the patroness of that city. They were also observed by the colonies of the Argives which had been planted at Samos and Ægina. ——There was a festival of the same name in Elis, celebrated every fifth year, in which sixteen matrons wove a garment for the goddess. ——There were also others instituted by Hippodamia, who had received assistance from Juno when she married Pelops. Sixteen matrons, each attended by a maid, presided at the celebration. The contenders were young virgins, who, being divided in classes according to their age, ran races each in their order, beginning with the youngest. She who obtained the victory was permitted to dedicate her picture to the goddess.——There was also a solemn day of mourning at Corinth, which bore the same name, in commemoration of Medea's children, who were buried in Juno's temple. They had been slain by the Corinthians; who, as it is reported, to avert the scandal which accompanied so barbarous a murder, presented Euripides with a large sum of money to write a play, in which Medea is represented as the murderer of her children.——Another festival of the same name at Pallene, with games, in which the victor was rewarded with a garment.

Herennius Senecio, I. a centurion sent in pursuit of Cicero by Antony. He cut off the orator's head. Plut. in Cic.——II. Caius, a man to whom Cicero dedicates his book de Rhetorick, a work attributed by some to Cornificius. ——III. Philo, a Phœnician, who wrote a book on Adrian's reign. He also composed a treatise, divided into 12 parts, concerning the choice of books, &c.

Hermathena, a statue, which represented Mercury and Minerva in the same body. This statue was generally placed in schools where eloquence and philosophy were taught, because these two deities presided over the arts and sciences.

HERADIAS, a Galatian philosopher in the second century. His irrisio philosophorum gentilium was printed with Justin Martyr's works, fol. Paris, 1615 and 1636, and with the Oxford edition of Tatian, 8vo. 1700.

HERMIONE, a daughter of Menelaus and Helen. She was privately promised in marriage to Orestes, the son of Agamemnon; but her father, ignorant of his pre-engagement, gave her hand to Pyrrhus, the son of Achilles, whose services he had experienced in the Trojan war. Pyrrhus, at his return from Troy, carried home Hermione and married her. Hermione, tenderly attached to her cousin Orestes, looked upon Pyrrhus with horror and indignation. According to others, however, Hermione received the addresses of Pyrrhus with pleasure. Her jealousy of Andromache, according to some, induced her to unite herself to Orestes, and to destroy Pyrrhus. She gave herself to Orestes, after this murder, and received the kingdom of Sparta as a dowry. Homer. Od. 4.—Eurip. in Andr. & Orest.—Ovid. Her. 8.—Propert. 1.

HERMIPPUS, a man who accused Aspasia, the mistress of Pericles, of impiety and prostitution. He was son of Lysis, and distinguished himself as a poet by forty theatrical pieces, and other compositions, some of which are quoted by Athenæus. Plut.

HERMOCRATES, I. a general of Syracuse against Nicias the Athenian. His lenity towards the Athenian prisoners was looked upon as treacherous. He was banished from Sicily without even a trial, and was murdered as he attempted to return back to his country, B. C. 408. Plut. in Nic. &c.——II. A Rhodian, employed by Artaxerxes to corrupt the Grecian states.——III. A sophist, preceptor to Pausanias, the murderer of Philip. Diod. 16.

HERMODORUS, I. a philosopher of Ephesus, who is said to have assisted, as interpreter, the Roman decemvirs in the composition of the ten tables of laws which had been collected in Greece. Cic. Tusc. 5, c. 36.—Plin. 34, c. 5.——II. A poet who wrote a book, called Νομιμα, on the laws of different nations.

HERMOGENES, I. an architect of Alabanda in Caria, employed in building the temple of Diana at Magnesia. He wrote a book upon his profession.——II. A rhetorician in the second century, the best editions of whose Rhetorica are that of Sturmius, 3 vols. 12mo. Argent. 1571, and Laurentius, Genev. 1614. He died A. D. 161, and it is said that his body was opened, and his heart found hairy, and of an extraordinary size. At the age of 25, as is reported, he totally lost his memory.

HERMOLAUS, a young Macedonian, among the attendants of Alexander. As he was one day hunting with the king, he killed a wild boar which was coming towards him. Alexander, who followed close behind him, was so disappointed because the beast had been killed before he could dart at him, that he ordered Hermolaus to be severely whipped. This treatment irritated Hermolaus, and he conspired to take away the king's life, with others who were displeased with the cruel treatment he had received. The plot was discovered by one of the conspirators, and Alexander ordered him to be put to death. Curt. 8, c. 5.

HERMOTIMUS, a famous prophet of Clazomenæ. It is said that his soul separated itself from his body, and wandered in every part of the earth to explain futurity; after which it returned again, and animated his frame. His wife, who was acquainted with the frequent absence of his soul, took advantage of it, and burnt his body, as if totally dead, and deprived the soul of its natural receptacle. Hermotimus received divine honours in a temple at Clazomenæ, into which it was unlawful for women to enter. Plin. 7, c. 52, &c.—Lucian.

HERO, a beautiful priestess of Venus at Sestos, greatly enamoured of Leander, a youth of Abydos. These two lovers were so faithful to one another, that Leander in the night escaped from the vigilance of his family, and swam across the Hellespont, while Hero, in Sestos, directed his course by holding a burning torch on the top of a high tower. After many interviews of mutual affection and tenderness, Leander was drowned in a tempestuous night as he attempted his usual course; and Hero, in despair, threw herself down from her tower, and perished in the sea. Musæus de Leand. & Hero.—Ovid. Heroid. 17 and 18.—Virg. G. 3, v. 258.

HERODES, I. surnamed the Great and Ascalonita, followed the interest of Brutus and Cassius, and afterwards that of Antony. He was made king of Judæa by means of Antony, and after the battle of Actium, he was continued in his power by his flattery and submission to Augustus. He rendered himself odious by his cruelty; and, as he knew that the day of his death would become a day of mirth and festivity, he ordered the most illustrious of his subjects to be confined, and murdered the very moment that he expired, that every eye in the kingdom might seem to shed tears at the death of Herod. He died in the 70th year of his age, after a reign of 40 years. Josephus.——II. Atticus. Vid. Atticus.

HERODIANUS, a Greek historian, who flourished A. D. 247. He was born at Alexandria, and he was employed among the officers of the Roman emperors. He wrote a Roman history in eight books, from the death of Marcus Aurelius to Maximinus. His style is peculiarly elegant, but it wants precision; and the work, too, plainly betrays that the author was not a perfect master of geography. He is accused of being too partial to Maximinus, and too severe upon Alexander Severus. His book comprehends the history of 68 or 70 years, and he asserts that he has been an eyewitness of whatever he has written. The best editions of his history are that of Politian, 4to. Dovan, 1525, who afterwards published a very valuable Latin translation; and that of Oxford, 8vo. 1708.

HERODOTUS, a celebrated historian of Halicarnassus, whose father's name was Lyxes, and that of his mother Dyro. He fled to Samos when his country laboured under the oppressive tyranny of Lygdamis, and travelled over Egypt, Italy, and all Greece. He afterwards returned to Halicarnassus, and expelled the tyrant, which patriotic deed, far from gaining the esteem and admiration of the populace, displeased and irritated them so that Herodotus was obliged to fly to Greece from the public resentment. He publicly repeated at the Olympic games the history which he had composed in his 39th year, B. C. 445. It was received with universal applause. This celebrated composition, which has procured its author the title of father of history, is written in the Ionic dialect. It is a history of the wars of the Persians against the Greeks, from the age of Cyrus to the battle of Mycale in the reign of Xerxes; and besides this it gives an account of the most celebrated nations in the world. Herodotus had written another history of Assyria and Arabia, which is not extant. The life of Homer, generally attributed to him, is supposed not to be the production of his pen. The two best editions of this great historian are that of Wesseling, fol. Amsterdam, 1763, and that of Glasgow, 9 vols. 12mo. 1761. Cic. de leg. 1. de Orat. 2.—*Dionys. Heron, two mathematicians, one of whom is called the ancient and the other the younger. The former, who lived about 100 years before Christ, was disciple of Ctesibius, and wrote a curious book, translated into Latin, under the title of Spiritualium Liber, the only edition of which is that of Baldus, Aug. Vind. 1616.

Herophilus, I. an impostor in the reign of J. Cæsar, who pretended to be the grandson of Marius. He was banished from Rome by Cæsar for his seditions, and was afterwards strangled in prison.——II. A Greek physician, about 570 years before the Christian era. He was one of the first who dissected bodies. Pliny, Cicero, and Plutarch have greatly commended him.

Hersilia, one of the Sabines, carried away by the Romans at the celebration of the Consualia. She was given and married to Romulus, though, according to some, she married Hostus, a youth of Latium, by whom she had Hostus Hostilius. After death she was presented with immortality by Juno, and received divine honours under the name of Ora. Liv. 1, c. 11.—Ovid. Met. 14, v. 832.

Hesiodus, a celebrated poet, born at Asera in Bœotia. His father's name was Dius, and his mother's Pycimede. He lived in the age of Homer, and even obtained a poetical prize in competition with him, according to Varro and Plutarch. Quintilian, Philostratus, and others, maintain that Hesiod lived before the age of Homer; but Val. Paterculus, and others, support that he flourished about 100 years after him. Hesiod is the first who wrote a poem on agriculture. This composition is called The Works and the Days. His Theogony is a miscellaneous narration, valuable for the faithful account it gives of the gods of antiquity. His Shield of Hercules is but a fragment of a larger poem, in which it is supposed he gave an account of the most celebrated heroines among the ancients. Hesiod, without being master of the fire and sublimity of Homer, is admired for the elegance of his diction and the sweetness of his poetry. Besides these poems, he wrote others, now lost. Pausanius says that in his age Hesiod's verses were still written on tablets in the temple of the Muses, of which the poet was a priest. If we believe Clem. Alexand. 6, Strom. the poet borrowed much from Musæus. Virgil, in his Georgics, has imitated the compositions of Hesiod, and taken his opera and dies for a model, as he acknowledges. Cicero strongly commends him, and the Greeks were so partial to his poetry and moral instructions, that they ordered their children to learn all by heart. Hesiod was murdered by the sons of Ganyctor of Naupactum, and his body was thrown into the sea. Some dolphins brought back the body to the shore, which was immediately known, and the murderers were discovered by the poet's dogs and thrown into the sea. If Hesiod flourished in the age of Homer, he lived 907 B. C. The best editions of this poet are that of Robinson, 4to. Oxon. 1737; that of Loesner, 8vo. Lips. 1778, and that of Parma, 4to. 1785. Cic. Fam. 6, ep. 18.—Paus. 9, c. 3, &c.—Quintil. 10, c. 1.—Paterc.—Varro.—Plut. de 7, Sep. & de Anim. Stag.

Hesychius, the author of a Greek lexicon in the beginning of the 3d century, a valuable work, which has been learnedly edited by Albert, 2 vols. fol. L. Bat. 1746.

Hierax, (Antiochus,) king of Syria, and brother to Seleucus, received the surname of Hierax. Justin. 37, c. 3.

Hiero, 1st, a king of Syracuse, after his brother Gelon, who rendered himself odious in the beginning of his reign by his cruelty and avarice. He made war against Theron, the tyrant of Agrigentum, and took Himera. He obtained three different crowns at the Olympic games, two in horseraces and one at a chariotrace. Pindar has celebrated him as being victorious at Olympia. In the latter part of his reign, the conversation of Simonides, Epicharmus, Pindar, &c. softened, in some measure, the roughness of his morals and the severity of his government, and rendered him the patron of learning, genius, and merit. He died, after a reign of 18 years, B. C. 467, leaving the crown to his brother Thrasybulus, who disgraced himself by his vices and tyranny. Diod. 11.—The second of that name, king of Syracuse, was descended from Gelon. He was unanimously elected king by all the states of the island of Sicily, and appointed to carry on the war against the Carthaginians. He joined his enemies in besieging Messana, which had surrendered to the Romans, but he was beaten by Appius Claudius, the Roman consul, and obliged to retire to Syracuse, where he was soon blocked up. Seeing all hopes of victory lost, he made peace with the Romans, and proved so faithful to his engagements during the fifty-nine years of his reign, that the Romans never had a more firm or more attached ally. He died in the 94th year of his age, about 225 years before the Christian era. He was universally regretted, and all the Sicilians showed, by their lamentations, that they had lost a common father and a friend. He liberally patronised the learned, and employed the talents of Archimedes for the good of his country. He wrote a book on agriculture, now lost. He was succeeded by Hieronymus. Ælian. V. H. 4, 8.—Justin. 23, c. 4.—Flor. 2, c. 2.—Liv. 16.

Hierocles, I. a persecutor of the Christians under Diocletian, who pretended to find inconsistencies in Scripture, and preferred the miracles of Thyaneus to those of Christ. His writings were refuted by Lactantius and Eusebius.——II. A Platonic philosopher, who taught at Alexandria, and wrote a book on providence and fate, fragments of which are preserved by Photius;

a commentary on the golden verses of Pythagoras; and facetious moral verses. He flourished A. D. 485. The best edition is that of Asheton and Warren, 8vo. London, 1742.

Hieronica Lex, by Hiero, tyrant of Sicily, to settle the quantity of corn, the price and time of receiving it, between the farmers of Sicily and the collector of the corn-tax at Rome. This law, on account of its justice and candour, was continued by the Romans when they became masters of Sicily.

Hieronymus, I. a tyrant of Sicily, who succeeded his father or grandfather Hiero, when only 15 years old. He rendered himself odious by his cruelty, oppression, and debauchery. He abjured the alliance of Rome, which Hiero had observed with so much honour and advantage. He was assassinated, and all his family was overwhelmed in his fall, and totally extirpated, B. C. 214.——II. A Christian writer, commonly called St. Jerome, born in Pannonia, and distinguished for his zeal against heretics. He wrote commentaries on the prophets, St. Matthew's Gospel, &c. a Latin version, known by the name of Vulgate, polemical treatises, and an account of ecclesiastical writers before him. Of his works, which are replete with lively animation, sublimity, and erudition, the best edition is that of Valarsius, fol. Veronæ, 1734 to 1740, 14 vols. Jerome died A. D. 420, in his 91st year.

Hilarius, a bishop of Poictiers, in France, who wrote several treatises, the most famous of which is on the Trinity, in 12 books. The only edition is that of the Benedictine monks, fol. Paris, 1693. Hilary died A. D. 372, in his 80th year.

Himilco, I. a Carthaginian, sent to explore the western parts of Europe. Fest. Avien.—— II. A son of Amilcar, who succeeded his father in the command of the Carthaginian armies in Sicily. He died with his army by a plague, B. C. 398. Justin. 19, c. 2.

Hipparchia, a woman in Alexander's age, who became enamoured of Crates, the cynic philosopher, because she heard him discourse. She wrote some things, now lost. Vid. Crates. Diog. 6.—Suidas.

Hipparchus, I. a son of Pisistratus, who succeeded his father as tyrant of Athens, with his brother Hippias. He patronised some of the learned men of the age, and distinguished himself by his fondness for literature. The seduction of a sister of Harmodius raised him many enemies; and he was at last assassinated by a desperate band of conspirators, with Harmodius and Aristogiton at their head, 513 years before Christ. Ælian. V. H. 8, c. 2.——II. A mathematician and astronomer of Nicæa. He first discovered that the interval between the vernal and the autumnal equinox is 186 days, 7 days longer than between the autumnal and vernal, occasioned by the eccentricity of the earth's orbit. He divided the heavens into 49 constellations, 12 in the ecliptic, 21 in the northern, and 16 in the southern hemisphere, and gave names to all the stars. He makes no mention of comets. From viewing a tree on a plain from different situations, which changed its apparent position, he was led to the discovery of the parallax of the planets, or the distance between their real or apparent position, viewed from the centre and from the surface of the earth. He determined longitude and latitude, and fixed the first degree of longitude at the Canaries. He likewise laid the first foundations of trigonometry, so essential to facilitate astronomical studies. He was the first who, after Thales and Sulpicius Gallus, found out the exact time of eclipses, of which he made a calculation for 600 years. He died 125 years before the Christian era. Plin. 2, c. 26, &c.

Hipparinus, I. a son of Dionysius, who ejected Callipus from Syracuse, and seized the sovereign power for 27 years. Polyæn. 5.——II. The father of Dion.

Hippias, I. a philosopher of Elis, who maintained that virtue consisted in not being in want of the assistance of men. At the Olympic games he boasted that he was master of all the liberal and mechanical arts; and he said that the ring upon his finger, the tunic, cloak, and shoes which he then wore were all the work of his own hands. Cic. de Orat. 3, c. 32.——II. A son of Pisistratus, who became tyrant of Athens, after the death of his father, with his brother Hipparchus. He was driven from his country, and fled to king Darius in Persia, and was killed at the battle of Marathon, fighting against the Athenians, B. C. 490. He had five children by Myrrhine, the daughter of Callias. Herodot. 6. —Thucyd. 7.

Hippocrates, I. a celebrated physician of Cos, one of the Cyclades. He studied physic, in which his grandfather Nebrus was so eminently distinguished; and he improved himself by reading the tablets in the temples of the gods, where each individual had written down the diseases under which he laboured, and the means by which he had recovered. He delivered Athens from a dreadful pestilence in the beginning of the Peloponnesian war; and he was publicly rewarded with a golden crown, the privileges of a citizen of Athens, and the initiation at the grand festivals. He openly declared the measures which he had taken to cure a disease, and candidly confesses that of 42 patients which were intrusted to his care, only 17 had recovered, and the rest had fallen a prey to the distemper, in spite of his medical applications. He devoted all his time for the service of his country; and when Artaxerxes invited him, even by force of arms, to come to his court, Hippocrates firmly and modestly answered, that he was born to serve his countrymen, and not a foreigner. The experiments which he had tried upon the human frame increased his knowledge; and from his consummate observations, he knew how to moderate his own life, as well as to prescribe to others. He died in the 99th year of his age, B. C. 361, free from all disorders of the mind and body; and after death he received, with the name of Great, the same honours which were paid to Hercules. He wrote in the Ionic dialect, at the advice of Democritus, though he was a Dorian. His memory is still venerated at Cos, and the present inhabitants of the island show a small house, which Hippocrates, as they mention, once inhabited. The best editions of his works are that of Fæsius, Genev. fol. 1657; of Lindan, 2 vols. 8vo. Amst. 1665; and that of Mackius, 2 vols. fol. Viennæ, 1743. His treatises, especially the Aphorisms, have been published separately. Plin. 7, c. 37.—Cic. de Orat. 3.——II. The father of Pisistratus.

HIPPOLYTUS, a Christian writer in the third century, whose works have been edited by Fabricius, Hamb. fol. 1716.

HIPPOMACHUS, a musician, who severely rebuked one of his pupils because he was praised by the multitude, and observed that it was the greatest proof of his ignorance. Ælian. 2, V. H. c. 6.

HIPPOMENES, an Athenian archon, who exposed his daughter Limone to be devoured by horses, because guilty of adultery. Ovid. in Ib. 469.

HIPPONAX, a Greek poet, born at Ephesus, 540 years before the Christian era. He cultivated the same satirical poetry as Archilochus, and was not inferior to him in the beauty or vigour of his lines. His satirical raillery obliged him to fly from Ephesus. Vid Anthemas. Cic. ad famil. 7, ep. 24.

HIRPINUS, Q. a Roman, to whom Horace dedicated his 2 od. 11, and also 1, ep. 16.

HIRTIUS, AULUS, I. a consul with Pansa, who assisted Brutus when besieged at Mutina by Antony. They defeated Antony, but were both killed in battle, B. C. 43. Suet. in Aug. 10. ——II. An historian, to whom the 8th book of Cæsar's history of the Gallic wars, as also that of the Alexandrian and Spanish wars, is attributed. The style is inferior to that of Cæsar's Commentaries. The author, who was Cæsar's friend and Cicero's pupil, is supposed to be the consul Hirtius.

HISPANUS, a native of Spain: the word Hispaniensis was also used, but generally applied to a person living in Spain, and not born there. Martial. 12, præf.

HISTIÆUS, a tyrant of Miletus, who excited the Greeks to take up arms against Persia. Herodot. 5, &c.

HOMEROMASTIX, a surname given to Zoilus the critic.

HOMERUS, I. a celebrated Greek poet, the most ancient of all the profane writers. The age in which he lived is not known, though some suppose it to be about 168 years after the Trojan war, or, according to others, 160 years before the foundation of Rome. According to Paterculus, he flourished 968 years before the Christian era, or 884, according to Herodus, who supposed him to be contemporary with Hesiod. The Arundelian Marbles fix his era 907 years before Christ, and made him also contemporary with Hesiod. No less than seven illustrious cities disputed the right of having given birth to the greatest of poets, as it is well expressed in these lines:—

Smyrna, Chios, Colophon, Salamis, Rhodes,
Argos, Athenæ,
Orbis de patriâ certat, Homere tuâ.

He was called Melesigenes, because supposed to be born on the borders of the river Meles. There prevailed a report that he had established a school at Chios in the latter part of his life; and, indeed, this opinion is favoured by the present inhabitants of the island, who still glory in showing to travellers the seats where the venerable master and his pupils sat in the hollow of a rock, at the distance of about four miles from the modern capital of the island. In his two celebrated poems, called the Iliad and Odyssey, Homer has displayed the most consummate knowledge of human nature, and rendered himself immortal by the sublimity, the fire, sweetness and elegance of his poetry. In his Iliad, Homer has described the resentment of Achilles, and its fatal consequences in the Grecian army before the walls of Troy. In the Odyssey, the poet has for his subject the return of Ulysses into his country, with the many misfortunes which attended his voyage after the fall of Troy. These two poems are each divided into 24 books, the same number as the letters of the Greek alphabet; and though the Iliad claims an uncontested superiority over the Odyssey, yet the same force, the same sublimity and elegance, prevail, though divested of its more powerful fire; and Longinus, the most refined of critics, beautifully compares the Iliad to the mid-day, and the Odyssey to the setting sun; and observes, that the latter still preserves its original splendour and majesty, though deprived of its meridian heat. The poetry of Homer was so universally admired, that, in ancient times, every man of learning could repeat with facility any passage in the Iliad or Odyssey; and, indeed, it was a sufficient authority to settle disputed boundaries or to support any argument. Modern travellers are astonished to see the different scenes, which the pen of Homer described about 3,000 years ago, still existing in the same unvaried form; and the sailor, who steers his course along the Ægean, sees all the promontories and rocks which appeared to Nestor and Menelaus when they returned victorious from the Trojan war. The ancients had such veneration for Homer, that they not only raised temples and altars to him, but offered sacrifices, and worshipped him as a god. The inhabitants of Chios celebrated festivals every fifth year in his honour, and medals were struck, which represented him sitting on a throne, holding his Iliad and Odyssey. In Egypt, his memory was consecrated by Ptolemy Philopater, who erected a magnificent temple, within which was placed a statue of the poet, beautifully surrounded with a representation of the seven cities which contended for the honour of his birth. The inhabitants of Cos, one of the Sporades, boasted that Homer was buried in their island; and the Cyprians claimed the same honour, and said that he was born of Themisto, a female native of Cyprus. It is said that Pisistratus, tyrant of Athens, was the first who collected and arranged the Iliad and Odyssey in the manner in which they now appear to us; and that it is to the well-directed pursuits of Lycurgus that we are indebted for their preservation. Besides the Iliad and Odyssey, Homer wrote, according to the opinion of some authors, a poem upon Amphiaraus's expedition against Thebes, besides the Phoceis, the Cercopse, the small Iliad, the Epicichlides, and the Batrachomyomachia, and many hymns to some of the gods. He borrowed from Orpheus, or, according to Suidas, (vocs Corinnus,) he took his plan of the Iliad from Corinnus, an epic poet, who wrote on the Trojan war at the very time the Greeks besieged that famed city. Of the numerous commentaries published on Homer, that of Eustathius, bishop of Thessalonica, is by far the most extensive and erudite. Herodot. 2, c. 53.—Theocrit. 16.—Aristot. Poet.—Strab.—Dio. Chrys 33. Orat.—Paus. 2, 9, 10.—Heliodor. 3.—

Æliun. V. H. 13.—Val. Max. 8, c. 8.—Quintil. 1, 8, 10, 12.—Paterc. 1, c. 5.—Dionys. Hal. —Plut. in Alex. &c.——II. One of the Greek poets, called Pleiades, born at Hierapolis, B. C. 263. He wrote 45 tragedies, all lost.——There were seven other poets, of inferior note, who bore the name of Homer.

Honōrius, an emperor of the western empire of Rome, who succeeded his father Theodosius the Great, with his brother Arcadius. He was neither bold nor vicious, but he was of a modest and timid disposition, unfit for enterprise and fearful of danger. He conquered his enemies by means of his generals, and suffered himself and his people to be governed by ministers who took advantage of their imperial master's indolence and inactivity. He died of a dropsy, in the 39th year of his age, 15th of August, A. D. 423. He left no issue, though he married two wives. Under him and his brother the Roman power was divided into two different empires. The successors of Honorius, who fixed their residence at Rome, were called the emperors of the west; and the successors of Arcadius, who sat on the throne of Constantinople, were distinguished by the name of emperors of the eastern Roman empire.

Horapollo, a Greek writer, whose age is unknown. His Hieroglyphica, a curious and entertaining book, has been edited by Corn. de Pauw, 4to. Ultraj. 1727.

Horātia, the sister of the Horatii, killed by her brother for mourning the death of the Curiatii. Cic. de Inv. 2, c. 20.

Hōrātius Cocles. (Vid. Cocles.)——Q. Flaccus, a celebrated poet, born in the year 689, at Venusia, or Venusium, (now Venosa,) a town situated on the confines on the ancient Apulia and Lucania; at present the district of Basilicata in Calabria. He was the son of a freedman, who, it appears, had acquired as much wealth as enabled him to purchase a small farm, lying on the banks of the Aufidus, and in the immediate vicinity of Venusium. Here Horace passed his childhood, wandering sometimes to a distance from his paternal home, amid the wild and mountainous scenery of his native region. When he was about ten years of age, his father sold the farm at Venusium, and came to the capital, where he was appointed a collector of imposts. His son was placed under the care of the grammarian Orbilius Pupillus, with whom our young scholar read (though, it would appear, with no great relish) the most ancient poets of his country. He was also instructed in Greek literature; and the writings of Homer, which were perused by him with much greater profit and satisfaction than those of Livius or Ennius, first seem to have awakened in his breast a taste for poetry. After he had assumed the toga virilis, Horace completed his course of instruction by a residence at Athens, where he studied philosophy, along with the son of Cicero, Varus, and the young Messala. He was there at the time of the assassination of Cæsar; and the conspirators Brutus and Cassius, having shortly afterwards arrived in Greece, Horace, with most of the other young Romans who were then studying at Athens, joined the republican party; and the camp of Brutus became thronged with the heirs of those illustrious patricians who had formerly rallied around the standard of Pompey. Horace continued nearly two years under the command of Brutus, and followed him to Macedonia, where he attained the rank of a military tribune. He was present at the fatal battle of Philippi, and much has been said of the cowardice he exhibited in that combat. Our poet himself acknowledges, in an ode imitated from Archilochus, that he threw away his shield, and fled with precipitation; and there seems no reason to suppose that he saved himself earlier than others, or that he left the field of battle till all hopes of victory had vanished. His father had died during his absence, and it is likely that this small patrimony had been ruined or confiscated in the course of those civil dissensions, in which he had engaged on the vanquished side. About this time he composed the odes which at present form the tenth and twenty-eighth of the first book, and the seventh of the first book of satires. At length, in the year 716, when he had reached the age of twenty-seven, he was recommended to the notice of Mæcenas, first by Virgil, and subsequently by Varus. He was shortly afterwards presented in due form to this distinguished patron of literature; but he felt so overawed, that he spoke little and with much hesitation. Though this introduction laid the foundation of his future fame and fortune, Mæcenas paid him no great attention at the first interview. To the poet's candid statement of his situation and circumstances, he made but a brief answer, and dismissed him after a short and unsatisfactory conversation. He took no farther notice of him for the space of nine months, and Horace did not stoop to any servility or flattery, during the interval, to obtain his patronage. At the end of this period, Mæcenas at length sent for him, and soon admitted him among the number of his domestic friends. From this time, Mæcenas was somewhat more to Horace than a mere patron, or even acquaintance; and it appears, both from the odes and satires, that, notwithstanding the difference in rank and situation, a tender friendship subsisted between them. Virgil and Propertius were learned and skilful poets; but Horace was also a man of the world, of delightful conversation and accomodating temper, and a fit companion for patricians or statesmen. Horace was better rewarded for his fidelity, and the dangers he encountered for the sake of a patron, than his predecessors, Lucretius and Catullus, or his contemporary Tibullus. Mæcenas bestowed on him a villa at Tibur, and obtained for him a grant of land in the eastern extremity of the Sabine territory. He also procured for him the favour of Augustus, who offered him the situation of one of his private secretaries. This office would have removed him from the table of Mæcenas, which he usually frequented, to that of the emperor himself. The offer was declined, on the plea of bad health; but, so far was the refusal from offending Augustus, that he continued to treat him with the utmost distinction and familiarity. With Augustus himself for his protector—with Mæcenas, Tibullus, and Virgil, for his friends—enlivened by the smiles of Lalage—blessed with a tranquil mind, and a competence with which he was satisfied—engaged in the composition of works which obtained for him the high esteem of his contemporaries, and which he foresaw would ensure him immortality, he attained, perhaps, the greatest felicity which an Epicurean life could afford. The manner in which he usually spent his time may be learned from his works: he passed it while at Rome, in the most delectable lounging, and when he retired to the country, in the most delightful rural occupations. In this happy frame of mind, Horace lived till November 746, when he expired suddenly at Rome. He was unable, in his last moments, to put his hand to his testament, but he nominated Augustus as his heir. His life terminated about the same time with that of Mæcenas, though it seems uncertain whether he survived or predeceased his friend. He died at the age of fifty-seven, and his remains were deposited near the tomb of Mæcenas, on the Esquiline Hill. The intellectual and moral character of Horace may be gathered from his writings, as accurately as the mode in which he passed his time. His mind was enlightened by study, and invigorated by observation. It was comprehensive, but not visionary—delicate, but not fastidious—too sagacious to be warped by prejudice—too reflective to be influenced by resentment. To infer the moral dispositions of a poet from the tone of sentiment which pervades his works, may be often a fallacious analogy; but the soul of Horace speaks so unequivocally through his odes and epistles, that we may safely consult them as the faithful mirrors of his heart. His moral qualities, perhaps, may not be so highly estimated as his intellectual endowments; but he was of a cheerful temper, and of great moderation, equanimity, and independence of mind. In early youth, when he first came to the capital, after the battle of Philippi, he was somewhat of a coxcomb, both in his dress and manners, and much addicted to the promiscuous gallantry which then prevailed. The advance of time scarcely saved him from the power of love; and, at the age of fifty, he felt the full force of a passion which he believed had been conquered. According to the principles of that sect to which he belonged, he adopted as a rule of conduct, that he should permit nothing to ruffle his temper. His heart was devoted to an indolence, which often arises from the conviction that happiness is not to be found in wealth, or power, or dignity. He was grateful to his benefactors, and warmly attached to his friends; but he wrapped himself up in Epicurean indifference to the crimes, and follies, and projects, of the rest of mankind. Of these, however, though little affected by them, he was a constant and acute observer; and his accurate, lively delineations of every species of human error and absurdity, form the most valuable, as well as the most characteristic portion of his agreeable compositions. The works of Horace comprehend, 1st, Odes; 2d, Epodes; 3d, Satires; and 4th, Epistles. It seems to be universally agreed, that, as a lyric poet at least, Horace has little claim to the praise of originality. Even in those odes which are most original, and, so far as we know, are not translated or imitated from any lyric bard of Greece, the words, the phrases, and sentiments, are all Greek, and evidently proceed from a poet whose mind was imbued not only with the compositions of Alcæus, Pindar, and Sappho, the three writers whom he is supposed chiefly to have imitated, but also with the works of Homer, and of the great tragedians. This particularly appears, as was to be expected, in the epithets attached to Greek places, heroes, or divinities. The odes which seem to be of the invention of the Latin poet, are chiefly of that sort which has been termed occasional. He willingly employed his muse to celebrate a festive day, to lament the departure of a friend, or congratulate him on his return, to record any pleasant occurrence of his own life, or any political event, which might reflect honour on his patrons. Being of this miscellaneous description, the odes of Horace cannot be all classed; but the greater proportion of them may be reduced under four divisions,—amatory, convivial, moral, and political. Those of an amorous strain, are by far the most numerous. In them he celebrates his love for Lydia, Tyndaris, Lalage, Glycera, and many others, who were perhaps real mistresses, but with fictitious names. The passion he sings, is of a light trivial description, compared with that of the contemporary elegiac poets; and both the style and sentiments are suited to the "grata protervitas" of his Glycera. The convivial odes consist of invitations to Mæcenas, and other illustrious friends, to join his social board. He prepares for the entertainment; he provides the accompaniments of music and garlands of flowers, and he celebrates the happy influence of the gifts of Bacchus with fervid and joyous praises. Many of these convivial odes are tempered with moral reflections; and some of them perhaps cannot be well discriminated from the third or moral class. Both in the moral and convivial odes, the friends to whom they are addressed are frequently reminded of the shortness of life, and of its closing scene—sometimes, indeed, with a moral scope, but oftener with a view of exciting to the enjoyment of the present hour, by a glance at the uncertainty and gloom of the future. In a history of Roman poetry, the political odes of Horace are those which are most deserving of consideration. They are chiefly of his own composition, instead of being translated or imitated, like so many of the others, from the Greek; and as they refer to the most prominent events of Roman history, they afford some insight into the political discussions and state intrigues of the day. All of them are written in courtly and soothing language. They breathe that spirit of wisdom, moderation, and humanity, which now began to prevail in the councils of the prince; and the mildest maxims of policy are inculcated amid bursts of lyric fancy. The epodes of Horace may be considered as intermediate compositions between his odes and satires. They are in iambic measure, and a few of them are on similar topics with the odes; but the others consist of invectives, directed against the orator Cassius Severus—the poet Mævius—and Menas, the freedman of Sextus Pompey, who, being admiral of his fleet, became so infamous during the civil wars by alternately deserting the service of Pompey and Octavius. Even to the second epode, containing the praises of a country life, a satirical and epigrammatic turn is given at the conclusion by putting them in the mouth of the usurer Alphius. In general, however, the satire in these odes is coarse, violent, and personal, resembling what is supposed to have been the style of the invectives of Archilochus and Lycambes, rather than that delicate tone of reproof and irony which Horace afterwards adopted in his own satires. Horace has now been described as the great master of Roman lyric poetry, whether amatory, convivial, or moral. We have still to consider him as a satiric, humorous, or familiar writer, in which character (though he chiefly valued himself on his odes) he is more instructive, and perhaps equally pleasing. He is also more an original poet in his satires than in his lyrical compositions. D. Heinsius, indeed, in his confused and prolix dissertation, De Satirâ Horatianâ, has pointed out several passages, which he thinks have been suggested by the comedies and satiric dramas of the Greeks. If, however, we except the dramatic form which he has given to so many of his satires, it will be difficult to find any general resemblance between them and those productions of the Greek stage which are at present extant. The epistles of Horace were written by him at a more advanced period of life than his satires, and were the last fruits of his long experience. Accordingly, we find in them more matured wisdom, more sound judgment, mildness, and philosophy, more of his own internal feelings, and greater skill and perfection in the versification. The chief merit, however, of the epistles depends on the variety in the characters of the persons to whom they are addressed; and, in conformity with which, the poet changes his tone and diversifies his colouring. They have not the generality of some modern epistles, which are merely inscribed with the name of a friend, and may have been composed for the whole human race; nor of some ancient idyls, where we are solely reminded of an individual by superfluous invocations on his name. Each epistle is written expressly for the entertainment, instruction, or reformation of him to whom it is addressed. The poet enters into his situation with wonderful facility, and every word has a reference, more or less remote, to his circumstances, feelings, or prejudices. In his satires, the object of Horace was to expose vice and folly; but, in his epistles, he has also an eye to the amendment of a friend, on whose failings he gently touches, and hints, perhaps, at their correction. The celebrated work of Horace, commonly called the Ars Poetica, which was written about the year 739, is usually considered as a separate and insulated composition. The critical works of Horace, which comprise one of his satires, the two epistles of the second book, and the Ars Poetica, have generally been considered, especially by critics themselves, as the most valuable part of his productions. Hurd has pronounced them 'the best and most exquisite of all his writings;' and of the Ars Poetica, in particular, he says, 'that the learned have long since considered it as a kind of summary of the rules of good writing, to be gotten by heart by every young student, and to whose decisive authority the greatest masters in taste and composition must finally submit.' Mr. Gifford, in the introduction to his translation of Juvenal, remarks that, 'as an ethical writer, Horace has not many claims to the esteem of posterity; but as a critic, he is entitled to all our veneration. Such is the soundness of his judgment, the correctness of his taste, and the extent and variety of his knowledge, that a body of criticism might be selected from his works, more perfect in its kind than any thing which antiquity has bequeathed us.' Suet. in Aug.—Ovid. Trist. 4, el. 10, v. 49.

——Three brave Romans, born at the same birth, who fought against the three Curiatii, about 667 years before Christ. This celebrated battle was fought between the hostile camps of the people of Alba and Rome, and on their success depended the victory. In the first attack two of the Horatii were killed, and the only surviving brother, by joining artifice to valour, obtained an honourable trophy: by pretending to fly from the field of battle, he easily separated his antagonists; and, in attacking them one by one, he was enabled to conquer them all. As he returned victorious to Rome, his sister reproached him with the murder of one of the Curiatii, to whom she was promised in marriage. He was incensed at the rebuke, and killed his sister. This violence raised the indignation of the people; he was tried, and capitally condemned. His eminent services, however, pleaded in his favour; the sentence of death was exchanged for a more moderate, but more ignominious punishment, and he was only compelled to pass under the yoke. A trophy was raised in the Roman Forum, on which he suspended the spoils of the conquered Curiatii. Cic. de Invent. 2, c. 26.—Liv. 1, c. 24, &c.—Dionys. Hal. 3, c. 3.

——A consul, who dedicated the temple of Jupiter Capitolinus. During the ceremony he was informed of the death of his son, but he did not forget the sacred character he then bore for the feelings of a parent, and continued the dedication, after ordering the body to be buried. Liv. 2.

Horcias, the general of 3000 Macedonians, who revolted from Antigonus in Cappadocia. Polyæn. 4.

Hormisdas, a name which some of the Persian kings bore in the reign of the Roman emperors.

Hortensia, a celebrated Roman lady, daughter of the orator Hortensius, whose eloquence she had inherited in the most eminent degree. When the triumvirs had obliged 14,000 women to give upon oath an account of their possessions, to defray the expenses of the state, Hortensia undertook to plead their cause, and was so successful in her attempt, that 1000 of her female fellow-sufferers escaped from the avarice of the triumvirate. Val. Max. 8, c. 3.

Hortensia Lex, by Q. Hortensius, the dictator, A. U. C. 367. It ordered the whole body of the Roman people to pay implicit obedience to whatever was enacted by the commons. The nobility, before this law was enacted, had claimed an absolute exemption.

Hortensius, Q. This celebrated orator was born in the year 640. His first appearance in the Forum was at the early age of nineteen—that is, in 659; and his excellence, says Cicero, was immediately acknowledged, like that of a statue by Phidias, which only requires to be seen in order to be admired. The case in which he first appeared was of considerable responsibility for one so young and inexperienced, being an accusation, at the instance of the Roman province of Africa, against its governors for rapacity. It was heard before Scævola and Crassus, as judges—the one the ablest lawyer, the other the most accomplished speaker, of his age; and the young orator had the good fortune to obtain their approbation, as well as that of all who were present at the trial. His next pleading of importance was in behalf of Nicomedes, king of Bithynia, in which he even surpassed his former speech for the Africans. After this we hear little of him for several years. The imminent perils of the Social war, which broke out in 663, interrupted, in a great measure, the business of the Forum. Hortensius served in this alarming contest for one year as a volunteer, and in the following season as a military tribune. When, on the re-establishment of peace in Italy in 666, he returned to Rome, and resumed the more peaceful avocations to which he had been destined from his youth, he found himself without a rival. Crassus, as we have seen, died in 662, before the troubles of Marius and Sylla. Antony, with other orators of inferior note, perished in 666, during the temporary and last ascendency of Marius, in the absence of Sylla. Sulpicius was put to death in the same year, and Cotta driven into banishment, from which he was not recalled until the return of Sylla to Rome, and his election to the dictatorship in 670. Hortensius was thus left for some years without a competitor; and after 670, with none of eminence but Cotta, whom also he soon outshone. His splendid, warm, and animated manner was preferred to the calm and easy elegance of his rival. Accordingly, when engaged in a cause on the same side, Cotta, though ten years senior, was employed to open the case, while the more important parts were left to the management of Hortensius. He continued the undisputed sovereign of the Forum, till Cicero returned from his quæstorship in Sicily, in 679, when the talents of that orator first displayed themselves in full perfection and maturity. Hortensius was thus, from 666 till 679, a space of thirteen years, at the head of the Roman bar; and being, in consequence, engaged during that long period, on one side or other, in every cause of importance, he soon amassed a prodigious fortune. He lived, too, with a magnificence corresponding to his wealth. An example of splendour and luxury had been set to him by the orator Crassus, who inhabited a sumptuous palace in Rome, the hall of which was adorned with four pillars of Hymettian marble, twelve feet high, which he brought to Rome in his ædileship, at a time when there were no pillars of foreign marble even in public buildings. The court of this mansion was ornamented by six lotus trees, which Pliny saw in full luxuriance in his youth, but which were afterwards burnt in the conflagration in the time of Nero. He had also a number of vases, and two drinking-cups, engraved by the artist Mentor, but which were of such immense value that he was ashamed to use them. Hortensius had the same tastes as Crassus, but surpassed him and all his contemporaries in magnificence. His mansion stood on the Palatine hill, which appears to have been the most fashionable situation in Rome, being at that time covered with the houses of Lutatius Catulus, Æmilius Scaurus, Clodius, Catiline, Cicero, and Cæsar. The residence of Hortensius was adjacent to that of Catiline; and though of no great extent, it was splendidly furnished. After the death of the orator, it was inhabited by Octavius Cæsar, and formed the centre of the chief imperial palace, which increased from the time of Augustus to that of Nero, till it covered a great part of the Palatine Mount, and branched over other hills. Besides his mansion in the capital, he possessed sumptuous villas at Tusculum, Bauli, and Laurentum, where he was accustomed to give the most elegant and expensive entertainments. He had frequently peacocks at his banquets, which he first served up at a grand augural feast, and which, says Varro, were more commended by the luxurious, than by men of probity and austerity. His olive plantations he is said to have regularly moistened and bedewed with wine; and on one occasion, during the hearing of an important case in which he was engaged along with Cicero, begged that he would change with him the previously arranged order of pleading, as he was obliged to go to the country to pour wine on a favourite platanus, which grew near his Tusculan villa. Notwithstanding this profusion, his heir found not less than 10,000 casks of wine in his cellar after his death. Besides his taste for wine, and fondness for plantations, he indulged a passion for pictures and fishponds. At his Tusculan villa, he built a hall for the reception of a painting of the expedition of the Argonauts, by the painter Cydias, which cost the enormous sum of a hundred and forty-four thousand sesterces. At his country-seat, near Bauli, on the seashore, he vied with Lucullus and Philippus in the extent of his fishponds, which were constructed at immense cost, and so formed that the tide flowed into them. Under the promontory of Bauli, travellers are yet shown the Piscina Mirabilis, a subterraneous edifice, vaulted and divided by four rows of arcades; and which is supposed by some antiquarians to have been a fish-pond of Hortensius. Yet such was his luxury, and his reluctance to diminish his supply, that when he gave entertainments at Bauli, he generally sent to the neighbouring town of Puteoli to buy fish for supper. The eloquence of Hortensius procured him not only all this wealth and luxury, but the highest official honours of the state. He was ædile in 679, prætor in 682, and consul two years afterwards. The wealth and dignities he had obtained, and the want of competition, made him gradually relax from that assiduity by which they had been acquired, till the increasing fame of Cicero, and particularly the glory of his consulship, stimulated him to renew his exertions. But his habit of labour had been in some degree lost, and he never again recovered his former reputation. Cicero partly accounts for this decline, from the peculiar nature and genius of his eloquence. It was of that showy species called Asiatic, which flourished in the Greek colonies of Asia Minor, and was infinitely more florid and ornamental than the oratory of Athens, or even of Rhodes, being full of brilliant thoughts and of sparkling expressions. This glowing style of rhetoric, though deficient in solidity and weight, was not unsuitable in a young man; and being farther recommended by a beautiful cadence of periods, met with the utmost applause. But Hortensius, as he advanced in life, did not prune his exuberance, or adopt a chaster eloquence; and this luxury, and glitter of phraseology, which even in his earliest years, had occasionally excited ridicule or disgust among the graver fathers of the senatorial order, being totally inconsistent with his advanced age and consular dignity, which required something more serious and composed, his reputation diminished with increase of years; and though the bloom of his eloquence might be in fact the same, it appeared to be somewhat withered. Besides, from his declining health and strength, which greatly failed in his latter years, he may not have been able to give full effect to that showy species of rhetoric in which he indulged. A constant toothache, and swelling in the jaws, greatly impaired his power of elocution and utterance, and became at length so severe as to accelerate his end. A few months, however, before his death, which happened in 703, he pleaded for his nephew, Messala, who was accused of illegal canvassing, and who was acquitted, more in consequence of the astonishing exertions of his advocate, than the justice of his cause. So unfavourable, indeed, was his case esteemed, that however much the speech of Hortensius had been admired, he was received, on entering the theatre of Curio on the following day, with loud clamour and hisses, which were the more remarked, as he had never met with similar treatment in the whole course of his forensic career. The speech, however, revived all the ancient admiration of the public for his oratorical talents, and convinced them, that had he always possessed the same perseverance as Cicero, he would not have ranked second to that orator. Another of his most celebrated harangues was that against the Manilian law, which vested Pompey with such extraordinary powers, and was so warmly supported by Cicero. That against the sumptuary law proposed by Crassus and Pompey, in the year 683, which tended to restrain the indulgence of his own taste, was well adapted to Hortensius's style of eloquence; and his speech was highly characteristic of his disposition and habits of life. He declaimed, at great length, on the glory of Rome, which required splendour in the mode of living followed by its citizens. He frequently glanced at the luxury of the consuls themselves, and forced them at length, by his eloquence and sarcastic declamation, to relinquish their scheme of domestic retrenchment. The speeches of Hortensius, it has been already mentioned, lost part of their effect by the orator's advance in years, but they suffered still more by being transferred to paper. As his chief excellence consisted in action and delivery, his writings were much inferior to what was expected from the high fame he had enjoyed; and, accordingly, after death, he retained little of that esteem, which he had so abundantly possessed during his life. Although, therefore, his orations had been preserved, they would have given us but an imperfect idea of the eloquence of Hortensius; but even this has been denied us, and we must, therefore, now chiefly trust for this oratorical character to the opinion of his great but unprejudiced rival. The friendship and honourable competition of Hortensius and Cicero, present an agreeable contrast to the animosities of Æschines and Demosthenes, the two great orators of Greece. It was by means of Hortensius that Cicero was chosen one of the college of Augurs—a service of which his gratified vanity ever appears to have retained an agreeable recollection.—In a few of his letters, indeed, written during the despondency of his exile, he hints a suspicion that Hortensius had been instrumental in his banishment, with a view of engrossing to himself the whole glory of the bar; but this mistrust ended with his recall, which Hortensius, though originally he had advised him to yield to the storm, urged on with all the influence of which he was possessed. Hortensius also appears to have been free from every feeling of jealousy or envy, which in him was still more creditable, as his rival was younger than himself, and yet ultimately forced him from the supremacy. Such having been their sentiments of mutual esteem, Cicero has done his oratoric talents ample justice—representing him as endued with almost all the qualities necessary to form a distinguished speaker. His imagination was fertile—his voice was sweet and harmonious—his demeanour dignified—his language rich and elegant—his acquaintance with literature extensive. So prodigious was his memory, that, without the aid of writing, he recollected every word he had meditated, and every sentence of his adversary's oration, even to the titles and documents brought forward to support the case against him—a faculty which greatly aided his peculiarly happy art of recapitulating the substance of what had been said by his antagonist, or by himself. He also originally possessed an indefatigable application; and scarcely a day passed in which he did not speak in the Forum, or exercise himself in forensic studies or preparation. But, of all the various arts of oratory, he most remarkably excelled in a happy and perspicuous arrangement of his subject. Cicero only reproaches him, and that but slightly, with showing more study and art in his gestures than was suitable for an orator. It appears, however, from Macrobius, that he was much ridiculed by his contemporaries, on account of his affected gestures. In pleading, his hands were constantly in motion, whence he was often attacked by his adversaries in the Forum for resembling an actor; and, on one occasion, he received from his opponent the appellation of Dionysia, which was the name of a celebrated dancing girl. Æsop and Roscius frequently attended his pleadings, to catch his gestures, and imitate them on the stage. Such, indeed, was his exertion in action, that it was commonly said that it could not be determined whether people went to hear or to see him. Like Demosthenes, he chose and put on his dress with the most studied care and neatness. He is said, not only to have prepared his attitudes, but also to have adjusted the plaits of his gown before a mirror, when about to issue forth to the Forum; and to have taken no less care in arranging them, than in moulding the periods of his discourse. He so tucked up his gown, that the folds did not fall by chance, but were formed with great care, by means of a knot artfully tied, and concealed in the plies of his robe, which apparently flowed carelessly around him. Macrobius also records a story of his instituting an action of damages against a person who had jostled him, while walking in this elaborate dress, and had ruffled his toga, when he was about to appear in public with his drapery adjusted according to the happiest arrangement—an anecdote which, whether true or false, shows by its currency the opinion entertained of his finical attention to every thing that concerned the elegance of his attire, or the gracefulness of his figure and attitudes. He also bathed himself in odoriferous waters, and daily perfumed himself with the most precious essences. This too minute attention to his person, and to gesticulation, appears to have been the sole blemish in his oratorical character; and the only stain on his moral conduct, was his practice of corrupting the judges of the causes in which he was employed—a practice which must be, in a great measure, imputed to the defects of the judicial system at Rome; for, whatever might be the excellence of the Roman laws, nothing could be worse than the procedure under which they were administered.

Hostia, the daughter of Hostius the poet, celebrated by Propertius under the name of Cynthea.

Hyacinthia, an annual solemnity at Amyclæ, in Laconia, in honour of Hyacinthus and Apollo. It continued for three days, during which time the people did not adorn their hair with garlands during their festivals, nor eat bread, but fed only upon sweetmeats. They did not even sing pæans in honour of Apollo, or observe any of the solemnities which were usual at other sacrifices. On the second day of the festival there were a number of different exhibitions. The city began then to be filled with joy, and immense numbers of victims were offered on the altars of Apollo, and the votaries liberally entertained their friends and slaves. During this latter part of the festivity, all were eager to be present at the games, and the city was almost desolate and without inhabitants. Athen. 4.—Ovid. Met. 10, v. 219.—Paus. 3, c. 1 and 19.

Hydrophŏria, a festival observed at Athens, called απο του φορειν υδωρ, from carrying water. It was celebrated in commemoration of those who perished in the deluge of Deucalion and Ogyges.

Hyginus, C. Jul., a grammarian, one of the freedmen of Augustus. He was a native of Alexandria, or, according to some, he was a Spaniard, very intimate with Ovid. He was appointed librarian to the library of mount Palatine, and he was able to maintain himself by the liberality of C. Licinius. He wrote a mythological history, which he called fables, and Poeticon Astronomicon, besides treatises on the cities of Italy, on such Roman families as were descended from the Trojans, a book on agriculture, commentaries on Virgil, the lives of great men, &c. now lost. The best edition of Hyginus is that of Munkerus, 2 vols. 8vo. Amst. 1681. These compositions have been greatly mutilated, and their incorrectness and their bad Latinity, have induced some to suppose that they are spurious. Sueton. de Gram.

Hyllus, a son of Hercules and Dejanira, who, soon after his father's death, married Iole. He, as well as his father, was persecuted by the envy of Eurystheus, and obliged to fly from the Peloponnesus. The Athenians gave a kind reception to Hyllus and the rest of the Heraclidæ, and marched against Eurystheus. Hyllus obtained a victory over his enemies, and killed with his own hand Eurystheus, and sent his head to Alcmena, his grandmother. Some time after, he attempted to recover the Peloponnesus with the Heraclidæ, and was killed in single combat by Echemus, king of Arcadia. Vid. Heraclidæ, Hercules. Herodot. 7, c. 204, &c.—Strab. 9. Vid. Part III.

Hyperbŏrei. Vid. Part I.

Hyperĭdes, an Athenian orator, disciple to Plato and Socrates, and long the rival of Demosthenes. His father's name was Glaucippus. He distinguished himself by his eloquence, and the active part he took in the management of the Athenian republic. After the unfortunate battle of Cranon, he was taken alive, and that he might not be compelled to betray the secrets of his country, he cut off his tongue. He was put to death by order of Antipater, B.C. 322. Only one of his numerous orations remains, admired for the sweetness and elegance of his style. It is said that Hyperides once defended the courtesan Phryne, who was accused of impiety; and that when he saw his eloquence ineffectual, he unveiled the bosom of his client, upon which the judges, influenced by the sight of her beauty, acquitted her. Plut. in Demost.—Cic. in Orat. 1, &c.—Quintil. 10, &c.

Hypsicrătea, the wife of Mithridates, who accompanied her husband in man's clothes when he fled before Pompey. Plut. in Pomp.

Hypsicrătes, a Phœnician, who wrote a history of his country in the Phœnician language. This history was saved from the flames of Carthage, when that city was taken by Scipio, and translated into Greek.

Hystaspes, a noble Persian, of the family of the Achæmenides. His father's name was Arsames. His son Darius reigned in Persia after the murder of the usurper Smerdis. It is said by Ctesias, that he wished to be carried to see the royal monument which his son had built between two mountains. The priests who carried him, as reported, slipped the cord with which he was suspended in ascending the mountain, and he died of the fall. Hystaspes was the first who introduced the learning and mysteries of the Indian Brachmans into Persia; and to his researches in India the sciences were greatly indebted, particularly in Persia. Darius is called Hystaspes, or son of Hystaspes, to distinguish him from his royal successors of the same name. Herodot. 1, c. 209, l. 5, c. 83.—Ctesias. Fragm.

I

Iamblichus, a Greek author, who wrote the life of Pythagoras and the history of his followers, an exhortation to philosophy, a treatise against Porphyry's letters on the mysteries of the Egyptians, &c. He was a great favourite of the emperor Julian, and died A. D. 363.

Iamĭdæ, certain prophets among the Greeks, descended from Iamus, a son of Apollo, who received the gift of prophecy from his father, which remained among his posterity. Paus. 6, c. 2.

Iarchas, and Jarchas, a celebrated Indian philosopher. His seven rings are famous for their power of restoring old men to the bloom and vigour of youth, according to the traditions of Philostr. in Apoll.

JASON. Vid. Part. III.

IBIS, a poem of the poet Callimachus, in which he bitterly satirises the ingratitude of his pupil the poet Apollonius. Ovid has also written a poem which bears the same name, and which, in the same satirical language, seems, according to the opinion of some, to inveigh bitterly against Hyginus, the supposed hero of the composition. Suidas.

IBYCUS, a lyric poet of Rhegium, about 540 years before Christ. He was murdered by robbers, and at the moment of death he implored the assistance of some cranes which at that moment flew over his head. Some time after, as the murderers were in the market-place, one of them observed some cranes in the air, and said to his companions, αι ιβυκου, εκδικοι παρεισιν, there are the birds that are conscious of the death of Ibycus. These words, and the recent murder of Ibycus, raised suspicions in the people; the assassins were seized and tortured, and they confessed their guilt. Cic. Tusc. 4, c. 43. —Ælian. V. H.

ICCIUS. Horace writes to him, 1 od. 29, and ridicules him for abandoning the pursuits of philosophy and the muses for military employments.

ICĔTAS, a man who obtained the supreme power at Syracuse after the death of Dion. He attempted to assassinate Timoleon, B. C. 340. C. Nep. in Tim.

L. ICILIUS, I. a tribune of the people, who made a law, A. U. C. 397, by which mount Aventine was given to the Roman people to build houses upon. Liv. 3, c. 54.——II. A tribune who signalized himself by his inveterate enmity against the Roman senate. He took an active part in the management of affairs after the murder of Virginia.

IDANTHYRSUS, a powerful king of Scythia, who refused to give his daughter in marriage to Darius the 1st, king of Persia. This refusal was the cause of a war between the two nations, and Darius marched against Idanthyrsus at the head of 700,000 men. He was defeated, and retired to Persia, after an inglorious campaign. Strab. 13.

IDŎMĔNEUS, succeeded his father Deucalion on the throne of Crete, and accompanied the Greeks to the Trojan war, with a fleet of 90 ships. During this celebrated war he rendered himself famous by his valour, and slaughtered many of the enemy. At his return, he made a vow to Neptune in a dangerous tempest, that if he escaped from the fury of the seas and storms, he would offer to the god whatever living creature first presented itself to his eye on the Cretan shore. This was no other than his son, who came to congratulate his father upon his safe return. Idomeneus performed his promise to the god, and the inhumanity and rashness of his sacrifice rendered him so odious in the eyes of his subjects, that he left Crete, and migrated in quest of a settlement. He came to Italy, and founded a city on the coast of Calabria, which he called Salentum. He died in an extreme old age, after he had had the satisfaction of seeing his new kingdom flourish and his subjects happy. According to the Greek scholiast of Lycophron, v. 1217, Idomeneus, during his absence in the Trojan war, intrusted the management of his kingdom to Leucos, to whom he promised his daughter Clisithere in marriage at his return. Leucos strengthened himself on the throne of Crete; and Idomeneus, at his return, found it impossible to expel the usurper. Ovid. Met. 13, v. 358.—Hygin. 92.—Homer. Il. 11, &c. Od. 19.—Paus. 5, c. 25.—Virg. Æn. 3, v. 122.

IDRIEUS, the son of Euromus of Caria, brother to Artemisia, who succeeded to Mausolus, and invaded Cyprus. Diod. 16.—Polyæn. 6.

IGNATIUS, a bishop of Antioch, torn to pieces in the amphitheatre at Rome by lions, during a persecution, A. D. 107. His writings were letters to the Ephesians, Romans, &c., and he supported the divinity of Christ, and the propriety of the episcopal order, as superior to priests and deacons. The best edition of his works is that of Oxon, in 8vo. 1708.

ILIA, or RHEA. Vid. Part III.

ILIĂCI LUDI, games instituted by Augustus, in commemoration of the victory he had obtained over Antony and Cleopatra. They are supposed to be the same as the Trojani ludi and the Actia; and Virgil says they were celebrated by Æneas. During these games were exhibited horseraces and gymnastic exercises. Virg. Æn. 3, v. 280.

ILIAS, a celebrated poem, composed by Homer, upon the Trojan war. It delineates the wrath of Achilles, and all the calamities which befell the Greeks, from the refusal of that hero to appear in the field of battle. It finished at the death of Hector, whom Achilles had sacrificed to the shades of his friend Patroclus. It is divided into 24 books. Vid. Homerus.

ILUS. Vid. Part III.

INĂCHI, a name given to the Greeks, particularly the Argives, from king Inachus.

INĂCHĬDÆ, the name of the eight first successors of Inachus on the throne of Argos.

INŌA, festivals in memory of Ino, celebrated yearly with sports and sacrifices at Corinth. An anniversary sacrifice was also offered to Ino at Megara, where she was first worshipped, under the name of Leucothoe.——Another in Laconia, in honour of the same. It was usual at the celebration to throw cakes of flour into a pond, which, if they sunk, were presages of prosperity; but if they swam on the surface of the waters, they were inauspicious and very unlucky.

INTAPHERNES, one of the seven Persian noblemen who conspired against Smerdis, who usurped the crown of Persia. He was so disappointed at not obtaining the crown, that he fomented seditions against Darius, who had been raised to the throne after the death of the usurper. When the king had ordered him and all his family to be put to death, his wife excited the compassion of Darius, who pardoned her, and permitted her to redeem from death any one of her relations whom she pleased. She obtained her brother; and when the king expressed his astonishment because she preferred him to her husband and children, she replied, that she could procure another husband, and children likewise: but that she could never have another brother, as her father and mother were dead. Intaphernes was put to death. Herodot.

INTERREX, a supreme magistrate at Rome, who was intrusted with the care of the government after the death of a king, till the election of another. This office was exercised by the senators alone, and none continued in power longer than five days, or, according to Plutarch, only 12 hours. Liv. 1, c. 17.—Dionys. 2, c. 15.

Iolaia, a festival at Thebes, the same as that called Heracleia. It was instituted in honour of Hercules and his friend Iolas, who assisted him in conquering the hydra. The place where the exercises were exhibited was called Iolaion, where there were to be seen the monument of Amphitryon, and the cenotaph of Iolas, who was buried in Sardinia. These monuments were strewed with garlands and flowers on the day of the festival.

Ion. Vid. Iones and Ionia, Part I.—A tragic poet of Chios. He began to exhibit, Olymp. lxxxii. 2, B. C. 451. The number of his dramas is variously estimated at from twelve to forty. Bentley has collected the names of eleven. The same great critic has also shown that this Ion was a person of birth and fortune, distinct from Ion Ephesius, a mere begging rhapsodist. Besides tragedies, Ion composed dithyrambs, elegies, &c., and several works in prose. Like Euripides, he was intimate with Socrates. Ion was so delighted with being decreed victor on one occasion in the tragic contests at Athens, that he presented each citizen with a vase of Chian pottery. We gather from a joke of Aristophanes, on a word taken from one of his dithyrambs, that Ion died before the exhibition of the Pax, B. C. 419.

Iones. Vid. Part I.

Iophon, a son of Sophocles, whose plays he was suspected of exhibiting as his own. Be that as it may, he is represented as being the best tragic poet at the time when the Ranæ was composed; for Sophocles, Euripides, and Agathon were then dead. Iophon is said to have contended against his father, with much honour to himself as a dramatist. He, too, is the son who is reported to have brought the unsuccessful charge of dotage against the age of Sophocles. Vid. Sophocles.

Jornandes, an historian who wrote on the Goths. He died A. D. 552.

Josephus Flavius, a celebrated Jew, born in Jerusalem, who signalized his military abilities in supporting a siege of forty-seven days against Vespasian and Titus, in a small town of Judæa. When the city surrendered there were found not less than 40,000 Jews slain, and the number of captives amounted to 12,000. Josephus saved his life by flying into a cave, where 40 of his countrymen had also taken refuge. He dissuaded them from committing suicide; and when they had all drawn lots to kill one another, Josephus fortunately remained the last, and surrendered himself to Vespasian. He wrote the history of the wars of the Jews, first in Syriac, and afterwards translated it into Greek. This composition so pleased Titus, that he authenticated it by placing his signature upon it, and by preserving it in one of the public libraries. He finished another work, which he divided into twenty books, containing the history of the Jewish antiquities, in some places subversive of the authority and miracles mentioned in the Scriptures. He also wrote two books to defend the Jews against Apion, their greatest enemy; besides an account of his own life, &c. Josephus has been admired for his lively and animated style, the bold propriety of his expressions, the exactness of his descriptions, and the persuasive eloquence of his orations. He has been called the Livy of the Greeks. Though, in some cases, inimical to the Christians, yet he has commended our Saviour so warmly, that St. Jerome calls him a Christian writer. Josephus died A. D. 93, in the 56th year of his age. The best editions of his works are Hudson's, 2 vols. fol. Oxon. 1720, and Havercamp's, 2 vols. fol. Amst. 1826, Sueton in Vesp. &c.

Jovianus, (Flavius Claudius,) a native of Pannonia, elected emperor of Rome by the soldiers after the death of Julian. He at first refused to be invested with the imperial purple, because his subjects followed the religious principles of the late emperor; but they removed his groundless apprehensions; and, when they assured him that they were warm for Christianity, he accepted the crown. He made a disadvantageous treaty with the Persians, against whom Julian was marched with a victorious army. Jovian died seven months and twenty days after his ascension, and was found in his bed suffocated by the vapours of charcoal, which had been lighted in his room, A. D. 364. Some attribute his death to intemperance. He burned a celebrated library at Antioch. Marcellin.

Iphicrates, a celebrated general of Athens, who, though son of a shoemaker, rose from the lowest station to the highest offices in the state. He married a daughter of Cotys, king of Thrace, by whom he had a son called Mnestheus, and died 380, B. C. When he was once reproached of the meanness of his origin, he observed, that he would be the first of his family, but that his detractor would be the last of his own. C. Nep. in Ephic.

Iphigenia. Vid. Part III.

Iphitus, a king of Elis, son of Praxonides, in the age of Lycurgus. He re-established the Olympic games 338 years after their institution by Hercules, or about 884 years before the Christian era. This epoch is famous in chronological history, as every thing previous to it seems involved in fabulous obscurity. Paterc. 1, c. 8.—Paus. 5, c. 4. Vid. Part III.

Irenæus, a native of Greece, disciple of Polycarp, and bishop of Lyons in France. He wrote on different subjects; but as what remains is in Latin, some suppose he composed in that language, and not in Greek. Fragments of his works in Greek are, however, preserved, which prove that his style was simple, though clear and often animated. His opinions concerning the soul are curious. He suffered martyrdom, A. D. 202. The best edition of his works is that of Grabe, Oxon. fol. 1702.

Irus, a beggar of Ithaca, who executed the commissions of Penelope's suiters. When Ulysses returned home, disguised in a beggar's dress, Irus hindered him from entering the gates, and even challenged him. Ulysses brought him to the ground with a blow, and dragged him out of the house. From his poverty originates the proverb Iro pauperior. Homer. Od. 8, v. 1 and 35.—Ovid. Trist. 3, el. 7, v. 42.

Isadas, a Spartan who, upon seeing the Thebans entering the city, stripped himself naked, and, with a spear and sword, engaged the enemy. He was rewarded with a crown for his valour. Plut.

Isæus, I. an orator of Chalcis, in Eubœa, who came to Athens, and became there the pupil of Lysias, and soon after the master of Demosthenes. Ten of his sixty-four orations are extant. Juv. 3, v. 74.—Plut. de 10 Orat. Dem. ——II. Another Greek orator, who came to Rome A. D. 17. He is greatly commended by Pliny the younger, who observes, that he always spoke extempore, and wrote with elegance, unlaboured ease, and great correctness.

Ischenia, an annual festival at Olympia, in honour of Ischenus, the grandson of Mercury and Hierea, who, in time of famine devoted himself for his country, and was honoured with a monument near Olympia.

Isdegerdes, a king of Persia, appointed by the will of Arcadius guardian to Theodosius the Second. He died in his 31st year, A. D. 408.

Isia, certain festivals observed in honour of Isis, which continued nine days. They were abolished by a decree of the senate, A. U. C. 696. They were introduced again, about 200 years after, by Commodus.

Isidorus, I. a native of Charax, in the age of Ptolemy Lagus, who wrote some historical treatises, besides a description of Parthia.——II. A disciple of Chrysostom, called Pelusiota from his living in Egypt. Of his epistles 2012 remain, written in Greek with conciseness and elegance. The best edition is that of Paris, fol. 1638.——III. A Christian Greek writer, who flourished in the 7th century. He is surnamed Hespalensis. His works have been edited, fol. de Breul, Paris, 1601.

Isme'nias, I. a Theban bribed by Timocrates of Rhodes, that he might use his influence to prevent the Athenians and some other Grecian states from assisting Lacedæmon, against which Xerxes was engaged in a war. Paus. 3, c. 9. ——II. A Theban general, sent to Persia with an embassy by his countrymen. As none were admitted into the king's presence without prostrating themselves at his feet, Ismenias had recourse to artifice to avoid doing an action which would prove disgraceful to his country. When he was introduced he dropped his ring, and the motion he made to recover it from the ground was mistaken for the most submissive homage, and Ismenias had a satisfactory audience of the monarch.

Isocrates, a celebrated orator, son of Theodorus, a rich musical instrument-maker at Athens. He was taught in the school of Gorgias and Prodicus, but his oratorical abilities were never displayed in public, and Isocrates was prevented by an unconquerable timidity from speaking in the popular assemblies. He opened a school of eloquence at Athens, where he distinguished himself by the number, character, and fame of his pupils, and by the immense riches which he amassed. He was intimate with Philip of Macedon, and regularly corresponded with him: and to his familiarity with that monarch the Athenians were indebted for some of the few peaceful years which they passed. The aspiring ambition of Philip, however, displeased Isocrates; and the defeat of the Athenians at Cheronæa had such an effect upon his spirits, that he did not survive the disgrace of his country, but died, after he had been four days without taking any aliment, in the 99th year of his age, about 338 years before Christ. Isocrates has always been much admired for the sweetness and graceful simplicity of his style, for the harmony of his expressions, and the dignity of his language. The conduct of the Athenians against Socrates highly displeased him, and, in spite of all the undeserved unpopularity of that great philosopher, he put on mourning the day of his death. About 31 of his orations are extant. Isocrates was honoured after death with a brazen statue by Timotheus, one of his pupils, and Aphareus, his adopted son. The best editions of Isocrates are that of Battie, 2 vols. 8vo. Cantab. 1729, and that of Augur, 3 vols. 8vo. Paris, 1782. Plut. de 10 Orat. &c. Cic. Orat. 20 de Inv. 2, c. 126. in Brut. c. 15. de Orat. 2, c. 6.—Quintil. 2, &c.—Paterc. 1, c. 16.

Isthmia, sacred games among the Greeks, which received their name from the Isthmus of Corinth, where they were observed and celebrated in commemoration of Melicerta. They were interrupted after they had been celebrated with great regularity during some years, and Theseus at last reinstituted them in honour of Neptune, whom he publicly called his father. These games were observed every third, or rather fifth year, and held so sacred and inviolable, that even a public calamity could not prevent the celebration. When Corinth was destroyed by Mummius, the Roman general, they were observed with the usual solemnity, and the Sicyonians were entrusted with the superintendence, which had been before one of the privileges of the ruined Corinthians. The years were reckoned by the celebration of the Isthmian games, as among the Romans from the consular government. Paus. 1, c. 44, l. 2, c. 1 and 2.—Plin. 4, c. 5.—Plut. in Thes.

Juba, I. a king of Numidia and Mauritania, who succeeded his father Hiempsal, and favoured the cause of Pompey against J. Cæsar. He defeated Curio, whom Cæsar had sent to Africa, and after the battle of Pharsalia he joined his forces to those of Scipio. He was conquered in a battle at Thapsus, and totally abandoned by his subjects. He killed himself with Petreius, who had shared his good fortune and his adversity. His kingdom became a Roman province, of which Sallust was the first governor. Plut. in Pomp. & Cæs.—Flor. 4, c. 12.—Suet. in Cæs. c. 35.—Dion. 41.—Mela, 1, c. 6.—Lucan. 3, &c.—Cæsar. de Bell. Civ. 2.—Paterc. 2, c. 54.——II. The second of that name was the son of Juba the First. He was led among the captives of Rome to adorn the triumph of Cæsar. He gained the hearts of the Romans by the courteousness of his manners, and Augustus rewarded his fidelity by giving him in marriage Cleopatra, the daughter of Antony, and conferring upon him the title of king, and making him master of all the territories which his father once possessed. Juba wrote a history of Rome in Greek, which is often quoted and commended by the ancients, but of which only a few fragments remain. He also wrote on the history of Arabia and the antiquities of Assyria, chiefly collected from Berosus. Besides these, he composed some treatises upon the drama, Roman antiquities, the nature of animals, painting, grammar, &c. now lost. Strab. 17.—Suet. in Cal. 26.—Plin. 5, c. 25 and 32.—Dion. 51, &c.

JUGURTHA, the illegitimate son of Manastabal, the brother of Micipsa. Micipsa and Manastabal were the sons of Massinissa, king of Numidia. Micipsa, who had inherited his father's kingdom, educated his nephew, with his two sons Adherbal and Hiempsal; but as he was of an aspiring disposition, he sent him with a body of troops to the assistance of Scipio, who was besieging Numantia, hoping to lose a youth whose ambition seemed to threaten the tranquillity of his children. His hopes were frustrated; Jugurtha showed himself brave and active, and endeared himself to the Roman general. Micipsa appointed him successor to his kingdom with his two sons, but the kindness of the father proved fatal to the children. Jugurtha destroyed Hiempsal, and stripped Adherbal of his possessions, and obliged him to fly to Rome for safety. The Romans listened to the well-grounded complaints of Adherbal, but Jugurtha's gold prevailed among the senators, and the suppliant monarch, forsaken in his distress, perished by the snares of his enemy. Cæcilius Metellus was at last sent against Jugurtha, and his firmness and success soon reduced the crafty Numidian, and obliged him to fly among his savage neighbours for support. Marius and Sylla succeeded Metellus, and fought with equal success. Jugurtha was at last betrayed by his father-in-law Bocchus, from whom he claimed assistance, and he was delivered into the hands of Sylla, after carrying on a war of five years. He was exposed to the view of the Roman people, and dragged in chains to adorn the triumph of Marius. He was afterwards put in a prison, where he died six days after of hunger, B. C. 106. The name and the wars of Jugurtha have been immortalized by the pen of Sallust. Sallust. in Jug.—Flor. 3, c. 1.—Paterc. 2, c. 10, &c.—Plut. in Mar. and Syll.—Eutrop. 4, c. 3.

JULIA LEX, prima de provinciis, by J. Cæsar, A. U. C. 691. It confirmed the freedom of all Greece; it ordained that the Roman magistrates should act there as judges; that the governors, at the expiration of their office, should leave a scheme of their accounts in two cities of their province; that the provincial governors should not accept of a golden crown, unless they were honoured with a triumph by the senate; that no supreme commander should go out of his province, enter any dominions, lead an army, or engage in a war, without the previous approbation and command of the Roman senate and people.——Another, de Sumptibus, in the age of Augustus. It limited the expense of provisions on the dies profesti, or days appointed for the transaction of business, to 200 sesterces; on common calendar festivals to 300; and on all extraordinary occasions, such as marriages, births, &c. to 1000.——Another, de provinciis, by J. Cæsar, dictator. It ordained that no pretorian province should be held more than one year, and a consular province more than two years.——Another, called also Campana agraria, by the same, A. U. C. 691. It required that all the lands of Campania, formerly rented according to the estimation of the state, should be divided among the plebeians, and that all the members of the senate should bind themselves by an oath to establish, confirm, and protect, that law.——Another, de civitate, by L. J. Cæsar, A. U. C. 664. It rewarded with the name and privileges of citizens of Rome all such as, during the civil wars, had remained the constant friends of the republican liberty. When that civil war was at an end, all the Italians were admitted as free denizens, and composed eight new tribes.——Another, de judicibus, by J. Cæsar. It confirmed the Pompeian law in a certain manner, requiring the judges to be chosen from the richest people in every century, allowing the senators and knights in the number, and excluding the tribuni ærarii.——Another, de ambitu, by Augustus. It restrained the illicit measures used at elections, and restored to the comitia their ancient privileges, which had been destroyed by the ambition and bribery of J. Cæsar.——Another, by Augustus, de adulterio and pudicitiâ. It punished adultery with death. It was afterwards confirmed and enforced by Domitian. Juvenal. Sat. 2, v. 30, alludes to it.——Another, called also Papia, or Papia Poppæa, which was the same as the following, only enlarged by the consuls Papius and Poppæus, A. U. C. 762.——Another, de maritandis ordinibus, by Augustus. It proposed rewards to such as engaged in matrimony, of a particular description. It inflicted punishment on celibacy, and permitted the patricians, the senators and sons of senators excepted, to intermarry with the libertini, or children of those that had been liberti, or servants manumitted. Horace alludes to it when he speaks of lex marita.——Another, de magestate, by J. Cæsar. It punished with aquæ et ignis interdictio all such as were found guilty of the crimen majestatis, or treason against the state.

JULIA, I. a daughter of J. Cæsar, by Cornelia, famous for her personal charms and for her virtues. She married Corn. Cæpio, whom her father obliged her to divorce to marry Pompey the Great. Her amiable disposition more strongly cemented the friendship of the father and of the son-in-law; and her sudden death in child-bed, B. C. 53, broke all ties of intimacy and relationship, and soon produced a civil war. Plut.—II. The mother of M. Antony.——III. An aunt of J. Cæsar, who married C. Marius. Her funeral oration was publicly pronounced by her nephew.——IV. The only daughter of the emperor Augustus, remarkable for her beauty, genius, and debaucheries. She was tenderly loved by her father, who gave her in marriage to Marcellus; after whose death she was given to Agrippa, by whom she had five children. She became a second time a widow, and was married to Tiberius. Her lasciviousness and debaucheries so disgusted her husband, that he retired from the court of the emperor; and Augustus, informed of her lustful propensities and infamy, banished her from his sight, and confined her in a small island on the coast of Campania. She was starved to death, A. D. 14, by order of Tiberius, who had succeeded to Augustus as emperor of Rome. Plut.——V. A daughter of the emperor Titus.——VI. A daughter of Julia, the wife of Agrippa, who married Lepidus, and was banished for her licentiousness.——VII. A daughter of Germanicus and Agrippina, born in the island of Lesbos, A. D. 17. She married a senator called M. Vinucius, at the age of 16, and enjoyed the most unbounded favours in the court of her brother Caligula, who is accused of being her first seducer. She was banished by Caligula on suspicion of conspiracy. Claudius recalled her; but she was soon after banished by the powerful intrigues of Messalina, and put to death about the 24th year of her age. Seneca, as some suppose, was banished to Corsica for having seduced her.——VIII. A celebrated woman, born in Phœnicia. She is also called Domna. She applied herself to the study of geometry and philosophy, &c., and rendered herself conspicuous as much by her mental as by her personal charms. She married Septimius Severus, who, twenty years after this matrimonial connexion, was invested with the imperial purple. She is even said to have conspired against the emperor; but she resolved to blot, by patronising literature, the spots which her debauchery and extravagance had rendered indelible in the eyes of virtue. Her influence, after the death of Severus, was for some time productive of tranquillity and cordial union between his two sons and successors. Geta at last, however, fell a sacrifice to his brother Caracalla, and Julia was even wounded in the arm while she attempted to screen her favourite son from his brother's dagger. She starved herself when her ambitious views were defeated by Macrinus, who aspired to the empire in preference to her, after the death of Caracalla.

Julianus, a son of Julius Constantius, the brother of Constantine the Great, born at Constantinople. The massacre which attended the elevation of the sons of Constantine the Great to the throne, nearly proved fatal to Julian and to his brother Gallus. The two brothers were privately educated together, and taught the doctrine of the Christian religion, and exhorted to be modest, temperate, and to despise the gratification of all sensual pleasures. Julian was some time after appointed over Gaul, with the title of Cæsar, by Constans, and there he showed himself worthy of the imperial dignity by his prudence, valour, and the numerous victories he obtained over the enemies of Rome in Gaul and Germany. His mildness, as well as his condescension, gained him the hearts of his soldiers; and when Constans, to whom Julian was become suspected, ordered him to send him part of his forces to go into the east, the army immediately mutinied, and promised fidelity to their leader, by refusing to obey the orders of Constans. They even compelled Julian by threats and entreaties to accept of the title of independent emperor and of Augustus; and the death of Constans, which soon after happened, left him sole master of the Roman empire, A. D. 361. Julian then disclosed his religious sentiments, and publicly disavowed the doctrines of Christianity, and offered solemn sacrifices to all the gods of ancient Rome. This change of religious opinion was attributed to the austerity with which he received the precepts of Christianity; or, according to others, to the literary conversation and persuasive eloquence of some of the Athenian philosophers. From this circumstance, therefore, Julian has been called Apostate. After he had made his public entry at Constantinople, he determined to continue the Persian war, and check those barbarians who had for 60 years derided the indolence of the Roman emperors. When he had crossed the Tigris he burned his fleet, and advanced with boldness into the enemy's country. But the country of Assyria had been left desolate by the Persians, and Julian, without corn or provisions, was obliged to retire. As he could not convey his army again over the stream of the Tigris, he took the resolution of marching up the sources of the river, and imitating the bold return of the ten thousand Greeks. As he advanced through the country, he defeated the officers of Sapor, the king of Persia; but an engagement proved fatal to him, and he received a deadly wound as he animated his soldiers to battle. He expired the following night, the 27th of June, A. D. 363, in the 32d year of his age. His last moments were spent in a conversation with a philosopher about the immortality of the soul, and he breathed his last without expressing the least sorrow for his fate or the suddenness of his death. Julian's character has been admired by some and censured by others, but the malevolence of his enemies arises from his apostacy. He was moderate in his successes, merciful to his enemies, and amiable in his character. He was frugal in his meals, and slept little, reposing himself on a skin spread on the ground. He awoke at midnight, and spent the rest of the night in reading or writing, and issued early from his tent to pay his daily visit to the guards around the camp. When he passed through Antioch in his Persian expedition, the inhabitants of the place, offended at his religious sentiments, ridiculed his person, and lampooned him in satirical verses. The emperor made use of the same arms for his defence; and rather than destroy his enemies by the sword, he condescended to expose them to derision, and unveil their follies and debaucheries in a humorous work; which he called Misopogon, or beard-hater. He was buried at Tarsus, and afterwards his body was conveyed to Constantinople. He distinguished himself by his writings as well as by his military character. Besides his Misopogon, he wrote the history of Gaul. He also wrote two letters to the Athenians; and besides, there are now extant sixty-four letters on various subjects. His Cæsars is the most famous of all his compositions, being a satire upon all the Roman emperors, from Julius Cæsar to Constantine. It is written in the form of a dialogue, in which the author severely attacks the venerable character of M. Aurelius, whom he had proposed to himself as a pattern; and speaks in a scurrilous and abusive language of his relation Constantine. It has been observed of Julian, that, like Cæsar, he could employ at the same time his hand to write, his ear to listen, his eyes to read, and his mind to dictate. The best edition of his works is that of Spanheim, fol. Lips. 1696; and of the Cæsars, that of Heusinger, 8vo. Gothæ, 1741. Julian.—Socrat.—Eutrop.—Amm.—Liban, &c.

Juli, a family of Alba, brought to Rome by Romulus, where they soon rose to the greatest honours of the state. J. Cæsar and Augustus were of this family; and it was said, perhaps through flattery, that they were lineally descended from Æneas, the founder of Lavinium.

Julius Cæsar, I. Vid. Cæsar.——II. Agricola, a governor of Britain, A. C. 80, who first discovered that Britain was an island by sailing round it. His son-in-law, the historian Tacitus, has written an account of his life. Tacit. in Agric.——III. Obsequens, a Latin writer, who flourished A. D. 214. The best edition of his book, de prodigiis, is that of Oudendorp, 8vo. L. Bat. 1720.——IV. S. a prætor, &c. Cic. ad Her. 2, c. 13.——V. Solinus, a writer. Vid. Solinus.——VI. Titianus, a writer in the age of Diocletian. His son became famous for his oratorical powers, and was made preceptor in the family of Maximinus. Julius wrote a history of all the provinces of the Roman empire, greatly commended by the ancients. He also wrote some letters, in which he happily imitated the style and elegance of Cicero, for which he was called the ape of his age.——VII. Constantius, the father of the emperor Julian, was killed at the accession of the sons of Constantine to the throne, and his son nearly shared his fate.——VIII. Pollux. Vid. Pollux.——IX. Proculus, a Roman, who solemnly declared to his countrymen, after Romulus had disappeared, that he had seen him above in human shape, and that he had ordered him to tell the Romans to honour him as a god. Julius was believed. Plut. in Rom.—Ovid.——X. Florus. Vid. Florus.——XI. L. Cæsar, a Roman consul, uncle to Antony the triumvir, the father of Cæsar the dictator. He died as he was putting on his shoes.——XII. Maximinus, a Thracian, who, from a shepherd, became an emperor of Rome. Vid. Maximinus.

Iūlus, I. the name of Ascanius, the son of Æneas. Vid. Ascanius.——II. A son of Ascanius, born in Lavinium. In the succession to the kingdom of Alba, Æneas Sylvius, the son of Æneas and Lavinia, was preferred to him. He was, however, made chief priest, Dionys. I.—Virg. Æn. 1, v. 271. *Vid. Jūnia Lex, Sacrata, by L. Junius Brutus, the first tribune of the people, A. U. C. 260. It ordained that the person of the tribune should be held sacred and inviolable; that an appeal might be made from the consuls to the tribune; and that no senator should be able to exercise the office of a tribune.——Another, A. U. C. 627, which excluded all foreigners from enjoying the privileges or names of Roman citizens.

Junia, I. a niece of Cato of Utica, who married Cassius, and died 64 years after her husband had killed himself at the battle of Philippi.——II. Calvina, a beautiful Roman lady, descended from Augustus. She was banished by Claudius, and recalled by Nero. Tacit. Ann. 2, c. 4.

Junius, (Lupus,) a senator who accused Vitellius of aspiring to the sovereignty, &c. Tacit. Ann. 12, c. 42. Vid. Brutus.

Junonālia, and Junonia, festivals at Rome in honour of Juno, the same as the Heræa of the Greeks. Vid. Heræa. Liv. 27, c. 37.

Justīnus M. Junianus, I. a Latin historian in the age of Antoninus, who epitomized the history of Trogus Pompeius. This epitome, according to some traditions, was the cause that the comprehensive work of Trogus was lost. It comprehends the history of the Assyrian, Persian, Grecian, Macedonian, and Roman empires, &c. in a neat and elegant style. It is replete with many judicious reflections and animated harangues; but the author is often too credulous, and sometimes examines events too minutely, while others are related only in a few words, too often obscure. The indecency of many of his expressions is deservedly censured. The best editions of Justin are that of Ab. Gronovius. 8vo. L. Bat. 1719, that of Hearne, 8vo. Oxon, 1703, and that of Barbou, 12mo. Paris, 1770.——II. Martyr, a Greek father, formerly a Platonic philosopher, born in Palestine. He died in Egypt, and wrote two apologies for the Christians, besides his dialogue with a Jew, two treatises, &c. in a plain and unadorned style. The best editions of Justin Martyr are that of Paris, fol. 1636. Of his apologies, 2 vols. 8vo. 1700 and 1703, and Jebb's dialogue with Trypho, published in London, 1722.——III. An emperor of the east, who reigned nine years, and died A. D. 526.——IV. Another, who died A. D. 564, after a reign of 38 years.——V. Another, who died 577, A. D. after a reign of 13 years.

Juvenālis, (Decius Junius,) a poet, born at Aquinum in Italy. He came early to Rome, and passed some time in declaiming; after which he applied himself to write satires, 16 of which are extant. He spoke with virulence against the partiality of Nero for the pantomime Paris; and though all his satire and declamation were pointed against this ruling favourite of the emperor, yet Juvenal lived in security during the reign of Nero. After the death of Nero, the effects of the resentment of Paris were severely felt, and the satirist was sent by Domitian as governor on the frontiers of Egypt. Juvenal was then in the 80th year of his age, and he suffered much from the trouble which attended his office, or rather his exile. He returned, however, to Rome after the death of Paris, and died in the reign of Trajan, A. D. 128. His writings are fiery and animated, and they abound with humour. He may be called, and with reason, perhaps, the last of the Roman poets. After him poetry decayed, and nothing more claims our attention as a perfect poetical composition. The best editions are those of Casaubon, 4to. L. Bat. 1695, with Persius, and of Hawkey, Dublin, 12mo. 1746, and of Gravius cum notis variorum, 8vo. L. Bat. 1684.

Labeo, (Antistius,) I. a celebrated lawyer in the age of Augustus, whose views he opposed, and whose offers of the consulship he refused. His works are lost. He was wont to enjoy the company and conversation of the learned for six months, and the rest of the year was spent in writing and composing. His father, of the same name, was one of Cæsar's murderers. He killed himself at the battle of Philippi. Horace 1, Sat. 3, v. 82, has unjustly taxed him with insanity, because, no doubt, he inveighed against his patrons. Appian Alex. 4.—Suet. in Aug. 45.——II. A tribune of the people at Rome, who condemned the censor Metullus to be thrown down from the Tarpeian rock, because he had expelled him from the senate. This rigorous sentence was stopped by the interference of another of the tribunes.——III. Q. Fabius, a Roman consul, A. U. C. 571, who obtained a naval victory over the fleet of the Cretans. He assisted Terence in composing his comedies, according to some.——IV. Actius, an obscure poet, who reconciled himself to the favour of Nero by an incorrect translation of Homer into Latin. The work is lost, and only this curious line is preserved by an old scholiast; Persius, 1, v. 4:—

Crudum manducus Priamum, Priamique Pelinnos.

Labērius, (J. Decimus,) a Roman knight, famous for his poetical talents in writing pantomimes. J. Cæsar compelled him to act one of his characters on the stage. The poet consented with great reluctance, but he showed his resentment during the acting of the piece, by throwing severe aspersions upon J. Cæsar, by warning the audience against his tyranny, and by drawing upon him the eyes of the whole theatre. Cæsar, however, restored him to the rank of knight, which he had lost by appearing on the stage; but to his mortification, when he went to take his seat among the knights, no one offered to make room for him; and even his friend Cicero said, Recepissem te nisi angustè sederem. Laberius was offended at the affectation and insolence of Cicero, and reflected upon his unsettled and pusillanimous behaviour during the civil wars of Cæsar and Pompey, by the reply of Mirum si angustè sedes, qui soles duabus sellis sedere. Laberius died ten months after the murder of J. Cæsar. Some fragments remain of his poetry. Macrob. Sat. 2, c. 3 and 7.—Horat. 1, sat. 10.—Senec. de Controv. 18.—Suet. in Cæs.

Labiēnus, I. an officer of Cæsar in the wars of Gaul. He deserted to Pompey, and was killed at the battle of Munda. Cæs. Bell. G. 6, &c. Lucan. 5, v. 346.——II. A Roman who followed the interest of Brutus and Cassius, and became general of the Parthians against Rome. He was conquered by the officers of Augustus. Strab. 12 and 14.—Dio. 48.——III. Titus, a declaimer and historian, is chiefly known from some passages in Seneca, the rhetorician, who informs us that his history was marked by an excessive rage for liberty, and its vituperation of all ranks and classes of men. He used to read it aloud in assemblies of his fellow-citizens: but he was wont to pass over the more violent passages, saying, that what he thus omitted would be perused after his death. He was the first author whose works were burned by public authority. They were condemned to the flames, towards the close of the reign of Augustus, by a decree of the senate. Labienus could not endure to survive the records of his genius: he made himself be carried to the sepulchre of his ancestors, where he was shut in, and expired. It would appear, however, that all the copies of Labienus's history had not been destroyed; for Caligula, while affecting to play the moralist and the patriot at the commencement of his reign, allowed his writings to be sought after, and read—since, as he remarked, it was of the utmost importance to him to encourage such compositions, in order that all the actions of his life should be transmitted to posterity. Suet. in Cal. 16.—Seneca.

Labinētus, or Labynētus, a king of Babylon, &c. Herodot. 1, c. 74.

Laches, I. an Athenian sent with Carias at the head of a fleet in the first expedition undertaken against Sicily in the Peloponnesian war. Justin. 4, c. 3.——II. An artist who finished the Colossus of Rhodes.

Lacidas, a Greek philosopher of Cyrene, who flourished B. C. 241. His father's name was Alexander. He was disciple of Arcesilaus, whom he succeeded in the government of the second academy. He was greatly esteemed by king Attalus, who gave him a garden, where he spent his hours in study. He taught his disciples to suspect their judgment, and never speak decisively. He disgraced himself by the magnificent funeral with which he honoured a favourite goose, and died through excess of drinking. Diog. 4.

Lactantius, a celebrated Christian writer, whose principal works are de irâ divinâ, de Dei operibus, and his divine institutions, in seven books, in which he proves the truth of the Christian religion, refutes the objections, and attacks the illusions and absurdities of Paganism. The expressive purity, elegance, and energy of his style have gained him the name of the Christian Cicero. He died A. D. 325. The best editions of his works are that of Sparke, 8vo. Oxon. 1684, that of Biineman, 2 vols. 8vo. Lips. 1739, and that of Du Fresnoy, 2 vols. 4to. Paris, 1748.

Lælianus, a general, proclaimed emperor in Gaul by his soldiers, A. D. 268, after the death of Gallienus. He was conquered by another general, called Posthumus, who also aspired to the imperial purple.

Lælius, C. a Roman consul, A. U. C. 614, surnamed Sapiens, so intimate with Africanus the younger, that Cicero represents him, in his treatise De Amicitiâ, as explaining the real nature of friendship, with its attendant pleasures. He made war with success against Viriathus. It is said that he assisted Terence in the composition of his comedies.

Læna, and Leæna, the mistress of Harmodius and Aristogiton. Being tortured because she refused to discover the conspirators, she bit off her tongue, totally to frustrate the violent efforts of her executioners.

Laertes, a king of Ithaca, son of Arcesius and Chalcomedusa, who married Anticlea, the daughter of Autolycus. Ulysses was treated with paternal care by Laertes, though not really his son, and Laertes ceded to him his crown, and retired into the country, where he spent his time in gardening. He was found in this mean employment by his son at his return from the Trojan war, after 20 years' absence; and immediately the father and son repaired to the palace of Penelope, the wife of Ulysses, whence all the suiters who daily importuned the princess were forcibly removed. Laertes was one of the Argonauts, according to Apollodorus, 1, c. 9.—Homer. Od. 11 and 24.—Ovid. Met. 13, v. 32. Heroid. 1, v. 98.

Læta, the wife of the emperor Gration, celebrated for her humanity and generous sentiments.

Lætus, I. a Roman whom Commodus condemned to be put to death. This violence raised Lætus against Commodus; he conspired against him, and raised Pertinax to the throne.——II. A general of the emperor Severus, put to death for his treachery to the emperor; or, according to others, on account of his popularity.

Lævinus, a Roman consul sent against Pyrrhus, A. U. C. 474. He was defeated.

Lagus, a Macedonian, of mean extraction. He received in marriage Arsinoe, the daughter of Meleager, who was then pregnant by king Philip, and being willing to hide the disgrace of his wife, he exposed the child in the woods. An eagle preserved the life of the infant, and Lagus then adopted the child as his own, and called him Ptolemy. This Ptolemy became king of Egypt after the death of Alexander. According to other accounts, Arsinoe was nearly related to Philip king of Macedonia, and her marriage with Lagus was not considered as dishonourable, because he was opulent and powerful. The first of the Ptolemies is called Lagus, to distinguish him from his successors of the same name; and the surname of Lagidas was transmitted to all his descendants on the Egyptian throne till the reign of Cleopatra, Antony's mistress. Plutarch mentions an anecdote, which serves to show how far the legitimacy of Ptolemy was believed in his age. A pedantic grammarian, says the historian, once displaying his great knowledge of antiquity in the presence of Ptolemy, the king suddenly interrupted him with the question of, Pray, tell me, sir, who was the father of Peleus? Tell me, replied the grammarian, without hesitation, tell me, if you can, O king! who the father of Lagus was? This reflection on the meanness of the monarch's birth did not in the least irritate his resentment, though the courtiers all glowed with indignation. Ptolemy praised the humour of the grammarian, and showed his moderation and the mildness of his temper, by taking him under his patronage. Paus. Attic.—Justin. 13. —Curt. 4.—Plut. de irâ cohib.—Lucan. 1, v. 684.—Ital. 1, v. 196.

Lais, a celebrated courtesan, daughter of Timandra, the mistress of Alcibiades, born at Hyccara in Sicily. She was carried away from her native country into Greece, when Nicias, the Athenian general invaded Sicily. She first began to sell her favours at Corinth for 10,000 drachmas; and the immense number of princes, noblemen, philosophers, orators and plebeians, who courted her embraces, show how much commendation is owed to her personal charms. The expenses which attended her pleasures gave rise to the proverb of Non cuivis homini contingit adire Corinthum. Even Demosthenes himself visited Corinth for the sake of Lais; but when he was informed by the courtesan that admittance to her bed was to be bought at the enormous sum of about 200*l.* English money, the orator departed, and observed that he would not buy repentance at so dear a price. The charms which had attracted Demosthenes to Corinth had no influence upon Xenocrates. When Lais saw the philosopher unmoved by her beauty, she visited his house herself; but there she had no reason to boast of the licentiousness or easy submission of Xenocrates. Diogenes the cynic was one of her warmest admirers, and though filthy in his dress and manners, yet he gained her heart and enjoyed her most unbounded favours. Lais ridiculed the austerity of philosophers, observing that the sages and philosophers of the age were not above the rest of mankind, for she found them at her door as often as the rest of the Athenians. The success which her debaucheries met at Corinth encouraged Lais to pass into Thessaly, and more particularly to enjoy the company of a favourite youth called Hippostratus. She was, however, disappointed; the women of the place, jealous of her charms, and apprehensive of her corrupting the fidelity of their husbands, assassinated her in the temple of Venus, about 340 years before the Christian era. Some suppose that there were two persons of this name, a mother and her daughter. Cic. ad Fam. 9, ep. 26.—Ovid. Amor. 1, el. 5.—Plut. in. Alcib.—Paus. 2, c. 2.

Lamachus, I. a son of Xenophanes, sent into Sicily with Nicias. He was killed B. C. 414, before Syracuse, where he displayed much courage and intrepidity. Plut. in Alcib.——II. A. governor of Heraclea in Pontus, who betrayed his trust to Mithridates, after he had invited all the inhabitants to a sumptuous feast.

Lamia, a famous courtesan, mistress to Demetrius Poliorcetes. Plut. in Dem.—Athen. 13.—Ælian. V. H. 13, c. 9. Vid. Parts I. and III.

Lamiacum Bellum happened after the death of Alexander, when the Greeks, and particularly the Athenians, incited by their orators, resolved to free Greece from the garrisons of the Macedonians. Leosthenes was appointed commander of a numerous force, and marched against Antipater, who then presided over Macedonia. Antipater entered Thessaly at the head of 13,000 foot and 600 horse, and was beaten by the superior force of the Athenians and of their Greek confederates. Antipater, after this blow, fled to Lamia, B. C. 323, where he resolved, with all the courage and sagacity of a careful general, to maintain a siege with about the 8 or 9000 men that had escaped from the field of battle. Leosthenes, unable to take the city by storm, began to make a regular siege. His operations were delayed by the frequent sallies of Antipater; and Leosthenes being killed by the blow of a stone, Antipater made his escape out of Lamia; and soon after, with the assistance of the army of Craterus, brought from Asia, he gave the Athenians battle near Cranon; and though only 500 of their men were slain, yet they became so dispirited, that they sued for peace from the conqueror. Plut. in Demost.—Diod. 17.—Justin. 11, &c.

Lamias Ælius, a governor of Syria, under Tiberius. He was honoured with a public funeral by the senate; and as having been a respectable and useful citizen, Horace has dedicated his 26 od. lib. 1, to his praises, as also 3 od. 17. Tacit. Ann. 6, c. 27.

Lampedo, a woman of Lacedæmon, who was daughter, wife, sister, and mother of a king. She lived in the age of Alcibiades. Agrippina, the mother of Claudius, could boast the same honours. Tacit. Ann. 12, c. 22 and 37.—Plut. in Ag.—Plato in 1, Alc.—Plin. 7, c. 41.

Lampeto. Vid. Part III.

Lampridius Ælius, a Latin historian in the fourth century, who wrote the lives of some of the Roman emperors. His style is inelegant, and his arrangement injudicious. His life of Commodus, Heliogabalus, Alexander Severus, &c. is still extant, and to be found in the works of the Historiæ Augustæ Scriptores.

Lamptēria, a festival at Pellene in Achaia, in honour of Bacchus, who was surnamed Lampter from λαμπειν, to shine, because, during this solemnity, which was observed in the night, the worshippers went to the temple of Bacchus with lighted torches in their hands. Paus. 4, c. 31.

LĪMUS. Vid. Part III.

LANASSA, a daughter of Agathocles, who married Pyrrhus, whom she soon after forsook for Demetrius. Plut.

LĀŌCOON. Vid. Part III.

LĀŌDĀMĪA, a daughter of Alexander, king of Epirus, by Olympia, the daughter of Pyrrhus. She was assassinated in the temple of Diana, where she had fled for safety during a sedition. Her murderer, called Milo, soon after turned his dagger against his own breast, and killed himself. Justin. 28, c. 3.

LĀŌDĪCE, I. a daughter of Agamemnon, called also Electra. Homer Il. 9.——II. A sister of Mithridates, who married Ariarathes, king of Cappadocia, and afterwards her own brother Mithridates. She attempted to poison Mithridates, for which she was put to death.——III. A queen of Cappadocia, put to death by her subjects for poisoning five of her children.——IV. A sister and wife of Antiochus 2d. She put to death Berenice, whom her husband had married. Vid. Antiochus 2d. She was murdered by order of Ptolemy Evergetes, B. C. 246.——V. A daughter of Demetrius, shamefully put to death by Ammonius, the tyrannical minister of the vicious Alexander Bala, king of Syria.——VI. The mother of Seleucus. Nine months before she brought forth, she dreamt that Apollo had presented her with a precious stone, on which was engraved the figure of an anchor, commanding her to deliver it to her son as soon as born. Not only the son that she brought forth, called Seleucus, but also all his successors of the house of the Seleucidæ, had the mark of an anchor upon their thigh. Justin. Appian. in Syr. mentions this anchor, though in a different manner.

LĀŌMĔDON. Vid. Part III.

LARGUS, a Latin poet, who wrote a poem on the arrival of Antenor in Italy, where he built the town of Padua. He composed with ease and elegance. Ovid. ex Pont. 4 ep. 16, v. 17.

LARTIUS FLORUS, (T.) I. a consul who appeased a sedition raised by the poorer citizens, and was the first dictator ever chosen at Rome, B. C. 498. He made Spurius Cassius his master of horse. Liv. 2, c. 18.——II. Spurius, one of the three Romans who alone withstood the fury of Porsenna's army at the head of a bridge, while the communication was cutting down behind them. His companions were Cocles and Herminius. Vid. Cocles. Liv. 2, c. 10 and 18. —Dionys. Hal.—Val. Max. 3, c. 2.——The name of Lartius has been common to many Romans.

LASSUS, or LASUS, a dithyrambic poet, born at Hermione in Peloponnesus, about 500 years before Christ, and reckoned among the wise men of Greece by some. He was acquainted with music. Some fragments of his poetry are to be found in Athenæus. He wrote an ode upon the Centaurs, and a hymn to Ceres, without inserting the letter S in the composition. Athen. 10.

LASTHĒNĪA, a woman who disguised herself to come and hear Plato's lessons. Diog.

LATERANUS PLAUTUS, a Roman consul elect, A. D. 65. A conspiracy with Piso against the emperor Nero proved fatal to him. He was led to execution, where he refused to confess the associates of the conspiracy, and did not even frown at the executioner, who was as guilty as himself; but when a first blow could not sever his head from his body, he looked at the executioner, and shaking his head, he returned it to the hatchet with the greatest composure, and it was cut off. There exists now a celebrated palace at Rome which derives its name from its ancient possessors, the Laterani.

LAUDĀMĪA, I. a daughter of Alexander, king of Epirus, and Olympias, daughter of Pyrrhus, killed in a temple of Diana by the enraged populace. Justin. 28, c. 3.——II. The wife of Protesilaus. Vid. Laodamia.

LĀVĪNĪA. Vid. Part III.

LAURENTĀLIA, certain festivals celebrated at Rome in honour of Laurentia, on the last day of April and the 23d of December. They were, in process of time, part of the Saturnalia. Ovid. Fast. 3, v. 57.

LEANDER. Vid Hero.

LĒGIO, a corps of soldiers in the Roman armies, whose numbers have been different at different times. The legion under Romulus consisted of 3000 foot and 300 horse, and was soon after augmented to 4000, after the admission of the Sabines into the city. When Annibal was in Italy it consisted of 5000 soldiers, and afterwards it decreased to 4000, or 4500. Marius made it consist of 6000, besides 700 horse. This was the period of its greatness in numbers. Livy speaks of ten, and even eighteen, legions kept at Rome. They were distributed over the Roman empire, and their stations were settled and permanent. The peace of Britain was protected by three legions; sixteen were stationed on the banks of the Rhine and Danube, viz. two in Lower, and three in Upper Germany; one in Noricum, one in Rhætia, three in Mœsia, four in Pannonia, and two in Dacia. Eight were stationed on the Euphrates, six of which remained in Syria, and two in Cappadocia; while the remote provinces of Egypt, Africa, and Spain, were guarded each by a single legion. Besides these, the tranquillity of Rome was preserved by 20,000 soldiers, who, under the titles of city cohorts and of prætorian guards, watched over the safety of the monarch and of the capital. The legions were distinguished by different appellations, and generally borrowed their name from the order in which they were first raised, as prima, secunda, tertia, quarta, &c. Besides this distinction, another more expressive was generally added, as from the name of the emperor who imbodied them, as Augusta, Claudiana, Galbiana, Flavia, Ulpia, Trajana, Antoniana, &c.; from the provinces or quarters where they were stationed, as Britannica, Cyrenica, Gallica, &c.; from the provinces which had been subdued by their valour, as Parthica, Scythica, Arabica, Africana, &c.; from the names of the deities whom their generals particularly worshipped, as Minervia, Apollinaris, &c.; or from more trifling accidents, as Martia, Fulminatrix, Rapax, Adjutrix, &c. Each legion was divided into ten cohorts, each cohort into three manipuli, and every manipulus into three centuries or ordines. The chief commander of the legion was called legatus, lieutenant. The standards borne by the legions were various. In the first ages of Rome a wolf was the standard, in honour of Romulus. Marius changed them all for the eagle, being a representation of that bird in silver, holding sometimes a thunderbolt in its claws. The Roman eagle ever after remained in use, though Trajan made use of the Dragon.

Lelĭbeia. Vid. Part I.

Lelex, I. an Egyptian, who came with a colony to Megara, where he reigned about 200 years before the Trojan war. His subjects were called from him Leleges, and the place Lelegeia tellus. Paus. 3, c. 1.——II. A Greek, who was the first king of Laconia in Peloponnesus. His subjects were also called Leleges, and the country where he reigned Lelegia. Id.

Lentŭlus, a celebrated family at Rome, which produced many great men in the commonwealth. The most illustrious were,—I. Corn. Lentulus, surnamed Sura. He joined in Catiline's conspiracy, and assisted in corrupting the Allobroges. He was convicted in full senate by Cicero, and put in prison, and afterwards executed.——II. Cn. Lentulus, surnamed Getulicus, was made consul A. D. 26, and was, some time after, put to death by Tiberius, who was jealous of his great popularity. He wrote a history, mentioned by Suetonius, and attempted also poetry.——III. P. Corn. Lentulus, a prætor, defeated by the rebellious slaves in Sicily. ——IV. P. Lentulus, a friend of Brutus, mentioned by Cicero, (de Orat. 1, c. 48,) as a great and consummate statesman. The consulship was in the family of the Lentuli in the years of Rome 427, 479, 517, 518, 553, 555, 598, &c. Tacit. Ann.—Liv.—Flor.—Plin.—Plut.—Eutrop.

Leo, I. a native of Byzantium, who flourished 360 years before the Christian era. His philosophical and political talents endeared him to his countrymen, and he was always sent upon every important occasion as ambassador to Athens, or to the court of Philip, king of Macedonia. This monarch was sensible that his views and claims to Byzantium would never succeed while it was protected by the vigilance of such a patriotic citizen. To remove him he had recourse to artifice and perfidy. A letter was forged, in which Leo made solemn promises of betraying his country to the king of Macedonia for money. This was no sooner known than the people ran enraged to the house of Leo, and the philosopher, to avoid their fury, and without attempting his justification, strangled himself. He had written some treatises upon physic, and also the history of his country and the wars of Philip, in seven books, which have been lost. Plut.——II. An emperor of the east, surnamed the Thracian. He reigned 17 years, and died A. D. 474, being succeeded by Leo the Second for 10 months, and afterwards by Zeno.

Leocorion, a monument and temple erected by the Athenians to Pasithea, Theope, and Eubule, daughters of Leos, who immolated themselves when an oracle had ordered that, to stop the raging pestilence, some of the blood of the citizens must be shed. Ælian. 12, c. 28.—Cic. N. D. 3, c. 19.

Leonātus, one of Alexander's generals. His father's name was Eunus. After the death of Alexander, at the general division of the provinces, he received for his portion that part of Phrygia which borders on the Hellespont. He aspired to the sovereignty of Macedonia, and secretly communicated to Eumenes the different plans he meant to pursue to execute his designs. He passed from Asia into Europe, to assist Antipater against the Athenians, and was killed in a battle which was fought soon after his arrival. Historians have mentioned, as an instance of the luxury of Leonatus, that he employed a number of camels to procure some earth from Egypt to wrestle upon, as, in his opinion, it seemed better calculated for that purpose. Plut. in Alex.—Curt. 3, c. 12, l. 6, c. 8.—Justin. 13, c. 2.—Diod. 18.—C. Nep. in Eum.

Leonĭdas, a celebrated king of Lacedæmon, of the family of the Euristhenidæ, sent by his countrymen to oppose Xerxes, king of Persia, who had invaded Greece with about five millions of souls. He was offered the kingdom of Greece by the enemy if he would not oppose his views; but Leonidas heard the proposal with indignation, and observed, that he preferred death for his country to an unjust though extensive dominion over it. Before the engagement Leonidas exhorted his soldiers, and told them all to dine heartily, as they were to sup in the realms of Pluto. The battle was fought at Thermopylæ, and the 300 Spartans, who alone had refused to abandon the scene of action, withstood the enemy with such vigour, that they were obliged to retire, wearied and conquered, during three successive days, till Ephialtes, a Trachinian, had the perfidy to conduct a detachment of Persians by a secret path up the mountains, whence they suddenly fell upon the rear of the Spartans and crushed them to pieces. Only one escaped of the 300; he returned home, where he was treated with insult and reproaches for flying ingloriously from a battle in which his brave companions, with their royal leader, had perished. This celebrated battle, which happened 480 years before the Christian era, taught the Greeks to despise the number of the Persians, and to rely upon their own strength and intrepidity. Temples were raised to the fallen hero; and festivals, called Leonidea, yearly celebrated at Sparta, in which freeborn youths contended. Leonidas, as he departed for the battle from Lacedæmon, gave no other injunction to his wife, but after his death to marry a man of virtue and honour, to raise from her children deserving of the name and greatness of her first husband. Herodot. 7, c. 120, &c.—C. Nep. in Them.—Justin. 2.—Val. Max. 1, c. 6.—Paus. 3, c. 4.—Plut. in Lyc. & Cleom.——II. A king of Sparta after Areus II. 257 years before Christ. He was driven from his kingdom by Cleombrotus, his son-in-law, and afterwards re-established.

Leontium, a celebrated courtesan of Athens, who studied philosophy under Epicurus, and became one of his most renowned pupils. Metrodorus shared her favours in the most unbounded manner, and by him she had a son, to whom Epicurus was so partial, that he recommended him to his executors on his dying bed. Leontium not only professed herself a warm admirer and follower of the doctrines of Epicurus, but she even wrote a book in support of them against Theophrastus. This book was valuable, if we believe the testimony and criticism of Cicero, who praised the purity and elegance of its style, and the truly Attic turn of the expressions. Leontium had also a daughter, called Danae, who married Sophron. Cic. de Nat. D. 1, c. 33.

Leos, a son of Orpheus. Vid. Leocorion.

Leosthĕnes, I. an Athenian general. Vid. Lamiacum. Diod. 17 and 18.—Strab. 9.—— II. Another general of Athens, condemned on account of the bad success which attended his arms against Peparethos.

Leotychĭdes, I. a king of Sparta, son of Menares, of the family of the Proclidæ. He was set over the Grecian fleet, and by his courage and valour he put an end to the Persian war at the famous battle of Mycale. It is said that he cheered the spirits of his fellow-soldiers at Mycale, who were anxious for their countrymen in Greece, by raising a report that a battle had been fought at Platæa, in which the barbarians had been defeated. This succeeded, and though the information was false, yet a battle was fought at Platæa, in which the Greeks obtained the victory the same day that the Persian fleet was destroyed at Mycale. Leotychides was accused of a capital crime by the Ephori; and, to avoid the punishment which his guilt seemed to deserve, he fled to the temple of Minerva at Tegea, where he perished, B. C. 469, after a reign of 22 years. He was succeeded by his grandson Archidamus, who assisted the Phocians in plundering the temple of Delphi. Paus. 3, c. 7 and 8.—Diod. 11.——II. A son of Agis, king of Sparta, by Timæa. The legitimacy of his birth was disputed by some, and it was generally believed that he was the son of Alcibiades. He was prevented from ascending the throne of Sparta by Lysander, though Agis had declared him upon his deathbed his lawful son and heir, and Agesilaus was appointed in his place. C. Nep. in Ages.—Plut.—Paus. 3, c. 8.

Lepĭda Domitia, a daughter of Drusus and Antonia, great niece to Augustus, and aunt to the emperor Nero. She is described by Tacitus as infamous in her manners, violent in her temper, and yet celebrated for her beauty. She was put to death by means of her rival Agrippina, Nero's mother. Tacit.

Lepĭdus, M. Æmilius, I. a Roman, celebrated as being one of the triumvirs with Augustus and Antony. He was of an illustrious family, and, like the rest of his contemporaries, he was remarkable for his ambition, to which was added a narrowness of mind, and a great deficiency of military abilities. He was sent against Cæsar's murderers and some time after he leagued with M. Antony, who had gained the heart of his soldiers by artifice, and that of their commander by his address. When his influence and power among the soldiers had made him one of the triumvirs, he showed his cruelty, like his colleagues, by his proscriptions: and even suffered his own brother to be sacrificed to the dagger of the triumvirate. He received Africa as his portion in the division of the empire; but his indolence soon rendered him despicable in the eves of his soldiers and of his colleagues; and Augustus, who was well acquainted with the unpopularity of Lepidus, went to his camp, and obliged him to resign the power to which he was entitled as being a triumvir. After this degrading event, he sunk into obscurity, and retired, by order of Augustus, to Cerceii, a small town on the coast of Latium, where he ended his days in peace, B. C. 13, and where he was forgotten as soon as out of power. Appian.—Plut. in Aug.—Flor. 4, c. 6 and 7.—— II. A son of Julia, the grand-daughter of Augustus. He was intended by Caius as his successor in the Roman empire. He committed adultery with Agrippina when young. Dion. 59.

Leptĭnes, I. a son of Hermocrates, of Syracuse, brother to Dionysius. He was sent by his brother against the Carthaginians, and experienced so much success that he sunk fifty of their ships. He was afterwards defeated by Mago, and banished by Dionysius. He was killed in a battle with the Carthaginians. Diod. 15.——II. A famous orator at Athens, who endeavoured to unload the people from oppressive taxes. He was opposed by Demosthenes.

Lesches, a Greek poet of Lesbos, who flourished B. C. 600. Some suppose him to be the author of the little Iliad, of which only a few verses remain quoted by Paus. 10, c. 25.

Leucippus, a celebrated philosopher of Abdera, about 428 years before Christ, disciple of Zeno. He was the first who invented the famous system of atoms, and of a vacuum, which was afterwards more fully explained by Democritus and Epicurus. Many of his hypotheses have been adopted by the moderns with advantage. Diogenes has written his life. Vid. Part III.

Leucon, a tyrant of Bosphorus, who lived in great intimacy with the Athenians. He was a great patron of the useful arts, and greatly encouraged commerce. Strab.—Diod. 14.

Leuttychĭdes. Vid. Leotychides.

Libānius, a celebrated sophist of Antioch, in the age of the emperor Julian. He was educated at Athens, and opened a school at Antioch, which produced some of the best and most of the literary characters of the age. When Julian had imprisoned the senators of Antioch for their impertinence, Libanius undertook the defence of his fellow-citizens. Some of his orations, and above 1600 of his letters are extant; they discover much affectation and obscurity of style. Julian submitted his writings to the judgment of Libanius with the greatest confidence, and the sophist freely rejected or approved, and showed that he was more attached to the person than the fortune and greatness of his prince. The time of his death is unknown. The best edition of Libanius seems to be that of Paris, fol. 1606, with a second volume published by Morell, 1627. His epistles have been edited by Wolf, fol. 1738.

Liberālia, festivals yearly celebrated in honour of Bacchus the 17th of March, much the same as the Dionysia of the Greeks. Varro.

Libo, a friend of the first triumvirate, who killed himself, and was condemned after death.

Libon, a Greek architect, who built the famous temple of Jupiter Olympius. He flourished about 450 years before the Christian era.

Lichas, an Arcadian, who found the bones of Orestes buried at Tegea, &c. Herodot.

Licĭnia Lex, was enacted by L. Licinius Crassus and Q. Mutius, consuls, A. U. C. 657. It ordered all the inhabitants of Italy to be enrolled on the list of citizens, in their respective cities.——Another, by C. Licinius Crassus the tribune, A. U. C. 608. It transferred the right of choosing priests from the college to the people. It was proposed, but did not pass. ——Another, by C. Licinius Stolo the tribune. It forbade any person to possess 500 acres of land, or keep more than 100 head of large cattle or 500 of small.——Another, by P. Licinius Varus, A. U. C. 545, to settle the day for the celebration of the Ludi Apollinares which was before uncertain.——Another, by P. Licinius Crassus Dives, B. C. 110. It was the same as the Fannian law, and farther required that no more than 30 asses should be spent at any table on the calends, nones, or nundinæ, and only three pounds of fresh and one of salt meat on ordinary days. None of the fruits of the earth were forbidden.——Another, de sodalitiis, by M. Licinius the consul, 690. It imposed a severe penalty on party clubs, or societies assembled or frequented for election purposes, as coming under the definition of ambitus, and of offering violence in some degree to the freedom and independence of the people.——Another, called also Æbutia, by Licinius and Æbutius the tribunes. It enacted, that when any law was preferred with respect to any office of power, the person who proposed the bill, as well as his colleagues in office, his friends and relations, should be declared incapable of being invested with the said office or power.

Licinia, I. the wife of C. Gracchus, who attempted to dissuade her husband from his seditious measures by a pathetic speech. She was deprived of her dowry after the death of Caius. ——II. The wife of Mæcenas, distinguished for conjugal tenderness. She was sister to Proculeius, and bore also the name of Terentia. Horat. 2, od. 12, v. 13.

Licinius, (C.) I. a tribune of the people, celebrated for the consequence of his family, for his intrigues and abilities. He was a plebeian, and was the first of that body who was raised to the office of a master of horse to the dictator. He made a law which permitted the plebeians to share the consular dignity with the patricians, A. U. C. 388. He reaped the benefits of this law, and was one of the first plebeian consuls. The law was proposed and passed by Licinius, as it is reported, at the instigation of his ambitious wife, who was jealous of her sister who had married a patrician, and who seemed to be of a higher dignity in being the wife of a consul. Liv. 6, c. 34.—Plut.——II. C. Calvus, a celebrated orator and poet in the age of Cicero. He distinguished himself by his eloquence in the forum, and his poetry, which some of the ancients have compared to Catullus. His orations are greatly commended by Quintilian. Some believe that he wrote annals quoted by Dionysius of Halicarnassus. He died in the 30th year of his age. Quintil.—Cic. in Brut. 81.——III. Macer, a Roman accused by Cicero when prætor. He derided the power of his accuser, but when he saw himself condemned, he grew so desperate that he killed himself. Plut. ——IV. P. Crassus, a Roman, sent against Perseus, king of Macedonia. He was at first defeated, but afterwards repaired his losses and obtained a complete victory, &c.——V. Caius Imbrex, a comic poet in the age of Africanus, preferred by some to Ennius and Terence. His Nævia and Neæra are quoted by ancient authors, but of all his poetry only two verses are preserved. Aul. Gel.——VI. Mucianus, a Roman who wrote about the history and geography of the eastern countries, often quoted by Pliny. He lived in the reign of Vespasian.——VII. P. Tegula, a comic poet of Rome, about 200 years before Christ. He is ranked as the fourth of the best comic poets which Rome produced. Few lines of his compositions are extant. He wrote an ode, which was sung all over the city of Rome by nine virgins during the Macedonian war. Liv. 31, c. 12.——VIII. Varro Muræna, a brother of Proculeius, who conspired against Augustus with Fannius Cæpio, and suffered for his crime. Horace addressed his 2 od. 10, to him, and recommended equanimity in every situation. Dio. 54.——IX. C. Flavius Valerianus, a celebrated Roman emperor. His father was a poor peasant of Dalmatia, and himself a common soldier in the Roman armies. His valour recommended him to the notice of Galerius Maximianus, who took him as a colleague in the empire, and appointed him over the province of Pannonia and Rhœtia. Constantine, who was also one of the emperors, courted the favour of Licinius, and made his intimacy more durable by giving him his sister Constantia in marriage, A. D. 313. The continual successes of Licinius, particularly against Maximinus, increased his pride, and rendered him jealous of the greatness of his brother-in-law. The persecutions of the Christians, whose doctrines Constantine followed, soon caused a rupture, and ill-fortune attended Licinius; he was conquered, and fled to Nicomedia, where soon the conqueror obliged him to surrender, and to resign the imperial purple. Constantine ordered him to be strangled at Thessalonica, A. D. 324. His family was involved in his ruin. The avarice, licentiousness, and cruelty of Licinius, are as conspicuous as his misfortunes. He was an enemy to learning, and his aversion totally proceeded from his ignorance of letters and the rusticity of his education. His son by Constantia bore also the same name. He was honoured with the title of Cæsar when scarce 20 months old. He was involved in his father's ruin, and put to death by order of Constantine.

Ligarius, Q. a Roman pro-consul of Africa, after Confidius. In the civil wars he followed the interests of Pompey, and was pardoned when Cæsar had conquered his enemies. Cæsar, however, and his adherents, were determined upon the ruin of Ligarius; but Cicero, by an eloquent oration, still extant, defeated his accusers, and he was pardoned. He became afterwards one of Cæsar's murderers. Cic. pro leg.—Plut. in Cæsar.

Litavicus, one of the Ædui, who assisted Cæsar with 10,000 men. Cæs. Bell. G. 7, c. 37.

Lithobolia, a festival celebrated at Trœzene, in honour of Lamia and Auxesia, who came from Crete, and were sacrificed by the fury of the seditious populace, and stoned to death. Hence the name of the solemnity, λιθοβολια, lapidation.

Livia Drusilla, a celebrated Roman lady, daughter of L. Drusus Calidianus. She married Tiberius Claudius Nero, by whom she had the emperor Tiberius and Drusus Germanicus. The attachment of her husband to the cause of Antony was the beginning of her greatness.

Augustus saw her as she fled from the danger which threatened her husband, and he resolved to marry her, though she was then pregnant. Her children by Drusus were adopted by the emperor; and, that she might make the succession of her son Tiberius more easy and undisputed, Livia is accused of secretly involving in one common ruin the heirs and nearest relations of Augustus. She is also charged with having murdered her own husband, to hasten the elevation of Tiberius. If she was anxious for the aggrandizement of her son, Tiberius proved ungrateful, and hated a woman to whom he owed his life, his elevation, and his greatness. Livia died in the 86th year of her age, A. D. 29. Tiberius showed himself as undutiful after her death as before, for he neglected her funeral, and expressly commanded that no honours, either private or public, should be paid to her memory. Tacit. Ann. 1, c. 3.——Suet. in Aug. & Tib.—Dion. Cass.

Livia Lex, de sociis, proposed to make all the inhabitants of Italy free citizens of Rome. M. Livius Drusus, who framed it, was found murdered in his house before it passed.——Another, by M. Livius Drusus the tribune, A. U. C. 662, which required that the judicial power should be lodged in the hands of an equal number of knights and senators.

Livius Andronicus, L a native of Magna Græcia, was the first who attempted to establish at Rome a regular theatre, or to connect a dramatic fable, free from the mummeries, the ballet, and the melodrama of the ancient satires. Tiraboschi asserts, that when his country was finally subdued by the Romans, in 492, Livius was made captive and brought to Rome. It is generally believed that he there became the slave, and afterwards the freedman of Livius Salinator, from whom he derived one of his names; these facts, however, do not seem to rest on any authority more ancient than the Eusebian Chronicle. The precise period of his death is uncertain; but in Cicero's dialogue De Senectute, Cato is introduced saying, that he had seen old Livius while he was himself a youth. Now Cato was born in 519, and since the period of youth among the Romans was considered as commencing at fifteen, it may be presumed that the existence of Livius was at least protracted till the year 534 of the city. It has been frequently said, that he lived till the year 546 because Livy mentions that a hymn composed by this ancient poet was publicly sung in that year, to avert the disasters threatened by an alarming prodigy; but the historian does not declare that it was written for the occasion, or even recently before. The earliest play of Livius was represented in 513 or 514, about a year after the termination of the first Punic war. Osannus, a modern German author, has written a learned and chronological dissertation on the question, in which of these years the first Roman play was performed; but it is extremely difficult for us to come to any satisfactory conclusion on a subject which, even in the time of Cicero, was one of doubt and controversy. Like Thespis, and other dramatists in the commencement of the theatrical art, Livius was an actor, and for a considerable time the sole performer in his own pieces. Afterwards, however, his voice failing, in consequence of the audience insisting on a repetition of favourite passages, he introduced a boy who relieved him, by declaiming in concert with the flute, while he himself executed the corresponding gesticulations in the monologues, and in the parts where high exertion was required, employing his own voice only in the conversational and less elevated scenes. It was observed that his action grew more lively and animated, because he exerted his whole strength in gesticulating, while another had the care and trouble of pronouncing. 'Hence,' continues Livy, 'the practice arose of reciting those passages which required much modulation of the voice, to the gesture and action of the comedian. Thenceforth the custom so far prevailed, that the comedians never pronounced any thing except the verses of the dialogues:' and this system, which one should think must have completely destroyed the theatric illusion, continued, under certain modifications, to subsist on the Roman stage during the most refined periods of taste and literature. The popularity of Livius increasing from these performances, as well as from a propitiatory hymn he had composed, and which had been followed by great public success, a building was assigned to him on the Aventine hill. This edifice was partly converted into a theatre, and was also inhabited by a troop of players, for whom Livius wrote his pieces, and frequently acted along with them. It has been disputed whether the first drama represented by Livius Andronicus at Rome was a tragedy or comedy. However this may be, it appears from the names which have been preserved of his plays, that he wrote both tragedies and comedies. These titles, which have been collected by Fabricius and other writers, are Achilles, Adonis, Ægisthus, Ajax, Andromeda, Antiopa, Centauri, Equus Trojanus, Helena, Hermione, Ino, Lydius, Protesilaodamia, Sirenus, Tereus, Teucer, Virgo. Such names also evince that most of his dramas were translated or imitated from the works of his countrymen of Magna Græcia, or from the great tragedians of Greece. Thus, Æschylus wrote a tragedy on the subject of Ægisthus. There is still an Ajax of Sophocles extant, and he is known to have written an Andromeda: Stobæus mentions the Antiopa of Euripides. Four Greek dramatists, Sophocles, Euripides, Anaxandrides, and Philæterus, composed tragedies on the subject of Tereus; and Epicharmus, as well as others, chose for their comedies the story of the Sirens. Little, however, except the titles, remains to us from the dramas of Livius. The longest passage we possess in connexion, extends only to four lines. It forms part of a hymn to Diana, recited by the chorus, in the tragedy of Ino, contains an animated exhortation to a person about to proceed to the chase, and testifies the vast improvement effected by Livius on the Latin tongue. As this is the only passage among the fragments of Livius, from which a connected meaning can be elicited, we must take our opinion of his poetical merits from those who judged of them while his writings were yet wholly extant. Cicero has pronounced an unfavourable decision, declaring that they scarcely deserved a second perusal. They long, however, continued popular in Rome, and were read by the youths in schools even during the Augustan age of poetry.

It is evident, indeed, that during that golden period of Roman literature, there prevailed a taste corresponding to our black-letter rage, which led to an inordinate admiration of the works of Livius, and to the bitter complaints of Horace, that they should be extolled as perfect, or held up by old pedants to the imitation of youth in an age when so much better models existed. But although Livius may have been too much read in the schools, and too much admired in an age which could boast of models so greatly superior to his writings, he is at least entitled to praise, as the inventor among the Romans of a species of poetry which was afterwards carried by them to much higher perfection. By translating the Odyssey, too, into Latin verse, he adopted the means which, of all others, were most likely to foster and improve the infant literature of his country—as he thus presented it with an image of the most pure and perfect taste, and at the same time with those wild and romantic adventures, which are best suited to attract the sympathy and interest of a half-civilized nation. This happy influence could not be prevented, even by the use of the rugged Saturnian verse, which led Cicero to compare the translation of Livius to the ancient statutes, which might be attributed to Dædalus.——II. M. Salinator, a Roman consul sent against the Illyrians. The success with which he finished his campaign, and the victory which some years after he obtained over Asdrubal, who was passing into Italy with a reinforcement for his brother Annibal, show how deserving he was to be at the head of the Roman armies. Liv.——III. Titus. This writer, though unquestionably the greatest historian of Rome, has been but slightly mentioned, either by those authors of his own country who were contemporary with him, or by those who succeeded him; and we, in consequence, have little information concerning the circumstance of his life. He was born at Padua, of a consular family, in the year of Rome 695. The place of his birth was one of the most ancient and distinguished municipal states of the Roman empire. Titus Livius Optatus was the first of the Livian family who came to it from Rome; and from him was descended Caius Livius, the father of the historian. Many of the poets and literary men of Rome were brought in early youth to the capital. Livy, however, seems to have received his early instruction in his native city. Soon after his arrival at Rome, he composed some dialogues on philosophical and political questions, which he addressed to Augustus. These dialogues, which are now lost, procured for him the favour of the emperor, who gave him free access to all those archives and records of the state which might prove serviceable in the prosecution of the historical researches in which he was employed. He also allotted him apartments in his own palace. It appears that Livy availed himself of the good graces of the emperor, only for the purpose of facilitating the historical researches in which he was engaged. We do not hear that he accepted any pecuniary favours, or even held any public employment. It has been conjectured by some writers, from a passage in Suetonius, that he had for a short while superintended the education of Claudius, who afterwards succeeded to the empire. But though the expressions scarcely authorize this inference, they prove, that at Livy's suggestion, Claudius undertook in his youth to write a history of Rome, from the death of Julius Cæsar, and thus acquired the habit of historical composition, which he continued after his accession; being better qualified, as Gibbon remarks, to record great actions than to perform them. Livy continued for nearly twenty years to be closely occupied in the composition of his history. During this long period his chief residence was at Rome, or in its immediate vicinity. Though Livy's great work was not finished till the year 745 or 746, he had previously published parts of it, from time to time, by which means he early acquired a high reputation with his countrymen, who considered him as holding the same rank, in the class of their historians, which Virgil occupied among their poets, and Cicero among their orators. His fame reached even the remotest extremities of the Roman empire. An inhabitant of Cadiz was so struck with his illustrious character, that he travelled all the way from the city to Rome on purpose to see him, and, having gratified his curiosity, straightway returned to Spain. Although his history was completed, as we have seen, in 745, Livy continued to reside at Rome till the death of Augustus, which happened in 765. On the accession of Tiberius, he returned to Padua, where he survived five years longer, and at length died at the place of his birth, in 770, and in the 76th year of his age. Livy is supposed to have been twice married. By one of his wives he left several daughters and a son, to whom he addressed an epistle or short treatise on the subject of rhetoric, in which, while delivering his opinion concerning the authors most proper to be read by youth, he says, that they ought first to study Demosthenes and Cicero, and next, such writers as most closely resemble these excellent orators. After his death, statues were erected to Livy at Rome; for we learn, from Suetonius, that the mad Caligula had nearly ordered that all his images, as well as those of Virgil, should be removed from the public libraries. His more rational subjects, nevertheless, regarded Livy as the only historian that had yet appeared, whose dignity of sentiment, and majesty of expression, rendered him worthy to record the story of the Roman republic. The work of Livy comprehends the whole history of Rome, from its foundation to the death of Drusus, the brother of Tiberius, which happened in the year 744. It consisted of 140, or according to some, of 142 books; but of these, as is well known, only thirty-five are now extant: and it must be admitted that the most valuable portion of Livy's history has perished. The commencement of those dissensions, which ended in the subversion of the liberties of Rome, and the motives by which the actors on the great political stage were influenced would have given scope for more interesting reflection, and more philosophic deduction, than details of the wars with the Sabines and Samnites, or even of those with the Carthaginians and Greeks. Stronger reliance might also have been placed on this portion of the history, than on that by which it was preceded. The author's account of the civil wars of Marius and Sylla, of Pompey and Cæsar, may have been derived from those who were eyewitnesses of these destructive contests, and he himself was living an impartial and intelligent observer of all the subsequent events which his history recorded. Both Lord Bolingbroke and Gibbon have declared, that they would willingly give up what we now possess of Livy, on the terms of recovering what we have lost. It would lead into a field of discussion much too extensive to enter into any investigation concerning even a few of the most important mistakes which have been imputed to Livy. Inexperienced in military affairs, numerous blunders have been attributed to him with regard to encampments, circumvalations, sieges, and in general all warlike operations. He did not, like Polybius, Sallust, or Diodorus Siculus, take the pains to visit the regions which had been the theatre of the great events he commemorates. Hence, many mistakes in geography, and much confusion with regard to the situation of towns and the boundaries of districts. 'Considered in this view,' says Gibbon, 'Livy appears merely as a man of letters, covered with the dust of his library, little acquainted with the art of war, and careless in point of geography.' Livy, besides, was not a very learned or zealous antiquary; and hence he has fallen into many errors of chronology, as also into mistakes concerning the ancient manners and institutions of the Romans. Into various inadvertences and contradictions he has been betrayed by carelessness or haste.* Thus, having discovered an inscription on a breastplate, which was at variance, as to a particular fact, with the common narrative of the annalists, he states it to be decisive against them; yet, subsequently, hurried away by the crowd of historians whom he followed, he forgets both himself and the confidence due to the breastplate, and subscribes to the accuracy of the annalists whose narrative is falsified. Sometimes, when there are two relations, by two different authors, varying from each other, he follows the one in one part of his history, and yet assents to the other in a subsequent passage. Sometimes the same incidents are twice related, as having occurred in different years —a confusion into which he was led by the vast number of annalists whom he consulted, and the discrepancy in Roman chronology, some writers following Cato, and others Varro, who disagreed by two years in the epoch which they fixed for the foundation of Rome. Considering the period in which he lived, the impartiality and sincerity of Livy passed through a fiery ordeal. But though his youth was spent in a period of civil war and violent faction, he seems to have imbibed none of the feelings of a partisan; and in this respect, perhaps, his residence at Padua, far from the dissensions and excitement of the capital, was favourable to his impartiality. The absolute domination of Augustus, and the favour which, on Livy's arrival at Rome, the emperor extended to him, might well have corrupted the fidelity of a republican historian. But he honoured the memory of the conquered patriots in the court of the conquering prince. The best editions of Livy will be found to be those of Maittaire, 6 vols. 12mo. London, 1722; of Drachenborch, 7 vols. 4to. Amst. 1731, and of Ruddiman, 4 vols. 12mo. Edin. 1751.

Locusta, a celebrated woman at Rome, in the favour of Nero. She poisoned Claudius and Britannicus, and at last attempted to destroy Nero himself, for which she was executed. Tacit. Ann. 12, c. 66, &c.—Suet. in Ner. 33.

Lollia Paulina, a beautiful woman, daughter of M. Lollius, who married C. Memmius Regulus, and afterwards Caligula. She was divorced and put to death by means of Agrippina. Tacit. Ann. 12, c. 1, &c.

Lollius, M. a companion and tutor of C. Cæsar, the son-in-law of Tiberius. He was consul, and offended Augustus by his rapacity in the provinces. Horace has addressed two of his epistles to him, &c. Tacit Ann. 3.

Longimanus, a surname of Artaxerxes, from his having one hand longer than the other. The Greeks called him Macrochir. C. Nep. in Reg.

Longinus, (Dionysius Cassius,) I. a celebrated Greek philosopher and critic of Athens. He was preceptor of the Greek language, and afterwards minister to Zenobia, the famous queen of Palmyra, and his ardent zeal and spirited activity in her cause, proved at last fatal to him. When the emperor Aurelian entered victorious the gates of Palmyra, Longinus was sacrificed to the fury of the Roman soldiers, A. D. 273. At the moment of death he showed himself great and resolute; and with a philosophical and unparalleled firmness of mind, he even repressed the tears and sighs of the spectators who pitied his miserable end. Longinus rendered his name immortal by his critical remarks on ancient authors. His treatise on the sublime gives the world reason to lament the loss of his other valuable compositions. The best editions of this author are that of Tollius, 4to. Traj. ad Rhen. 1694, and that of Toup, 8vo. Oxon. 1778.—II. A lawyer whom, though blind and respected, Nero ordered to be put to death, because he had in his possession a picture of Cassius, one of Cæsar's murderers. Juv. 10, v. 6.

Longus, a Greek author, who wrote a novel called the amours of Daphnis and Chloe. The age in which he lived is not precisely known. The best editions of this pleasing writer are that of Paris, 4to. 1754, and that of Villoison, 8vo. Paris, 1778.

Lucanus, M. Annæus, I. a native of Corduba in Spain. He was early removed to Rome, where his rising talents, and more particularly his lavished praises and panegyrics, recommended him to the emperor Nero. This intimacy was soon productive of honour, and Lucan was raised to the dignity of an augur and quæstor before he had attained the proper age. The poet had the imprudence to enter the lists against his imperial patron; he chose for his subject Orpheus, and Nero took the tragical story of Niobe. Lucan obtained an easy victory, but Nero became jealous of his poetical reputation, and resolved upon revenge. The insults to which Lucan was daily exposed, provoked at last his resentment, and he joined Piso in a conspiracy against the emperor. The whole was discovered, and the poet had nothing left but to choose the manner of his execution. He had his veins opened in the warm bath, and as he expired, he pronounced with great energy the lines which, in his Pharsalia, l. 3, v. 630—642, he had put into the mouth of a soldier who died in the same manner as himself. Some have accused him of pusillanimity at the moment of his death, and say that, to free himself from the punishment which threatened him he accused his own mother, and involved her in the crime of which he was guilty. This circumstance, which throws an indelible blot upon the character of Lucan, is not mentioned by some writers, who observe that he expired with all the firmness of a philosopher. He died in his 26th year, A. D. 65. Of all his compositions none but his Pharsalia remains. This poem, which is an account of the civil wars of Cæsar and Pompey, is unfinished. Opinions are various as to the merits of the poetry. Lucan, to use the words of Quintilian, is more an orator than a poet. He wrote a poem upon the burning of Rome, now lost. It is said that his wife, Polla Argentaria, not only assisted him in the composition of his poem, but even corrected it after his death. Scaliger says that Lucan rather barks than sings. The best editions of Lucan are those of Oudendorp, 4to. L. Bat. 1728, of Bentley, 4to. printed at Strawberry-hill, 1760, and of Barbou, 12mo. Paris, 1767. Quintil. 10.—Suet.—Tacit. Ann. 15, &c.—Martial. 7, ep. 20.——II. Ocellus, or Ucellus, an ancient Pythagorean philosopher, whose age is unknown. He wrote, in the Attic dialect a book on the nature of the universe, which he deemed eternal, and from it were drawn the systems adopted by Aristotle, Plato, and Philo Judæus. This work was first translated into Latin by Nogarola. Another book of Ocellus on laws, written in the Doric dialect, was greatly esteemed by Archytas and Plato, a fragment of which has been preserved by Stobæus, of which, however, Ocellus is disputed to be the author. There is an edition of Ocellus, with a learned commentary, by C. Emman. Vizzanius, Bononiæ, 1646, in 4to.

Lucceius, L. a celebrated historian. He composed histories of the Social war, and of the Civil wars of Sylla, which were so highly esteemed by Cicero, that he urged him, in one of his letters, to undertake a history of his consulship, in which he discovered and suppressed the conspiracy of Catiline. From a subsequent letter to Atticus we learn that Lucceius had promised to accomplish the the task suggested to him. It is probable, however, that it never was completed—his labours having been interrupted by the civil wars, in which he followed the fortunes of Pompey, and was indeed one of his chief advisers in adopting the fatal resolution of quitting Italy. Cic. ad Fam. 5, ep. 12, &c.

Lŭcĕres, a body of horse, composed of Roman knights, established by Romulus and Tatius. It received its name either from Lucumo, an Etrurian, who assisted the Romans against the Sabines, or from lucus, a grove where Romulus had erected an asylum, or a place of refuge for all fugitives, slaves, homicides, &c. that he might people his city. The Luceres were some of these men, and they were incorporated with the legions. Propert. 4. el. 1, v. 31.

Lucianus, a celebrated writer of Samosata. His father was poor in his circumstances, and Lucian was early bound to one of his uncles, who was a sculptor. The employment highly displeased him: he made no proficiency in the art, and resolved to seek his livelihood by better means. He visited different places; and Antioch, Ionia, Greece, Italy, Gaul, and more particularly Athens, became successively acquainted with the depth of his learning and the power of his eloquence. The emperor M. Aurelius was sensible of his merit, and appointed him register to the Roman governor of Egypt. He died A. D. 180, in his 90th year, and some of the moderns have asserted that he was torn to pieces by dogs for his impiety, particularly for ridiculing the religion of Christ. The works of Lucian, which are numerous, and written in the Attic dialect, consist partly of dialogues, in which he introduces different characters, with much dramatic propriety. His style is easy, simple, elegant, and animated; and he has stored his compositions with many lively sentiments, and much of the true Attic wit. He also wrote the life of Sostrates, a philosopher of Bœotia, as also that of the philosopher Demonax. Some have also attributed to him, with great impropriety, the life of Apollonius Thyaneus. The best editions of Lucan are that of Grævius, 2 vols. 8vo. Amst. 1687, and that of Reitzius, 4 vols. 4to. Amst. 1743.

Lucifer. Vid. Part III.

Lucilius, (C.) I. a Roman knight, who was born in the year 605, at Suessa, a town in the Auruncian territory. He was descended of a good family, and was the maternal granduncle of Pompey the Great. In early youth he served at the siege of Numantia, in the same camp with Marius and Jugurtha, under the younger Scipio Africanus, whose friendship and protection he had the good fortune to acquire. On his return to Rome from his Spanish campaign, he dwelt in a house which had been built at the public expense, and had been inhabited by Seleucus Philopater, prince of Syria, whilst he resided in his youth as a hostage at Rome. Lucilius continued to live on terms of the closest intimacy with the brave Scipio and wise Lælius. These powerful protectors enabled him to satirise the vicious without restraint or fear of punishment. In his writings he drew a genuine picture of himself, acknowledged his faults, made a frank confession of his inclinations, gave an account of his adventures, and, in short, exhibited a true and spirited representation of his whole life. Fresh from business or pleasure, he seized his pen while his fancy was yet warm, and his passions still awake,—while elated with success or depressed by disappointment. All these feelings, and the incidents which occasioned them, he faithfully related, and made his remarks on them with the utmost freedom. Unfortunately, however, the writings of Lucilius are so mutilated, that few particulars of his life and manners can be gleaned from them. Little farther is known concerning him, than that he died at Naples, but at what age has been much disputed. Eusebius and most other writers have fixed it at 45, which, as he was born in 605, would be in the 651st year of the city. But M. Dacier and Bayle assert that he must have been much older at the time of his death, as he speaks in his satires of the Licinian law against exhorbitant expenditure at entertainments, which was not promulgated till 657 or 658. Lucilius did not confine himself to invectives on vicious mortals. In the first book of his satires, he appears to have declared war on the false gods of Olympus, whose plurality he denied, and ridiculed the simplicity of the people, who bestowed on an infinity of gods the venerable name of father, which should be reserved for one. Quintil. 10, c. 1.—Cic. de Orat. 2.—Horat.——II. Lucinus, a famous Roman, who fled with Brutus after the battle of Philippi. They were soon after overtaken by a party of horse, and Lucilius suffered himself to be severely wounded by the dart of the enemy, exclaiming that he was Brutus. He was taken and carried to the conquerors, whose clemency spared his life. Plut.

Lucilla, a daughter of M. Aurelius, celebrated for the virtues of her youth, her beauty, debaucheries, and misfortunes. At the age of sixteen her father sent her to Syria to marry the emperor Verus, who was then employed in a war with the Parthians and Armenians. The conjugal virtues of Lucilla were great at first, but when she saw Verus plunge himself into debauchery and dissipation, she followed his example. At her return to Rome she saw the incestuous commerce of her husband with her mother, and at last poisoned him. She afterwards married an old but virtuous senator, by order of her father, and was not ashamed soon to gratify the criminal sensualities of her brother Commodus. The coldness and indifference with which Commodus treated her afterwards determined her on revenge, and she, with many illustrious senators, conspired against his life, A. D. 185. The plot was discovered, Lucilla was banished, and soon after put to death by her brother, in the 38th year of her age.

Lucius, a writer, called by some Saturantius Apuleius. He was born in Africa, on the borders of Numidia. He studied poetry, music, geometry, &c. at Athens, and warmly embraced the tenets of the Platonists. He cultivated magic, and some miracles are attributed to his knowledge of enchantments. He wrote in Greek and Latin, with great ease and simplicity; his style, however, is sometimes affected, though his eloquence was greatly celebrated in his age. Some fragments of his compositions are still extant. He flourished in the reign of M. Aurelius.——The word Lucius is a prænomen common to many Romans, of whom an account is given under their family names.

Lucrētia, a celebrated Roman lady, daughter of Lucretius, and wife of Tarquinius Collatinus. The beauty and innocence of Lucretia inflamed the passions of Sextus, the son of Tarquin. He cherished his flame, and secretly retired from the camp, and came to the house of Lucretia, where he met with a kind reception. In the dead of night he introduced himself to Lucretia, who refused to his entreaties what her fear of shame granted to his threats. She yielded to her ravisher when he threatened to murder her, and to slay one of her slaves and put him in her bed. Lucretia in the morning sent for her husband and her father, and, after she had revealed to them the indignities she had suffered from the son of Tarquin, and entreated them to avenge her wrongs, she stabbed herself with a dagger which she had previously concealed under her clothes. Brutus, who was present at the tragical death of Lucretia, kindled the flames of rebellion, and the republican or consular government was established at Rome, A. U. C. 244. Liv. 1, c. 57, &c.—Dionys. Hal. 4, c. 15.—Ovid. Fast. 2, v. 741.—Val. Max. 6, c. 1.—Plut.—August. de Cic. D. 1, c. 19.

Lucrētius Carus, (T.) I. was the most remarkable of the Roman writers, as he united the precision of the philosopher to the fire and fancy of the poet; and, while he seems to have had no perfect model among the Greeks, has left a production unrivalled, (perhaps not to be rivalled,) by any of the same kind in later ages. Of the life of Lucretius very little is known: he lived at a period abounding with great political actors, and full of portentous events—a period when every bosom was agitated with terror or hope, and when it must have been the chief study of a prudent man, especially if a votary of philosophy and the Muses, to hide himself as much as possible amid the shades. The year of his birth is uncertain. According to the chronicle of Eusebius, he was born in 658, being thus nine years younger than Cicero, and two or three younger than Cæsar. To judge from his style, he might be supposed older than either; but this, as appears from the example of Sallust, is no certain test, as his archaisms may have arisen from the imitation of ancient writers: and we know that he was a fond admirer of Ennius. One of the dearest, perhaps the dearest friend of Lucretius, was Memmius, who had been his school-fellow, and whom, it is supposed he accompanied to Bithynia when appointed to the government of that province. The poem De Rerum Natura, if not undertaken at the request of Memmius, was doubtless much encouraged by him; and Lucretius, in a dedication expressed in terms of manly and elegant courtesy, very different from the servile adulation of some of his great successors, tells him, that the much-desired pleasure of his friendship, was what enabled him to endure any toil or vigil.—

'Sed tua me virtus tamen, et sperata voluptas
Suavis amicitiæ, quemvis efferre laborem
Suadet, et inducit noctes vigilare serenas.'

The life of the poet was short, but happily was sufficiently prolonged to enable him to complete his poem, though, perhaps, not to give some portions of it their last polish. According to Eusebius, he died in the 44th year of his age, by his own hands, in a paroxysm of insanity, produced by a filter, which Lucilia, his wife or mistress, had given him, with no design of depriving him of life or reason, but to renew or increase his passion. Others suppose that his mental alienation proceeded from melancholy, on account of the calamities of his country, and the exile of Memmius—circumstances which were calculated deeply to affect his mind. There seems no reason to doubt the melancholy fact that he perished by his own hand. The poem of Lucretius, De Rerum Natura, which he composed during the lucid intervals of his malady, is, as the name imports, philosophic and didactic in the strictest acceptation of these terms. The poem of Lucretius contains a full exposition of the theological, physical, and moral system of Epicurus. It has been remarked by an able writer, 'that all the religious systems of the ancient Pagan world were naturally perishable, from the quantity of false opinions, and vicious habits and ceremonies that were attached to them.' He observes even of the barbarous Anglo Saxons, that, 'as the nation advanced in its active intellect, it began to be dissatisfied with its mythology. Many indications exist of this spreading alienation, which prepared the northern mind for the reception of the nobler truths of Christianity.' A secret incredulity of this sort seems to have been long nourished in Greece, and appears to have been imported into Rome with its philosophy and literature. The more pure and simple religion of early Rome was quickly corrupted, and the multitude of ideal and heterogeneous beings which superstition introduced into the Roman worship, led to its total rejection. This infidelity is very obvious in the writings of Ennius, who translated Euhemerus's work on the Deification of Human Spirits, while Plautus dramatized the vices of the father of the gods and tutelar deity of Rome. The doctrine of materialism was introduced at Rome during the age of Scipio and Lælius; and perhaps no stronger proof of its rapid progress and prevalence can be given, than that Cæsar, though a priest, and ultimately Pontifex Maximus, boldly proclaimed in the senate, that death is the end of all things, and that beyond it there is neither hope nor joy. This state of the public mind was calculated to give a fashion to the system of Epicurus. According to this distinguished philosopher, the chief good of man is pleasure, of which the elements consist, in having a body free from pain, and a mind tranquil and exempt from perturbation. Of this tranquillity there are, according to Epicurus, as expounded by Lucretius, two chief enemies, superstition, or slavish fear of the gods, and the dread of death. In order to oppose these two foes to happiness, he endeavours, in the first place, to show that the world was formed by a fortuitous concourse of atoms, and that the gods, who, according to the popular theology, were constantly interposing, take no concern whatever in human affairs. We do injustice to Epicurus when we estimate his tenets by the refined and exalted ideas of a philosophy purified by faith, without considering the superstitious and polluted notions prevalent at his time. 'The idea of Epicurus,' as observed by Dr. Drake, 'that it is the nature of gods to enjoy an immortality in the bosom of perpetual peace, infinitely remote from all relations to this globe, free from care, from sorrow, and from pain, supremely happy in themselves, and neither rejoicing in the pleasures, nor concerned for the evils of humanity—though perfectly void of any rational foundation, yet possesses much moral charm when compared with the popular religions of Greece and Rome. The felicity of their deities consisted in the vilest debauchery; nor was there a crime, however deep its die, that had not been committed and gloried in by some one of their numerous objects of worship.' Never, also, could the doctrine, that the gods take no concern in human affairs, appear more plausible than in the age of Lucretius, when the destiny of man seemed to be the sport of the caprice of such a monster as Sylla. With respect to the other great leading tenet of Lucretius and his master—the mortality of the soul—still greater injustice is done to the philosopher and poet. It is affirmed, and justly, by a great Apostle, that life and immortality have been brought to light by the gospel; and yet an author who lived before this dawn is reviled because he asserts, that the natural arguments for the immortality of the soul, afforded by the analogies of nature or principle of moral retribution, are weak and inconclusive! In fact, however, it is not by the truth of the system or general philosophical views in a poem, (for which no one consults it,) that its value is to be estimated; since a poetical work may be highly moral on account of its details, even when its systematic scope is erroneous or apparently dangerous. Notwithstanding passages which seem to echo Spinosism, and almost to justify crime, the Essay on Man is rightly considered as the most moral production of our most moral poet. In like manner, where shall we find exhortations more eloquent than those of Lucretius, against ambition, and cruelty, and luxury, and lust—against all the dishonest pleasures of the body, and all the turbulent passions of the mind. In the whole history of Roman taste and criticism, nothing appears to us so extraordinary as the slight mention that is made of Lucretius by succeeding Latin authors; and, when mentioned, the coldness with which he is spoken of by all Roman critics and poets, with the exception of Ovid. Perhaps the spirit of free-thinking which pervaded his writings, rendered it unsuitable or unsafe to extol even his poetical talents. There was a time, when, in this country, it was thought scarcely decorous or becoming to express high admiration of the genius of Rosseau or Voltaire. Paterc. 2, c. 36.—Quintil. 3, c. 1, l. 10, c. 1.——II. Lucullus, (Lucius Licinius,) I. a Roman celebrated for his fondness of luxury, and for his military talents. He was born about 115 years before the Christian era, and soon distinguished himself by his proficiency in the liberal arts, particularly eloquence and philosophy. His first military campaign was in the Marsian war, where his valour and cool intrepidity recommended him to public notice. His mildness and constancy gained him the admiration and confidence of Sylla, and from this connexion he derived honour, and during his quæstorship in Asia and prætorship in Africa, he rendered himself more conspicuous by his justice, moderation, and humanity. He was raised to the consulship A. U. C. 680, and intrusted with the care of the Mithridatic war, and first displayed his military talents in rescuing his colleague Cota, whom the enemy had besieged in Chalcedonia. This was soon followed by a celebrated victory over the forces of Mithridates, on the borders of the Granicus, and by the conquest of all Bithynia. His victories by sea were as great as those by land, and Mithridates lost a powerful fleet near Lemnos. Such considerable losses weakened the enemy, and Mithridates retired with precipitation towards Armenia, to the court of king Tigranes, his father-in-law. His flight was perceived, and Lucullus crossed the Euphrates with great expedition, and gave battle to the numerous forces which Tigranes had already assembled to support the cause of his son-in-law. According to the exaggerated account of Plutarch, no less than 100,000 foot, and near 55,000 horse of the Armenians, lost their lives in that celebrated battle. All this carnage was made by a Roman army amounting to no more than 18,000 men, of whom only five were killed and 100 wounded during the combat. The taking of Tigranocerta, the capital of Armenia, was the consequence of this immortal victory, and Lucullus there obtained the greatest part of the royal treasures. This continual success, however, was attended with serious consequences. The severity of Lucullus, and the haughtiness of his commands, offended his soldiers, and displeased his adherents at Rome. Pompey was soon after sent to succeed him, and to continue the Mithridatic war; and the interview which he had with Lucullus began with acts of mutual kindness, and ended in the most inveterate reproaches and open enmity. Lucullus was permitted to retire to Rome, and only 1600 of the soldiers who had shared his fortune and his glories were suffered to accompany him. He was received with coldness at Rome, and he obtained with difficulty a triumph, which was deservedly claimed by his fame, his successes, and his victories. In this ended the days of his glory; he retired to the enjoyment of ease and peaceful society, and no longer interested himself in the commotions which disturbed the tranquillity of Rome. He dedicated his time to studious pursuits and to literary conversation. His house was enriched with a valuable library, which was opened for the service of the curious and of the learned. Lucullus fell into a delirium in the last part of his life, and died in the 67th or 68th year of his age. The people showed their respect for his merit by their wish to give him an honourable burial in the Campus Martius; but their offers were rejected, and he was privately buried by his brother in his estate at Tusculum. Lucullus has been admired for his many accomplishments, but he has been censured for his severity and extravagance. The expenses of his meals were immoderate, his halls were distinguished by the different names of the gods; and when Cicero and Pompey attempted to surprise him, they were astonished at the costliness of a supper which had been prepared upon the word of Lucullus, who had merely said to his servants that he would sup in the hall of Apollo. In his retirement, Lucullus was fond of artificial variety; subterraneous caves and passages were dug under the hills on the coast of Campania, and the sea water was conveyed round the house and pleasure-grounds, where the fishes flocked in such abundance that not less than 25,000 pounds worth were sold at his death. In his public character Lucullus was humane and compassionate, and he showed his sense of the vicissitudes of human affairs by shedding tears at the sight of one of the cities of Armenia which his soldiers reduced to ashes. He was a perfect master of the Greek and Latin languages, and he employed himself for some time to write a concise history of the Marsi in Greek hexameters. Such are the striking characteristics of a man who meditated the conquest of Parthia, and for a while gained the admiration of all the inhabitants of the east by his justice and moderation, and who might have disputed the empire of the world with a Cæsar or a Pompey, had not, at last, his fondness for retirement withdrawn him from the reach of ambition. Cic. pro Arch. 4.—*Quæst. LUPERCĀLIA, a yearly festival, observed at Rome the 15th of February, in honour of the god Pan. It was usual first to sacrifice two goats and a dog, and to touch with a bloody knife the foreheads of two illustrious youths, who always were obliged to smile when they were touched. The blood was wiped away with soft wool dipped in milk. After this the skins of the victims were cut in thongs, with which whips were made for the youths. With these whips the youths ran about the streets, all naked except the middle, and whipped freely all those they met. Women, in particular, were fond of receiving the lashes, as they superstitiously believed that they removed barrenness and eased the pains of childbirth. This festival, as Plutarch mentions, was first instituted by the Romans in honour of the she-wolf which suckled Romulus and Remus. This opinion is controverted by others; and Livy, with Dionysius of Halicarnassus, observes that they were introduced into Italy by Evander. The name seems to be borrowed from the Greek name of Pan, Lycæus, from λυκος, a wolf; not only because these ceremonies were, like the Lycæan festivals, observed in Arcadia, but because Pan, as god of the shepherds, protected the sheep from the rapacity of the wolves. The priests who officiated at the Lupercalia were called Luperci. Augustus forbade any person above the age of fourteen to appear naked, or to run about the streets during the Lupercalia. Cicero, in his philipics, reproaches Antony for having disgraced the dignity of the consulship by running naked, and armed with a whip, about the streets. It was during the celebration of these festivals that Antony offered a crown to J. Cæsar, which the indignation of the populace obliged him to refuse. Ovid. Fast. 2, v. 427.—Varro. L. L. 5, c. 3.

LUPERCI, a number of priests at Rome, who assisted at the celebration of the Lupercalia, in honour of the god Pan, to whose service they were dedicated. This order of priests was the most ancient and respectable of all the sacerdotal offices. It was divided into two separate colleges, called Fabiani and Quintiliani, from Fabius and Quintilius, two of their highpriests. The former were instituted in honour of Romulus, and the latter of Remus. To these two sacerdotal bodies, J. Cæsar added a third, called from himself, the Julii, and this action contributed not a little to render his cause unpopular, and to betray his ambitious and aspiring views. *Vid. Lupercalia. Luscius Lavinius, was the contemporary and enemy of Terence, who, in his prologues, has satirised his injudicious translations from the Greek:—

'Qui bene, vertendo et eas describendo male,
Ex Græcis bonis, Latinas fecit non bonas.'

In particular, we learn from the prologue to the Phormio, that he was fond of bringing on the stage frantic youths, committing all those excesses of folly and distraction which are supposed to be produced by violent love. Donatus has afforded us an account of the plot of his Phasma, which was taken from Menander. Part of the old Scotch ballad, the Heir of Linne, has a curious resemblance to the plot of this play of Luscius Lavinius.

Lycæa, festivals in Arcadia, in honour of Pan, the god of shepherds. They are the same as the Lupercalia of the Romans.——A festival at Argos in honour of Apollo Lycæus, who delivered the Argives from wolves, &c.

Lycambes, the father of Neobule. He promised his daughter in marriage to the poet Archilochus, and afterwards refused to fulfil his engagement when she had been courted by a man whose opulence had more influence than the fortune of the poet. This irritated Archilocus; he wrote a bitter invective against Lycambes and his daughter, and rendered them both so desperate by the satire of his composition, that they hanged themselves. Horat. ep. 6, v. 13. —Ovid. in Ib. 52.—*Aristot. Lycophron, I. a son of Periander, king of Corinth. The murder of his mother Melissa, by his father, had such an effect upon him, that he resolved never to speak to a man who had been so wantonly cruel against his relations. This resolution was strengthened by the advice of Procles, his maternal uncle; and Periander at last banished to Corcyra a son whose disobedience and obstinacy had rendered him odious. Cypselus, the eldest son of Periander, being incapable of reigning, Lycophron was the only surviving child who had any claim to the crown of Corinth. But when the infirmities of Periander obliged him to look for his successor, Lycophron refused to come to Corinth while his father was there, and he was induced to leave Corcyra, only on promise that Periander would come and dwell there while he remained master of Corinth. This exchange, however, was prevented. The Corcyreans, who were apprehensive of the tyranny of Periander, murdered Lycophron before he left that island. Herodot. 3.—Aristot.——II. A brother of Thebe, the wife of Alexander, tyrant of Pheræ. He assisted his sister in murdering her husband, and he afterwards seized the sovereignty. He was dispossessed by Philip of Macedonia. Plut.—Diod. 16.——III. A famous Greek poet and grammarian, born at Chalcis in Eubœa. He was one of the poets who flourished under Ptolemy Philadelphus, and who, from their number, obtained the name of Pleiades. Lycophron died by the wound of an arrow. He wrote tragedies, the titles of twenty of which have been preserved. The only remaining composition of this poet is called Cassandra, or Alexandra. It contains 1474 verses, whose obscurity has procured the epithet of Tenebrosus to its author. It is a mixture of prophetical effusions, which, as he supposes, were given by Cassandra during the Trojan war. The best editions of Lycophron, are that of Basil, 1546, fol. enriched with the Greek commentary of Tzetzes; that of Canter, 8vo. apud Commelin, 1596; and that of Potter, fol. Oxon. 1702. Ovid. in Ib. 533.—Stat. 5. Sylv. 3.

Lycoris, a freedwoman of the senator Volumnius, also called Cytheris, and Volumnia, from her master. She was celebrated for her beauty and intrigues. The poet Gallus was greatly enamoured of her, and his friend Virgil comforts him in his 10th eclogue, for the loss of the favours of Cytheris, who followed M. Antony's camp, and was become the Aspasia of Rome. The charms of Cleopatra, however, prevailed over those of Cytheris, and the unfortunate courtesan lost the favours of Antony and of all the world at the same time. Lycoris was originally a comedian. Virg. Ecl. 10.—Ovid. A. A. 3, v. 537.

Lycurgides, annual days of solemnity appointed in honour of the lawgiver of Sparta. ——The patronymic of a son of Lycurgus. Ovid. in Ib. v. 503.

Lycurgus, I. an orator of Athens, surnamed Ibis, in the age of Demosthenes, famous for his justice and impartiality when at the head of the government. He was one of the thirty orators whom the Athenians refused to deliver up to Alexander. Some of his orations are extant. He died about 330 years before Christ. Diod. 16.——II. A celebrated lawgiver of Sparta, son of king Eunomus, and brother to Polydectes.

He succeeded his brother on the Spartan throne; but when he saw that the widow of Polydectes was pregnant, he refused to marry his brother's widow, who wished to strengthen him on his throne by destroying her own son Charilaus, and leaving him in the peaceful possession of the crown. The integrity with which he acted, when guardian of his nephew Charilaus, united with the disappointment and the resentment of the queen, raised him many enemies, and he at last yielded to their satire and malevolence, and retired to Crete; but he returned home at the earnest solicitations of his countrymen. The disorder which reigned at Sparta induced him to reform the government; and the more effectually to execute his undertaking, he had recourse to the oracle of Delphi. He was received by the priestess of the god with every mark of honour, his intentions were warmly approved by the divinity, and he was called the friend of gods, and himself rather god than man. After such a reception from the most celebrated oracle of Greece, Lycurgus found no difficulty in reforming the abuses of the state, and all were equally anxious in promoting a revolution which had received the sanction of heaven. This happened 884 years before the Christian era. Lycurgus first established a senate, which was composed of 28 senators, whose authority preserved the tranquillity of the state, and maintained a due and just equilibrium between the kings and the people, by watching over the intrusions of the former, and checking the seditious convulsions of the latter. All distinction was destroyed; and by making an equal and impartial division of the land among the members of the commonwealth, Lycurgus banished luxury, and encouraged the useful arts. The use of money, either of gold or silver, was forbidden; and the introduction of heavy brass and iron coin brought no temptations to the dishonest, and left every individual in the possession of his effects without any fears of robbery or violence. All the citizens dined in common, and no one had greater claims to indulgence and luxury than another. The intercourse of Sparta with other nations was forbidden, and few were permitted to travel. The youths were intrusted to the public master as soon as they had attained their seventh year, and their education was left to the wisdom of the laws. They were taught early to think, to answer in a short and laconic manner, and to excel in sharp repartee. They were instructed and encouraged to carry things by surprise, but if ever the theft was discovered, they were subjected to a severe punishment. Lycurgus was happy and successful in establishing and enforcing these laws, and by his prudence and administration the face of affairs in Lacedæmon was totally changed, and it gave rise to a set of men distinguished for their intrepidity, their fortitude, and their magnanimity. After this, Lycurgus retired from Sparta to Delphi, or, according to others, to Crete; and before his departure, he bound all the citizens of Lacedæmon by a solemn oath, that neither they nor their posterity would alter, violate, or abolish the laws which he had established before his return. He soon after put himself to death, and he ordered his ashes to be thrown into the sea, fearful lest, if they were carried to Sparta, the citizens should call themselves freed from the oath which they had taken, and empowered to make a revolution. The wisdom and the good effect of the laws of Lycurgus have been firmly demonstrated at Sparta, where, for 700 years, they remained in force; but the legislator has shown himself inhumane in ordering mothers to destroy such of their children whose feebleness or deformity in their youth seemed to promise incapability of action in maturer years, and to become a burden to the state. His regulations about marriage must necessarily be censured, and no true conjugal felicity can be expected from the union of a man with a person whom he perhaps never knew before, and whom he was compelled to choose in a dark room, where all the marriageable women in the state assembled on stated occasions. Lycurgus has been compared to Solon, the celebrated legislator of Athens; and it has been judiciously observed, that the former gave his citizens morals conformable to the laws which he had established, and that the latter had given the Athenians laws which coincided with their customs and manners. The office of Lycurgus demanded resolution, and he showed himself inexorable and severe. In Solon artifice was requisite, and he showed himself mild and even voluptuous. The moderation of Lycurgus is greatly commended, particularly when we recollect that he treated with the greatest humanity and confidence Alcander, a youth who had put out one of his eyes in a seditious tumult. Lycurgus had a son called Antiorus, who left no issue. The Lacedæmonians showed their respect for their great legislator by yearly celebrating a festival in his honour, called Lycurgidæ or Lycurgides. The introduction of money into Sparta, in the reign of Agis, the son of Archidamus, was one of the principal causes which corrupted the innocence of the Lacedæmonians, and rendered them the prey of intrigue and of faction. The laws of Lycurgus were abrogated by Philopœmen, B. C. 188, but only for a little time, as they were soon after re-established by the Romans. Plut. in vitâ.—Justin. 3, c. 2, &c.—Strab. 8, 10, 15, &c.—*Dionys. Lysander, I. a celebrated general of Sparta, in the last years of the Peloponnesian war. He drew Ephesus from the interest of Athens, and gained the friendship of Cyrus the younger. He gave battle to the Athenian fleet, consisting of 120 ships, at Ægospotamos, and destroyed it all, except three ships, with which the enemy's general fled to Evagoras, king of Cyprus. In this celebrated battle, which happened 405 years before the Christian era, the Athenians lost 3000 men, and with them their empire and influence among the neighbouring states. Lysander well knew how to take advantage of his victory, and the following year Athens, worn out by a long war of 27 years, and discouraged by its misfortunes, gave itself up to the power of the enemy, and consented to destroy the Piræus, to deliver up all its ships, except 12, to recall all those who had been banished; and, in short, to be submissive in every degree to the power of Lacedæmon. Besides these humiliating conditions, the government of Athens was totally changed, and 30 tyrants were set over it by Lysander. This glorious success, and the honour of having put an end to the Peloponnesian war, increased the pride of Lysander. He had already begun to pave his way to universal power, by establishing aristocracy in the Grecian cities of Asia, and now he attempted to make the crown of Sparta elective. In the pursuit of his ambition he used prudence and artifice; and as he could not easily abolish a form of government which ages and popularity had confirmed, he had recourse to the assistance of the gods. His attempt, however, to corrupt the oracles of Delphi, Dodona, and Jupiter Ammon, proved ineffectual; and he was even accused of using bribes by the priests of the Libyan temple. The sudden declaration of war against the Thebans saved him from the accusations of his adversaries, and he was sent, together with Pausanias, against the enemy. The plan of his military operations was discovered, and the Haliartians, whose ruin he secretly meditated, attacked him unexpectedly, and he was killed in a bloody battle which ended in the defeat of his troops, 394 years before Christ. His body was recovered by his colleague Pausanias, and honoured with a magnificent funeral. In the midst of all his pomp, his ambition, and intrigues, he died extremely poor, and his daughters were rejected by two opulent citizens of Sparta, to whom they had been betrothed during the life of their father. This behaviour of the lovers was severely punished by the Lacedæmonians, who protected from injury the children of a man whom they hated for his sacrilege, his contempt of religion, and his perfidy. The father of Lysander, whose name was Aristoclites or Aristocrates, was descended from Hercules, though not reckoned of the race of the Heraclidæ. Plut & C. Nep. in vitâ.—Diod. 13.——II. Lysias, a celebrated orator, son of Cephalus, a native of Syracuse. His father left Sicily and went to Athens, where Lysias was born and carefully educated. In his 15th year he accompanied the colony which the Athenians sent to Thurium, and after a long residence there he returned home in his 47th year. He distinguished himself by his eloquence, and by the simplicity, correctness, and purity of his orations, of which he wrote no less than 425, according to Plutarch, though the number may with more probability be reduced to 230. Of these 34 are extant, the best editions of which are that of Taylor, 8vo. Cantab. 1740, and that of Auger, 2 vols. 8vo. Paris, 1783. He died in the 81st year of his age, 378 years before the Christian era. Plut. de Orat.—Cic. de Brut. de Orat.—Quintil. 3, &c.—Diog. 2.

Lysicles, an Athenian, sent with Chares into Bœotia, to stop the conquests of Philip of Macedonia. He was conquered at Chæronæa, and sentenced to death for his ill conduct there.

Lysimachus, 1. a son of Agathocles, among the generals of Alexander. After the death of that monarch, he made himself master of part of Thrace, where he built a town which he called Lysimachia. He sided with Cassander and Seleucus against Antigonus and Demetrius, and fought with them at the celebrated battle of Ipsus. He afterwards siezed Macedonia, after expelling Pyrrhus from the throne, B. C. 286; but his cruelty rendered him odious, and the murder of his son, Agathocles, so offended his subjects, that the most opulent and powerful revolted from him, and abandoned the kingdom. He pursued them to Asia, and declared war against Seleucus, who had given them a kind reception. He was killed in a bloody battle, 281 years before Christ, in the 80th year of his age, and his body was found in the heaps of slain only by the fidelity of a little dog, which had carefully watched near it. It is said that the love and respect of Lysimachus for his learned master Callisthenes proved nearly fatal to him. He, as Justin mentions, was thrown into the den of a hungry lion, by order of Alexander, for having given Callisthenes poison to save his life from ignominy and insult; and when the furious animal darted upon him, he wrapped his hand in his mantle, and boldly thrust it into the lion's mouth, and by twisting his tongue, killed an adversary ready to devour him. This act of courage in his self-defence recommended him to Alexander. He was pardoned, and ever after esteemed by the monarch. Justin. 15, c. 3, &c.—Diod. 10, &c.—Paus. 1, c. 10.——II. An Acarnanian, preceptor to Alexander the Great. He used to call himself Phœnix, his pupil Achilles, and Philip Peleus. Plut. in Alex.—Justin. 15, c. 3.

Lysippus, a famous statuary of Sicyon. He was originally a whitesmith, and afterwards applied himself to painting, till his talents and inclination taught him that he was born to excel in sculpture. He flourished about 326 years before the Christian era, in the age of Alexander the Great. The monarch was so partial to the artist, that he forbade any sculptor but Lysippus to make his statue. Lysippus excelled in expressing the hair, and he was the first who made the head of his statues less large, and the body smaller than usual, that they might appear taller. This was observed by one of his friends, and the artist gave for answer, that his predecessors had represented men in their natural form, but that he represented them such as they appeared. Lysippus made no less than 600 statues, the most admired of which were those of Alexander; one of Apollo of Tarentum, 40 cubits high; one of a man coming out of a bath with which Agrippa adorned his baths; one of Socrates; and those of the 25 horsemen who were drowned in the Granicus. These were so valued that in the age of Augustus they were bought for their weight in gold. Plut. in Alex.—Cic. in Brut. c. 164, ad Her.

Lysistratus, a brother of Lysippus. He was the first artist who ever made a statue with wax. Plin. 34, c. 8, l. 35, c. 12.

M.

Macar, a son of Crinisus or Crinacus, the first Greek who led a colony to Lesbos. His four sons took possession of the four neighbouring islands, Chios, Samos, Cos, and Rhodes, which were called the seats of the Macares or the blessed (μακαρ, beatus.) Dionys. Hal. 1.—*Homer. Macareus, a son of Æolus, who debauched his sister Canace, and had a son by her. The father, being informed of the incest, ordered the child to be exposed, and sent a sword to his daughter, and commanded her to destroy herself. Macareus fled to Delphi, where he became priest of Apollo. Ovid. Met. Heroid. 11, in fi. 563.

Macedonicum Bellum, was undertaken by the Romans against Philip, king of Macedonia, some few months after the second Punic war, B. C. 200. The cause of this war originated in the hostilities which Philip had exercised against the Achæans, the friends and allies of Rome. The consul Flaminius had the care of the war, and he conquered Philip on the confines of Epirus, and afterwards in Thessaly. The Macedonian fleets were also defeated; Eubœa was taken; and Philip, after continual losses, sued for peace, which was granted him in the fourth year of the war. The ambition and cruelty of Persius, the son and successor of Philip, soon irritated the Romans. Another war was undertaken, in which the Romans suffered two defeats. This, however, did not discourage them: Paulus Æmilius was chosen consul in the 60th year of his age, and intrusted with the care of the war. He came to a general engagement near the city of Padua, and 20,000 of the Macedonian soldiers were left on the field of battle. This decisive blow put an end to the war, which had already continued for three years, 168 years before the Christian era. Perseus, and his sons Philip and Alexander were taken prisoners, and carried to Rome to adorn the triumph of the conqueror. About fifteen years after, new seditions were raised in Macedonia, and the false pretensions of Andriscus, who called himself the son of Perseus, obliged the Romans to send an army to quell the commotions. Andriscus at first obtained many considerable advantages over the Roman forces, till at last he was conquered and delivered to the consul Matellus, who carried him to Rome. After these commotions, which are sometimes called the third Macedonian war, Macedonia was finally reduced into a Roman province, and governed by a regular proconsul, about 148 years before the Christian era.

Macedonicus, a surname given to Metellus, from his conquests in Macedonia. It was also given to such as had obtained any victory in that province.

Macer. There appears to have been two poets who bore the name of Macer, during the Augustan age, both of considerable note and both friends of Ovid. The elder, called Æmilius, who was born at Verona, was of greater age than Ovid, though he sometimes condescended to read his works to his youthful friend. These were poems on birds and serpents, and on the virtues of different sorts of herbs. They were written in hexameters, and were chiefly translated from Nicander, a Greek poet of Colophon. Macer also composed a piece, entitled Theriaca, on wild animals, from which Isidorus and others have saved about half a dozen of verses. Nonius Marcellus adds, that he wrote a Theogony, from which he cites a single line. He also published a book on the subject of Bees; but it is not certain whether this work was in prose or in verse. Tibullus inscribed one of his elegies to this Macer, on occasion of his setting out on some military expedition. It would appear that, at his departure from Rome, Macer had boasted that, however deeply he seemed involved in the snares of love, yet his heart was free, and that he now only panted for military fame. But Tibullus addresses Cupid, bids him follow Macer to the field, and threatens, that if he did not bring him back, he would himself desert the service of love, and forget his fondness for the fair, amid the various duties of a soldier. It is probable that Macer never returned from this expedition, since, according to the Eusebian Chronicle, he died in 737, during the consulate of Furnius and Silanus. As his death took place in that year, he must be a different poet from the Macer to whom Ovid addressed one of his epistles from Pontus, which was not written till after his banishment to that country, in 762. With this second Macer Ovid had travelled in his youth through the different cities of Asia and Sicily:—

Te duce magnificas Asiæ perspeximus urbes;
Trinacris est oculis te duce nota meis.

Macer was the author of one of those numerous poems on the Trojan war, which went under the name of Homeri Paralipomena.

Te canis æterno quicquid restabat Homero,
Ne careant summâ Troica bella manu.

In this poem he followed the historic order of events, beginning with the departure of the expedition from Greeee, and ending with the commencement of the wrath of Achilles—interminglingling with the heroic part of the composition a great number of love adventures, as those of Paris and Helen, of Protesilaus and Laodamia, which occurred previous to the siege of Troy, or immediately after its commencement. Ovid. Trist, 4, el. 10, v. 44. ex Pont. 2, ep. 10.—Quintil. 10, c. 1.——L. Claudius, a pro-prætor of Africa in the reign of Nero. He assumed the title of emperor, and was put to death by order of Galba.

Machon. Vid. Part III.

Macrianus, (Titus Fulvius Julius), an Egyptian of obscure birth, who, from a private soldier, rose to the highest command in the army, and proclaimed himself emperor when Valerian had been made prisoner by the Persians, A. D. 260. When he had supported his dignity for a year in the eastern parts of the world, Macrianus marched towards Rome, to crush Gallienus, who had been proclaimed emperor. He was defeated in Illyricum by the lieutenant of Gallienus, and put to death with his son, at his own request, A. D. 262.

Macrinus, (M. Opilius Severus,) a native of Africa, who rose from the most ignominious condition to the rank of præfect of the prætorian guards, and at last of emperor, after the death of Caracalla, whom he sacrificed to his ambition, A. D. 217. The beginning of his reign was popular; the abolition of the taxes, and an affable and complaisant behaviour endeared him to his subjects. These promising appearances did not long continue, and the timidity which Macrinus betrayed in buying the peace of the Persians by a large sum of money, soon rendered him odious. Heliogabalus was proclaimed emperor, and Macrinus attempted to save his life by flight. He was, however, seized in Cappadocia, and his head was cut off and sent to his successor, June 7th, A. D. 218. Macrinus reigned about two months and three days. His son, called Diadumenianus, shared his father's fate.

Macro, a favourite of the emperor Tiberius, celebrated for his intrigues, perfidy, and cruelty. He destroyed Sejanus, and raised himself upon the ruins of that unfortunate favourite. He was accessary to the murder of Tiberius, and conciliated the good opinion of Caligula, by prostituting to him his own wife, called Ennia. He soon after became unpopular, and was obliged by Caligula to kill himself, together with his wife, A. D. 38.

Macrobius, a Latin writer, who died A. D. 415. Some suppose that he was chamberlain to the emperor Theodosius II. but this appears groundless, when we observe that Macrobius was a follower of paganism, and that none were admitted to the confidence of the emperor, or to the enjoyment of high stations, except such as were of the Christian religion. Macrobius has rendered himself famous for a composition called Saturnalia; a miscellaneous collection of antiquities and criticisms, supposed to have been the result of a conversation of some of the learned Romans, during the celebration of the Saturnalia. This was written for the use of his son, and the bad latinity which the author has often introduced, proves that he was not born in a part of the Roman empire where the Latin tongue was spoken, as he himself candidly confesses. The Saturnalia are useful for the learned reflections they contain, and particularly for some curious observations on the two greatest epic poets of antiquity. Besides this, Macrobius wrote a commentary on Cicero's somnium Scipionis, which is likewise composed for the improvement of the author's son, and dedicated to him. The best editions are that of Gronovius, 8vo. L. Bat. 1670, and that of Lips. 8vo. 1777.

Madetes, a general of Darius, who bravely defended a place against Alexander. The conqueror resolved to put him to death, though thirty orators pleaded for his life. Sisygambis prevailed over the almost inexorable Alexander, and Madetes was pardoned. Curt. 5, c. 3.

Madyes, a Scythian prince who pursued the Cimmerians in Asia, and conquered Cyaxares, B. C. 633. He held for some time the supreme power of Asia Minor. Herodot. 8, c. 103.

Mæmacteria, sacrifices offered to Jupiter at Athens in the winter month Mæmacterion.

Mæonides, a surname of Homer. Ovid.

Mævius, a poet of inferior note in the Augustan age, who made himself known by his illiberal attacks on the character of the first writers of his time, as well as by his affected compositions. His name would have sunk in oblivion if Virgil had not ridiculed him in his third eclogue, and Horace in his 10th epode.

Magi, a religious sect among the eastern nations of the world, and particularly in Persia. They had great influence in the political, as well as religious affairs of the state, and a monarch seldom ascended the throne without their previous approbation. Zoroaster was founder of their sect. They paid particular homage to fire, which they deemed a deity, as pure in itself, and the purifier of all things. In their religious tenets they had two principles, one good, the source of every thing good; and the other evil, from whence sprung all manner of ills. Their professional skill in the mathematics and philosophy rendered every thing familiar to them, and from their knowledge of the phenomena of the heavens, the word Magi was applied to all learned men; and in process of time, the Magi, from their experience and profession, were confounded with the magicians who impose upon the superstitious and credulous. Hence the word Magi and magicians became synonymous among the vulgar. Smerdis, one of the Magi, usurped the crown of Persia after the death of Cambyses, and the fraud was not discovered till the seven noble Persians conspired against the usurper, and elected Darius king. From this circumstance there was a certain day on which none of the Magi were permitted to appear in public, as the populace had the privilege of murdering whomsoever of them they met. Strab. —Cic. de Div. 1.——Herodot. 3, c. 62, &c.

Magnentius, an ambitious Roman, who distinguished himself by his cruelty and perfidy. He conspired against the life of Constans, and murdered him in his bed. This cruelty was highly resented by Constantius; and the assassin, unable to escape from the fury of his antagonist, murdered his own mother and the rest of his relations, and afterwards killed himself by falling upon a sword which he had thrust against a wall. He was the first of the followers of Christianity who ever murdered his lawful sovereign, A. D. 353.

Magnes, the Athenian, was of the same age as Chionides. All his comedies have perished; but such of their titles as are preserved confirm the opinion that the materials of Athenian comedy were derived from other sources than mythology. The plays of Magnes were probably much of the same nature with those of Aristophanes. Indeed two of them, the Βάτραχοι and the Ὄρνιθες, had the very titles which are borne by two of the surviving dramas of the latter poet. Magnes, whilst in his prime, was an active and popular writer, full of wit and invention; but in his old age he fell into disrepute: his services were forgotten by an ungrateful audience, and he was left to die in neglect and obscurity.

Mago, I. a Carthaginian general, sent against Dionysius tyrant of Sicily. He obtained a victory, and granted peace to the conquered. In a battle, which soon after followed this treaty of peace, Mago was killed. His son of the same name succeeded to the command of the Carthaginian army, but he disgraced himself by flying at the approach of Timoleon, who had come to assist the Syracusans. He was accused in the Carthaginian senate, and he prevented by suicide the execution of the sentence justly pronounced against him. His body was hung on a gibbet, and exposed to public ignominy.——II. A brother of Annibal the Great. He was present at the battle of Cannæ, and was deputed by his brother to carry to Carthage the news of the celebrated victory which had been obtained over the Roman armies. His arrival at Carthage was unexpected; and, more powerfully to astonish his countrymen, on account of the victory at Cannæ, he emptied in the senate-house the three bushels of golden rings which had been taken from the Roman knights slain in battle. He was afterwards sent to Spain, where he defeated the two Scipios, and was himself, in another engagement, totally ruined. He retired to the Beleares, which he conquered; and one of the cities there still bears his name, and is called Portus Magonis, Port Mahon. After this, he landed in Italy with an army, and took possession of part of Insubria. He was defeated in a battle by Quintilius Varus, and died of a mortal wound, 203 years before the Christian era. Liv. 30, &c.—C. Nep. in Ann. 8, gives a very different account of his death, and says he either perished in a shipwreck or was murdered by his servants. Perhaps Annibal had two brothers of that name. ——III. A. Carthaginian, more known by the excellence of his writings than by his military exploits. He wrote 28 volumes upon husbandry; these were preserved by Scipio at the taking of Carthage, and presented to the Roman senate. They were translated into Greek by Cassius Dionysius of Utica, and into Latin by order of the Roman senate, though Cato had already written so copiously upon the subject; and the Romans, as it has been observed, consulted the writings of Mago with greater earnestness than the books of the Sibylline verses. Columella.——IV. A Carthaginian, sent by his countrymen to assist the Romans against Pyrrhus and the Tarentines, with a fleet of 120 sail. This offer was politely refused by the Roman senate. This Mago was father of Asdrubal and Hamilcar. Val. Max.

Maherbal, a Carthaginian, who was at the siege of Saguntum, and who commanded the cavalry of Annibal at the battle of Cannæ. He advised the conqueror immediately to march to Rome, but Annibal required time to consider on so bold a measure; upon which Maherbal observed, that Annibal knew how to conquer, but not how to make a proper use of victory.

Majorianus, Jul. (Valerius,) an emperor of the western Roman empire, raised to the imperial throne A. D. 457. He signalized himself by his private as well as public virtues. He was massacred, after a reign of 37 years, by one of his generals.

Mamercus, a tyrant of Catana, who surrendered to Timoleon. His attempts to speak in a public assembly at Syracuse were received with groans and hisses; upon which he dashed his head against a wall, and endeavoured to destroy himself. The blows were not fatal, and Mamercus was soon after put to death as a robber, B. C. 340. Polyæn. 5.—C. Nep. in. Tim.

Mamertini, a mercenary band of soldiers, which passed from Campania into Sicily at the request of Agathocles. When they were in the service of Agathocles, they claimed the privilege of voting at the election of magistrates at Syracuse, and were ordered to leave Sicily. In their way to the coast, they were received with great kindness by the people of Messana, and soon returned perfidy for hospitality. They murdered all the males in the city, and rendered themselves masters of the place. After this violence, they assumed the name of Mamertini, and called their city Mamertina, from a provincial word, which, in their language, signified Martial or warlike. The Mamertines were afterwards defeated by Hiero, and totally disabled to repair their ruined affairs. Plut. in Pyrrh. &c.

Mamilia Lex, de limitibus, by the tribune Mamilius. It ordained that in the boundaries of the lands, five or six feet of land should be left uncultivated, which no person could convert into private property. It also appointed commissioners to see it carried into execution.

Mamilii, a plebeian family at Rome, descended from the Aborigines. They first lived at Tusculum, from whence they came to Rome. Liv. 3, c. 29.

Mamurius Veturius. Vid. Ancile, Part III.

Mamurra, a Roman knight, born at Formiæ. He followed the fortune of J. Cæsar in Gaul, where he greatly enriched himself. He built a magnificent palace on mount Cœlius, and was the first who incrusted his walls with marble. Catullus has attacked him in his epigrams. Formiæ is sometimes called Mamurrarum urbs. Plin. 36, c. 6.

Mancinus, C. a Roman general, who, though at the head of an army of 30,000 men, was defeated by 4000 Numantians, B. C. 138. He was dragged from the senate, &c. Cic. in Orat. 1, c. 40.

Mandane, a daughter of king Astyages, married by her father to Cambyses, an ignoble person of Persia. Vid. Cyrus.

Mandanes, an Indian prince and philosopher, whom Alexander invited by his ambassadors, on pain of death, to come to his banquet, as being the son of Jupiter. The philosopher ridiculed the threats and promises of Alexander, &c. Strab. 15.

Mandubratius, a young Briton, who came over to Cæsar in Gaul. His father, Immanuentius, was king in Britain, and had been put to death by order of Cassivelaunus. Cæs. Bell. G. 5, c. 20.

Manetho, a celebrated priest of Heliopolis in Egypt, surnamed the Mendesian, B. C. 261. He wrote in Greek a history of Egypt, which has been often quoted and commended by the ancients, particularly by Josephus. It was chiefly collected from the writings of Mercury, and from the journals and annals which were preserved in the Egyptian temples. This history has been greatly corrupted by the Greeks. The author supported that all the gods of the Egyptians had been mere mortals, and had all lived upon earth. This history, which is now lost, had been epitomised, and some fragments of it are still extant. There is extant a Greek poem ascribed to Manetho, in which the power of the stars, which preside over the birth and fate of mankind, is explained. The Apotelesmata of this author were edited in 4to. by Gronovius, L. Bat. 1698.

Manilia Lex, by Manilius the tribune, A. U. C. 678. It required that all the forces of Lucullus and his province, together with Bithynia, which was then under the command of Glabrio, should be delivered to Pompey, and that this general should, without any delay, declare war against Mithridates, and still retain the command of the Roman fleet, and the empire of the Mediterranean, as before.

Manilius, I. a Roman who married the daughter of Tarquin. He lived at Tusculum, and received his father-in-law in his house when banished from Rome, &c. Liv. 2, c. 15. ——II. Caius, a celebrated mathematician and poet of Antioch, who wrote a poetical treatise on astronomy, of which five books are extant, treating of the fixed stars. The style is not elegant. The age in which he lived is not known, though some suppose that he flourished in the Augustan age. No author, however, in the age of Augustus, has made mention of Manilius. The best editions of Manilius are those of Bentley, 4to. London, 1739, and Stoeberus, 8vo. Argentor, 1767.

Manlius Torquatus, I. a celebrated Roman, whose youth was distinguished by a lively and cheerful disposition. These promising talents were, however, impeded by a difficulty of speaking; and the father, unwilling to expose his son's rusticity at Rome, detained him in the country. The behaviour of the father was publicly censured, and Marius Pomponius the tribune cited him to answer for his unfatherly behaviour to his son. Young Manlius was informed of this, and with a dagger in his hand he entered the house of the tribune, and made him solemnly promise that he would drop the accusation. This action of Manlius endeared him to the people, and soon after he was chosen military tribune. In a war against the Gauls he accepted the challenge of one of the enemy, whose gigantic stature and ponderous arms had rendered him terrible and almost invincible in the eyes of the Romans. The Gaul was conquered, and Manlius stripped him of his arms; and, from the collar (torquis) which he took from the enemy's neck, he was ever after surnamed Torquatus. Manlius was the first Roman who was raised to the dictatorship without having been previously consul. The severity of Torquatus to his son has been deservedly censured. This father had the courage and heart to put to death his son, because he had engaged one of the enemy, and obtained an honourable victory, without his previous permission. This uncommon rigour displeased many of the Romans; and though Torquatus was honoured with a triumph, and commended by the senate for his services, yet the Roman youth showed their disapprobation of the consul's severity by refusing him at his return the homage which every other conqueror received. Some time after, the censorship was offered to him; but he refused it, observing, that the people could not bear his severity nor he the vices of the people. From the rigour of Torquatus, all edicts, and actions of severity and justice have been called Manliana edicta. Liv. 7, c. 10.—Val. Max. 6, c. 9.——II. Marcus, a celebrated Roman, whose valour was displayed in the field of battle, even at the early age of sixteen. When Rome was taken by the Gauls, Manlius, with a body of his countrymen, fled into the capitol, which he defended when it was suddenly surprised in the night by the enemy. This action gained him the surname of Capitolinus; and the geese, which by their clamour had awakened him to arm himself in his own defence, were ever after held sacred among the Romans. A law which Manlius proposed, to abolish the taxes on the common people, raised the senators against him. The dictator, Corn. Cossus, seized him as a rebel, but the people put on mourning, and delivered from prison their common father. This did not in the least check his ambition; he continued to raise factions, and even secretly to attempt to make himself absolute, till at last the tribunes of the people themselves became his accusers. He was tried in the Campus Martius; but when the distant view of the capitol which Manlius had saved, seemed to influence the people in his favour, the court of justice was removed, and Manlius was condemned. He was thrown down from the Tarpeian rock, A. U. C. 371; and, to render his ignominy still greater, none of his family were afterwards permitted to bear the surname of Marcus, and the place where his house had stood was deemed unworthy to be inhabited. Liv. 5, c. 31, l. 6, c. 5.—Flor. 1, c. 13 and 26.—Val. Max. 6, c. 3.—Virg. Æn. 6, v. 825.——III. Imperiosus, father of Manlius Torquatus, was made dictator. Vid. Manlius Torquatus.——IV. Volso, a Roman consul, who received an army of Scipio in Asia, and made war against the Gallo-Grecians, whom he conquered. He was honoured with a triumph at his return, though it was at first strongly opposed. Flor. 3, c. 11.—Liv. 38, c. 12, &c.—— V. Caius, or Aulus, a senator sent to Athens to collect the best and wisest laws of Solon, A. U. C. 300.—Liv. 2, c. 54, l. 3, c. 31.——VI. Another in whose consulship the temple of Janus was shut.——VII. a Roman appointed judge between his son Silanus and the province of Macedonia. When all the parties had been heard, the father said: "It is evident that my son has suffered himself to be bribed, therefore I deem him unworthy of the republic and of my house, and I order him to depart from my presence." Silanus was so struck at the rigour of his father, that he hanged himself. Val. Max. 5, c. 5.

Mansuetus, J. a friend of Vitellius, who entered the Roman armies, and left his son, then very young, at home. The son was promoted by Galba, and soon after met a detachment of the partisans of Vitellius in which his father was. A battle was fought, and Mansuetus was wounded by the hand of his son, &c. Tacit. Hist. 3, c. 25.

Marcellinus Ammianus, a celebrated historian, who carried arms under Constantius. Julian, and Valens, and wrote a history of Rome from the reign of Domitian, where Suetonius stops, to the emperor Valens. His style is neither elegant nor laboured, but it is greatly valued for its veracity, and in many of the actions he mentions the author was nearly concerned. This history was composed at Rome, where Ammianus retired from the noise and troubles of the camp, and does not betray that severity against the Christians which other writers have manifested, though the author was warm in favour of Paganism, the religion which for a while was seated on the throne. It was divided into thirty-one books, of which only the eighteen last remain, beginning at the death of Magnentius. The best editions of Ammianus are those of Gronovius, fol. and 4to. L. Bat. 1693, and of Ernesti, 8vo. Lips. 1773.

MARCELLUS, I. (Marcus Claudius,) a famous Roman general, who, after the first Punic war, had the management of an expedition against the Gauls, where he obtained the Spolia opima, by killing with his own hand Veridomarus, the king of the enemy. Such success rendered him popular, and soon after he was intrusted to oppose Annibal in Italy. He was the first Roman who obtained some advantage over this celebrated Carthaginian, and showed his countrymen that Annibal was not invincible. The troubles which were raised in Sicily by the Carthaginians at the death of Hieronymus, alarmed the Romans, and Marcellus, in his third consulship, was sent with a powerful force against Syracuse. He attacked it by sea and land, but his operations proved ineffectual, and the invention and industry of a philosopher, vid. Archimedes, were able to baffle all the efforts, and to destroy all the great and stupendous machines and military engines of the Romans during three successive years. The perseverance of Marcellus at last obtained the victory. The inattention of the inhabitants during their nocturnal celebration of the festivals of Diana, favoured his operations; he forcibly entered the town, and made himself master of it. The conqueror enriched the capital of Italy with the spoils of Syracuse, and when he was accused of rapaciousness, for stripping the conquered city of all its paintings and ornaments, he confessed that he had done it to adorn the public buildings of Rome, and to introduce a taste for the fine arts and elegance of the Greeks among his countrymen. After the conquest of Syracuse, Marcellus was called upon by his country to oppose a second time Annibal. In this campaign he behaved with greater vigour than before; the greatest part of the towns of the Samnites, which had revolted, were recovered by force of arms, and 3000 of the soldiers of Annibal made prisoners. Some time after, an engagement with the Carthaginian general proved unfavourable; Marcellus had the disadvantage; but on the morrow a more successful skirmish vindicated his military character, and the honour of the Roman soldiers. Marcellus, however, was not sufficiently vigilant against the snares of his adversary. He imprudently separated himself from his camp, and was killed in an ambuscade, in the 60th year of his age, in his fifth consulship, A. U. C. 546. His body was honoured with a magnificent funeral by the conqueror, and his ashes were conveyed in a silver urn to his son. Marcellus claims our commendation for his private as well as public virtues; and the humanity of a general will ever be remembered, who, at the surrender of Syracuse, wept at the thought that many were going to be exposed to the avarice and rapaciousness of an incensed soldiery, which the policy of Rome and the laws of war rendered inevitable. *Virg. One of his descendants, who bore the same name, signalized himself in the civil wars of Cæsar and Pompey, by his firm attachment to the latter. He was banished by Cæsar, but afterwards recalled at the request of the senate. Cicero undertook his defence in an oration which is still extant.——III. The grandson of Pompey's friend, rendered himself popular by his universal benevolence and affability. He was son of Marcellus by Octavia the sister of Augustus. He married Julia, that emperor's daughter, and was publicly intended as his successor. Vid. Octavia. Marcellus was buried at the public expense. *Virg. The son of the great Marcellus who took Syracuse, was caught in the ambuscade which proved fatal to his father, but he forced his way from the enemy and escaped. He received the ashes of his father from the conqueror. Plut. in Marcell.

MARCIA LEX, by Marcius Censorinus. It forbade any man to be invested with the office of censor more than once.

MARCIA, I. the wife of Regulus. When she heard that her husband had been put to death at Carthage in the most excruciating manner, she retorted the punishment, and shut up some Carthaginian prisoners in a barrel, which she had previously filled with sharp nails. The senate was obliged to stop her wantonness and cruelty. Diod. 24.——II. A daughter of Cato of Utica.

MARCIÂNA, a sister of the emperor Trajan, who, on account of her public and private virtues, and her amiable disposition, was declared Augustus and empress by her brother. She died A. D. 113.

MARCIÂNUS, I. a native of Thrace, born of an obscure family. After he had for some time served in the army as a common soldier, he was made private secretary to one of the officers of Theodosius. His winning address and uncommon talents raised him to higher stations; and on the death of Theodosius the 2d, A. D. 450, he was invested with the imperial purple in the east. The subjects of the Roman empire had reason to be satisfied with their choice. Marcianus showed himself active and resolute; and when Attila, the barbarous king of the Huns, asked of the emperor the annual tribute which the indolence and cowardice of his predecessors had regularly paid, the successor of Theodosius firmly said, that he kept his gold for his friends, but that iron was the metal which he had prepared for his enemies. In the midst of universal popularity, Marcianus died, after a reign of six years, in the 69th year of his age, as he was making warlike preparations against the barbarians that had invaded Africa. His death was lamented, and indeed his merit was great, since his reign has been distinguished by the appellation of the golden age. Marcianus married Pulcheria, the sister of his predecessor. It is said that in the years of his obscurity he found a man who had been murdered, and that he had the humanity to give him a private burial; for which circumstance he was accused of the homicide and imprisoned. He was condemned to lose his life, and the sentence would have been executed, had not the real murderer been discovered, and convinced the world of the innocence of Marcianus.——II. Capella. Vid. Capella.

Marcius Sabinus, (M.) I. was the progenitor of the Marcian family at Rome. He came to Rome with Numa, and it was he who advised Numa to accept of the crown which the Romans offered to him. He attempted to make himself king of Rome in opposition to Tullus Hostilius, and when his efforts proved unsuccessful, he killed himself. His son, who married a daughter of Numa, was made highpriest by his father-in-law. He was father of Ancus Martius. Plut. in Numa.——II. A man whom Catiline hired to assassinate Cicero.

Mardonius, a general of Xerxes, who, after the defeat of his master at Thermopylæ and Salamis, was left in Greece with an army of 300,000 chosen men, to subdue the country and reduce it under the power of Persia. In a battle at Platæa, Mardonius was defeated and left among the slain, B. C. 479. He had been commander of the armies of Darius in Europe, and it was chiefly by his advice that Xerxes invaded Greece. He was son-in-law of Darius. Plut. in Arist.—Herodot. 6, 7 and 8.—Diod. 11.—Justin. 2, c. 13, &c.

Margites, a man against whom, as some suppose, Homer wrote a poem, to ridicule his superficial knowledge, and to expose his affectation. When Demosthenes wished to prove Alexander an inveterate enemy to Athens, he called him another Margites.

Maria Lex, by C. Marius, the tribune, A. U. C. 634. It ordered the planks called pontes, on which the people stood up to give their votes in the comitia, to be narrower, that no other might stand there to hinder the proceedings of the assembly.——Another, called also Porcia, by L. Marius and Porcius, tribunes, A. U. C. 691. It fined a certain sum of money such commanders as gave a false account to the Roman senate of the number of slain in a battle.

Mariamna, a Jewish woman, who married Herodes.

Marius, (C.) I. a celebrated Roman, who, from a peasant became one of the most powerful and cruel tyrants that Rome ever beheld during her consular government. He was born at Arpinum, of obscure and illiterate parents. His father bore the same name as himself, and his mother was called Fulcinia. He forsook the meaner occupations of the country for the camp, and signalized himself under Scipio at the siege of Numantia. His marriage with Julia, who was of the family of the Cæsars, contributed in some measure to raise him to consequence. He passed into Africa as lieutenant to the consul Metellus against Jugurtha, and, after he had there ingratiated himself with the soldiers, and raised enemies to his friend and benefactor, he returned to Rome, and canvassed for the consulship. He was elected, and appointed to finish the war against Jugurtha. No sooner was Jugurtha conquered than new honours and fresh trophies awaited Marius. The provinces of Rome were suddenly invaded by an army of 300,000 barbarians, and Marius was sent against the Teutones. The war was prolonged, and Marius was a third and fourth time invested with the consulship. At last two engagements were fought, and not less than 200,000 of the barbarian forces of the Ambrones and Teutones were slain in the field of battle, and 90,000 made prisoners. The following year was also marked by a total overthrow of the Cimbri, another horde of barbarians, in which 140,000 were slaughtered by the Romans and 60,000 taken prisoners. After such honourable victories, Marius, with his colleague Catulus, entered Rome in triumph; and, for his eminent services, he received the appellation of the third founder of Rome. He was elected consul a sixth time; and, as his intrepidity had delivered his country from its foreign enemies, he sought employment at home; and his restless ambition began to raise seditions and to oppose the power of Sylla. This was the cause and the foundation of a civil war. Sylla refused to deliver up the command of the forces with which he was empowered to prosecute the Mithridatic war, and he resolved to oppose the authors of a demand which he considered as arbitrary and improper. He advanced to Rome, and Marius was obliged to save his life by flight. The unfavourable winds prevented him from seeking a safer retreat in Africa, and he was left on the coast of Campania, where the emissaries of his enemy soon discovered him in a marsh, where he had plunged himself into the mud, and left only his mouth above the surface for respiration. He was violently dragged to the neighbouring town of Minturnæ; and the magistrates, all devoted to the interest of Sylla, passed sentence of immediate death on their magnanimous prisoner. A Gaul was commanded to cut off his head in the dungeon, but the stern countenance of Marius disarmed the courage of the executioner, and when he heard the exclamation of Tune homo, audes occidere Caium Marium, the dagger dropped from his hand. Such an uncommon adventure awakened the compassion of the inhabitants of Minturnæ. They released Marius from prison, and favoured his escape to Africa, where he joined his son Marius, who had been arming the princes of the country in his cause. Marius landed near the walls of Carthage, and he received no small consolation at the sight of the venerable ruins of a once powerful city, which, like himself, had been exposed to calamity, and felt the cruel vicissitude of fortune. He soon after learned that Cinna had embraced his cause at Rome. This intelligence animated Marius; he set sail to assist his friend, only at the head of a thousand men. His army, however, gradually increased, and he entered Rome like a conqueror. His enemies were inhumanly sacrificed to his fury. Rome was filled with blood, and he who had once been called the father of his country, marched through the streets of the city, attended by a number of assassins, who immediately slaughtered all those whose salutations were not answered by their leader. Such were the signals for bloodshed. When Marius and Cinna had sufficiently gratified their resentment, they made themselves consuls; but Marius, already worn out with old age and infirmities, died sixteen days after he had been honoured with the consular dignity for the seventh time, B. C. 86. His end was probably hastened by the uncommon quantity of wine which he drank when labouring under a dangerous disease. Such was the end of Marius, who rendered himself conspicuous by his victories and by his cruelty. As he was brought up in the midst of poverty and among peasants, it will not appear wonderful that he always betrayed rusticity in his behaviour, and despised in others those polished manners and that studied address which education had denied him. His countenance was stern, his voice firm and imperious, and his disposition untractable. He was in the 70th year of his age when he died, and Rome seemed to rejoice in the fall of a man whose ambition had proved fatal to so many of her citizens. His only qualifications were those of a great general, and with these he rendered himself the most illustrious and powerful of the Romans, because he was the only one whose ferocity seemed capable to oppose the barbarians of the north. Plut. in vitâ.—Palerc. 2, c. 9.—Flor. 3, c. 3.—Juv. 8, v. 245, &c.—Lucan. 2, v. 69.——II. Caius, the son of the great Marius, was as cruel as his father, and shared his good and his adverse fortune. He made himself consul in the 25th year of his age, and murdered all the senators who opposed his ambitious views. He was defeated by Sylla, and fled to Prænestе, where he killed himself. Plut. in Mario.——III. One of the Greek fathers of the 5th century, whose works were edited by Garner, 2 vols. fol. Paris, 1673; and Baluzius, ib. 1684.——IV. M. Aurelius, a native of Gaul, who, from the mean employment of a blacksmith, became one of the generals of Gallienus, and at last caused himself to be saluted emperor. Three days after this elevation, a man who had shared his poverty without partaking of his more prosperous fortune, publicly assassinated him, and he was killed by a sword which he himself had made in the time of his obscurity. Marius has been often celebrated for his great strength; and it is confidently reported that he could stop, with one of his fingers only, the wheel of a chariot in its most rapid course.——V. Maximus, a Latin writer, who published an account of the Roman emperors from Trajan to Alexander, now lost. His compositions were entertaining, and executed with great exactness and fidelity.

Martha, a celebrated prophetess of Syria, whose artifice and fraud proved of the greatest service to C. Marius, in the numerous expeditions he undertook. Plut. in Mario.

Martialis, (Marcus Valerius,) a native of Bilbilis in Spain, who came to Rome about the 20th year of his age, where he recommended himself to notice by his poetical genius. Domitian gave him the tribuneship; but the poet, unmindful of the favours he received, after the death of his benefactor, exposed to ridicule the vices and cruelties of a monster whom, in his lifetime, he had extolled as the pattern of virtue, goodness, and excellence. Trajan treated the poet with coldness; and Martial, after he had passed thirty-five years in the capital of the world, in the greatest splendour and affluence, retired to his native country, where he had the mortification to be the object of malevolence, satire, and ridicule. He received some favors from his friends, and his poverty was alleviated by the liberality of Pliny the younger, whom he had panegyrized in his poems. Martial died about the 104th year of the Christian era, in the 75th year of his age He is now well known by the fourteen books of epigrams which he wrote, and whose merit is now best described by the candid confession of the author in this line:—

Sunt bona, sunt quædam mediocria, sunt mala plura.

It has been observed of Martial that his talent was epigrams. Every thing he did was the subject of an epigram. The best editions of Martial are those of Rader, fol. Mogunt, 1627, of Schriverius, 12mo. L. Bat. 1619, and of Smids, 8vo. Amst. 1701.

Marullus, I. a tribune of the people, who tore the garlands which had been placed upon Cæsar's statues, and who ordered those that had saluted him king to be imprisoned. He was deprived of his consulship by J. Cæsar. Plut.——II. A Latin poet in the reign of M. Aurelius. He satirised the emperor with great licentiousness, but his invectives were disregarded and himself despised.

Masinissa, son of Gala, was king of a small part of Africa, and assisted the Carthaginians in their wars against Rome. He proved a most indefatigable and courageous ally, but an act of generosity converted him to the interests of Rome. After the defeat of Asdrubal, Scipio, the first Africanus who had obtained the victory, found, among the prisoners of war, one of the nephews of Masinissa. He sent him back to his uncle, loaded with presents, and conducted him with a detachment for the safety and protection of his person. Masinissa was struck with the generous action of the Roman general, he forgot all former hostilities, and joined his troops to those of Scipio. It was to his exertions they owed many of their victories in Africa, and particularly in that battle which proved fatal to Asdrubal and Syphax. The Numidian conqueror, charmed with the beauty of Sophonisba, the captive wife of Syphax, carried her to his camp, and married her; but when he perceived that this new connexion displeased Scipio, he sent poison to his wife, and recommended her to destroy herself, since he could not preserve her life in a manner which became her rank, her dignity, and fortune, without offending his Roman allies. In the battle of Zama, Masinissa greatly contributed to the defeat of the great Annibal; and the Romans, who had so often been spectators of his courage and valour, rewarded his fidelity with the kingdom of Syphax and some of the Carthaginian territories. Masinissa died in the 97th year of his age, after a reign of above sixty years, 149 years before the Christian era. In the last years of his life he was seen at the head of his armies, behaving with the most indefatigable activity; and he often remained for many successive days on horseback, without a saddle under him or a covering upon his head, and without showing the least marks of fatigue. This strength of mind and body he chiefly owed to the temperance which he observed. He was seen eating brown bread at the door of his tent, like a private soldier, the day after he had obtained an immortal victory over the armies of Carthage. He left fifty-four sons, three of whom were legitimate, Micipsa, Gulussa, and Manastabal. The kingdom was fairly divided among them by Scipio, and the illegitimate children received, as their portions, very valuable presents. The death of Gulussa and Manastabal soon after left Micipsa sole master of the large possessions of Masinissa. Strab. 17.—Polyb.—Appian. Lybic.—Cic. de Senec.—*Val. Maurus, a man who flourished in the reign of Trajan, or, according to others, of the Antonini. He was governor of Syene in Upper Egypt. He wrote a Latin poem upon the rules of poetry and versification.

Mausōlus, a king of Caria. His wife Artemisia was so disconsolate at his death, which happened B. C. 353, that she drank up his ashes, and resolved to erect one of the grandest and noblest monuments of antiquity, to celebrate the memory of a husband whom she tenderly loved. This famous monument, which passed for one of the seven wonders of the world, was called Mausoleum, and from it all other magnificent sepulchres and tombs have received the same name. It was built by four different architects; Scopas erected the side which faced the east, Timotheus had the south, Leochares had the west, and Bruxis the north. Pithis was also employed in raising a pyramid over this stately monument, and the top was adorned by a chariot drawn by four horses. The expenses of this edifice were immense, and this gave occasion to the philosopher Anaxagoras to exclaim, when he saw it, *How much money changed into stones! Vid. Artemisia. Maxentius, (Marcus Aurelius Valerius,) a son of the emperor Maximianus Hercules. Some suppose him to have been a suppositious child. The voluntary abdication of Diocletian, and of his father, raised him in the state, and he declared himself independent emperor, or Augustus, A. D. 306. He afterwards incited his father to re-assume his imperial authority, and in a perfidious manner destroyed Severus, who had delivered himself into his hands, and relied upon his honour for the safety of his life. His victories and successes were impeded by Galerius Maximianus, who opposed him with a powerful force. The defeat and voluntary death of Galerius soon restored peace to Italy, and Maxentius passed into Africa, where he rendered himself odious by his cruelty and oppression. He soon after returned to Rome, and was informed that Constantine was come to dethrone him. He gave his adversary battle near Rome, and, after he had lost the victory, he fled back to the city. The bridge over which he crossed the Tiber was in a decayed situation, and he fell into the river and was drowned, on the 24th of September, A. D. 312.

Maximianus, I. (Herculius Marcus Aurelius Valerius,) a native of Sirmium, in Pannonia, who served as a common soldier in the Roman armies. When Diocletian had been raised to the imperial throne, he remembered the valour and courage of his fellow-soldier Maximianus, and rewarded his fidelity by making him his colleague in the empire, and by ceding to him the command of the provinces of Italy, Africa, and Spain, and the rest of the western territories of Rome. Maximianus showed the justness of the choice of Diocletian by his victories over the barbarians. In Britain success did not attend his arms; but in Africa he defeated and put to death Aurelius Julianus, who had proclaimed himself emperor. Soon after, Diocletian abdicated the imperial purple, and obliged Maximianus to follow his example, on the 1st of April, A. D. 304. Maximianus reluctantly complied with the command of a man to whom he owed his greatness. Before the first year of his resignation had elapsed, he re-assumed the imperial dignity; but the troops mutinied against him, and he fled for safety to Gaul, to the court of Constantine, to whom he gave his daughter Faustina in marriage. Here he again acted a conspicuous character, and re-assumed the imperial power, which his misfortunes had obliged him to relinquish. This offended Constantine: But when open violence seemed to frustrate the ambitious views of Maximianus, he had recourse to artifice. He prevailed upon his daughter Faustina, to leave the doors of her chamber open in the dead of night; and he secretly introduced himself to her bed, where he stabbed the man who slept by the side of his daughter. This was not Constantine; Faustina, faithful to her husband, had apprized him of her father's machinations, and a eunuch had been placed in his bed. Constantine resolved to punish Maximianus, and nothing was left to him but to choose his own death. He strangled himself at Marseilles, A. D. 310, in the 60th year of his age. His body was found fresh and entire in a leaden coffin about the middle of the eleventh century.——II. Galerius Valerius, a native of Dacia, who, in the first years of his life, was employed in keeping his father's flocks. He entered the army, where his valour and bodily strength recommended him to the notice of his superiors, and particularly to Diocletian, who invested him with the imperial purple in the east, and gave him his daughter Valeria in marriage. Galerius deserved the confidence of his benefactor. He conquered the Goths and Dalmatians, and checked the insolence of the Persians. In a battle, however, with the king of Persia, Galerius was defeated; and, to complete his ignominy, and render him more sensible of his disgrace, Diocletian obliged him to walk behind his chariot arrayed in his imperial robes. This humiliation stung Galerius to the quick; he assembled another army, and gave battle to the Persians. He gained a complete victory, and took the wives and children of his enemy. This success elated Galerius to such a degree, that he claimed the most dignified appellations, and ordered himself to be called the son of Mars. Diocletian himself dreaded his power, and even, it is said, abdicated the imperial dignity by means of his threats. As soon as Diocletian had abdicated, Galerius was proclaimed Augustus, A. D. 304, but his cruelty soon rendered him odious; and the Roman people, offended at his oppression, raised Maxentius to the imperial dignity the following year, and Galerius was obliged to yield, and to fly before his more fortunate adversary. He died in the greatest agonies, A. D. 311. In his character, Galerius was wanton and tyrannical; and he often feasted his eyes with the sight of dying wretches, whom his barbarity had delivered to bears and wild beasts. Lactant. de M. P. 33.—Eusebius 8, c. 16.

Maximinus, (Caius Julius Verus,) the son of a peasant in Thrace. He was originally a shepherd, and, by heading his countrymen against the frequent attacks of the neighbouring barbarians and robbers, he inured himself to the labours and to the fatigues of a camp. He entered the Roman armies, where he gradually rose to the first offices; and on the death of Alexander Severus he caused himself to be proclaimed emperor, A. D. 235. The popularity which he had gained when general of the armies, was at an end when he ascended the throne. He was delighted with acts of the greatest barbarity, and no less than 400 persons lost their lives on the false suspicion of having conspired against the emperor's life. Such is the character of the suspicious and tyrannical Maximinus. In his military capacity he acted with the same ferocity; and in an expedition in Germany, he not only cut down the corn, but he totally ruined and set fire to the whole country, to the extent of 450 miles. Such a monster of tyranny at last provoked the people of Rome. The Gordians were proclaimed emperors, but their innocence and pacific virtues were unable to resist the fury of Maximinus. After their fall, the Roman senate invested twenty men of their number with the imperial dignity, and intrusted into their hands the care of the republic. These measures so highly irritated Maximinus, that, at the first intelligence, he howled like a wild beast, and almost destroyed himself by knocking his head against the walls of his palace. When his fury was abated, he marched to Rome, resolved on slaughter. His bloody machinations were stopped, and his soldiers, ashamed of accompanying a tyrant whose cruelties had procured him the name of Busiris, Cyclops, and Phalaris, assassinated him in his tent before the walls of Aquileia, A. D. 236, in the 65th year of his age. Maximinus has been represented by historians as of a gigantic stature; he was eight feet high, and the bracelets of his wife served as rings to adorn the fingers of his hand. His strength was proportionable to his gigantic shape; he could alone draw a loaded wagon, and, with a blow of his fist, he often broke the teeth in a horse's mouth. Herodianus.—Jornand. de reb. Get.—Capitol. Maximinus made his son, of the same name, emperor, as soon as he was invested with the purple; and his choice was unanimously approved by the senate, by the people, and by the army.——II. Galerius Valerius, a shepherd of Thrace, who was raised to the imperial dignity by Diocletian, A. D. 305. He was nephew to Galerius Maximianus, by his mother's side, and to him he was indebted for his rise and consequence in the Roman armies. As Maximinus was ambitious and fond of power, he looked with an eye of jealousy upon those who shared the dignity of emperor with himself. He declared war against Licinius, his colleague on the throne; but a defeat, which soon after followed, on the 30th of April, A. D. 313, between Heraclea and Adrianopolis, left him without resources and without friends. His victorious enemy pursued him, and he fled beyond mount Taurus, forsaken and almost unknown. He attempted to put an end to his existence, but his efforts were ineffectual; and though his death is attributed by some to despair, it is more universally believed that he expired in the greatest agonies, of a dreadful distemper, which consumed him day and night with inexpressible pains.——III. One of the ambassadors of young Theodosius to Attila, king of the Huns.

Maximus, (Magnus,) I. a native of Spain, who proclaimed himself emperor, A. D. 383. The unpopularity of Gratian favoured his usurpation, and he was acknowledged by his troops. Gratian marched against him, but he was defeated, and soon after assassinated. Maximus refused the honours of a burial to the remains of Gratian; and when he had made himself master of Great Britain, Gaul, and Spain, he sent ambassadors into the east, and demanded of the emperor Theodosius to acknowledge him as his associate on the throne. Theodosius endeavoured to amuse and delay him, but Maximus resolved to support his claim by arms, and crossed the Alps. Italy was laid desolate, and Rome opened her gates to the conqueror. Theodosius now determined to revenge the audaciousness of Maximus, and had recourse to artifice. He began to make a naval armament, and Maximus, not to appear inferior to his adversary, had already embarked his troops, when Theodosius, by secret and hastened marches, fell upon him, and besieged him at Aquileia. Maximus was betrayed by his soldiers, and the conqueror, moved with compassion at the sight of his fallen and dejected enemy, granted him life; but the multitude refused him mercy, and instantly struck off his head, A. D. 388. His son, Victor, who shared the imperial dignity with him, was soon after sacrificed to the fury of the soldiers. ——II. Petronius, a Roman, descended of an illustrious family. He caused Valentinian III. to be assassinated, and ascended the throne; and to strengthen his usurpation, he married the empress, to whom he had the weakness and imprudence to betray that he had sacrificed her husband to his love for her person. This declaration irritated the empress; she had recourse to the barbarians to avenge the death of Valentinian, and Maximus was stoned to death by his soldiers, and his body thrown into the Tiber, A. D 455. He reigned only 77 days.——III. Pupianus. Vid. Pupianus.——IV. A celebrated cynic philosopher and magician of Ephesus. He instructed the emperor Julian in magic, and, according to the opinion of some historians, it was in the conversation and company of Maximus that the apostacy of Julian originated. The emperor not only visited the philosopher, but he even submitted his writings to his inspection and censure. Maximus refused to live in the court of Julian, and the emperor, not dissatisfied with the refusal, appointed him high pontiff in the province of Lydia, an office which he discharged with the greatest moderation and justice. When Julian went into the east, the philosopher promised him success, and even said that his conquests would be more numerous and extensive than those of the son of Philip. He persuaded his imperial pupil, that, according to the doctrine of metempsychosis, his body was animated by the soul which once animated the hero whose greatness and victories he was going to eclipse. After the death of Julian, Maximus was almost sacrificed to the fury of the soldiers: but the interposition of his friends saved his life, and he retired to Constantinople. He was soon after accused of magical practices before the emperor Valens, and beheaded at Ephesus, A. D. 366. He wrote some philosophical and rhetorical treatises, some of which were dedicated to Julian. They are now all lost. Ammian.——V. Tyrius, a Platonic philosopher in the reign of M. Aurelius. This emperor, who was naturally fond of study, became one of the pupils of Maximus, and paid great deference to his instructions. There are extant of Maximus 41 dissertations on moral and philosophical subjects, written in Greek. The best editions of which are that of Davis, 8vo. Cantab. 1703; and that of Reiske, 2 vols. 8vo. Lips. 1774.——VI. One of the Greek fathers of the 7th century, whose works were edited by Combesis, 2 vols. fol. Paris, 1675. ——VII. A native of Sirmium, in Pannonia. He was originally a gardener, but, by enlisting in the Roman army, he became one of the military tribunes, and his marriage with a woman of rank and opulence soon rendered him independent. He was father to the emperor Probus.

Mecœnas, or Mecœnas, (C. Cilnius,) a celebrated Roman knight, descended from the kings of Etruria. He has rendered himself immortal by his liberal patronage of learned men and of letters; and to his prudence and advice Augustus acknowledged himself indebted for the security he enjoyed. It was from the result of his advice, against the opinion of Agrippa, that Augustus resolved to keep the supreme power in his hands, and not by a voluntary resignation to plunge Rome into civil commotions. The emperor received the private admonitions of Mecœnas in the same friendly manner as they were given: and he was not displeased with the liberty of his friend, who threw a paper to him with these words, Descend from the tribunal, thou butcher! while he sat in the judgment-seat, and betrayed revenge and impatience in his countenance. Mecœnas was fond of literature, and, according to the most received opinion, he wrote a history of animals, a journal of the life of Augustus, a treatise on the different natures and kinds of precious stones, besides the two tragedies of Octavia and Prometheus, and other things, all now lost. He died eight years before Christ; and on his deathbed he particularly recommended his poetical friend Horace to the care and confidence of Augustus. From the patronage and encouragement which the princes of heroic and lyric poetry, among the Latins, received from the favourite of Augustus, all patrons of literature have ever since been called Mecœnates. Virgil dedicated to him his Georgics, and Horace his Odes. Suet. in Aug. 66, &c.—Plut. in Aug.—Herodian.—Senec. ep. 19 and 92.

Medon, son of Codrus, the 17th and last king of Athens, was the first archon that was appointed with regal authority, B. C. 1070. In the election Medon was preferred to his brother Neleus by the oracle of Delphi, and he rendered himself popular by the justice and moderation of his administration. His successors were called from him Medontidæ, and the office of archon remained for above 200 years in the family of Codrus under 12 perpetual archons. Paus. 7, c. 2.—Paterc. 2, c. 2.

Medus, a son of Ægeus and Medea, who gave his name to a country of Asia. Medus, when arrived to years of maturity, went to seek his mother, whom the arrival of Theseus in Athens had driven away. Vid. Medea. He came to Colchis, where he was seized by his uncle Perses, who usurped the throne of Æetes, his mother's father, because the oracle had declared that Perses should be murdered by one of the grandsons of Æetes. Medus assumed another name, and called himself Hippotes, son of Creon. Meanwhile, Medea arrived at Colchis, disguised in the habit of a priestess of Diana; and when she heard that one of Creon's children was imprisoned, she resolved to hasten the destruction of a person whose family she detested. To effect this with more certainty, she told the usurper that Hippotes was really a son of Medea, sent by his mother to murder him. She begged Perses to give her Hippotes, that she might sacrifice him to her resentment. Perses consented. Medea discovered that it was her own son, and she instantly armed him with the dagger which she had prepared against his life, and ordered him to stab the usurper. He obeyed, and Medea discovered who he was, and made her son Medus sit on his grandfather's throne. Hesiod.—Theog.—Paus. 2.—Apollod. 1.—Justin. 42.—Senec. in Med.—Diod.

Megabyzus, I. one of the noble Persians who conspired against the usurper Smerdis. He was set over an army in Europe by king Darius, where he took Perynthus, and conquered all Thrace. He was greatly esteemed by his sovereign. Herodot. 3, &c.——II. A son of Zopyrus, satrap to Darius. He conquered Egypt, &c. Herodot. 3, c. 160.——III. A satrap of Artaxerxes. He revolted from his king, and defeated two large armies that had been sent against him. The interference of his friends restored him to the king's favour, and he showed his attachment to Artaxerxes by killing a lion which threatened his life in hunting. This act of affection in Megabyzus was looked upon with envy by the king. He was discarded, and afterwards reconciled to the monarch by means of his mother. He died in the 76th year of his age, B. C. 447, greatly regretted. Ctesias.

Megacles, I. an Athenian archon, who involved the greatest part of the Athenians in the sacrilege which was committed in the conspiracy of Cylon. Plut in Sol.——II. A son of Alcmæon, who revolted with some Athenians after the departure of Solon from Athens. He was ejected by Pisistratus.——III. A man who exchanged dress with Pyrrhus when assisting the Tarentines in Italy. He was killed in that disguise.

Megaleas, a seditious person of Corinth. He was seized for his treachery to King Philip of Macedonia, upon which he destroyed himself to avoid punishment.

Megapenthes, an illegitimate son of Menelaus, who, after his father's return from the Trojan war, was married to a daughter of Alector, a native of Sparta. His mother's name was Teridae, a slave of Menelaus. Homer. Od. 4.—Apollod. 3.

Megasthenes, a Greek historian in the age of Seleucus Nicanor, about 300 years before Christ. He wrote about the Oriental nations, and particularly the Indians. His history is often quoted by the ancients. What now passes as his composition is spurious.

Mela Pomponius, a Spaniard who flourished about the 45th year of the Christian era, and distinguished himself by his geography, divided into three books, and written with elegance, with great perspicuity and brevity. The best editions of this book, called de situ orbis, are those of Gronovius, 8vo. L. Bat. 1722, and Reinhold, 4to. Eton. 1761.

Melanippides, a Greek poet, about 520 years before Christ. His grandson, of the same name, flourished about 60 years after at the court of Perdiccas the second, of Macedonia. Some fragments of their poetry are extant.

Melanthus, Melanthes, or Melanthius, a son of Andropompus, whose ancestors were kings of Pylos. He was driven from his paternal kingdom by the Heraclidæ, and came to Athens, where king Thymœtes resigned the crown to him provided he fought a battle against Xanthus, a general of the Bœotians, who made war against him. He fought and conquered. Vid. Apaturia, and his family, surnamed the Neleidæ, sat on the throne of Athens till the age of Codrus. He succeeded to the crown 1128 years B. C. and reigned 37 years. Paus. 2, c. 18.

Meles, I. a beautiful Athenian youth, beloved by Timagoras, whose affections he repaid with the greatest coldness and indifference. He even ordered Timagoras to leap down a precipice from the top of the citadel of Athens, and Timagoras, not to disoblige him, obeyed, and was killed in the fall. This token of true friendship and affection had such an effect upon Meles, that he threw himself down from the place, to atone by his death for the ingratitude which he had shown to Timagoras. Paus 1, c. 30.——II. A king of Lydia, who succeeded his father Alyattes, about 747 years before Christ. He was father to Candaules.

Melētus, a poet and orator of Athens, who became one of the principal accusers of Socrates. After his eloquence had prevailed, and Socrates had been put ignominiously to death, the Athenians repented of their severity to the philosopher, and condemned his accusers. Meletus perished among them. Diog.

Melissus, I. a philosopher of Samos, who maintained that the world was infinite, immoveable, and without a vacuum. According to his doctrines, no one could advance any argument upon the power or attributes of Providence, as all human knowledge was weak and imperfect. Themistocles was among his pupils. He flourished about 440 years before the Christian era. Diog.——II. A freedman of Mecænas, appointed librarian to Augustus. He wrote some comedies. Ovid. Pont. 4, ep. 16, v. 30.—Sueton. de Gram.

Melius, Sp. a Roman knight accused of aspiring to tyranny, on account of his uncommon liberality to the populace. He was summoned to appear by the dictator L. Q. Cincinnatus, and when he refused to obey, he was put to death by Ahala, the master of horse, A. U. C. 314. Varro de L. L. 4.—Val. Max. 6, c. 3.

Mella Annæus, the father of Lucan. He was accused of being privy to Pisco's conspiracy against Nero, upon which he opened his veins. Tacit. 16, Ann. c. 17.

Memmia Lex, ordained that no one should be entered on the calendar of criminals who was absent on the public accounts.

Memmius, a Roman knight, who rendered himself illustrious for his eloquence and poetical talents. He was made tribune, prætor, and afterwards governor of Bithynia. He was accused of extortion in his province, and banished by J. Cæsar, though Cicero undertook his defence. Lucretius dedicated his poem to him. Cic. in Brut.——The family of the Memmii were plebeians. They were descended, according to some accounts, from Mnestheus, the friend of Æneas. Virg. Æn. 4, v. 117.

Memnon, a general of the Persian forces when Alexander invaded Asia. He distinguished himself for his attachment to the interest of Darius, his valour in the field, the soundness of his counsels, and his great sagacity. He defended Miletus against Alexander, and died in the midst of his successful enterprises, B. C. 333. His wife Barsine was taken prisoner with the wife of Darius. Diod. 16. Vid. Part. III.

Menander, the chief of the New Comedy, was born B. C. 342. His father, Diopithes, was at this time commander of the forces stationed by the Athenians at the Hellespont, and must therefore have been a man of some consequence. Alexis the comic poet was his uncle and instructer in the drama. Theophrastus was his tutor in philosophy and literature. In his twenty-first year, B. C. 321, he brought out the Ὀργὴ his first drama. He lived twenty-nine years more, dying B. C. 292, after having composed one hundred and five plays. All antiquity seems to combine in celebrating Menander. Terence, the first of Latin comedians, was but the translator of his dramas, and according to Cæsar's well-known expression, only a dimidiatus Menander: Plutarch and Dio Chrysostom prefer him to Aristophanes: Ovid declares that his fame shall never die whilst the characters, which he so admirably exhibited, exist among mankind; and Quinctilian pronounces a splendid eulogy on his works. Quintil. 10, c. 1.—Paterc. 1, c. 16.

Menas, a freedman of Pompey the Great, who distinguished himself by the active and perfidious part he took in the civil wars which were kindled between the younger Pompey and Augustus. When Pompey invited Augustus to his galley, Menas advised his master to seize the person of his enemy, and at the same time the Roman empire, by cutting the cables of his ship. No, (replied Pompey,) I would have approved of the measure if you had done it without consulting me, but I scorn to break my word. Suet. in Oct. Horace, epod. 4, has ridiculed the pride of Meras, and recalled to his mind his former meanness and obscurity.

MENECRĀTES, a physician of Syracuse, famous for his vanity and arrogance. He was generally accompanied by some of his patients whose disorders he had cured. He crowned himself like the master of the gods; and in a letter which he wrote to Philip, king of Macedon, he styled himself, in these words, Menecrates Jupiter to king Philip, greeting. The Macedonian monarch answered, Philip to Menecrates, greeting, and better sense. Philip also invited him to one of his feasts, but when the meats were served up, a table was put separate for the physician, on which he was served only with perfumes and frankincense, like the father of the gods. This entertainment displeased Menecrates; he remembered that he was a mortal, and hurried away from the company. He lived about 360 years before the Christian era. Ælian. V. H. 10, c. 51.—Athen. 7, c. 13.

MENEDĒMUS, I. a Socratic philosopher of Eretria, who was originally a tentmaker, an employment which he left for the profession of arms. The persuasive eloquence and philosophical lectures of Plato had such an influence over him, that he gave up his offices in the state to cultivate literature. It is said that he died through melancholy when Antigonus, one of Alexander's generals, had made himself master of his country, B. C. 301, in the 74th year of his age. Some attribute his death to a different cause, and say that he was falsely accused of treason, for which he became so desperate that he died after he had passed seven days without taking any aliment. He was called the Eretrian Bull, on account of his gravity. Strab. 9.—Diog.——II. A cynic philosopher of Lampsacus, who said that he was come from hell to observe the sins and wickedness of mankind. His habit was that of the furies, and his behaviour was a proof of his insanity. He was disciple of Colotes of Lampsacus. Diog.

MĔNĔLĀIA, a festival celebrated at Therapnæ in Laconia, in honour of Menelaus. He had there a temple, where he was worshipped with his wife Helen as one of the supreme gods.

MĔNĔLĀUS, a king of Sparta, brother to Agamemnon. His father's name was Atreus, according to Homer, or, according to the more probable opinion of Hesiod, Apollodorus, &c. he was the son of Plisthenes and Ærope. Vid. Plisthenes. He was educated with his brother Agamemnon in the house of Atreus, and, like the rest of the Grecian princes, solicited the marriage of Helen, the daughter of king Tyndarus. By the artifice and advice of Ulysses, Helen was permitted to choose a husband, and she fixed her eyes upon Menelaus and married him, after her numerous suiters had solemnly bound themselves by an oath to defend her, and protect her person against the violence or assault of every intruder. Vid. Helena. As soon as the nuptials were celebrated, Tyndarus resigned the crown to his son-in-law, and their happiness was complete. The absence of Menelaus in Crete gave opportunities to Paris, the Trojan prince, to corrupt the fidelity of Helen, and to carry away home what the goddess of beauty had promised to him as his due. This action was highly resented by Menelaus; he reminded the Greek princes of their oath and solemn engagements when they courted the daughter of Tyndarus, and immediately all Greece took up arms to defend his cause. During the Trojan war Menelaus behaved with great spirit and courage; and Paris must have fallen by his hand, had not Venus interposed and redeemed him from certain death. He also expressed his wish to engage Hector, but Agamemnon hindered him from fighting with so powerful an adversary. In the tenth year of the Trojan war, Helen obtained the forgiveness of Menelaus by introducing him, with Ulysses, the night that Troy was reduced to ashes, into the chamber of Deiphobus, whom she had married after the death of Paris. This perfidious conduct totally reconciled her to her first husband; and she returned with him to Sparta, during a voyage of eight years. He died some time after his return. The palace which Menelaus once inhabited was still entire in the days of Pausanias, as well as the temple which had been raised to his memory by the people of Sparta. Homer. Od. 4, &c. Il. 1, &c.—Apollod. 3, c. 10.—Paus. 3, c. 14 and 19.—Dictys. Cret. 2, &c.—Virg. Æn. 2, &c.—Quintil. Smyrn. 14.—Ovid. Heroid. 5 and 13.—Hygin. fab. 79.—Eurip. in Iphig.—Propert. 2.—Sophocles.

MENĒNIUS AGRIPPA, a celebrated Roman, who appeased the Roman populace in the infancy of the consular government by repeating the well-known fable of the belly and limbs. He flourished 495 B. C. Liv. 2, c. 16, 32, 33.

MĔNES, the first king of Egypt. He built the town of Memphis, as it is generally supposed, and deserved, by his abilities and popularity, to be called a god after death. Herodot. 2, c. 1 and 90.—Diod. 1.

MENESTEUS, or MENESTHEUS, or MNESTHEUS, a son of Pereus, who, during the long absence of Theseus, was elected king. As he had been one of Helen's suiters, he went to the Trojan war at the head of the people of Athens, and died in his return in the island of Melos. He reigned 23 years, 1205, and was succeeded by Demophoon, the son of Theseus. Plut. in Thes.

MENIPPUS, a cynic philosopher of Phœnicia. He was originally a slave, and obtained his liberty with a sum of money, and became one of the greatest usurers at Thebes. He grew so desperate from the continual reproaches and insults to which he was daily exposed on account of his meanness, that he destroyed himself. He wrote 13 books of satires, which have been lost. M. Varro composed satires in imitation of his style, and called them Menippean.

MENIUS, a plebeian consul at Rome. He was the first who made the rostrum at Rome with the beaks (rostra) of the enemy's ships.

MENON, I. a Thessalian commander in the expedition of Cyrus the younger against his brother Artaxerxes. He was dismissed on the suspicion that he had betrayed his fellow-soldiers. Diod. 14.——II. A Thessalian refused the freedom of Athens though he furnished a number of auxiliaries to the people.

MENOPHĪLUS, a eunuch to whom Mithridates, when conquered by Pompey, intrusted the care of his daughter. Menophilus murdered the princess for fear of her falling into the enemy's hands. Ammian. 16.

Mĕrĭŏnes, a charioteer of Idomeneus king of Crete during the Trojan war, son of Molus, a Cretan prince, and Melphidis. He signalized himself before Troy, and fought with Deiphobus, the son of Priam, whom he wounded. He was greatly admired by the Cretans, who even paid him divine honours after death. Horat. 1, od. 6, v. 15.—Homer. Il. 2, &c.—Dictys. Cret. 1, &c.—Ovid. Met. 13, fab. 1.

Mermnadæ, a race of kings in Lydia, of which Gyges was the first. They sat on the Lydian throne tilll the reign of Crœsus, who was conquered by Cyrus king of Persia. They were descendants of the Heraclidæ, and probably received the name of Mermnadæ from Mermnas, one of their own family. They were descended from Lemnos, or, according to others from Agelaus, the son of Omphale by Hercules. Herodot. 1, c. 7 and 14.

Merŏpe, a daughter of Cypselus, who married Cresphontes king of Messenia, by whom she had three children. Her husband and two of her children were murdered by Polyphontes. The murderer obliged her to marry him, and she would have been forced to comply had not Egyptus or Telephontes, her 3d son, revenged his father's death by assassinating Polyphontes. Apolled. 2, c. 6.—Paus. 4, c. 3. Vid. Part III.

Messalĭna Valeria, I. a daughter of Messala Barbatus. She married the emperor Claudius, and disgraced herself by her cruelties and incontinence. Her extravagances at last irritated her husband; he commanded her to appear before him to answer to all the accusations which were brought against her, upon which she attempted to destroy herself; and when her courage failed, one of the tribunes, who had been sent to her, despatched her with his sword, A. D. 48. It is in speaking of her debaucheries and lewdness that a celebrated satirist says:—

Et lassata viris, necdum satiata, recessit.

Juv.—Tacit. Ann. 11, c. 37.—Suet. in Claud.—Dio.——II. Another, called also Statilia. She was descended of a consular family, and married the consul Atticus Vistinus, whom Nero murdered. She received with great marks of tenderness her husband's murderer, and married him. She had married four husbands before she came to the imperial throne; and after the death of Nero she retired to literary pursuits and peaceful occupations. Otho courted her, and would have married her had he not destroyed himself. In his last moments he wrote her a very pathetic and consolatory letter, &c. Tacit. Ann.

Messalĭnus (M. Valer.) I. a Roman officer in the reign of Tiberius. He was appointed governor of Dalmatia, and rendered himself known by his opposition to Piso, and by his attempts to persuade the Romans of the necessity of suffering women to accompany the camps on their different expeditions. Tacit. Ann. 3.——II. One of Domitian's informers.

Messĕne, a daughter of Triopas, king of Argos, who married Polycaon son of Lelex, king of Laconia. She encouraged her husband to levy troops, and to seize a part of Peloponnesus, which, after it had been conquered, received her name. She received divine honours after her death, and had a magnificent temple at Rhome, where her statue was made half of gold and half of Parian marble. Paus. 4, c. 1 and 13.

Metăbus, a tyrant of the Privernates. He was father of Camilla, whom he consecrated to the service of Diana, when he had been banished from his kingdom by his subjects. Virg. Æn. 11, v. 540.

Metelli, the surname of the family of the Cæcilii at Rome, the most known of whom were —I. Q. Cæcilius, who rendered himself illustrious by his successes against Jugurtha, the Numidian king, from which he was surnamed Numidicus. He took, in this expedition, the celebrated Marius, as his lieutenant, and he had soon cause to repent of the confidence he had placed in him. Marius raised himself to power by defaming the character of his benefactor, and Metellus was recalled to Rome, and accused of extortion and ill-management. He was acquitted of the crimes laid to his charge before the tribunal of the Roman knights, who observed that the probity of his whole life, and the greatness of his exploits were greater proofs of his innocence than the most powerful arguments. Cic. de Orat. 1, c. 48.—Sallust de Bell. Jug.—— II. L. Cæcilius, another, who saved from the flames the palladium, when Vesta's temple was on fire. He was then highpriest. He lost his sight and one of his arms in doing it; and the senate, to reward his zeal and piety, permitted him always to be drawn to the senate-house in a chariot, an honour which no one had ever before enjoyed. He also gained a great victory over the Carthaginians in the first Punic war, and led in his triumph 13 generals and 120 elephants taken from the enemy. He was honoured with the dictatorship and the office of master of horse, &c.——III. Q. Cæcilius Celer, another, who distinguished himself by his spirited exertions against Catiline. He married Clodia, the sister of Clodius, who disgraced him by her incontinence and lasciviousness. He died 57 years before Christ. He was greatly lamented by Cicero, who shed tears at the loss of one of his most faithful and valuable friends. Cic. de Cæl.——IV. L. Cæcilius, a tribune in the civil wars of J. Cæsar and Pompey. He favoured the cause of Pompey, and opposed Cæsar when he entered Rome with a victorious army. He refused to open the gates of Saturn's temple, in which were deposited great treasures; upon which they were broken open by Cæsar, and Metellus retired when threatened with death.——V. Q. Cæcilius, the grandson of the highpriest who saved the palladium from the flames, was a warlike general, who, from his conquest of Crete and Macedonia, was surnamed Macedonicus. He had six sons, of which four are particularly mentioned by Plutarch. ——VI. Q. Cæcilius, surnamed Balearicus, from his conquest of the Baleares.——VII. L. Cæcilius, surnamed Diadematus, but supposed the same as that called Lucius with the surname of Dalmaticus, from a victory obtained over the Dalmatians during his consulship with Mutius Scævola.——VIII. Caius Cæcilius, surnamed Caprarius, who was consul with Carbo, A. U. C. 641.——IX. The fourth was Marcus, and of these four brothers it is remarkable, that two of them triumphed in one day, but over what nation is not mentioned by Eutrop. 4.——X. A general of the Roman armies against the Sicilians and Carthaginians. Before he marched he offered sacrifices to all the gods, except Vesta, for which neglect the goddess was so incensed that she demanded the blood of his daughter Metella. When Metella was going to be immolated, the goddess placed a heifer in her place, and carried her to a temple at Lanuvium, of which she became the priestess.——XI. Lucius Cæcilius, or Quintus, surnamed Creticus, from his conquest in Crete, B. C. 66, is supposed by some to be the son of Metellus Macedonicus. ——XII. Cimber, one of the conspirators against J. Cæsar. It was he who gave the signal to attack and murder the dictator in the senate-house. ——XIII. Pius, a general in Spain, against Sertorius, on whose head he set a price of 100 talents, and 20,000 acres of land. He distinguished himself also in the Marsian war, and was high-priest. He obtained the name of Pius from the sorrow he showed during the banishment of his father Metellus Numidicus, whom he caused to be recalled. Paterc. 2, c. 5.—Sallust. Jug. 44.

Methodius, a bishop of Tyre, who maintained a controversy against Porphyry. The best edition is that of Paris, fol. 1657.

Metilia Lex, was enacted A. U. C. 536, to settle the power of the dictator, and of his master of horse, within certain bounds.

Mithiochus, a son of Miltiades, who was taken by the Phœnicians, and given to Darius, king of Persia. He was tenderly treated by the monarch, though his father had conquered the Persian armies in the plains of Marathon. Plut.—Herodot. 6, c. 41.

Metion, a son of Erechtheus, king of Athens, and Praxithea. He married Alcippe, daughter of Mars and Agraulos. His sons drove Pandion from the throne of Athens, and were afterwards expelled by Pandion's children. Apollod. 3. c. 15.—Paus. 2, c. 6.

Metius Curtius, I. one of the Sabines who fought against the Romans on account of the stolen virgins.——II. Suffetius, a dictator of Alba in the reign of Tullus Hostilius. He fought against the Romans, and at last, finally to settle their disputes, he proposed a single combat between the Horatii and Curiatii. The Albans were conquered, and Metius promised to assist the Romans against their enemies. In a battle against the Veientes and Fidenates, Metius showed his infidelity by forsaking the Romans at the first onset, and retired to a neighbouring eminence, to wait for the event of the battle, and to fall upon whatever side proved victorious. The Romans obtained the victory, and Tullus ordered Metius to be tied between two chariots, which were drawn by four horses two different ways, and his limbs were torn away from his body, about 669 years before the Christian era. Liv. 1, c. 23, &c.—Flor. 1, c. 3.—Virg. Æn. 8, v. 642.——III. A critic. Vid. Turpa.——IV. Carus, a celebrated informer under Domitian, who enriched himself with the plunder of those who were sacrificed to the emperor's suspicion.

Meton, an astrologer and mathematician of Athens. His father's name was Pausanias. In a book called Enneadecaterides, or the cycle of 19 years, he endeavoured to adjust the course of the sun and of the moon; and supported that the solar and lunar years could regularly begin from the same point in the heavens. This is called by the moderns the golden numbers. He flourished B. C. 439. Vitruv. 1.—Plut. in Nicia.

Metrocles, a pupil of Theophrastus, who had the care of the education of Cleombrotus and Cleomenes. He suffocated himself when old and infirm. Diog.

Metrodorus, I. a physician of Chios, B. C. 444. He was a disciple of Democritus, and had Hippocrates among his pupils. His compositions on medicine, &c. are lost. He supported that the world was eternal and infinite, and denied the existence of motion. Diog.—— II. A painter and philosopher of Stratonice, B. C. 171. He was sent to Paulus Æmylius, who, after the conquest of Perseus, demanded of the Athenians a philosopher and a painter, the former to instruct his children, and the latter to make a painting of his triumphs. Metrodorus was sent, as in him alone were united the philosopher and painter. Plin. 35, c. 11.—Cic. 5, de Finib. 1. de Orat. 4. Acad.—Diog. in Epic. ——III. A friend of Mithridates, sent as ambassador to Tigranes, king of Armenia. He was remarkable for his learning, moderation, humanity, and justice. He was put to death by his master, B. C. 72. Strab.—Plut.

Mezentius, a king of the Tyrrhenians when Æneas came into Italy. He was remarkable for his cruelties, and put his subjects to death by slow tortures, or sometimes tied a man to a dead corpse face to face, and suffered him to die in this condition. He was expelled by his subjects, and fled to Turnus, who employed him in his war against the Trojans. He was killed by Æneas, with his son Lausus. Dionys. Hal. 1, c. 15.—Justin. 43, c. 1.—Liv. 1, c. 2.—Virg. Æn. 7, v. 648, l. 8, v. 482.—Ovid. Fast. 4. v. 881.

Micipsa, a king of Numidia, son of Masinissa, who at his death, B. C. 119, left his kingdom between his sons Adherbal and Hiempsal, and his nephew Jugurtha. Sallust. de Jug.—Flor. 3, c. 1.—Plut in Gr.

Milo, I. a celebrated athlete of Crotona in Italy. His father's name was Diotimus. He early accustomed himself to carry the greatest burdens, and by degrees became a monster in strength. It is said that he carried on his shoulders a young bullock four years old, for above forty yards, and afterwards killed it with one blow of his fist, and eat it up in one day. He was seven times crowned at the Pythian games, and six at Olympia. He presented himself a seventh time, but no one had the courage or boldness to enter the lists against him. He was one of the disciples of Pythagoras, and to his uncommon strength the learned preceptor and his pupils owed their life. The pillar which supported the roof of the school suddenly gave way, but Milo supported the whole weight of the building, and gave the philosopher and his auditors time to escape. In his old age Milo attempted to pull up a tree by the roots and break it. He partly effected it, but his strength being gradually exhausted, the tree, when half cleft, reunited, and his hands remained pinched in the body of the tree. He was then alone, and being unable to disentangle himself, he was eaten up by the wild beasts of the place, about 500 years before the Christian era. Ovid. Met. 15. —Cic. de Senect.—Val. Max. 9, c. 12.—Strab. 16.—Paus. 6, c. 11.——II. T. Annius, a native of Lanuvium, who attempted to obtain the consulship at Rome by intrigue and seditious tumults. Clodius the tribune opposed his views, yet Milo would have succeeded had not an unfortunate event totally frustrated his hopes. As he was going into the country, attended by his wife and a numerous retinue of gladiators and servants, he met on the Appian road his enemy Clodius. A quarrel arose between the servants. Milo supported his attendants, and the dispute became general. Clodius received many severe wounds, and was obliged to retire to a neighbouring cottage. Milo pursued his enemy in his retreat, and ordered his servants to despatch him. Eleven of the servants of Clodius shared his fate, as also the owner of the house who had given them reception. The body of the murdered tribune was carried to Rome, and exposed to public view. Cicero undertook the defence of Milo, but the continual clamours of the friends of Clodius, and the sight of an armed soldiery, which surrounded the seat of judgment, so terrified the orator, that he forgot the greatest part of his arguments. Milo was condemned, and banished to Massilia. Cicero soon after sent his exiled friend a copy of the oration which he had delivered in his defence, in the form in which we have it now; and Milo, after he had read it, exclaimed, O Cicero, hadst thou spoken before my accusers in these terms, Milo would not be now eating figs at Marseilles! The friendship and cordiality of Cicero and Milo were the fruits of long intimacy and familiar intercourse. It was by the successful labours of Milo that the orator was recalled from banishment and restored to his friends. Cic. pro Milon.—Paterc. 2, c. 47 and 68.—Dio. 40.——III. A general of the forces of Pyrrhus. Miltiades, I. an Athenian, son of Cypselus, who obtained a victory in a chariot-race at the Olympic games, and led a colony of his countrymen to the Chersonesus. The causes of this appointment are striking and singular. The Thracian Dolonci, harassed by a long war with the Absynthians, were directed by the oracle of Delphi to take for their king the first man they met in their return home, who invited them to come under his roof and partake of his entertainments. This was Miltiades, whom the appearance of the Dolonci, their strange arms and garments, had struck. He invited them to his house, and was made acquainted with the commands of the oracle. He obeyed, and when the oracle of Delphi had approved a second time the choice of the Dolonci, he departed for the Chersonesus, and was invested by the inhabitants with sovereign power. The first measure he took was to stop the further incursions of the Absynthians, by building a strong wall across the isthmus. When he had established himself at home, and fortified his dominions against foreign invasion, he turned his arms against Lampsacus. His expedition was unsuccessful; he was taken in an ambuscade and made prisoner. His friend Crœsus, king of Lydia, was informed of his captivity, and he procured his release by threatening the people of Lampsacus with his severest displeasure. He lived a few years after he had recovered his liberty. As he had no issue, he left his kingdom and possessions to Stesagoras the son of Cimon, who was his brother by the same mother. The memory of Miltiades was greatly honoured by the Dolonci, and they regularly celebrated festivals and exhibited shows in commemoration of a man to whom they owed all their greatness and preservation. Some time after Stesagoras died without issue, and Miltiades the son of Cimon, and the brother of the deceased, was sent by the Athenians with one ship to take possession of the Chersonesus. At his arrival Miltiades appeared mournful, as if lamenting the recent death of his brother. The principal inhabitants of the country visited the new governor to condole with him; but their confidence in his sincerity proved fatal to them. Miltiades seized their persons, and made himself absolute in Chersonesus; and, to strengthen himself, he married Hegesipyla, the daughter of Olorus, the king of the Thracians. He was present at the celebrated battle of Marathon, in which all the chief officers ceded their power to him, and left the event of the battle to depend upon his superior abilities. He obtained an important victory, (Vid. Marathon,) over the more numerous forces of his adversaries; and when he demanded of his fellow-citizens an olive crown as the reward of his valour in the field of battle, he was not only refused, but severely reprimanded for presumption. The only reward, therefore, that he received, was in itself simple and inconsiderable, though truly great in the opinion of that age. He was represented in the front of a picture among the rest of the commanders who fought at the battle of Marathon, and he seemed to exhort and animate the soldiers to fight with courage and intrepidity. Some time after, Miltiades was intrusted with a fleet of 70 ships, and ordered to punish those islands which had revolted to the Persians. He was successful at first, but a sudden report that the Persian fleet was coming to attack him, changed his operations as he was besieging Paros. He raised the siege and returned to Athens, where he was accused of treason, and particularly of holding correspondence with the enemy. The falsity of these accusations might have appeared if Miltiades had been able to come into the assembly. A wound which he had received before Paros detained him at home; and his enemies, taking advantage of his absence, became more eager in their accusations and louder in their clamours. He was condemned to death, but the rigour of the sentence was retracted on the recollection of his great services to the Athenians, and he was put into prison till he had paid a fine of 50 talents to the state. His inability to discharge so great a sum detained him in confinement, and soon after his wounds became incurable, and he died about 489 years before the Christian era. His body was ransomed by his son Cimon, who was obliged to borrow and pay the 50 talents to give his father a decent burial. Cornelius Nepos has written the life of Miltiades the son of Cimon; but his history is incongruous and not authentic; and the author, by confounding the actions of the son of Cimon with those of the son of Cypselus, has made the whole dark and unintelligible. Greater reliance in reading the actions of both the Miltiades is to be placed on the narration of Herodotus, whose veracity is confirmed, and who was indisputably more informed and more capable of giving an account of the lives and exploits of men who flourished in his age, and of which he could see the living monuments. Herodotus was born about six years after the famous battle of Marathon, and C. Nepos, as a writer of the Augustan age, flourished about 450 years after the age of the father of history. *C. Mimnermus, a Greek poet and musician of Colophron in the age of Solon. He chiefly excelled in elegiac poetry, whence some have attributed the invention of it to him, and, indeed, he was the poet who made elegy an amorous poem, instead of a mournful and melancholy tale. In the expression of love, Propertius prefers him to Homer, as this verse shows:—

Plus in amore valet Mimnermi versus Homero.

In his old age Mimnermus became enamoured of a young girl called Nanno. Some few fragments of his poetry remain, collected by Stobæus. He is supposed by some to be the inventor of the pentamater verse, which others however attribute to Callinus or Archilochus. The surname of Ligustiades, λιγυς (shrill-voiced), has been applied to him; though some imagine the word to be the name of his father. Strab. 1 and 14.—Paus. 9, c. 29.—Diog. 1.—Propert. 1, el. 9, v. 11.—Horat. 1, ep. 6, v. 65.

Minutius, soon after this, fought with ill success against Annibal, and was saved by the interference of Fabius: which circumstance had such an effect upon him that he laid down his power at the feet of his deliverer, and swore that he would never act again but by his directions. He was killed at the battle of Cannæ. Liv.—C. Nep. in Ann.——III. He has written an elegant dialogue in defence of the Christian religion, called Octavius, from the principal speaker in it. The two last editions are that of Davies, 8vo. Cantab. 1712; and of Gronovius, 8vo. L. Bat. 1709.

Misitheus, a Roman, celebrated for his virtues and his misfortunes. He was father-in-law to the emperor Gordian, whose counsels and actions he guided by his prudence and moderation. He was sacrificed to the ambition of Philip, a wicked senator, who succeeded him as præfect of the prætorian guards. He died A. D. 243, and left all his possessions to be appropriated for the good of the public.

Mithradātes, a herdsman of Astyages, ordered to put young Cyrus to death. He refused, and educated him at home as his own son, &c. Herodot.—Justin.

Mithridātes 1st, was the third king of Pontus. He was tributary to the crown of Persia, and his attempts to make himself independent proved fruitless. He was conquered in a battle, and obtained peace with difficulty. Xenophon calls him merely a governor of Cappadocia. He was succeeded by Ariobarzanes, B. C. 363. Diod.—Xenoph.——The second of that name, king of Pontus, was grandson to Mithridates I. He made himself master of Pontus, which had been conquered by Alexander, and had been ceded to Antigonus at the general division of the Macedonian empire among the conqueror's generals. He reigned about 26 years, and died at the advanced age of 84 years, B. C. 302. He was succeeded by his son, Mithridates III. Some say that Antigonus put him to death, because he favoured the cause of Cassander. Appian. Mith.—Diod.——The III. was son of the preceding monarch. He enlarged his paternal possessions by the conquest of Cappadocia and Paphlagonia, and died, after a reign of 36 years. Diod.——The IV. succeeded his father Ariobarzanes, who was the son of Mithridates III. ——The V. succeeded his father Mithridates IV. and strengthened himself on his throne by an alliance with Antiochus the Great, whose daughter, Laodice, he married. He was succeeded by his son Pharnaces.——The VI. succeeded his father Pharnaces. He was the first of the kings of Pontus who made alliance with the Romans. He furnished them with a fleet in the third Punic war, and assisted them against Aristonicus, who had laid claim to the kingdom of Pergamus. This fidelity was rewarded; he was called Evergetes, and received from the Roman people the province of Phrygia Major, and was called the friend and ally of Rome. He was murdered B. C. 123. Appian. Mithr.—Justin. 37, &c.——The VII. surnamed Eupator and The Great, succeeded his father, Mithridates VI. though only at the age of 11 years. The beginning of his reign was marked by ambition, cruelty, and artifice. He murdered his own mother, who had been left by his father coheiress of the kingdom, and also the two sons whom his sister Laodice had had by Ariarathes, king of Cappadocia and placed one of his own children, only eight years old, on the vacant throne. These violent proceedings alarmed Nicomedes, king of Bithynia, who had married Laodice, the widow of Ariarathes. He suborned a youth to be king of Cappadocia, as the third son of Ariarathes, and Laodice was sent to Rome to impose upon the senate, and assure them that her third son was now alive, and that his pretensions to the kingdom of Cappadocia were just and well-grounded. Mithridates used the same arms of dissimulation. He also sent to Rome Gordius, the governor of his son, who solemnly declared before the Roman people, that the youth who sat on the throne of Cappadocia was the third son and lawful heir of Ariarathes, and that he was supported as such by Mithridates. This intricate affair displeased the Roman senate, and finally, to settle the dispute between the two monarchs, the powerful arbiters took away the kingdom of Cappadocia from Mithridates, and Paphlagonia from Nicomedes. These two kingdoms being thus separated from their original possessors, were presented with their freedom and independence; but the Cappadocians refused it, and received Ariobarzanes for king. Such were the first seeds of enmity between Rome and the king of Pontus, which ended in his destruction. Vid. Mithridaticum Bellum. He fled to Tigranes, but that monarch refused an asylum to his father-in-law, whom he had before supported with all the collected forces of his kingdom. Mithridates found a safe retreat among the Scythians; and, though destitute of power, friends, and resources, yet he meditated the destruction of the Roman empire, by penetrating into the heart of Italy by land. These wild projects were rejected by his followers, and he sued for peace. It was denied to his ambassadors, and the victorious Pompey declared, that, to obtain it, Mithridates must ask it in person. He scorned to trust himself in the hands of his enemy, and resolved to conquer or to die. His subjects refused to follow him any longer, and they revolted from him, and made his son Pharnaces king. The son showed himself ungrateful to his father, and even, according to some writers, ordered him to be put to death. This unnatural treatment broke the heart of Mithridates; he obliged his wife to poison herself, and attempted to do the same himself. It was in vain the frequent antidotes he had taken in the early part of his life, strengthened his constitution against the poison; and when this was unavailing, he attempted to stab himself. The blow was not mortal; and a Gaul, who was then present, at his own request, gave him the fatal stroke, about 63 years before the Christian era, in the 72d year of his age. Such were the misfortunes, abilities, and miserable end of a man, who supported himself so long against the power of Rome; and who, according to the declaration of the Roman authors, proved a more powerful and indefatigable adversary to the capital of Italy, than the great Annibal, and Pyrrhus, Perseus, or Antiochus. Mithridates has been commended for his eminent virtues and censured for his vices. As a commander, he deserves the most unbounded applause; and it may create admiration to see him waging war with such success during so many years, against the most powerful people on earth, led to the field by a Sylla, a Lucullus, and a Pompey. He was the greatest monarch that ever sat on a throne, according to the opinion of Cicero; and, indeed, no better proof of his military character can be brought, than the mention of the great rejoicings which happened in the Roman armies and in the capital at the news of his death. No less than twelve days were appointed for public thanksgivings to the immortal gods; and Pompey, who had sent the first intelligence of his death to Rome, and who had partly hastened his fall, was rewarded with the most uncommon honours. Vid. Ampia lex. It is said that Mithridates conquered 24 nations, whose different languages he knew, and spoke with the same ease and fluency as his own. As a man of letters he also deserves attention. He was acquainted with the Greek language, and even wrote in that dialect a treatise on botany. His skill in physic is well known, and even now there is a celebrated antidote which bears his name, and is called Mithridate. Superstition, as well as nature, had united to render him great; and if we rely upon the authority of Justin, his birth was accompanied by the appearance of two large comets, which were seen for seventy days successively, and whose splendour eclipsed the midday sun, and covered the fourth part of the heavens. Justin. 37, c. 1, &c.—Strab.—Diod. 14.—Flor. 3, c. 5, &c.—Plut. in Syll.—*Luc. MITHRIDĀTĪCUM BELLUM, begun 89 years B. C. was one of the longest and most celebrated wars ever carried on by the Romans against a foreign power. Three Roman officers, L. Cassius, the pro-consul, M. Aquilius, and Q. Oppius, opposed Mithridates with the troops of Bithynia, Cappadocia, Paphlagonia, and Gallogræcia. The army of these provinces, together with the Roman soldiers in Asia, amounted to 70,000 men and 6000 horse. The forces of the king of Pontus were greatly superior to these; he led 250,000 foot, 40,000 horse, and 130 armed chariots, into the field of battle, under the command of Neoptolemus and Archelaus. His fleet consisted of 400 ships of war, well manned and provisioned. In an engagement, the king of Pontus obtained the victory, and dispersed the Roman forces in Asia. He became master of the greatest part of Asia, and the Hellespont submitted to his power. Two of the Roman generals were taken, and M. Aquilius, who was the principal cause of the war, was carried about in Asia, and exposed to the ridicule and insults of the populace, and at last put to death by Mithridates, who ordered melted gold to be poured down his throat as a slur upon the avidity of the Romans. The conqueror took every possible advantage; he subdued all the islands of the Ægean sea, and, though Rhodes refused to submit to his power, yet all Greece was soon overrun by his general Archelaus, and made tributary to the kingdom of Pontus. Meanwhile, the Romans, incensed against Mithridates on account of his perfidy, and of his cruelty in massacring 80,000 of their countrymen in one day all over Asia, appointed Sylla to march into the east. Sylla landed in Greece, where the inhabitants readily acknowledged his power; but Athens shut her gates against the Roman commander, and Archelaus, who defended it, defeated, with the greatest courage, all the efforts and operations of the enemy. This spirited defence was of short duration. Archelaus retreated into Bœotia, where Sylla soon followed him. The two hostile armies drew up in a line of battle near Chæronea, and the Romans obtained the victory; and, of the almost innumerable forces of the Asiatics, no more than 10,000 escaped. Another battle in Thessaly, near Orchomenos, proved equally fatal to the king of Pontus. Dorylaus, one of his generals, was defeated, and he soon after sued for peace. Sylla listened to the terms of accommodation, as his presence at Rome was now become necessary to quell the commotions and cabals which his enemies had raised against him. He pledged himself to the king of Pontus to confirm him in the possession of his dominions, and to procure him the title of friend and ally of Rome; and Mithridates consented to relinquish Asia and Paphlagonia, to deliver Cappadocia to Ariobarzanes, and Bithynia to Nicomedes; and to pay to the Romans 2000 talents to defray the expenses of the war, and to deliver into their hands 70 galleys with all their rigging. Though Mithridates seemed to have re-established peace in his dominions, yet Fimbria, whose sentiments were contrary to those of Sylla, and who made himself master of an army by intrigue and oppression, kept him under continual alarms, and rendered the existence of his power precarious. Sylla, who had returned from Greece to ratify the treaty which had been made with Mithridates, rid the world of the tyrannical Fimbria; and the king of Pontus, awed by the resolution and determined firmness of his adversary, agreed to the conditions, though with reluctance. The hostile preparations of Mithridates, which continued in the time of peace, became suspected by the Romans; and Muræna, who was left as governor of Asia in Sylla's absence, and who wished to make himself known by some conspicuous action, began hostilities by taking Comana, and plundering the temple of Bellona. Mithridates did not oppose him, but he complained of the breach of peace before the Roman senate. Muræna was publicly reprimanded; but, as he did not cease from hostilities, it was easily understood that he acted by the private directions of the Roman people. The king upon this marched against him, and a battle was fought, in which both the adversaries claimed the victory. This was the last blow which the king of Pontus received in this war, which is called the second Mithridatic war, and which continued for about three years. Sylla, at that time, was made perpetual dictator at Rome, and he commanded Muræna to retire from the kingdom of Mithridates. The death of Sylla changed the face of affairs; the treaty of peace between the king of Pontus and the Romans, which had never been committed to writing, demanded frequent explanations, and Mithridates at last threw off the mask of friendship, and declared war. Nicomedes, at his death, left his kingdom to the Romans; but Mithridates disputed their right to the possessions of the deceased monarch, and entered the field with 120,000 men, besides a fleet of 400 ships in his ports, 16,000 horsemen to follow him, and 100 chariots armed with scythes. Lucullus was appointed over Asia, and intrusted with the care of the Mithridatic war. His valour and prudence showed his merit; and Mithridates, in his vain attempts to take Cyzicum, lost no less than 300,000 men. Success continually attended the Roman arms. The king of Pontus was defeated in several bloody engagements, and with difficulty saved his life, and retired to his son-in-law, Tigranes, king of Armenia. Lucullus pursued him, and when his application for the person of the fugitive monarch had been despised by Tigranes, he marched to the capital of Armenia, and terrified, by his sudden approach, the numerous forces of the enemy. A battle ensued. The Romans obtained an easy victory, and no less than 100,000 foot of the Armenians perished, and only five men of the Romans were killed. Tigranocerta, the rich capital of the country, fell into the conqueror's hands. After such signal victories, Lucullus had the mortification to see his own troops mutiny, and to be dispossessed of the command by the arrival of Pompey. The new general showed himself worthy to succeed Lucullus. He defeated Mithridates, and rendered his affairs so desperate, that the monarch fled for safety into the country of the Scythians, where, for a while, he meditated the ruin of the Roman empire; and, with more wildness than prudence, secretly resolved to invade Italy by land, and march an army across the northern wilds of Asia and Europe to the Apennines. Not only the kingdom of Mithridates had fallen into the enemy's hands, but also all the neighbouring kings and princes were subdued; and Pompey saw prostrate at his feet Tigranes himself, that king of kings, who had lately treated the Romans with such contempt. Meantime, the wild projects of Mithridates terrified his subjects; and they, fearful to accompany him in a march of above 2000 miles across a barren and uncultivated country, revolted, and made his son king. The monarch, forsaken in his old age, even by his own children, put an end to his life, (Vid. Mithridates VII.) and gave the Romans cause to rejoice, as the third Mithridatic war was ended in his fall, B. C. 63. The duration of the Mithridatic war is not precisely known. According to Justin, Orosius, Florus, and Eutropius, it lasted for forty years; but the opinion of others, who fix its duration to 30 years, is far more credible; and, indeed, by proper calculation, there elapsed no more than 26 years from the time that Mithridates first entered the field against the Romans till the time of his death. Appian. in Mithrid.—Justin, 37, &c.—Flor. 2, &c.—Liv.—Plut. in Luc. &c.—Orosius.—Paterc.—Dion.

Moses, a celebrated legislator and general among the Jews, well known in sacred history. He was born in Egypt, 1571, B. C. and after he had performed his miracles before Pharaoh, conducted the Israelites through the Red Sea, and gave them laws and ordinances during their peregrination of 40 years in the wilderness of Arabia. He died at the age of 120. His writings have been quoted and recommended by several of the heathen authors, who have divested themselves of their prejudices against a Hebrew, and extolled his learning and the effects of his wisdom. Longinus.—Diod. 1.

C. 147, He destroyed Corinth, Thebes, and Chalcis, by order of the senate, and obtained the surname of Achaicus from his victories. He did not enrich himself with the spoils of the enemy, but returned home without any increase of fortune. He was so unacquainted with the value of the paintings and works of the most celebrated artists of Greece, which were found in the plunder of Corinth, that he said to those who conveyed them to Rome, that if they lost them or injured them they should make others in their stead. Paterc. 1, c. 13.—Strab. 8.—Plin. 34, c. 7, l. 37, c. 1.—Flor. 2, c. 6.—Paus. 5, c. 24.

Munatius, Plancus, I. a consul sent to the rebellious army of Germanicus. He was almost killed by the incensed soldiery, who suspected that it was through him that they had not all been pardoned and indemnified by a decree of the senate. Calpurnius rescued him from their fury.——II. An orator and disciple of Cicero. His father, grandfather, and great-grandfather, bore the same name. He was with Cæsar in Gaul, and was made consul with Brutus. He promised to favour the republican cause for some time, but he deserted again to Cæsar. He was long Antony's favourite, but he left him at the battle of Actium, to conciliate the favours of Octavius. His services were great in the senate; for, through his influence and persuasion, that venerable body flattered the conqueror of Antony with the appellation of Augustus. He was rewarded with the office of censor. Plut. in Ant.

Murena, a celebrated Roman, left at the head of the armies of the republic in Asia by Sylla. He invaded the dominions of Mithridates with success, but soon after met with a defeat. He was honoured with a triumph at his return to Rome. He commanded one of the wings of Sylla's army at the battle against Archelaus near Chæronea. He was ably defended in an oration by Cicero when his character was attacked and censured. Cic. pro Mur.—Appian. de Mithrid.

He was not so successful in recommending the use of the cold bath to Marcellus as he had been to Augustus, and his illustrious patient died under his care. Two small treatises, de herbâ Betonicâ, and de tuendâ Valetudine, are supposed to be the productions of his pen. ——II. A daughter of Nicomedes, king of Bithynia. and sister of Metellus Celer. She was Pompey's third wife. Her incontinent behaviour so disgusted her husband, that, at his return from the Mithridatic war, he divorced her, though she had borne him three children. She afterwards married M. Scaurus. Augustus greatly esteemed her. Plut in Pomp.——II. A wife of Julius Cæsar, beloved by Clodius the tribune. Suet. in Cæs. 50.——III. The mother of Augustus.

Mutia Lex, the same as that which was enacted by Licinius Crassus and Q. Mutius, A. U. C. 657. Vid Licinia Lex.

Mutines, one of Annibal's generals, who was honoured with the freedom of Rome on delivering up Agrigentum. Liv. 25, c. 41, l. 27, c. 5.

Mutius, I. the father-in-law of C. Marius.——II. A Roman, who saved the life of young Marius, by conveying him away from the pursuits of his enemies in a load of straw.——III. A friend of Tiberius Gracchus, by whose means he was raised to the office of a tribune.——IV. C. Scævola, surnamed Cordus, because famous for his courage and intrepidity. When Porsenna, king of Etruria, had beseiged Rome, Mutius disguised himself in the habit of a Tuscan, and as he could fluently speak the language, he gained an easy introduction into the royal tent. Porsenna sat alone with his secretary when Mutius entered. The Roman rushed upon the secretary, and stabbed him to the heart, mistaking him for his royal master. This occasioned a noise, and Mutius, unable to escape, was seized and brought before the king. He gave no answers to the inquiries of the courtiers, and only told them that he was a Roman; and, to give them a proof of his fortitude, he laid his right hand on an altar of burning coals, and, sternly looking at the king, and without uttering a groan, he boldly told him that 300 young Romans like himself had conspired against his life, and entered his camp in disguise, determined either to destroy him or perish in the attempt. This extraordinary confession astonished Porsenna; he made peace with the Romans, and retired from their city. Mutius obtained the surname of Scævola, because he had lost the use of his right hand by burning it in the presence of the Etrurian king. Plut in Par.—Flor. 1, c. 10.—Liv. 2, c. 12.——V. Q. Scævola, a Roman consul. He obtained a victory over the Dalmatians, and signalized himself greatly in the Marsian war. He is highly commended by Cicero, whom he instructed in the study of civil law. Cic.—Plut.——VI. Another, appointed proconsul of Asia, which he governed with so much popularity, that he was generally proposed to others as a pattern of equity and moderation. Cicero speaks of him as eloquent, learned, and ingenious; equally eminent as an orator and as a lawyer. He was murdered in the temple of Vesta, during the civil war of Marius and Sylla, 82 years before Christ. Plut.—Cic. de Orat. 1, c. 48.—Paterc. 2, c. 22.

Mycerinus, a son of Cheops, king of Egypt. After the death of his father he reigned with great justice and moderation. Herodot. 2, c. 129.

Mycithus, a servant of Anaxilaus, tyrant of Rhegium. He was intrusted with the care of the kingdom, and of the children of the deceased prince, and he exercised his power with such fidelity and moderation, that he acquired the esteem of all the citizens, and at last restored the kingdom to his master's children when come to years of maturity, and retired to peace and solitude with a small portion. He is called by some Micalus. Justin. 4, c. 2.

Mycon, a celebrated painter, who with others assisted in making and perfecting the Pœcile of Athens. He was the rival of Polygnotus. Plin. 33 and 35.

Myrmidones. Vid. Part I.

Myron, a celebrated statuary of Greece, peculiarly happy in imitating nature. He made a cow so much resembling life, that even bulls were deceived, and approached her as if alive, as is frequently mentioned by many epigrams in the Anthologia. He flourished about 442 years before Christ. Ovid. Art. Am. 3, v. 319.—Paus.—Juv. 8.—Propert. 2, el. 41.

Myrsilus, a son of Mersus, the last of the Heraclidæ who reigned in Lydia. He is also called Candaules, Vid. Candaules.

Myrtis, a Greek woman, who distinguished herself by her poetical talents. She flourished about 500 years B. C. and instructed the celebrated Corinna in the several rules of versification. Pindar himself, as some report, was also one of her pupils.

Mys, (mys,) an artist famous in working and polishing silver. He beautifully represented the battle of the Centaurs and Lapithæ on a shield in the hand of Minerva's statue made by Phidias. Paus. 1, c. 28.—Martial. 8, ep. 34 and 51, l. 14, ep. 93.—Propert. 3, el. 9, c. 14.

Myscellus, or Miscellus, a native of Rhypæ in Achaia, who founded Crotona in Italy, according to an oracle, which told him to build a city where he found rain with fine weather. The meaning of the oracle long perplexed him, till he found a beautiful woman all in tears in Italy, which circumstance he interpreted in his favour. According to some, Myscellus, who was the son of Hercules, went out of Argos, without the permission of the magistrates, for which he was condemned to death. The judges had put each a black ball as a sign of condemnation, but Hercules changed them all and made them white, and had his son acquitted; upon which Myscellus left Greece, and came to Italy, where he built Crotona. Ovid. Met. 15, v. 19.—Strab. 6 and 8.—Suidas.

Mystes, a son of the poet Valgius, whose early death was so lamented by the father, that Horace wrote an ode to allay the grief of his friend. Horat. 2, od. 9.

Mythecus, a sophist of Syracuse. He studied cookery, and when he thought himself sufficiently skilled in dressing meat, he went to Sparta, where he gained much practice, especially among the younger citizens. He was soon after expelled the city by the magistrates, who observed, that the aid of Mythecus was unnecessary, as hunger was the best seasoning.

N.

Nabazanes, an officer of Darius third, at the battle of Issus. He conspired with Bessus to murder his royal master, either to obtain the favour of Alexander, or to seize the kingdom. He was pardoned by Alexander. Curt. 3, &c.—Diod. 17.

NABIS, a celebrated tyrant of Lacedæmon, who in all acts of cruelty and oppression surpassed a Phalaris or a Dionysius. When he had exercised every art in plundering the citizens of Sparta, he made a statue, which in resemblance was like his wife, and was clothed in the most magnificent apparel; and whenever any one refused to deliver up his riches, the tyrant led him to the statue, which immediately, by means of secret springs, seized him in its arms, and tormented him in the most excruciating manner with bearded points and prickles hid under the clothes. Nabis made an alliance with Flaminius, the Roman general, and pursued, with the most inveterate enmity, the war which he had undertaken against the Achæans. He besieged Gythium, and defeated Philopœmen in a naval battle. His triumph was short; the general of the Achæans soon repaired his losses, and Nabis was defeated in an engagement, and treacherously murdered as he attempted to save his life by flight, B. C. 192, after a usurpation of 14 years. Polyb. 13.—Justin. 30 and 31.—Plut. in Phil.—Pous. 7, c. 8.—Flor. 2, c. 7.

NABONASSAR, a king of Babylon, after the division of the Assyrian monarchy. From him the Nabonassarean epoch received its name, agreeing with the year of the world 3237, or 746 B. C.

NÆVIUS, (CN.) I. a native of Campania, was the first imitator of the regular dramatic works which had been produced by Livius Andronicus. He served in the first Punic war, and his earliest plays were represented at Rome in the year 519. The names of his tragedies, from which as few fragments remain as from those of Livius, are still preserved:—Alcestis, (from which there is yet extant a description of old age in rugged and barbarous verse)—Danae, Dulorestes, Hesiona, Hector, Iphigenia, Lycurgus, Phœnissæ, Protesilaus, and Telephus. All these were translated, or closely imitated, from the works of Euripides, Anaxandrides, and other Greek dramatists. Cicero commends a passage in the Hector, one of the above-mentioned tragedies, where the hero of the piece delighted with the praises which he had received from his father Priam, exclaims:—

'—— Lætus sum
Laudari me abs te, pater, laudato viro.'

Nævius, however, was accounted a better comic than tragic poet. Cicero has given us some specimens of his jests, with which that celebrated wit and orator appears to have been greatly amused; but they consist rather in unexpected turns of expression, or a play of words, than in genuine humour. Unfortunately for Nævius, he did not always confine himself in his comedies to such inoffensive jests. The dramas of Magna Græcia and Sicily, especially those of Epicharmus, were the prototypes of the older Greek comedy; and accordingly the most ancient Latin plays, particularly those of Nævius, which were formed on the same school, though there be no evidence that they ridiculed political events, partook of the personal satire and invective which pervaded the productions of Aristophanes. If, as is related, the comedies of Nævius were directed against the vices and corporal defects of the consuls and senators of Rome, he must have been the most original of the Latin comic poets, and infinitely more so than Plautus or Terence; since, although he may have parodied or copied the dramatic fables of the ancient Greek or Sicilian comedies, the spirit and colouring of the particular scenes must have been his own. The elder Scipio was one of the chief objects of his satiric representations, and the poetic severity with which Aristophanes persecuted Socrates or Euripides, was hardly more indecent and misdirected than the sarcasms of Nævius against the greatest captain, the most accomplished scholar, and the most virtuous citizen of his age. Nevius, however, did not long escape with impunity. Rome was a very different sort of republic from Athens: it was rather an aristocracy than a democracy, and its partisans were not always disposed to tolerate the taunts and insults which the chiefs of the Greek democracy were obliged to endure. Nævius had said, in one of his verses, that the patrician family of the Matelli had frequently obtained the consulship before the age permitted by law, and he insinuated that they had been promoted to this dignity, not in consequence of their virtues, but the cruelty of the Roman fate:

'Fato Metelli Romæ fiunt Consules.'

With the assistance of the other patricians, the Metelli retorted his sarcasms in a Saturnian stanza, not unlike the measure of some of our old ballads, in which they threatened to play the devil with their witty persecutor:—

'Et Nævio Poetæ,
Cum sæpe lacerarentur,
Dabunt malum Metelli,
Dabunt malum Metelli,
Dabunt malum Metelli.'

The Metelli, however, did not confine their vengeance to the ingenious and spirited satire, in the composition of which, it may be presumed that the whole Roman senate was engaged. On account of the unceasing abuse and reproaches which he had uttered against them, and other chief men of the city, he was thrown into prison, where he wrote his comedies, the Hariolus and Leontes. These plays being in some measure intended as a recantation of his former invectives, he was liberated by the tribunes of the people. He soon, however, relapsed into his former courses, and continued to persecute the nobility in his dramas and satires with such implacable dislike, that he was at length driven from Rome by their influence, and having retired to Utica, he died there, in the year 550, according to Cicero; but Varro fixes his death somewhat later. Before leaving Rome, he had composed the following epitaph on himself, which Gellius remarks is full of Campanian arrogance; though the import of it, he adds, might be allowed to be true, had it been written by another:—

'Mortales immortales flere si foret fas,
Flerent divæ Camenæ Nævium poetam;
Itaque postquam est Orcino traditus thesauro,
Oblitei sunt Romæ loquier Latina lingua.'

Besides his comedies and the above epitaph, Nævius was also author of the Cyprian Iliad, a translation from a Greek poem, called the Cyprian Epic. Aristotle, in the 23d chapter of his Poetics, mentions the original work, (τα κυπρια,) which, he says, had furnished many subjects for the drama. Some writers, particularly Pindar, have attributed this Greek poem to Homer; and there was long an idle story current, that he had given it as a portion to his daughter Arsephone. Herodotus, in his second book, concludes, after some critical discussion, that it was not written by Homer, but that it was doubtless the work of a contemporary poet, or one who lived shortly after him. Heyne thinks it most probable, that it was by a poet called Stasinus, a native of the island of Cyprus, and that it received its name from the country of its author. Whoever may have written this Cyprian Epic, it contained twelve books, and was probably a work of amorous and romantic fiction. It commenced with the nuptials of Thetis and Peleus—it related the contention of the three goddesses on mount Ida—the fables concerning Palamedes—the story of the daughters of Anius—and the love adventures of the Phrygian fair during the early period of the siege of Troy—and it terminated with the council of the gods, at which it was resolved that Achilles should be withdrawn from the war, by sowing dissension between him and Atrides. A metrical chronicle, which chiefly related the events of the first Punic war, was another, and probably the last work of Nævius, since Cicero says, that in writing it he filled up the leisure of his latter days with wonderful complacency and satisfaction. Cic. Tusc. 1, c. 1. de Senect.—Horat. 2, ep. 1, c. 53. ——II. An augur in the reign of Tarquin. To convince the king and the Romans of his power as an augur, he cut a flint with a razor, and turned the ridicule of the populace into admiration. The razor and flint were buried under an altar, and it was usual among the Romans to make witnesses in civil causes swear near it. Dionys. Hal.—Liv. 1, c. 36.—Cic. de divin. 1, c 17, de N. D. 2, ç. 3, l. 3, c. 6.

Narcissus, a freedman and secretary of Claudius, who abused his trust and the infirmities of his imperial master, and plundered the citizens of Rome to enrich himself. Messalina, the emperor's wife, endeavoured to remove him, but Narcissus sacrificed her to his avarice and resentment. Agrippina, who succeeded in the place of Messalina, was more successful. Narcissus was banished by her intrigues, and compelled to kill himself, A. D. 54. Vid. Part III.

Nasica, the surname of one of the Scipios. Nasica was the first who invented the measuring of time by water, B. C. 159, about 134 years after the introduction of sundials at Rome. Vid. Scipio.——An avaricious fellow, who married his daughter to Coranus, a man as mean as himself, that he might not only not repay the money he had borrowed, but moreover become his creditor's heir. Coranus, understanding his meaning, purposely alienated his property from him and his daughter, and exposed him to ridicule. Horat. 2, Sat. 5, v. 64, &c.

Nasidiēnus, a Roman knight, whose luxury, arrogance, and ostentation, exhibited at an entertainment he gave to Mecænas, were ridiculed by Horace, 2, Sat. 8.

Naucrātes, I. a Greek poet, who was employed by Artemisia to write a panegyric upon Mausolus.——II. An orator who endeavoured to alienate the cities of Lycia from the interest of Brutus.

Nausĭcaa, a daughter of Alcinous, king of the Phæaceans. She met Ulysses shipwrecked on her father's coasts, and it was to her humanity that he owed the kind reception he experienced from the king. She married, according to Aristotle and Dictys, Telemachus the son of Ulysses, by whom she had a son called Perseptolis or Ptoliporthus. Homer. Od. 6.—Paus. 5, c. 19.—Hygin. fab. 126.

Nautes, a Trojan soothsayer, who comforted Æneas when his fleet had been burnt in Sicily. Virg. Æn. 5, v. 704. He was the progenitor of the Nautii at Rome, a family to whom the palladium of Troy was, in consequence of the service of their ancestors, intrusted. Virg. Æn. 5, v. 794.

Nealices, a painter, amongst whose capital pieces are mentioned a painting of Venus, a seafight between the Persians and the Egyptians, and an ass drinking on the shore with a crocodile preparing to attack it.

Nearchus, an officer of Alexander in his Indian expedition. He was ordered to sail upon the Indian ocean with Onesicritus, and to examine it. He wrote an account of this voyage and of the king's life; but his veracity has been called in question by Arrian. After the king's death he was appointed over Lycia and Pamphylia. Curt. 9, c. 10.—Polyæn. 9.—Justin. 13, c. 4.—Strab. 2, &c.

Necnos, a king of Egypt, who attempted to make a communication between the Mediterranean and Red seas, B. C. 610. No less than 12,000 men perished in the attempt. It was discovered in his reign that Africa was circumnavigable. Herodot. 2, c. 158, l. 4, c. 42.

Nectanĕbus, and Nectanăbis, a king of Egypt, who defended his country against the Persians, and was succeeded by Tachos, B. C. 363. His grandson, of the same name, made an alliance with Agesilaus, king of Sparta, and with his assistance he quelled a rebellion of his subjects. Some time after, he was joined by the Sidonians, Phœnicians, and inhabitants of Cyprus, who had revolted from the king of Persia. This powerful confederacy was soon attacked by Darius, the king of Persia, who marched at the head of his troops. Nectanebus, to defend his frontiers against so dangerous an enemy, levied 20,000 mercenary soldiers in Greece, the same number in Libya, and 60,000 were furnished in Egypt. This numerous body was not equal to the Persian forces; and Nectanebus, defeated in a battle, gave up all hopes of resistance, and fled into Æthiopia, B. C. 350, where he found a safe asylum. His kingdom of Egypt became from that time tributary to the king of Persia. Plut. Ages.—Diod. 16, &c.—Polyæn. 2.—Nep. in Ages.

Nemesiănus, M. Aurel. Olymp., a Latin poet, born at Carthage, of no very brilliant talents, in the third century, whose poems on hunting and bird-catching were published by Burnam, inter scriptores rei venaticæ, 4to. L. Bat. 1728.

Nemesius, a Greek writer, whose elegant and useful treatise de Natura Hominis was edited in 12mo. Ant. apud Plant. 1565, and in 8vo. Oxon. 1671.

Neŏcles, I. an Athenian philosopher, father, er, according to Cicero, brother to the philosopher Epicurus. Cic. 1, de Nat. D. c. 21.—Diog.——II. The father of Themistocles. Ælian. V. H. 2, &c.—Cic. Nep. in Them.

Neon, one of the commanders of the ten thousand Greeks who assisted Cyrus against Artaxerxes.

Neoptolemus, I. a king of Epirus, son of Achilles and Deidamia, called Pyrrhus, from the yellow colour of his hair. He was carefully educated under the eye of his mother, and gave early proofs of his valour. After the death of Achilles, Calchas declared in the assembly of the Greeks that Troy could not be taken without the assistance of the son of the deceased hero. Immediately upon this Ulysses and Phœnix were commissioned to bring Pyrrhus to the war. He returned with them with pleasure, and received the name of Neoptolemus, (new soldier,) because he had come late to the field. His cruelty, however, was as great as that of his father. Not satisfied with breaking down the gates of Priam's palace, he exercised the greatest barbarity upon the remains of his family; and, without any regard to the sanctity of the place where Priam had taken refuge, he slaughtered him without mercy; or, according to others, dragged him by the hair to the tomb of his father, where he sacrificed him, and where he cut off his head, and carried it in exultation through the streets of Troy fixed on the point of a spear. He also sacrificed Astyanax to his fury, and immolated Polyxena on the tomb of Achilles, according to those who deny that that sacrifice was voluntary. When Troy was taken, the captives were divided among the conquerors, and Pyrrhus had for his share Andromache, the widow of Hector, and Helenus, the son of Priam. The place of his retirement after the Trojan war is not known. Some maintain that he went to Thessaly, where his grandfather still reigned; but this is confuted by others, who observe, perhaps with more reason, that he went to Epirus, where he laid the foundations of a new kingdom, because his grandfather Peleus had been deprived of his sceptre by Acastus the son of Pelias. Neoptolemus lived with Adromache after his arrival in Greece. He had a son by this unfortunate princess, called Molossus, and two others, if we rely on the authority of Pausanias. Besides Andromache, he married Hermione, the daughter of Menelaus, as also Lanassa, the daughter of Cleodæus, one of the descendants of Hercules. The cause of his death is variously related. Menelaus, before the Trojan war, had promised his daughter Hermione to Orestes, but the services he experienced from the valour and the courage of Neoptolemus, during the siege of Troy, induced him to reward his merit by making him his son-in-law. The nuptials were accordingly celebrated, but Orestes caused his rival to be assassinated in the temple of Delphi, and he was murdered at the foot of the altar by Machareus the priest, or by the hand of Orestes himself, according to Virgil, Paterculus, and Hyginus. Some say that he was murdered by the Delphians, who had been bribed by the presents of Orestes. He suffered the same death and the same barbarities which he had inflicted in the temple of Minerva upon the aged Priam and his wretched family. From this circumstance the ancients have made use of the proverb of Neoptolemus revenge when a person had suffered the same savage treatment which others had received from his hands. The Delphians celebrated a festival with great pomp and solemnity in memory of Neoptolemus, who had been slain in his attempt to plunder their temple, because, as they said, Apollo, the patron of the place, had been in some manner accessary to the death of Achilles. Paterc. 1, c. 1.—*Virg. He was made king of Epirus by the Epirots, who had revolted from their lawful sovereign, and was put to death when he attempted to poison his nephew, &c. Plut. in Pyrr.——III. A tragic poet of Athens, greatly favoured by Philip, king of Macedonia. When Cleopatra, the monarch's daughter, was married to Alexander of Epirus, he wrote some verses which proved to be prophetic of the tragical death of Philip. Diod. 16.——IV. A relation of Alexander. He was the first who climbed the walls of Gaza when that city was taken by Alexander. After the king's death he received Armenia as his province, and made war against Eumenes. He was supported by Craterus, but an engagement with Eumenes proved fatal to his cause. Craterus was killed, and himself mortally wounded by Eumenes, B. C. 321. C. Nep. in Eumen.

Nepherites, a king of Egypt, who assisted the Spartans against Persia when Agesilaus was in Asia. He sent them a fleet of 100 ships, which were intercepted by Conon as they were sailing towards Rhodes, &c. Diod. 14.

Nepos, (Corn.) I. the author of the Vitæ Excellentium Imperatorum, and the life of Titus Pomponius Atticus, the celebrated friend and correspondent of Cicero. There can be no doubt that an author of the name of Cornelius Nepos lived at Rome during this period, and enjoyed considerable celebrity. He is generally believed to have been born at Hostilia (now Ostiglia), a small town situated on the banks of the Po, near the confines of the Veronese and Mantuan territories. The year of his birth is uncertain, but he first came to Rome during the dictatorship of Julius Cæsar. He does not appear to have filled any public office in the state; but his merit soon procured him the friendship of the most eminent men who at that time adorned the capital of the world. Catullus dedicated to him the volume of poems, which he had privately read and approved of before their publication. Nepos addressed one of his own works to Pomponius Atticus, with whom also he was on terms of intimacy. He likewise obtained the esteem and affection of Cicero, who speaks of his writings with high approbation in one of his letters, and in another alludes with much sympathy to the loss which Nepos had sustained by the death of a favourite son. It farther appears, that Cicero had frequently corresponded with him, for Macrobius quotes the second book of that orator's epistles to Cornelius Nepos. It is thus probable that some of our author's works had been prepared, or were in the course of composition, previous to the death of Cicero; but they were not given to the public till early in the reign of Augustus, since Eusebius considers him as flourishing in the fourth year of that emperor. The precise period of his death is unknown, and it can only be ascertained that he survived Atticus, whose biography he writes, and who died in the 722d year of the city. Some chronological accounts extend his life till the commencement of the Christian era, but it is scarcely possible that one who was a distinguished literary character in the time of Catullus could have existed till that epoch. Whether the Cornelius Nepos, concerning whose life these circumstances have been gleaned, was the author of the well-known book entitled Vitæ Excellentium Imperatorum, has been a subject, ever since it was first printed, of much debate and controversy among critics and commentators. The discussion originated in the following circumstances:—A person of the name, of Æmilius Probus, who lived in the fourth century, during the reign of Theodosius the Great, presented to his sovereign a copy of the Vitæ Imperatorum, and prefixed to it some barbarous verses, which left it doubtful whether he meant to announce himself as the author, or merely as the transcriber, of the work. To myself it appears, that after allowing for the superior dignity of the office of a transcriber in the age of Theodosius, compared with its diminished importance at the present day, there is something more implied in the verses of Probus than that he was merely a copyist, and he must either have had a part in the composition, or, having discovered the MS., was not unwilling that he should have some share of the credit due to the author. The Vitæ Imperatorum, properly so called, contains the lives of nineteen Greek, one Persian, and two Carthaginian generals. It has been conjectured, that there was also a series of lives of Roman commanders, but that these had perished before Æmilius Probus commenced his transcription. That Nepos at least intended to write these biographies, appears from a passage at the end of the life of Hannibal, in which he says: 'it is now time to conclude this book, and proceed to the lives of the Roman generals, that their exploits, being compared with those of the Greeks, it may be judged which are to be preferred.' That he actually accomplished this task is rendered at least probable, from the circumstance of Plutarch quoting the authority of Nepos, for facts concerning the lives of Marcellus and Lucullus; and it seems not unlikely, that the sentence at the close of Hannibal, may have suggested to that biographer the idea of his parallel lives. The principles which Nepos displays in that part of the work which still remains, are those of an admirer of virtue, a foe to vice, and a supporter of the cause of freedom. It was written in the crisis of his country's fate, and during her last struggles for liberty, when despotism was impending, but the hope of freedom was not yet extinguished in the breasts of the last of the Romans. The work, it has been conjectured, was undertaken to fan the expiring flame, by exhibiting the example of such men as Dion and Timoleon, and by inserting sentiments which were appropriate to the times. In choosing the subjects of his biographies, the author chiefly selects those heroes who had maintained or recovered the liberties of their country, and he passes over all that bears no reference to this favourite theme. Nepos appears to have been a very fertile writer. Besides the lives of commanders and that of Pomponius Atticus, he was the author of several works, chiefly of a historical description, which are now almost entirely lost. He wrote, in three books, an abridgment of the history of the world; and he had the merit of being the first author among the Romans who completed a task of this laborious and useful description. Aulus Gellius mentions his life of Cicero, and quotes the fifth book of his work, entitled Exemplorum Libri. He also composed a treatise on the difference of the terms literatus and eruditus; and, finally, a book De Historicis Græcis. Among the many good editions of Cornelius Nepos, two may be selected as the best, that of Verheyk, 8vo. L. Bat. 1773, and that of Glasgow, 12mo. 1761.——II. Julius, an emperor of the west, &c.

Nepotianus, (Flavius Popilius,) a son of Eutropia, the sister of the emperor Constantine. He proclaimed himself emperor after the death of his cousin Constans, and rendered himself odious by his cruelty and oppression. He was murdered by Anicetus, after one month's reign, and his family were involved in his ruin.

Nero, I. (Claud. Domitius Cæsar,) a celebrated Roman emperor, son of Caius Domitius Ahenobarbus and Agrippina, the daughter of Germanicus. He was adopted by the emperor Claudius, A. D. 50, and four years after he succeeded to him on the throne. The beginning of his reign was marked by acts of the greatest kindness and condescension, by affability, complaisance, and popularity; and when he was desired to sign his name to a list of malefactors that were to be executed, he exclaimed, I wish to Heaven I could not write. These promising virtues were soon discovered to be artificial, and Nero displayed the propensities of his nature. He delivered himself from the sway of his mother, and at last ordered her to be assassinated. Many of his courtiers shared the unhappy fate of Agrippina, and Nero sacrificed to his fury or caprice all such as obstructed his pleasure or diverted his inclination. He also turned actor, and publicly appeared on the Roman stage in the meanest characters. In his attempts to excel in music, and to conquer the disadvantages of a hoarse rough voice, he moderated his meals, and often passed the day without eating. The celebrity of the Olympian games attracted his notice. He passed into Greece, and presented himself as a candidate for the public honour. He was defeated in wrestling, but the flattery of the spectators adjudged him the victory. He disguised himself in the habit of a woman, and was publicly married to one of his eunuchs. This violence to nature and decency was soon exchanged for another: Nero resumed his sex, and celebrated his nuptials with one of his meanest catamites; and it was on this occasion that one of the Romans observed, that the world would have been happy if Nero's father had had such a wife. He sacrificed to his wantonness his wife Octavia Poppæa, and the celebrated writers, Seneca, Lucan, Petronius, &c. The Christians also did not escape his barbarity. He had heard of the burning of Troy; and as he wished to renew that dismal scene, he caused Rome to be set on fire in different places. The conflagration became soon universal, and during nine successive days the fire was unextinguished. Nero placed himself on the top of a high tower, and sang on his lyre the destruction of Troy; a dreadful scene, which his barbarity had realized before his eyes. He built himself a celebrated palace, which he called his golden house. It was profusely adorned with gold, with precious stones, and with whatever was rare and exquisite. It contained spacious fields, artificial lakes, woods, gardens, orchards, and whatever could exhibit beauty and grandeur. The entrance of this edifice could admit a large colossus of the emperor 120 feet high; the galleries were each a mile long, and the whole was covered with gold. The roofs of the dining-halls represented the firmament, in motion as well as in figure, and continually turned round night and day, showering down all sorts of perfumes and sweet waters. When this grand edifice, which, according to Pliny, extended all round the city, was finished, Nero said that now he could lodge like a man. This continuation of debauchery and extravagance at last roused the resentment of the people. Many conspiracies were formed against the emperor, but they were generally discovered, and such as were accessary suffered the greatest punishments. The most dangerous conspiracy against Nero's life was that of Piso, from which he was delivered by the confession of a slave. The conspiracy of Galba proved more successful; and the conspirator, when he was informed that his plot was known to Nero, declared himself emperor. The unpopularity of Nero favoured his cause; he was acknowledged by all the Roman empire, and the senate condemned the tyrant that sat on the throne to be dragged naked through the streets of Rome, and whipped to death, and afterwards to be thrown down from the Tarpeian rock like the meanest malefactor. This, however, was not done; and Nero, by a voluntary death, prevented the execution of the sentence. He killed himself, A. D. 68, in the 32d year of his age, after a reign of 13 years and eight months. The tyrant, as he expired, begged that his head might not be cut off from his body, and exposed to the insolence of the enraged populace, but that the whole might be burned on the funeral pile. His request was granted by one of Galba's freedmen, and his obsequies were performed with the usual ceremonies. Though his death seemed to be the source of universal gladness, yet many of his favourites lamented his fall, and were grieved to see that their pleasures and amusements were stopped by the death of the patron of debauchery and extravagance. Even the king of Parthia sent ambassadors to Rome to condole with the Romans, and to beg that they would honour and revere the memory of Nero. His statues were also crowned with garlands of flowers, and many believed that he was not dead, but that he would soon make his appearance, and take a due vengeance upon his enemies. Pliny calls him the common enemy and the fury of mankind; and in this he has been followed by all writers, who exhibit Nero as a pattern of the most execrable barbarity and unpardonable wantonness. Plut. in Galb.—Suet. in vitâ.—Plin. 7, c. 8, &c.—Dio. 64.—Aurel. Victor.—Tacit. Ann.——II. Claudius, a Roman general, sent into Spain to succeed the two Scipios. He suffered himself to be imposed upon by Asdrubal, and was soon after succeeded by young Scipio. He was afterwards made consul, and intercepted Asdrubal, who was passing from Spain into Italy with a large reinforcement for his brother Annibal. An engagement was fought near the river Metaurus, in which 56,000 of the Carthaginians were left on the field of battle, and great numbers taken prisoners, 207 B. C. Asdrubal, the Carthaginian general, was also killed, and his head cut off and thrown down into his brother's camp by the conquerors. Appian. in Han.—Oros. 4.—Liv. 27, &c.—Horat. 4, od. 4, v. 37.—Flor. 2, c. 6.—Val. Max. 4, c. 1.——III. A son of Germanicus, who was ruined by Sejanus, and banished from Rome by Tiberius. He died in the place of his exile. His death was voluntary, according to some. Suet. in Tib.—Domitian was called Nero, because his cruelties surpassed those of his predecessors, and also Calvus, from the baldness of his head. Juv. 4.—The Neros were of the Claudian family, which, during the republican times of Rome, was honoured with 28 consulships, five dictatorships, six triumphs, seven censorships, and two ovations. They assumed the surname of Nero, which, in the language of the Sabines, signifies strong and warlike.

NERÓNIA, a name given to Artaxata by Tiridates, who had been restored to his kingdom by Nero, whose favours he acknowledged by calling the capital of his dominions after the name of his benefactor.

NERVA COCCEIUS, I. a Roman emperor, after the death of Domitian, A. D. 96. He rendered himself popular by his mildness, his generosity, and the active part he took in the management of affairs. He suffered no statues to be raised to his honour, and he applied to the use of the government all the gold and silver statues which flattery had erected to his predecessor. In his civil character he was the pattern of good manners, of sobriety, and temperance. He forbade the mutilation of male children, and gave no countenance to the law which permitted the marriage of an uncle with his niece. He made a solemn declaration that no senator should suffer death during his reign; and this he observed with such sanctity, that, when two members of the senate had conspired against his life, he was satisfied to tell them that he was informed of their wicked machinations. He also conducted them to the public spectacles, and seated himself between them, and when a sword was offered to him, according to the usual custom, he desired the conspirators to try it upon his body. Such goodness of heart, such confidence in the self-conviction of the human mind, and such reliance upon the consequence of his lenity and indulgence, conciliated the affection of all his subjects. Yet the prætorian guards at last mutinied, and Nerva nearly yielded to their fury. He uncovered his aged neck in the presence of the incensed soldiery, and bade them wreak their vengeance upon him, provided they spared the lives of those to whom he was indebted for the empire, and whom his honour commanded him to defend. His seeming submission was unavailing, and he was at last obliged to surrender to the fury of his soldiers some of his friends and supporters. The infirmities of his age, and his natural timidity, at last obliged him to provide himself against any future mutiny or tumult, by choosing a worthy successor. He had many friends and relations, but he did not consider the aggrandizement of his family, and he chose for his son and successor Trajan, a man of whose virtues and greatness of mind he was fully convinced. He died on the 27th of July, A. D. 98, in his 72d year, and his successor showed his respect for his merit and his character by raising him altars and temples in Rome, and in the provinces, and by ranking him in the number of the gods. Nerva was the first Roman emperor who was of foreign extraction, his father being a native of Crete. Plin. paneg.—Diod. 69.——II. M. Cocceius, a consul in the reign of Tiberius. He starved himself, because he would not be concerned in the extravagance of the emperor.——III. A celebrated lawyer, consul with the emperor Vespasian. He was father to the emperor of that name.

Nestŏcles, a famous statuary of Greece, rival of Phidias. Plin. 34, c. 8.

Nestor, a son of Neleus and Chloris, nephew to Pelias, and grandson to Neptune. He had eleven brothers, who were all killed, with his father, by Hercules. As king of Pylos and Messenia he led his subjects to the Trojan war, where he distinguished himself, among the rest of the Grecian chiefs, by eloquence, address, wisdom, justice, and an uncommon prudence of mind. Homer displays his character as the most perfect of all his heroes; and Agamemnon exclaims, that if he had ten generals like Nestor, he should soon see the walls of Troy reduced to ashes. After the Trojan war, Nestor retired to Greece, where he enjoyed, in the bosom of his family, the peace and tranquillity which were due to his wisdom and to his old age. The manner and the time of his death are unknown; the ancients are all agreed that he lived three generations of men, which length of time some suppose to be 300 years, though, more probably, only 90, allowing 30 years for each generation. He had two daughters, Pisidice and Polycaste; and seven sons, Perseus, Straticus, Aretus, Echephron, Pisistratus, Antilochus, and Trasimedes. Nestor was one of the Argonauts, according to Valerius Flaccus, 1, v. 380, &c.—Dictys Cret. 1, c. 13, &c.—*Homer. Nestorius, a bishop of Constantinople, who flourished A. D. 431. He was condemned and degraded from his episcopal dignity for his heretical opinions, &c.

Nicagŏras, a sophist of Athens, in the reign of the emperor Philip. He wrote the lives of illustrious men, and was reckoned one of the greatest and most learned men of his age.

Nicander, I. a king of Sparta, son of Charillus, of the family of the Proclidæ. He reigned 39 years, and died B. C. 770.——II. A Greek grammarian, poet, and physician, of Colophon, 137 B. C. His writings were held in estimation. Two of his poems, entitled Theriaca, on hunting, and Alexipharmaca, on antidotes against poison, are still extant; the best editions of which are those of Gorræus, with a translation in Latin verse by Grevinus, a physician at Paris, 4to. Paris, 1557, and Salvinus, 8vo. Florent. 1764. Cic. 1, de Orat. c. 16.

Nicănor, (Vid. Demetrius 2d,) I. a governor of Media, conquered by Seleucus. He had been governor over the Athenians under Cassander, by whose orders he was put to death.——II. A governor of Munychia, who seized the Piræus, and was at last put to death by Cassander, because he wished to make himself absolute over Attica. Diod. 18.——III. A general of Antiochus, king of Syria. He made war against the Jews, and showed himself uncommonly cruel.

Nicias, I. an Athenian general, celebrated for his valour and for his misfortunes. When Athens determined to make war against Sicily, Nicias was appointed, with Alcibiades and Lamachus, to conduct the expedition, which he reprobated as impolitic, and as the future cause of calamities to the Athenian power. In Sicily he behaved with great firmness, but he often blamed the quick and inconsiderate measures of his colleagues. The success of the Athenians remained long doubtful. Alcibiades was recalled by his enemies to take his trial, and Nicias was left at the head of affairs. Syracuse was surrounded by a wall, and though the operations were carried on slowly, yet the city would have surrendered, had not the sudden appearance of Gylippus, the Corinthian ally of the Sicilians, cheered up the courage of the besieged at the critical moment. Gylippus proposed terms of accommodation to the Athenians, which were refused; some battles were fought, in which the Sicilians obtained the advantage, and Nicias at last, tired of his ill success, and grown despondingdemanded of the Athenians a reinforcement or a successor. Demosthenes, upon this, was sent with a powerful fleet; but the advice of Nicias was despised, and the admiral, by his eagerness to come to a decisive engagement, ruined his fleet and the interest of Athens. Nicias gave himself up to the conquerors with all his army, and was shamefully put to death with Demosthenes. His troops were sent to quarries, where the plague and hard labour diminished their numbers and aggravated their misfortunes. Some suppose that the death of Nicias was not violent. He perished about 413 years before Christ, and the Athenians lamented in him a great and valiant, but unfortunate general. Plut. in vitâ.—C. Nep. in Alcib.—Thucyd. 4, &c.—Diod. 15.——II. A physician of Pyrrhus, king of Epirus, who made an offer to the Romans of poisoning his master for a sum of money. The Roman general disdained his offers, and acquainted Pyrrhus with his treachery. He is oftener called Cineas.

Nico, a celebrated architect and geometrician. He was father to the celebrated Galen, the prince of physicians.——The name of an ass which Augustus met before the battle of Actium, a circumstance which he considered as a favourable omen.——The name of an elephant, remarkable for his fidelity to king Pyrrhus.

Nicŏcles, I. a familiar friend of Phocion, condemned to death. Plut.——II. A king of Salamis, celebrated for his contest with a king of Phœnicia, to prove which of the two was most effeminate.——III. A king of Paphos, who reigned under the protection of Ptolemy, king of Egypt. He revolted from his friend to the king of Persia, upon which Ptolemy ordered one of his servants to put him to death, to strike terror into the other dependant princes. The servant, unwilling to murder the monarch, advised him to kill himself. Nicocles obeyed, and all his family followed the example, 310 years before the Christian era.——IV. An ancient Greek poet, who called physicians a happy race of men, because light published their good deeds to the world, and the earth hid all their faults and imperfections.——V. A king of Cyprus, who succeeded his father Evagoras on the throne, 374 years before Christ. It was with him that the philosopher Isocrates corresponded.——VI. A tyrant of Sicyon, deposed by means of Aratus the Achæan. Plut. in Arat.

Nicocrătes, I. a tyrant of Cyrene.——II. An author at Athens.——III. A king of Salamis in Cyprus; who made himself known by a valuable collection of books. Athen. 1.

Nicocreon, a tyrant of Salamis, in the age of Alexander the Great. He ordered the philosopher Anaxarchus to be pounded to pieces in a mortar.

Nicodēmus, I. an Athenian, appointed by Conon over the fleet which was going to the assistance of Artaxerxes. Diod. 14.——II. A tyrant of Italy, &c.——III. An ambassador sent to Pompey by Aristobulus.

Nicolāus, a celebrated Syracusan, who endeavoured to dissuade his countrymen from offering violence to the Athenian prisoners who had been taken with Nicias their general. His eloquence was unavailing.

Nicomăcha, a daughter of Themistocles.

Nicomăchus, the father of Aristotle, whose son also bore the same name. The philosopher composed his ten books of morals for the use and improvement of his son, and thence they are called Nicomachea. Suidas.

Nicomēdes, I. a king of Bithynia, about 278 years before the Christian era. It was by his exertions that this part of Asia became a monarchy. He behaved with great cruelty to his brothers, and built a town which he called by his own name, Nicomedia. Justin.—Paus. &c.——The 2d, was ironically surnamed Philopater, because he drove his father Prusias from the kingdom of Bithynia, and caused him to be assassinated, B. C. 149. He reigned 59 years. Mithridates laid claim to his kingdom, but all their disputes were decided by the Romans, who deprived Nicomedes of the province of Paphlagonia, and his ambitious rival of Cappadocia. He gained the affections of his subjects by a courteous behaviour, and by a mild and peaceful government. Justin.——The 3d, son and successor of the preceding, was dethroned by his brother Socrates, and afterwards by the ambitious Mithridates. The Romans reestablished him on his throne, and encouraged him to make reprisals upon the king of Pontus. He followed their advice, and he was, at last, expelled another time from his dominions, till Sylla came into Asia, who restored him to his former power and affluence. Strab.—Appian.——The fourth of that name, was son and successor of Nicomedes 3d. He passed his life in an easy and tranquil manner, and enjoyed the peace which his alliance with the Romans had procured him. He died B. C. 75, without issue, and left his kingdom, with all his possessions, to the Roman people. Strab. 12.—Appian. Mithr.—Just. 33, c. 2, &c.—Flor. 3, c. 5.

Nicostrăta, a courtesan, who left all her possessions to Sylla.—The same as Carmente, mother of Evander.

Nicostrătus, I. a man of Argos, of great strength. He was fond of imitating Hercules by clothing himself in a lion's skin. Diod. 16.——II. One of Alexander's soldiers. He conspired against the king's life with Hermolaus. Curt. 8.——III. A general of the Achæans, who defeated the Macedonians.

Niger, (C. Pescennius Justus,) a celebrated governor in Syria, well known by his valour in the Roman armies, while yet a private man. At the death of Pertinax he was declared emperor of Rome, and his claims to that elevated situation were supported by a sound understanding, prudence of mind, moderation, courage, and virtue. He proposed to imitate the actions of the venerable Antoninus, of Trajan, of Titus, and M. Aurelius. He was remarkable for his fondness for ancient discipline, and never suffered his soldiers to drink wine, but obliged them to quench their thirst with water and vinegar. He forbade the use of silver or gold utensils in his camp, all the bakers and cooks were driven away, and the soldiers ordered to live, during the expedition they undertook, merely upon biscuit. In his punishments Niger was inexorable; he condemned ten of his soldiers to be beheaded in the presence of his army, because they had stolen and eaten a fowl. The sentence was heard with groans; the army interfered; and when Niger consented to diminish the punishment for fear of kindling a rebellion, yet he ordered the criminals to make each a restoration of ten fowls to the person whose property they had stolen; they were, besides, ordered not to light a fire the rest of the campaign, but to live upon cold aliments and to drink nothing but water. Such great qualifications in a general seemed to promise the restoration of ancient discipline in the Roman armies, but the death of Niger frustrated every hope of reform. Severus, who had been invested with the imperial purple, marched against him; some battles were fought, and Niger was at last defeated, A. D. 194. His head was cut off, and fixed to a long spear, and carried in triumph through the streets of Rome. He reigned about one year. Herodian. 3.—Eutrop. Vid. Part I.

Nigidius Figŭlus, P. a celebrated philosopher and astrologer at Rome, one of the most learned men of his age. He was made prætor, and honoured with a seat in the senate. In the civil wars he followed the interests of Pompey, for which he was banished by the conqueror. He died in the place of his banishment 47 years before Christ. Cic. ad Fam. 4, ep. 13.—Lucan. 1, v. 639.

Nileus, a son of Codrus, who conducted a colony of Ionians to Asia, where he built Ephesus, Miletus, Priene, Colophon, Myus, Teos, Lebedos, Clazomenæ, &c. Paus. 7, c. 2, &c.

NINUS, a son of Belus, who built a city to which he gave his own name, and founded the Assyrian monarchy, of which he was the first sovereign, B. C. 2059. He was very warlike, and extended his conquests from Egypt to the extremities of India and Bactriana. He became enamoured of Semiramis, the wife of one of his officers, and he married her after her husband had destroyed himself through fear of his powerful rival. Ninus reigned 52 years, and at his death he left his kingdom to the care of his wife Semiramis, by whom he had a son. Ninus after death received divine honours, and became the Jupiter of the Assyrians and the Hercules of the Chaldeans. Ctesias.—Diod. 2.—Justin. 1, c. 1.—Herodot. 2. Vid. Part I.

NINYAS, a son of Ninus and Semiramis, king of Assyria, who succeeded his mother, who had voluntarily abdicated the crown. The reign of Ninyas is remarkable for its luxury and extravagance. Justin. 1, c. 2.—Diod. 1, &c.

NISUS, a son of Hyrtacus, born on mount Ida, near Troy. He came to Italy with Æneas, and signalized himself by his valour against the Rutulians. He was united in the closest friendship with Euryalus, a young Trojan, and with him he entered, in the dead of night, the enemy's camp. As they were returning victorious, after much bloodshed, they were perceived by the Rutulians, who attacked Euryalus. Nisus, in endeavouring to rescue his friend from the enemy's darts, perished himself with him, and their heads were cut off and fixed on a spear, and carried in triumph to the camp. Their death was greatly lamented by all the Trojans; and their great friendship, like that of a Pylades and an Orestes, or of a Theseus and Pirithous, is become proverbial. Virg. Æn. 9, v. 176. Vid. Part III.

NITOCRIS, I. a celebrated queen of Babylon, who built a bridge across the Euphrates, in the middle of that city, and dug a number of reservoirs for the superfluous waters of that river. She ordered herself to be buried over one of the gates of the city, and placed an inscription on her tomb, which signified that her successors would find great treasures within, if ever they were in need of money, but that their labours would be ill-repaid if ever they ventured to open it without necessity. Cyrus opened it through curiosity, and was struck to find within these words:—If thy avarice had not been insatiable thou never would have violated the monuments of the dead. Herodot. 1, c. 185.——II. A queen of Egypt, who built a third pyramid.

NOMADES, a name given to all those uncivilized people who had no fixed habitation, and who continually changed the place of their residence to go in search of fresh pasture for the numerous cattle which they tended. There were Nomades in Scythia, India, Arabia, and Africa. Those of Africa were afterwards called Numidians, by a small change of the letters which composed their name. Ital. 1, v. 215.—Plin. 5, c. 3.—Herodot. 1, c. 15, l. 4, c. 187.—Strab. 7—Mela. 2, c. 1, l. 3, c. 4.—Virg. G. 3, v. 343.—Paus. 8, c. 43.

NOMENTANUS, an epithet applied to L. Cassius as a native of Nomentum. He is mentioned by Horace as a mixture of luxury and dissipation. Horat. 1, Sat. 1, v. 102, and alibi.

NONIUS, a Roman who exhorted his countrymen after the fatal battle of Pharsalia and the flight of Pompey, by observing that eight standards (aquilæ) still remained in the camp; to which Cicero answered, Recte, si nobis cum graculis bellus esset.

NONNIUS MARCELLUS, a grammarian, whose treatise de varia significatione verborum was edited by Mercer, 8vo. Paris, 1614.

NONNUS, a Greek writer of the fifth century, who wrote an account of the embassy he had undertaken to Æthiopia, among the Saracens and other eastern nations. He is also known by his Dionysiaca, a wonderful collection of heathen mythology and erudition, edited 4to. Antwerp, 1569. His paraphrase on John was edited by Heinsius, 8vo. L. Bat. 1627.

NONUS, a Greek physician, whose book de omnium morborum curatione, was edited in 12mo. Argent, 1568.

NORBANUS, C. a young and ambitious Roman, who opposed Sylla, and joined his interest to that of young Marius. In his consulship he marched against Sylla, by whom he was defeated, &c. Plut.

NUMA MARCIUS, a man made governor of Rome by Tullus Hostilius. He was son-in-law of Numa Pompilius, and father to Ancus Martius. Tacit. A. 6, c. 11.—Liv. 1, c. 20.

NUMA POMPILIUS, I. a celebrated philosopher, born at Cures, a village of the Sabines, on the day that Romulus laid the foundation of Rome. He married Tatia, the daughter of Tatius, the king of the Sabines, and at her death he retired into the country to devote himself more freely to literary pursuits. At the death of Romulus the Romans fixed upon him to be their new king, and two senators were sent to acquaint him with the decisions of the senate and of the people. Numa refused their offers, and it was not but at the repeated solicitations and prayers of his friends that he was prevailed upon to accept the royalty. The beginning of his reign was popular, and he dismissed the 300 bodyguards which his predecessor had kept around his person, observing that he did not distrust a people who had compelled him to reign over them. He applied himself to tame the ferocity of his subjects, to inculcate in their minds a reverence for the deity, and to quell their dissensions by dividing all the citizens into different classes. He established different orders of priests, and taught the Romans not to worship the deity by images; and from his example no graven or painted statues appeared in the temples or sanctuaries of Rome for upwards of 160 years. He encouraged the report which was spread of his paying regular visits to the nymph Egeria, and made use of her name to give sanction to the laws and institutions which he had introduced. He established the college of the vestals, and dedicated a temple to Janus, which, during his whole reign, remained shut, as a mark of peace and tranquillity at Rome. Numa died after a reign of 43 years, in which he had given every possible encouragement to the useful arts, and in which he had cultivated peace, B. C. 672. He forbade his body to be burnt, according to the custom of the Romans, but he ordered it to be buried near mount Janiculum, with many of the books which he had written. These books were accidentally found by one of the Romans about 400 years after his death; and as they contained nothing new or interesting, but merely the reasons why he had made innovations in the form of worship and in the religion of the Romans, they were burnt by order of the senate. He left behind one daughter, called Pompilia, who married Numa Martius, and became the mother of Ancus Martius, the fourth king of Rome. Some say that he had also four sons; but this opinion is ill founded. Plut. in vitâ.—Varro.—Liv. 1, c. 18.—Plin. 13 and 14, &c.—Flor. 1, c. 2.—Virg. Æn. 6, v. 809, l. 9, v. 562.—Cic. de Nat. D. 3, c. 2 and 17. Val. Max. 1, c. 2.—Dionys. Hal. 2, c. 59.—Ovid. Fast. 3, &c.——II. One of the Rutulian chiefs, killed in the night by Nisus and Euryalus. Virg. Æn. 9, v. 454.

Numenia, or Neomenia, a festival observed by the Greeks at the beginning of every lunar month, in honour of all the gods, but especially of Apollo or the Sun. It was observed with games and public entertainments, which were provided at the expense of rich citizens, and which were always frequented by the poor.

Numerianus, (M. Aurelius,) a son of the emperor Carus. He accompanied his father into the east with the title of Cæsar, and at his death he succeeded him with his brother Carinus, A. D. 282. His reign was short. Eight months after his father's death he was murdered in his litter by his father-in-law, Arrius Aper, who accompanied him in an expedition. Numerianus has been admired for his learning as well as his moderation. He was naturally an eloquent speaker, and in poetry he was inferior to no writer of his age.

Numerius, a man who favoured the escape of Marius to Africa, &c.

Numitor, a son of Procas, king of Alba, who inherited his father's kingdom with his brother Amulius, who began to reign conjointly with him. He expelled his brother, and put to death his son Lausus, and consecrated his daughter Ilia to the service of the goddess Vesta, which demanded perpetual celibacy. These great precautions were rendered abortive. Ilia became pregnant; and though the two children whom she brought forth were exposed in the river by order of the tyrant, their life was preserved, and Numitor was restored to his throne by his grandsons, and the tyrannical usurper was put to death. Dion. Hal.—Liv. 1, c. 3.—Plut. in Rom. —Ovid. Fast. 4, v. 55, &c.—Virg. Æn. 6, v. 768.

Numitorius, a Roman, who defended Virginia, to whom Appius wished to offer violence. He was made military tribune.

Nuncoreus, a son of Sesostris, king of Egypt, who made an obelisk, some ages after brought to Rome and placed in the Vatican. Plin. 36, c. 11. He is called Pheron by Herodotus.

Nyctelia, festivals in honour of Bacchus, (Vid. Nyctelius,) observed on mount Cithæron. Plut in Symp.

Nymphidius, a favourite of Nero, who said that he was descended from Caligula. He was raised to the consular dignity, and soon after disputed the empire with Galba. He was slain by the soldiers, &c. Tacit. Ann. 15.

Nympholeptes, or Nymphomanes, possessed by the nymphs. This name was given to the inhabitants of mount Cithæron, who believed that they were inspired by the nymphs. Plut in Arist.

O.

Oarses, the original name of Artaxerxes Mnemon.

Ocha, a woman who presided over the sacred rites of Vesta for 57 years with the greatest sanctity. She died in the reign of Tiberius, and the daughter of Domitius succeeded her. Tacit. Ann. 2, c. 86.

Ocellus, an ancient philosopher of Lucania, Vid. Lucanus.

Ochus. Vid. Artaxerxes.

Ocrisia, a woman of Corniculum, who was one of the attendants of Tanaquil, the wife of Tarquinius Priscus. As she was throwing into the flames, as offerings, some of the meats that were served on the table of Tarquin, she suddenly saw in the fire what Ovid calls Obscæni forma virilis. She informed the queen of it, and when by her orders she had approached near it, she conceived a son, who was called Servius Tullius, and who, being educated in the king's family, afterwards succeeded to the vacant throne. Plut. de fort. Rom.—Plin. 36, c. 27.—Ovid. Fast. 6, v. 627.

Octavia, I. a Roman lady, sister to the emperor Augustus, and celebrated for her beauty and virtues. She married Claudius Marcellus, and after his death M. Antony. Her marriage with Antony was a political step to reconcile her brother and her husband. Antony proved for some time attentive to her, but he soon after despised her for Cleopatra. After the battle of Actium and the death of Antony, Octavia, forgetful of the injuries she had received, took into her house all the children of her husband, and treated them with maternal tenderness. Marcellus, her son by her first husband, was married to a niece of Augustus, and publicly intended as a successors to his uncle. Vid. Virgil. Octavia had two daughters by Antony, Antonia Major and Antonia Minor. The death of Marcellus preyed upon the mind of Octavia, who died of melancholy about 10 years before the Christian era. Her brother paid great regard to her memory, by pronouncing himself her funeral oration. The Roman people also showed their respect for her virtues by their wish to pay her divine honours.—Suet. in Aug.—Plut. in Anton. &c.——II. A daughter of the emperor Claudius by Messalina. She was betrothed to Silanus, but by the intrigues of Agrippina, she was married to the emperor Nero in the 16th year of her age. She was soon after divorced on pretence of barrenness, and the emperor married Poppæa, who exercised her enmity upon Octavia by causing her to be banished into Campania. She was afterwards recalled at the instance of the people, and Poppæa, who was resolved on her ruin, caused her again to be banished to an island, where she was ordered to kill herself by opening her veins. Her head was cut off and carried to Poppæa. Suet. in Claud. 27, in Ner. 7 and 35.—Tacit. Ann. 12.

Octavianus, or Octavius Cæsar. Vid. Augustus.

Octavius, I. a Roman officer, who brought Perseus, king of Macedonia, a prisoner to the consul. He was sent by his countrymen to be guardian to Ptolemy Eupator, the young king of Egypt, where he behaved with the greatest arrogance. He was assassinated by Lysias, who was before regent of Egypt. The murderer was sent to Rome.——II. A man who banished Cinna from Rome, and became remarkable for his probity and fondness of discipline. He was seized and put to death by order of his successful rivals Marius and Cinna.——III. A Roman, who boasted of being in the number of Cæsar's murderers. His assertions were false, yet he was punished as if he had been accessary to the conspiracy.——IV. A lieutenant of Crassus in Parthia. He accompanied his general to the tent of the Parthian conqueror, and was killed by the enemy as he attempted to hinder them from carrying away Crassus.——V. A tribune of the people at Rome, whom Tib. Gracchus his colleague deposed.——VI. A poet in the Augustan age, intimate with Horace. He also distinguished himself as an historian. Horat. 1, Sat. 10, v. 82.

Odenatus, a celebrated prince of Palmyra. When Aurelian had been taken prisoner by Sapor, king of Persia, Odenatus solicited his release by writing a letter to the conqueror and sending him presents. The king of Persia was offended at the liberty of Odenatus; he tore the letter, and ordered the presents which were offered to be thrown into a river. To punish Odenatus, who had the impudence, as he observed, to pay homage to so great a monarch as himself, he ordered him to appear before him, on pain of being devoted to instant destruction, with all his family, if he dared to refuse. Odenatus disdained the summons of Sapor, and opposed force to force. Gallienus, the then reigning emperor, named Odenatus as his colleague on the throne, and gave the title of Augustus to his children, and to his wife, the celebrated Zenobia. He perished by the dagger of one of his relations, whom he had slightly offended in a domestic entertainment. He died at Emessa, about the 267th year of the Christian era. Zenobia succeeded to all his titles and honours.

Odoacer, a king of the Heruli, who destroyed the western empire of Rome, and called himself king of Italy, A. D. 476.

Odyssea, one of Homer's epic poems, in which he describes, in 24 books, the adventures of Ulysses on his return from the Trojan war, with other material circumstances. The whole of the action comprehends no more than 55 days. Vid. Homerus.

Œbares, a groom of Darius, son of Hystaspes. He was the cause that his master obtained the kingdom of Persia, by his artifice in making his horse neigh first. Herodot. 3, c. 85.—Justin. 1, c. 10.

Œcumenius, wrote in the middle of the 10th century a paraphrase of some of the books of the New Testament in Greek, edited in 2 vols. fol. Paris, 1631.

Oileus. Vid. Part. III.

Olen, a Greek poet of Lycia, who flourished some time before the age of Orpheus, and composed many hymns, some of which were regularly sung at Delphi on solemn occasions. Some suppose that he was the first who established the oracle of Apollo at Delphi, where he first delivered oracles. Herodot. 4, c. 35.

Ollius, T. the father of Poppæa, destroyed on account of his intimacy with Sejanus, &c. Tacit. Ann. 13, c. 45.

Ollovico, a prince of Gaul, called the friend of the republic of the Roman senate: Cæs. B. G. 7, c. 31.

Olympia, (orum,) celebrated games which received their name either from Olympia, where they were observed, or from Jupiter Olympius, to whom they were dedicated. They were, according to some, instituted by Jupiter after his victory over the Titans, and first observed by the Idæi Dactyli, B. C. 1453. Some attribute the institution to Pelops, after he had obtained a victory over Œnomaus and married Hippodamia; but the more probable, and indeed the more received opinion is, that they were first established by Hercules in honour of Jupiter Olympius, after a victory obtained over Augias, B. C. 1222. They are not, however, mentioned by Homer. Iphitus, in the age of the lawgiver of Sparta, renewed them, and instituted the celebration with greater solemnity. This reinstitution, which happened B. C. 884, forms a celebrated epoch in Grecian history, and is the beginning of the Olympiads. (Vid. Olympias.) They, however, were neglected for some time after the age of Iphitus, till Corœbus, who obtained a victory B. C. 776, reinstituted them to be regularly and constantly celebrated. The care and superintendence of the games were intrusted to the people of Elis, till they were excluded by the Pisæans, B. C. 364, after the destruction of Pisa. These obtained great privileges from this appointment; they were in danger neither of violence nor war, but they were permitted to enjoy their possessions without molestation, as the games were celebrated within their territories. Only one person superintended till the 50th Olympiad, when two were appointed. In the 103d Olympiad, the number was increased to twelve, according to the number of the tribes of Elis. But in the following Olympiad they were reduced to eight, and afterwards increased to ten, which number continued till the reign of Adrian. No women were permitted to appear at the celebration of the Olympian games, and whoever dared to trespass this law was immediately thrown down from a rock. This, however, was sometimes neglected, for we find not only women present at the celebration, but also some among the combatants, and some rewarded with the crown. The preparations for these festivals were great. No person was permitted to enter the lists if he had not regularly exercised himself ten months before the celebration at the public gymnasium of Elis. The wrestlers were appointed by lot. Some little balls, superscribed with a letter, were thrown into a silver urn, and such as drew the same letter were obliged to contend one with the other. He who had an odd letter remained the last, and he often had the advantage, as he was to encounter the last who had obtained the superiority over his adversary. He was called ἐφεδρος. In these games were exhibited running, leaping, wrestling, boxing, and the throwing of the quoit, which was called altogether πενταθλον, or quinquertium. Besides these, there were horse and chariot-races, and also contentions in poetry, eloquence, and the fine arts. The only reward that the conqueror obtained was a crown of olive; which, as some suppose, was in memory of the labours of Hercules, which were accomplished for the universal good of mankind, and for which the hero claimed no other reward but the consciousness of having been the friend of humanity. The statues of the conquerors, called Olympionicæ, were erected in Olympia, in the sacred wood of Jupiter. Their return home was that of a warlike conqueror; and their entrance into their native city was not through the gates, but, to make it more grand and more solemn, a breach was made in the walls. Painters and poets were employed in celebrating their names; and indeed the victories severally obtained at Olympia are the subjects of the most beautiful odes of Pindar. The combatants were naked; a scarf was originally tied round their waist, but when it had entangled one of the adversaries, and been the cause that he lost the victory, it was laid aside, and no regard was paid to decency. The Olympic games were observed every fifth year, or, to speak with greater exactness, after a revolution of four years, and in the first month of the fifth year, and they continued for five successive days. As they were the most ancient and the most solemn of all the festivals of the Greeks, it will not appear wonderful that they drew so many people together, not only inhabitants of Greece, but of the neighbouring islands and countries. Pind Olymp. 1 and 2.—Strab. 8.—Paus. 5, c. 67, &c.—Diod. 1, &c.—*Plut. in Thes. Olympias, a certain space of time which elapsed between the celebration of the Olympic games. The Olympic games were celebrated after the expiration of four complete years, whence some have said that they were observed every fifth year. The period of time was called Olympiad, and became a celebrated era among the Greeks, who computed their time by it. The custom of reckoning time by the celebration of the Olympic games was not introduced at the first institution of these festivals, but, to speak accurately, only the year in which Corœbus obtained the prize. This Olympiad, which has always been reckoned the first, fell, according to the accurate and learned computations of some of the moderns, exactly 776 years before the Christian era, in the year of the Julian period 3938, and 23 years before the building of Rome. The games were exhibited at the time of the full moon next after the summer solstice; therefore the Olympiads were of unequal lengths, because the time of the full moon differs 11 days every year, and for that reason they sometimes began the next day after the solstice, and at other times four weeks after. The computations by Olympiads ceased, as some suppose, after the 364th, in the year 440 of the Christian era. It was universally adopted, not only by the Greeks, but by many of the neighbouring countries, though still the Pythian games served as an epoch to the people of Delphi and to the Bœotians, the Nemæan games to the Argives and Arcadians, and the Isthmian to the Corinthians and the inhabitants of the Peloponnesian isthmus.——A celebrated woman, who was daughter of a king of Epirus, and who married Philip, king of Macedonia, by whom she had Alexander the Great. Her haughtiness, and more probably her infidelity, obliged Philip to repudiate her, and to marry Cleopatra, the niece of king Attalus. Olympias was sensible of this injury, and Alexander showed his disapprobation of his father's measures by retiring from the court to his mother. The murder of Philip, which soon followed this disgrace, and which some have attributed to the intrigues of Olympias, was productive of the greatest extravagancies. The queen paid the highest honour to her husband's murderer. She gathered his mangled limbs, placed a crown of gold on his head, and laid his ashes near those of Philip. When Alexander was dead, Olympias seized the government of Macedonia, and, to establish her usurpation, she cruelly put to death Aridæus, with his wife Eurydice, as also Nicanor, the brother of Cassander, with one hundred leading men of Macedon, who were inimical to her interest. Such barbarities did not long remain unpunished, Cassander besieged her in Pydna, where she had retired with the remains of her family, and she was obliged to surrender after an obstinate siege. The conqueror ordered her to be accused, and to be put to death. A body of 200 soldiers were directed to put the bloody commands into execution, but the splendour and majesty of the queen disarmed their courage, and she was at last massacred by those whom she had cruelly deprived of their children, about 316 years before the Christian era. Justin. 7, c. 6, l. 9, c. 7.—Plut. in Alex.—Curt.—Paus.

Olympiodorus, I. a musician, who taught Epaminondas music. C. Nep.——II. A native of Thebes, in Egypt, who flourished under Theodosius 2d, and wrote 22 books of history, in Greek, beginning with the seventh consulship of Honorius, and the second of Theodosius, to the period when Valentinian was made emperor. He wrote also an account of an embassy to some of the barbarian nations of the north, &c. His style is censured by some as low, and unworthy of an historian. The commentaries of Olympiodorus on the Meteora of Aristotle were edited apud Ald. 1550, in fol.

Olympus, a poet and musician of Mysia, son of Mæon, and disciple to Marsyas. He lived before the Trojan war, and distinguished himself by his amatory elegies, his hymns, and particularly the beautiful airs which he composed, and which were still preserved in the age of Aristophanes. Plato in Min.—Aristot. Pol. 8.

Onesicritus, a cynic philosopher of Ægina, who went with Alexander into Asia, and was sent to the Indian Gymnosophists. He wrote a history of the king's life, which has been censured for the romantic, exaggerated, and improbable narrative it gives. It is asserted that Alexander, upon reading it, said that he should be glad to come to life again for some time, to see what reception the historian's work met with. Plut. in Alex.—Curt. 9, c. 10.

Onesimus, a Macedonian nobleman, treated with great kindness by the Roman emperors. He wrote an account of the life of the emperor Probus and of Carus, with great precision and elegance.

Onomacritus, a soothsayer of Athens. It is generally believed, that the Greek poem on the Argonautic expedition, attributed to Orpheus, was written by Onomacritus. The elegant poems of Musæus are also, by some, supposed to be the production of his pen. He flourished about 516 years before the Christian era, and was expelled from Athens by Hipparchus, one of the sons of Pisistratus. Herodot. 7, c. 6.

Onomachus, a Phocian, son of Euthycrates, and brother of Philomelus, whom he succeeded as general of his countrymen in the Sacred war. After exploits of valour and perseverance, he was defeated and slain in Thessaly by Philip of Macedon, who ordered his body to be ignominiously hung up, for the sacrilege offered to the temple of Delphi. He died 353 B. C. Aristot. Pol. 5, c. 4.—Diod. 17.

Onophas, one of the seven Persians who conspired against the usurper Smerdis. Ctesias.

Onosander, a Greek writer, whose book De Imperatoris Institutione has been edited by Schwebel, with a French translation, fol. Norimb. 1752.

Opimius, L. a Roman, who made himself consul in opposition to the interest and efforts of the Gracchi. He showed himself a most inveterate enemy to C. Gracchus and his adherents, and behaved, during his consulship, like a dictator. He was accused of bribery and banished. He died of want at Dyrrachium. Cic. pro Sext. Planc. & in Pis.—Plut.

Oppia Lex, by C. Oppius, the tribune, A. U. C. 540. It required that no woman should wear above half an ounce of gold, have party-coloured garments, or be carried in any city or town, or to any place within a mile's distance, unless it was to celebrate some sacred festivals or solemnities. This famous law, which was made while Annibal was in Italy, and while Rome was in distressed circumstances, created discontent, and 18 years after, the Roman ladies petitioned the assembly of the people that it might be repealed. Cato opposed it strongly, and made many satirical reflections upon the women for their appearing in public to solicit votes. The tribune Valerius, who had presented the petition to the assembly, answered the objections of Cato, and his eloquence had such an influence on the minds of the people, that the law was instantly abrogated with the unanimous consent of all the comitia, Cato alone excepted. Liv. 33 and 34.—Cic. de Orat. 3.

Oppianus, a Greek poet of Cilicia in the second century. His father's name was Agesilaus, and his mother's Zenodota. He wrote some poems, celebrated for their elegance and sublimity. Two of his poems are now extant, five books on fishing, called alieuticon, and four on hunting, called cynegeticon. The emperor Caracalla was so pleased with his poetry, that he gave him a piece of gold for every verse of his cynegeticon; from which circumstance the poem received the name of the golden verses of Oppian. The poet died of the plague, in the 30th year of his age. His countrymen raised statues to his honour, and engraved on his tomb that the gods had hastened to call back Oppian in the flower of his youth only because he had already excelled all mankind. The best edition of his works is that of Schneider, 8vo. Argent. 1776.

Oppius, C. a friend of Julius Cæsar, celebrated for his life of Scipio Africanus, and of Pompey the Great. In the age of Suetonius, he was deemed the true author of the Alexandrian, African, and Spanish wars, which some attribute to Cæsar and others to A. Hirtius. Tacit. Ann. 12.—Suet. in Cæs. 53.

Optatus, one of the fathers whose works were edited by Du Pin, fol. Paris, 1700.

Oraculum, an answer of the gods to the questions of men, or the place where those answers were given. Nothing is more famous than the ancient oracles of Egypt, Greece, Rome, &c. They were supposed to be the will of the gods themselves, and they were consulted, not only upon every important matter, but even in the affairs of private life. The small province of Bœotia could once boast of her 25 oracles, and the Peloponnesus of the same number. Not only the chief of the gods gave oracles, but, in process of time, heroes were admitted to enjoy the same privileges; and the oracles of a Trophonius and an Antinous were soon able to rival the fame of Apollo and of Jupiter. The most celebrated oracles of antiquity were those of Dodona, Delphi, Jupiter Ammon, &c. Vid. Dodona, Delphi, Ammon. The temple of Delphi seemed to claim a superiority over the other temples; its fame was once more extended, and its riches were so great, that not only private persons, but even kings and numerous armies made it an object of plunder and of rapine. The manner of delivering oracles was different. The answers were sometimes given in verse or written on tablets, but their meaning was always obscure, and often the cause of disaster to such as consulted them. Crœsus, when he consulted the oracle of Delphi, was told that if he crossed the Halys, he should destroy a great empire; he supposed that that empire was the empire of his enemy, but unfortunately it was his own. The words of Credo te Æacida, Romanos vincere posse, which Pyrrhus received when he wished to assist the Tarentines against the Romans, by a favourable interpretation for himself, proved his ruin. Nero was ordered by the oracle of Delphi to beware of 73 years; but the pleasing idea that he should live to that age rendered him careless, and he was soon convinced of his mistake, when Galba, in his 73d, year, had the presumption to dethrone him. Some have believed that all the oracles of the earth ceased at the birth of Christ, but the supposition is false. It was, indeed, the beginning of their decline, but they remained in repute, and were consulted, though, perhaps, not so frequently, till the fourth century, when Christianity began to triumph over paganism. The oracles often suffered themselves to be bribed. Alexander did it; but it is well known that Lysander failed in the attempt. Herodotus, who first mentioned the corruption which often prevailed in the oracular temples of Greece and Egypt, has been severely treated for his remarks by the historian Plutarch. Demosthenes is also a witness of the corruption; and he observed, that the oracles of Greece were servilely subservient to the will and pleasure of Philip, king of Macedonia, as he beautifully expresses it by the word φιλιππιζειν. *Homer Il. Orbia, certain solemn sacrifices of fruits, offered in the four seasons of the year, to obtain mild and temperate weather. They were offered to the goddesses who presided over the seasons, who attended upon the sun, and who received divine worship at Athens.

Orbilius Pupillus, a grammarian of Beneventum, who was the first instructer of the poet Horace. He came to Rome in the consulship of Cicero, and there, as a public teacher, acquired more fame than money. He was naturally of a severe disposition, of which his pupils often felt the effects. He lived almost to his 100th year, and lost his memory some time before his death. Suet. de Illust. Gr. 9.—Horat. 2, ep. 1, v. 71.

Orchia Lex, by Orchius, the tribune, A. U. C. 566. It was enacted to limit the number of guests that were to be admitted at an entertainment; and it also enforced, that during supper, which was the chief meal among the Romans, the doors of every house should be left open.

Ordovices, the people of North Wales in Britain, mentioned by Tacit. Ann. 12, c. 53.

Orestes, I. a son of Agamemnon and Clytemnestra. When his father was cruelly murdered by Clytemnestra and Ægisthus, young Orestes was saved from his mother's dagger by means of his sister Electra, called Laodicea by Homer, and he was privately conveyed to the house of Strophius, who was king of Pocis, and who had married a sister of Agamemnon. He was tenderly treated by Strophius, who educated him with his son Pilades. The two young princes soon became acquainted, and from their familiarity arose the most inviolable attachment and friendship. When Orestes was arrived to years of manhood, he visited Mycenæ, and avenged his father's death by assassinating his mother Clytemnestra, and her adulterer Ægisthus. This murder received the punishment which, among the ancients, was always supposed to attend parricide. Orestes was tormented by the Furies, and exiled himself to Argos, where he was still pursued by the avengeful goddesses. Apollo himself purified him, and he was acquitted by the unanimous opinion of the Areopagites, whom Minerva herself instituted on this occasion, according to the narration of the poet Æschylus. According to Pausanias, Orestes was purified of the murder, not at Delphi, but at Trœzene, where still was seen a large stone at the entrance of Diana's temple, upon which the ceremonies of purification had been performed by nine of the principal citizens of the place. There was also, at Megalopolis in Arcadia, a temple dedicated to the Furies, near which Orestes cut off one of his fingers with his teeth in a fit of insanity. These different traditions are confuted by Euripides, who says that Orestes, after the murder of his mother, consulted the oracle of Apollo at Delphi, where he was informed that nothing could deliver him from the persecutions of the Furies if he did not bring into Greece Diana's statue, which was in the Taurica Chersonesus, and which, as it is reported by some, had fallen down from heaven. The king of the Chersonesus always sacrificed on the altars of the goddess all such as entered the borders of his country. Orestes and his friend were both carried before Thoas, the king of the place, and they were doomed to be sacrificed. Iphigenia was then priestess of Diana's temple, and it was her office to immolate these strangers. The intelligence that they were Grecians delayed the preparations, and Iphigenia was anxious to learn something about a country which had given her birth. Vid. Iphigenia. She even interested herself in their misfortunes, and offered to spare the life of one of them, provided he would convey letters to Greece from her hand. This was a difficult trial; never was friendship more truly displayed, according to the words of Ovid, ex Pont. 3, el. 2:—

Ire jubet Pylades carum moriturus Orestem.
Hic negat; inque vicem pugnat uterque mori.

At last Pylade, gave way to the pressing entreaties of his friend, and consented to carry the letters of Iphigenia to Greece. These were addressed to Orestes himself, and therefore these circumstances soon led to a total discovery of the connexions of the priestess with the man whom she was going to immolate. Iphigenia was convinced that he was her brother Orestes, and when the causes of their journey had been explained, she resolved, with the two friends, to fly from Chersonesus, and to carry away the statue of Diana. Their flight was discovered, and Thoas prepared to pursue them; but Minerva interfered, and told him that all had been done by the will and approbation of the gods. After these celebrated adventures, Orestes ascended the throne of Argos, where he reigned in perfect security, and married Hermione, the daughter of Menelaus, and gave his sister to his friend Pylades. The marriage of Orestes with Hermione is a matter of dispute among the ancients. All are agreed that she had been promised to the son of Agamemnon, but Menelaus had married her to Neoptolemus, the son of Achilles, who had shown himself so truly interested in his cause during the Trojan war. The marriage of Hermione with Neoptolemus displeased Orestes; he remembered that she had been early promised to him, and therefore he resolved to recover her by force or artifice. This he effected by causing Neoptolemus to be assassinated, or assassinating him himself. According to Ovid's epistle of Hermione to Orestes, Hermione had always been faithful to her first lover, and even it was by her persuasions that Orestes removed her from the house of Neoptolemus. His old age was crowned with peace and security, and he died in the 90th year of his age, leaving his throne to his son Tisamenes, by Hermione. Three years after, the Heraclidæ recovered the Peloponnesus, and banished the descendants of Menelaus from the throne of Argos. Orestes died in Arcadia, as some suppose, by the bite of a serpent; and the Lacedæmonians, who had become his subjects at the death of Menelaus, were directed by an oracle to bring his bones to Sparta. They were, some time after, discovered at Tegea, and his stature appeared to be seven cubits, according to the traditions mentioned by Herodotus and others. The friendship of Orestes and of Pylades became proverbial, and the two friends received divine honours among the Scythians, and were worshipped in temples. Paus. 1, 2, 4, &c.—Paterc. 1, c. 1 and 3.—Apollod. 1, &c.—Strab. 9 and 13.—*Ovid. Orestĭdæ, the descendants or subjects of Orestes, the son of Agamemnon. They were driven from the Peloponnesus by the Heraclidæ, and came to settle in a country which, from them, was called Orestidæ, at the southwest of Macedonia. Some suppose that that part of Greece originally received its name from Orestes, who fled and built there a city, which gave its founder's name to the whole province. Thucyd. 2.—Liv. 31.

Orgia, festivals in honour of Bacchus. They are the same as the Bacchanalia, Dionysia, &c. Vid. Dionysia.

Oribăsus, a celebrated physician, greatly esteemed by the emperor Julian, in whose reign he flourished. He abridged the works of Galenus, and of all the most respectable writers on physic, at the request of the emperor. After Julian's death, he fell into the hands of the barbarians. Origen, a Greek writer, as much celebrated for the easiness of his manner, his humility, and modesty, as for his learning and the sublimity of his genius. He was surnamed Adamantus, from his assiduity, and became so rigid a Christian, that he made himself a eunuch, by following the literal sense of a passage in the Greek testament, which speaks of the voluntary eunuchs of Christ. He suffered martyrdom in his 60th year, A. C. 254. His works were excellent and numerous, and contained a number of homilies, commentaries on the holy scriptures, and different treatises, besides the Hexapla, so called from its being divided into six columns, the first of which contained the Hebrew text; the second, the same text in Greek characters; the third, the Greek version of the Septuagint; the fourth, that of Aquila; the fifth, that of Symmachus; and the sixth, Theodosian's Greek version. This famous work first gave the hint for the compilation of our Polyglot bibles. The works of Origen have been learnedly edited by the Benedictine monks, though the whole is not yet completed, in four vols. fol. Paris, 1733, 1740, and 1759. The Hexapla was published in 8vo. at Lips. 1769, by Car. Frid. Bahrdt.

Orŏdes, a prince of Parthia, who murdered his brother Mithridates, and ascended his throne. He defeated Crassus, the Roman triumvir, and poured melted gold down the throat of his fallen enemy, to reproach him for his avarice and ambition. He followed the interest of Cassius and Brutus at Philippi. It is said, that, when Orodes became old and infirm, his thirty children applied to him, and disputed, in his presence, their right to the succession. Phraates, the eldest of them, obtained the crown from his father, and, to hasten him out of the world, he attempted to poison him. The poison had no effect, and Phraates, still determined on his father's death, strangled him with his own hands, about 37 years before the Christian era. Orodes had then reigned about 50 years. Justin. 42, c. 4.—Paterc. 2, c. 30.

Orœtes, a Persian governor of Sardis, famous for his cruel murder of Polycrates. He died B. C. 521. Herodot.

Orosius, a Spanish writer, A. D. 416, who published a universal history, in seven books, from the creation to his own time, in which, though learned, diligent, and pious, he betrayed a great ignorance of the knowledge of historical facts and of chronology. The best edition is that of Havercamp, 4to. L. Bat. 1767.

Orphĭca, a name by which the orgies of Bacchus were called, because they had been introduced to Europe from Egypt by Orpheus.

Orsippus, a man of Megara, who was prevented from obtaining a prize at the Olympic games, because his clothes were entangled as he ran. Vid. Olympia.

Oschophŏria, a festival observed by the Athenians. It received its name απο του φερειν τας οσχας, from carrying boughs hung with grapes, called οσχαι. Its original institution is thus mentioned by Plut. in Thes. Theseus, at his return from Crete, forgot to hand out the white sail by which his father was to be apprized of his success. This neglect was fatal to Ægeus, who threw himself into the sea and perished. Thesius no sooner reached the land than he sent a herald to inform his father of his safe return, and in the meantime he began to make the sacrifices which he vowed when he first set sail from Crete. The herald, on his entrance into the city, found the people in great agitation. Some lamented the king's death, while others, elated at the sudden news of the victory of Theseus, crowned the herald with garlands in demonstration of their joy. The herald carried back the garlands on his staff to the seashore, and after he had waited till Theseus had finished his sacrifice, he related the melancholy story of the king's death. Upon this the people ran in crowds to the city, showing their grief by cries and lamentations. From that circumstance, therefore, at the feast of Oschophoria, not the herald, but his staff, is crowned with garlands, and all the people that are present always exclaim ελελευ, ιυ ιυ, the first of which expresses haste, and the other a consternation or depression of spirits. The historian further mentions that Theseus, when he went to Crete, did not take with him the usual number of virgins, but that, instead of two of them, he filled up the number with two youths of his acquaintance, whom he made pass for women, [illegible] one of the 300 Spartans who fought against 300 Argives, when those two armies disputed their respective right to Thyrea. [illegible] Argives, Amynor and Chromius, and Othryades, survived the battle. The Argives went home to carry the news of their victory, but Othryades, who had been reckoned among the number of the slain, on account of his wounds, recovering himself, and carrying some of the spoils of respect he had stripped the Argives, into the camp of his countrymen; and after he had erected a trophy, and had written with his own blood the words that were on his shield, he killed himself, unwilling to survive the death of his companions. Val. Max. 3, c. 2.—Plut. in Parall.

Ovidius Naso, P. I. This celebrated writer was born at Sulmo, now Sulmona, a small village on the river Peligna, at the distance of ninety miles from Rome. He came into the world in [illegible] the memorable year in which the two consuls, Hirtius and Pansa, fell at the battle of Mutinum. Little is precisely known concerning his parents, or any of his ancestors: but [illegible], from several passages in his works, that he belonged to a family of ancient Roman knights. The spot where he was born lay at the [illegible] bounds of a well-watered and fertile region, whose fine inhabitants were remarkable for their valour, and the females were noted for their fruitfulness in personal attractions. As Sulmo produced fruit not inferior to the means of its cultivation, Ovid was carried to Rome at an early period of life, along with an elder brother, that he might be fully instructed in the arts and customs of the capital. He soon displayed an inclination towards poetry: but he was for some time dissuaded from a prosecution of the art by his father, whose chief object was to render him an accomplished orator and patron, and therefore meant to turn his youth to civic honours. Having mastered the Three Virgilia, and completed the usual course of rhetorical tuition at Rome, he proceeded to finish his education at Athens. After his return to the capital, he ventured on a trial of his legal skill in the actual business of life. He successively held several of the lower ordinary offices of the state, and also frequently acted as arbiter, highly to the satisfaction of the persons whose causes he decided. These occupations, however, were speedily relinquished. The father of Ovid had for some time restrained his son's inclination towards poetry; but the arguments he dedicated against its cultivation from the noble example of the poverty of Homer, were now answering an almost practical refutation in the court favour and affluence of Virgil and Horace. The death, too, of his elder brother by lessening Ovid's hope to a fortune more than sufficient to satisfy his wants, finally induced him to abandon the profession to which he had been destined, and bid adieu at once to public affairs and the clamour of the forum. While frequenting the court of Augustus, Ovid was well received by the politest of the courtiers. The titles of many of the epistles written during his banishment, show that they were addressed to persons well known to us, even at this distance of time, as distinguished statesmen and imperial favourites. Nor was Ovid's acquaintance less with the celebrated poets of his age than with its courtiers and senators. Virgil, indeed, he had merely seen, and premature death cut off the society of Tibullus; but Horace, Macer, and Propertius, were long his familiar friends, and often communicated to him their writings previous to publication. Ovid passed nearly thirty years in the voluptuous enjoyment of the pleasures of the capital—blest with the smiles of fortune, honoured with the favour of his prince, and fondly anticipating a tranquil old age. He now remained at Rome, the last of the constellation of poets, which had brightened the earlier age of Augustus. That prince had now lost his favourite ministers Mæcenas and Agrippa; he was less prosperous than during former years in the external affairs of the empire, and less prudently advised in his domestic concerns; he was insidiously alienated from his own family, and was sinking in his old age under the sway of the imperious Livia, and the dark-souled Tiberius. Ovid's friendships lay chiefly among those who supported the lineal descendants of Augustus—the unfortunate offspring of Julia and Agrippa. He thus became an object of suspicion to the party in power, and had lost many of those benefactors who might have shielded him from the storm, which now unexpectedly burst on his head, and swept from him every hope and comfort for the remainder of his existence. It was in the year 762, and when Ovid had reached the age of 51, that Augustus suddenly banished him from Rome to a wild and distant corner of the empire. Ovid has derived nearly as much celebrity from his misfortunes as his writings; and, as they were solely occasioned by the vengeance of Augustus, they have reflected some dishonour on a name which would otherwise have descended to posterity as that of a generous and almost universal protector of learning and poetry. The real cause of his exile is the great problem in the literary history of Rome, and has occasioned as much doubt and controversy as the imprisonment of Tasso by Alphonso has created in modern Italy. His death happened in the year 771, in the ninth year of his exile, and the fourth of the reign of Tiberius. Before his decease, he expressed a wish that his ashes might be carried to Rome, lest his shade should continue to wander in the barbarous region, for which, during life, he had felt such horror. Even this desire, however, was not complied with. His bones were buried in the Scythian soil, and the Getæ erected to him a monument near the spot of his earthly sojourn. This, however, is an imposition to render celebrated an obscure corner of the world which never contained the bones of Ovid. The greatest part of Ovid's poems are remaining. His Metamorphoses, in 15 books, are extremely curious, on account of the many different mythological facts and traditions which they relate, but they can have no claim to an epic poem. In composing this, the poet was more indebted to the then existing traditions, and to the theogony of the ancients, than to the powers of his own imagination. His Fasti were divided into 12 books, the same number as the constellations in the zodiac; but of these, six have perished, and the learned world have reason to lament the loss of a poem which must have thrown so much light upon the religious rites and ceremonies, festivals and sacrifices, of the ancient Romans, as we may judge from the six that have survived the ravages of time and barbarity. His Tristia, which are divided into five books, contain much elegance and softness of expression, as also his Elegies on different subjects. The Heroides are nervous, spirited, and diffuse; the poetry is excellent, the language varied, but the expressions are often too wanton and indelicate, a fault which is common in his compositions. His three books of Amorum, and the same number de Arte Amandi, with the other de Remedio Amoris, are written with great elegance, and contain many flowery descriptions; but the doctrine which they hold forth is dangerous, and they are to be read with caution, as they seem to be calculated to corrupt the heart, and sap the foundations of virtue and morality. His Ibis, which is written in imitation of a poem of Callimachus of the same name, is a satirical performance. Besides these, there are extant some fragments of other poems, and among these some of a tragedy called Medea. It has been judiciously observed that his poetry, after his banishment from Rome, was destitute of that spirit and vivacity which we admire in his other compositions. His Fasti are perhaps the best written of all his poems, and after them we may fairly rank his love-verses, his Heroides, and after all, his Metamorphoses, which were not totally finished when Augustus sent him into banishment. His Epistles from Pontus are the language of an abject and pusillanimous flatterer. Ovid married three wives, but of the last alone he speaks with fondness and affection. He had only one daughter, but by which of his wives is unknown; and she herself became mother of two children by two husbands. The best editions of Ovid's works are those of Burman, 4 vols. 4to. Amst. 1727; of L. Bat. 1670, in 8vo. and of Utrecht, in 12mo. 4 vols. 1713. Ovid. Trist. 3 and 4, &c.—Paterc. 2.—Martial. 3 and 8.——II. Pacŏrus, the eldest of the thirty sons of Orodes, king of Parthia, sent against Crassus, whose army he defeated, and whom he took by disguising their dress, and by using them to the ointments and perfumes of women, as well as by a long and successful imitation of their voice. The imposition succeeded, their sex was not discovered in Crete, and when Theseus had triumphed over the Minotaur, he, with these two youths, led a procession with branches in their hands, in the same habit which is still used at the celebration of the Oschophoria. The branches which were carried were in honour of Bacchus or of Ariadne, or because they returned in autumn, when the grapes were ripe. Besides this procession, there was also a race exhibited, in which only young men, whose parents were both alive, were permitted to engage. It was usual for them to run from the temple of Bacchus to that of Minerva, which was on the seashore. The place where they stopped was called οσχοφοριον, because the boughs which they carried in their hands were deposited there. The reward of the conqueror was a cup called πεντα πλοα, five-fold, because it contained a mixture of five different things, wine, honey, cheese, meal, and oil. Plut. in Thes.

Otanes, a noble Persian, one of the seven who conspired against the usurper Smerdis. It was through him that the usurpation was first discovered. He was afterwards appointed by Darius over the seacoast of Asia Minor, and took Byzantium. Herodot. 3, c. 70, &c.

Otho, M. Salvius, a Roman emperor, descended from the ancient kings of Etruria. He was one of Nero's favourites, and, as such, he was raised to the highest offices of the state, and made governor of Pannonia by the interest of Seneca, who wished to remove him from Rome lest Nero's love for Poppæa should prove his ruin. After Nero's death, Otho conciliated the favour of Galba the new emperor; but when Galba had refused to adopt him as his successor, he resolved to make himself absolute without any regard to the age or dignity of his friend. He was acknowledged by the senate and the Roman people; but the sudden revolt of Vitellius in Germany rendered his situation precarious, and it was mutually resolved that their respective right to the empire should be decided by arms. Otho obtained three victories over his enemies, but in a general engagement near Brixellum, his forces were defeated, and he stabbed himself when all hopes of success were vanished, after a reign of three months, on the 20th of April, A. D. 69. It has been justly observed, that the last moments of Otho's life were those of a philosopher. He comforted his soldiers, who lamented his fortune, and he expressed his concern for their safety, when they earnestly solicited to pay him the last friendly offices before he stabbed himself, and he observed that it was better that one man should die than that all should be involved in ruin for his obstinacy. He also burnt the letters which, by falling into the hands of Vitellius, might provoke his resentment against those who had favoured the cause of an unfortunate general. These noble and humane sentiments in a man who was the associate of Nero's shameful pleasures, and who stained his hand in the blood of his master, have appeared to some wonderful, and passed for the features of policy, and not of a naturally-virtuous and benevolent heart. Plut. in vitâ.—Suet.—Tacit. 2, Hist. c. 50, &c.—Juv. 2, v. 90.

He soon disclosed an inclination towards poetry; but he was for some time dissuaded from a prosecution of the art by his father, whose chief object was to render him an accomplished orator and patron, and thereby open to him the path to civic honours. Having assumed the Toga Virilis, and completed the usual course of rhetorical tuition at Rome, he proceeded to finish his education at Athens. After his return to the capital, he ventured on a trial of his legal skill in the actual business of life. Pacŭvius, M. a native of Brundusium, son of the sister of the poet Ennius, who distinguished himself by his skill in painting, and by his poetical talents. He wrote satires and tragedies, which were represented at Rome, and of some of which the names are preserved, as Peribœa, Hermione, Atalanta, Ilione, Teucer, Antiope, &c. Orestes was considered as the best-finished performance; the style, however, though rough, and without either purity or elegance, deserved the commendation of Cicero and Quintilian, who perceived strong rays of genius and perfection frequently beaming through the clouds of the barbarity and ignorance of the times. The poet, in his old age, retired to Tarentum, where he died in his 90th year, about 131 years before Christ. Of all his compositions, about 437 scattered lines are preserved in the collections of Latin poets. Cic. de Orat. 2, ad Heren. 2, c. 27.—Horat. 2, ep. 1, v. 56.—Quintil. 10, c. 1.

Palamēdes, a Grecian chief, son of Nauplius, king of Eubœa, by Clymene. He was sent by the Greek princes who were going to the Trojan war, to bring Ulysses to the camp, who, to withdraw himself from the expedition, pretended insanity; and the better to impose upon his friends, used to harness different animals to a plough, and sow salt instead of barley into the furrows. The deceit was soon perceived by Palamedes; he took Telemachus, whom Penelope had lately brought into the world, and put him before the plough of his father. Ulysses showed that he was not insane by turning the plough a different way, not to hurt his child. This having been discovered, Ulysses was obliged to attend the Greek princes to the war: but an immortal enmity arose between Ulysses and Palamedes. The king of Ithaca resolved to take every opportunity to distress him; and when all his expectations were frustrated, he had the meanness to bribe one of his servants, and to make him dig a hole in his master's tent, and there conceal a large sum of money. After this, Ulysses forged a letter in Phrygian characters, which king Priam was supposed to have sent to Palamedes. In the letter, the Trojan king seemed to entreat Palamedes to deliver into his hands the Grecian army, according to the conditions which had been previously agreed upon when he received the money. This forged letter was carried by means of Ulysses before the princes of the Grecian army. Palamedes was summoned, and he made the most solemn protestations of innocence, but all was in vain; the money that was discovered in his tent served only to corroborate the accusation. He was found guilty by all the army, and stoned to death. Homer is silent upon the miserable death of Palamedes; and Pausanias mentions that it had been reported by some, that Ulysses and Diomedes had drowned him in the sea, as he was fishing on the coast. Philostratus, who mentions the tragical story above related, adds that Achilles and Ajax burned his body with great pomp on the seashore, and that they raised upon it a small chapel, where sacrifices were regularly offered by the inhabitants of Troas. Palamedes was a learned man as well as a soldier; and, according to some, he completed the alphabet of Cadmus by the addition of the four letters, θ, ξ, χ, φ, during the Trojan war. To him also is attributed the invention of dice and backgammon; and it is said he was the first who regularly ranged an army in a line of battle, and who placed sentinels round a camp, and excited their vigilance and attention by giving them a watchword. Hygin. fab. 96, 105, &c.—Apollod. 2, &c.—Dictys Cret. 2, c. 15.—*Ovid. Palīlia, a festival celebrated by the Romans in honour of the goddess Pales. The ceremony consisted in burning heaps of straw, and in leaping over them. No sacrifices were offered, but the purifications were made with the smoke of horse's blood, and with the ashes of a calf that had been taken from the belly of his mother after it had been sacrificed, and with the ashes of beans. The purification of the flocks was also made with the smoke of sulphur, of the olive, the pine, the laurel, and the rosemary. Offerings of mild cheese, boiled wine, and cakes of millet, were afterwards made to the goddess. This festival was observed on the 21st of April, and it was during the celebration that Romulus first began to build his city. Some call this festival Parilia quasi a pariendo, because the sacrifices were offered to the divinity for the fecundity of the flocks. *Ovid. Palīnūrus, a skilful pilot of the ship of Æneas. He fell into the sea in his sleep, and was three days exposed to the tempests and the waves of the sea, and at last came safe to the seashore near Velia, where the cruel inhabitants of the place murdered him to obtain his clothes. His body was left unburied on the seashore; and as, according to the religion of the ancient Romans, no person was suffered to cross the Stygian lake before one hundred years were elapsed if his remains had not been decently buried, we find Æneas, when he visited the infernal regions, speaking to Palinurus, and assuring him that, though his bones were deprived of a funeral, yet the place where his body was exposed should soon be adorned with a monument, and bear his name; and accordingly a promontory was called Palinurus, now Palinuro. *Virg. Pallas, (antis,) I. a son of king Evander, sent with some troops to assist Æneas. He was killed by Turnus, the king of the Rutuli, after he had made great slaughter of the enemy. Virg. Æn. 8, v. 104, &c.——II. One of the giants, son of Tartarus and Terra. He was killed by Minerva, who covered herself with his skin; whence, as some suppose, she is called Pallas. Apollod. 3, c. 12.——III. A freedman of Claudius, famous for the power and the riches he obtained. He advised the emperor, his master, to marry Agrippina, and to adopt her son Nero for his successor. It was by this means that Nero was raised to the throne. Nero forgot to whom he was indebted for the crown. He discarded Pallas, and some time after caused him to be put to death, that he might make himself master of his great riches, A. D. 61. Tacit. 12, Ann. c. 53.

Pamphĭlus, a celebrated painter of Macedonia, in the age of Philip, distinguished above his rivals by a superior knowledge of literature. He was founder of the school for painting at Sicyon, and he made a law which was observed not only in Sicyon, but all over Greece, that none but the children of noble and dignified persons should be permitted to learn painting. Apelles was one of his pupils. Diog.

Pamphos, a Greek poet, supposed to have lived before Hesiod's age.

Pamphȳla, a Greek woman, who wrote a general history in 33 books, in Nero's reign. This history, much commended by the ancients, is lost.

Panætius, I. a stoic philosopher of Rhodes, 138 B. C. He studied at Athens for some time, of which he refused to become a citizen, observing, that a good and honest man ought to be satisfied with one country. He came to Rome, where he reckoned among his pupils Lælius and Scipio the second Africanus. The latter he attended in his expeditions. To the interest of their countrymen at Rome the Rhodians were greatly indebted for their prosperity and the immunities which they for some time enjoyed. Panætius wrote a treatise on the duties of man, the merit of which can be ascertained from the encomiums which Cicero bestows upon it. Cic. in offic. de Div. 1. In Acad. 2, c. 2, de N. D. 2, c. 46.——II. A tyrant of Leontini in Sicily, B. C. 613. Polyæn. 5.

Panathenæa, festivals in honour of Minerva, the patroness of Athens. They were first instituted by Erichtheus or Orpheus, and called Athenæa; but Theseus afterwards renewed them, and caused them to be celebrated and observed by all the tribes of Athens, which he had united into one, and from which reason the festivals received their name. Some suppose that they are the same as the Roman Quinquatria, as they are often called by that name among the Latins. In the first year of the institution they were observed only during one day, but afterwards the time was prolonged. The festivals were two; the great Panathenæa, (μεγαλα,) which were observed every 5th year, beginning ont he 22d of the month called Hecatombæon, or 7th of July; and the lesser Panathenæa, (μικρα,) which were kept every 3d year, or rather annually, beginning on the 21st or 20th of the month called Thargelion, corresponding to the 5th or 6th day of the month of May. In the lesser festivals there were three games, conducted by ten presidents chosen from the ten tribes of Athens, who continued four years in office. On the evening of the first day there was a race with torches, in which men on foot, and afterwards on horseback, contended. The second combat exhibited a trial of strength and bodily dexterity. The last was a musical contention, first instituted by Pericles. Phrynis of Mitylene was the first who obtained the victory by playing upon the harp. There were, besides, other musical instruments, on which they played in concert, such as flutes, &c. The poets contended in four plays, called from their number τετραλογια. The last of these was a satire. There was also at Sunium an imitation of a naval-fight. Whoever obtained the victory in any of these games was rewarded with a vessel of oil, which he was permitted to dispose of in whatever manner he pleased, and it was unlawful for any other person to transport that commodity. The conqueror also received a crown of the olives which grew in the groves of Academus, and were sacred to Minerva, and called μορεια, from μορος, death, in remembrance of the tragical end of Hallirhotius, the son of Neptune, who cut his own legs when he attempted to cut down the olive which had given the victory to Minerva in preference to his father, when these two deities contended about giving a name to Athens. Some suppose that the word is derived from μερος, a part, because these olives were given by contribution by all such as attended at the festivals. There was also a dance, called Pyrrhichia, performed by young boys in armour, in imitation of Minerva, who thus expressed her triumph over the vanquished Titans. Gladiators were also introduced when Athens became tributary to the Romans. During the celebration, no person was permitted to appear in died garments, and if any one transgressed, he was punished according to the discretion of the president of the games. After these things, a sumptuous sacrifice was offered, in which every one of the Athenian boroughs contributed an ox, and the whole was concluded by an entertainment for all the company with the flesh that remained from the sacrifice. In the greater festivals, the same rites and ceremonies were usually observed, but with more solemnity and magnificence. Others were also added, particularly the procession, in which Minerva's sacred πεπλος, or garment, was carried. This garment was woven by a select number of virgins, called εργαστραι, from εργον, work. They were superintended by two of the αρρηφοροι, or young virgins, not above seventeen years of age nor under eleven, whose garments were white, and set off with ornaments of gold. Minerva's peplus, was of a white colour, without sleeves, and embroidered with gold. Upon it were described the achievements of the goddess, particularly her victories over the giants. The exploits of Jupiter and the other gods were also represented there, and from that circumstance men of courage and bravery are said to be αξιοι πεπλου, worthy to be pourtrayed in Minerva's sacred garment. In the procession of the peplus the following ceremonies were observed. In the ceramicus, without the city, there was an engine built in the form of a ship, upon which Minerva's garment was hung as a sail, and the whole was conducted, not by beasts, as some have supposed, but by subterraneous machines, to the temple of Ceres Eleusinia, and from thence to the citadel, where the peplus was placed upon Minerva's statue, which was laid upon a bed woven or strewed with flowers, which was called πλαναις. Persons of all ages, of every sex and quality, attended the procession, which was led by old men and women, carrying olive branches in their hands; from which reason they were called θαλλοφοροι, bearers of green boughs. Next followed men of full age, with shields and spears. They were attended by the μετοικοι, or foreigners, who carried small boats as a token of their foreign origin, and from that account were called σκαφηφοροι, boat-bearers. After them came the women, attended by the wives of the foreigners, called ὑδριαφοροι, because they carried water-pots. Next to these came young men crowned with millet, and singing hymns to the goddess, and after them followed select virgins of the noblest families, called κανηφοροι, basket-bearers, because they carried baskets, in which were certain things necessary for the celebration, with whatever utensils were also requisite. These several necessaries were generally in the possession of the chief manager of the festival, called αρχιθεωρος, who distributed them when occasion offered. The virgins were attended by the daughters of the foreigners, who carried umbrellas and little seats, from which they were named διφρηφοροι, seat-carriers. The boys, called παιδαμοικοι, as it may be supposed, led the rear, clothed in coats generally worn at processions. The necessaries for this and every other festival were prepared in a public hall erected for that purpose, between the Piræan gate and the temple of Ceres. The management and the care of the whole was intrusted to the νομοφυλακες, or people employed in seeing the rites and ceremonies properly observed. It was also usual to set all prisoners at liberty, and to present golden crowns to such as had deserved well of their country. Some persons were also chosen to sing some of Homer's poems, a custom which was first introduced by Hipparchus, the son of Pisistratus. It was also customary in this festival, and every other quinquennial festival, to pray for the prosperity of the Platæans, whose services had been so conspicuous at the battle of Marathon. Plut in Thes.—Paus Arc. 2.—Ælian. V. H. 8, c. 2.—Apollod. 3, c. 14.

PANDARUS, a son of Lycaon, who assisted the Trojans in their war against the Greeks. He went to the war without a chariot, and therefore he generally fought on foot. He broke the truce which had been agreed upon between the Greeks and Trojans, and wounded Menelaus and Diomedes, and showed himself brave and unusually courageous. He was at last killed by Diomedes; and Æneas, who then carried him in his chariot, by attempting to revenge his death, nearly perished by the hand of the furious enemy. Dictys Cret. 2, v. 35.—Homer Il. 2 and 5.—Hygin. fab. 112.—Virg. Æn. 5, v. 495.—Strab. 14.—Servius. in loco. Vid. Part III.

PANDIA, a festival at Athens, established by Pandion, from whom it received its name, or because it was observed in honour of Jupiter, who can τα παντα δεγεσιν, move and turn all things as he pleases. Some suppose that it concerned the moon, because it does παντοτε ιεναι, move incessantly, by showing itself day and night, rather than the sun, which never appears but in the day-time. It was celebrated after the Dionysia.

PANOPION, a Roman, saved from death by the uncommon fidelity of his servant. When the assassins came to murder him, as being proscribed, the servant exchanged clothes with his master, and let him escape by a back door. He afterwards went into his master's bed, and suffered himself to be killed, as if Panopion himself. Val. Max.

PANSA, (C. Vibius,) a Roman consul, who, with A. Hirtius, pursued the murderers of J. Cæsar, and was killed in a battle near Mutina. On his deathbed, he advised young Octavius to unite his interest with that of Antony, if he wished to revenge the death of Julius Cæsar; and from his friendly advice soon after rose the celebrated second triumvirate. Some suppose that Pansa was put to death by Octavius himself, or through him, by the physician Glicon, who poured poison into the wounds of his patient. Pansa and Hirtius were the two last consuls who enjoyed the dignity of chief magistrates of Rome with full power. The authority of the consuls afterwards dwindled into a shadow. Paterc. 2, c. 6.—Dio. 46.—Ovid. Trist. 3, el. 5.—Plut & Appian.

PANTALEON, a king of Pisa, who presided at the Olympic games, B. C. 664, after excluding the Eleans, who on that account expunged the Olympiad from the Fasti, and called it the 2d Anolympiad. They had called, for the same reason, the 8th the 1st Anolympiad, because the Pisæans presided.

PANTHEA, the wife of Abradates, celebrated for her beauty and conjugal affection. She was taken prisoner by Cyrus, who refused to visit her, not to be ensnared by the power of her personal charms. She killed herself on the body of her husband, who had been slain in a battle, &c. Vid. Abradates. Xenoph. Cyrop.—Suidas.

PANTHOÏDES, a patronymic of Euphorbus, the son of Panthous. Pythagoras is sometimes called by that name, as he asserted that he was Euphorbus during the Trojan war. Horat. 1, od. 28, v. 10.—Ovid. Met. 15, v. 161.——A Spartan general, killed by Pericles at the battle of Tanagra.

Panyasis, an ancient Greek, uncle to the historian Herodotus. The celebrated Hercules in one of his poems, and the Ionians in another, and was universally esteemed. Athen. 2.

Papia Lex, de peregrinis, by Papius the tribune, A. U. C. 688, which required that all strangers should be driven away from Rome. It was afterwards confirmed and extended by the Julian law.——Another, called Papia Poppæa, because it was enacted by the tribunes M. Papius Mutilus and Q. Poppæus Secundus, who had received consular power from the consul for six months. It was called afterwards the Julian law. Vid. Julia lex de Maritandis ordinibus. It gave the patron a certain right to the property of his client, if he had left a specified sum of money, or if he had not three children.

Papianus, a man who proclaimed himself emperor some time after the Gordians. He was put to death.

Papias, an early Christian writer, who first propagated the doctrine of the Milennium. There are remaining some historical fragments of his.

Papirius, I. a Roman, from whose ill-treatment of the slaves a decree was made which forbade any person to be detained in fetters, but only for a crime that deserved such a treatment, and only till the criminal had suffered the punishment which the laws directed. Creditors also had a right to arrest the goods and not the person of their debtors. Liv. 8, c. 28.——II. Carbo, a Roman consul, who undertook the defence of Opimius, who was accused of condemning and putting to death a number of citizens on mount Aventius, without the formalities of a trial. His client was acquitted.——III. Cursor, a man who first erected a sundial in the temple of Quirinus at Rome, B. C. 293; from which time the days began to be divided into hours.——IV. A dictator, who ordered his master of horse to be put to death because he had fought and conquered the enemies of the republic without his consent. The people interfered and the dictator pardoned him. Cursor made war against the Sabines, and conquered them, and also triumphed over the Samnites. His great severity displeased the people. He flourished about 320 years before the Christian era. Liv. 9, c. 14.——V. one of his family, surnamed Prætextatus, from an action of his whilst he wore the prætexta, a certain gown for young men. His father of the same name, carried him to the senate-house, where affairs of the greatest importance were then in debate before the senators. The mother of young Papirius wished to know what had passed in the senate; but Papirius, unwilling to betray the secrets of that august assembly, amused the mother by telling her that it had been considered whether it would be more advantageous to the republic to give two wives to one husband, than two husbands to one wife. The mother of Papirius was alarmed, and she communicated the secret to the other Roman matrons, and, on the morrow, they assembled in the senate, petitioning that one woman might have two husbands, rather than one husband two wives. The senators were astonished at this petition, but young Papirius unravelled the whole mystery, and from that time it was made a law among the senators that no young man should for the future be introduced into the senate-house, except Papirius. This law was carefully observed till the age of Augustus, who permitted children of all ages to hear the debates of the senators. Macrob. Sat. 1, c. 6.——VI. Carbo, a friend of Cinna and Marius. He raised cabals against Sylla and Pompey, and was at last put to death by order of Pompey, after he had rendered himself odious by a tyrannical consulship, and after he had been proscribed by Sylla.——VII. Maso, a consul, who conquered Sardinia and Corsica, and reduced them into the form of a province. At his return to Rome he refused a triumph, upon which he introduced a triumphal procession, and walked with his victorious army to the capitol, wearing a crown of myrtle on his head. His example was afterwards followed by such generals as were refused a triumph by the Roman senate. Val. Max. 3, c. 6.——The family of the Papirii were patrician, and long distinguished for its service to the state. It bore the different surnames of Crassus, Cursor, Mugillanus, Maso, Prætextatus, and Pætus, of which the three first branches became the most illustrious.

Papiria Lex, by Papirius Carbo, A. U. C. 621. It required that, in passing or rejecting laws in the comitia, the votes should be given on tablets.——Another, by the tribune Papirius, which enacted that no person should consecrate any edifice, place, or thing, without the consent or permission of the people. Cic. pro domo, 50.——Another, A. U. C. 563, to diminish the weight and increase the value of the Roman as.——Another, A. U. C. 421, to give the freedom of the city to the citizens of Acerræ.

Pappia Lex was enacted to settle the rights of husbands and wives if they had no children.——Another, by which a person less than 50 years old could not marry another of 60.

Parabyston, a tribunal at Athens, where causes of inferior consequence were tried by 11 judges. Paus. 1, c. 40.

Parălus, I. a friend of Dion, by whose assistance he expelled Dionysius.——II. A son of Pericles. His premature death was greatly lamented by his father. Plut.

Parentalia, a festival annually observed at Rome in honour of the dead. The friends and relations of the deceased assembled on the occasion, when sacrifices were offered and banquets provided. Æneas first established it. Ovid. Fast. 2, v. 544.

Păris, I. the son of Priam, king of Troy, by Hecuba, also called Alexander. He was destined, even before his birth, to become the ruin of his country; and when his mother, in the first month of her pregnancy, had dreamed that she should bring forth a torch which would set fire to her palace, the soothsayers foretold the calamities which might be expected from the imprudence of her future son, and which would end in the destruction of Troy. Priam, to prevent so great and so alarming an evil, ordered his slave Archelaus to destroy the child as soon as born. The slave did not destroy him, but was satisfied to expose him on mount Ida, where the shepherds of the place found him, and educated him as their own son. Some attribute the preservation of his life, before he was found by the shepherds, to the motherly tenderness of a she-bear which suckled him. Young Paris, though educated among shepherds and peasants, gave early proofs of courage and intrepidity; and from his care in protecting the flocks of mount Ida against the rapacity of the wild beasts, he obtained the name of Alexander (helper or defender). He gained the esteem of all the shepherds, and his graceful countenance and manly deportment recommended him to the favour of Œnone, a nymph of Ida, whom he married. He was chosen umpire between Juno, Minerva, and Venus; and appointed to adjudge the prize of beauty to the fairest of the goddesses. The goddesses appeared before their judge, and each tried, by promises and entreaties, to gain the attention of Paris, and to influence his judgment. Juno promised him a kingdom; Minerva, military glory; and Venus, the fairest woman in the world for his wife, as Ovid expresses it. Heroid. 17, v. 118:—

Unaque cum regnum; belli daret alter laudem; Tyndaridis conjux, Tertia dixit, eris.

After he had heard their several claims and promises, Paris adjudged the prize to Venus. This decision of Paris in favour of Venus, drew upon the judge and his family the resentment of the two other goddesses. Soon after, Priam proposed a contest among his sons and other princes, and promised to reward the conqueror with one of the finest bulls of mount Ida. His emissaries were sent to procure the animal, and it was found in the possession of Paris, who reluctantly yielded it up. The shepherd was desirous of obtaining again this favourite animal, and he went to Troy, and entered the lists of the combatants. He was received with the greatest applause, and obtained the victory over his rivals, Nestor, the son of Neleus; Cycnus, son of Neptune; Polites, Helenus, and Deiphobus, sons of Priam. He also obtained a superiority over Hector himself. Cassandra, the daughter of Priam, soon discovered that he was her brother, and as such she introduced him to her father and to his children. Priam acknowledged Paris as his son, forgetful of the alarming dream which had influenced him to meditate his death, and all jealousy ceased among the brothers. Paris did not long suffer himself to remain inactive; he equipped a fleet, as if willing to redeem Hesione, his father's sister, whom Hercules had carried away. He visited Sparta, the residence of Helen, who had married Menelaus, and was received with every mark of respect; but he abused the hospitality of Menelaus, and, while the husband was absent in Crete, Paris persuaded Helen to elope with him, and to fly to Asia. Upon this, all Greece took up arms in the cause of Menelaus. Vid. Troja. Paris, meanwhile, who had refused Helen to the petitions and embassies of the Greeks, armed himself, with his brothers and subjects, to oppose the enemy; but the success of the war was neither hindered nor accelerated by his means. He fought with little courage, and at the very sight of Menelaus, whom he had so recently injured, all his resolution vanished, and he retired from the front of the army, where he walked before like a conqueror. In a combat with Menelaus, which he undertook at the persuasion of his brother Hector, Paris must have perished, had not Venus interfered, and stolen him from the resentment of his adversary. He nevertheless wounded, in another battle, Machaon, Eurypilus, and Diomedes; and, according to some opinions, he killed with one of his arrows the great Achilles. Vid. Achilles. The death of Paris is differently related; some suppose that he was mortally wounded by one of the arrows of Philoctetes, which had been once in the possession of Hercules, and that when he found himself languid on account of his wounds, he ordered himself to be carried to the feet of Œnone, whom he had basely abandoned, and who, in the years of his obscurity, had foretold him that he would solicit her assistance in his dying moments. He expired before he came into the presence of Œnone, and the nymph, still mindful of their former loves, threw herself upon his body, and stabbed herself to the heart. According to some authors, Paris did not immediately go to Troy when he left the Peloponnesus, but he was driven on the coast of Egypt, where Proteus, who was king of the country, detained him, and when he heard of the violence which had been offered to the king of Sparta, he kept Helen at his court and permitted Paris to retire. *Vid. Parmenides, a Greek philosopher of Elis, who flourished about 505 years before Christ. He was son of Pyres of Elis, and the pupil of Xenophanes, or of Anaximander, according to some. He maintained that there were only two elements, fire and the earth; and he taught that the first generation of men was produced from the sun. He first discovered that the earth was round, and habitable only in the two temperate zones, and that it was suspended in the centre of the universe, in a fluid lighter than air, so that all bodies left to themselves fell on its surface. There were, as he supposed, only two sorts of philosophy; one founded on reason, and the other on opinion. He digested this unpopular system in verse, of which a few fragments remain. Diog.

Parmenio, a celebrated general in the armies of Alexander, who enjoyed the king's confidence, and was more attached to his person as a man than as a monarch. When Darius, king of Persia, offered Alexander all the country which lies at the west of the Euphrates, with his daughter Statira in marriage, and 10,000 talents of gold, Parmenio took occasion to observe, that he would without hesitation accept of these conditions if he were Alexander. So would I were I Parmenio, replied the conqueror. This friendship, so true and inviolable, was sacrificed to a moment of resentment and suspicion; and Alexander, who had too eagerly listened to a light, and perhaps a false, accusation, ordered Parmenio and his son to be put to death, as if guilty of treason against his person. Parmenio was in the 70th year of his age, B. C.

330. He died in the greatest popularity; and it has been judiciously observed, that Parmenio obtained many victories without Alexander, but Alexander not one without Parmenio. Curt. 7, &c.—Plut in Alex.

Parphŏrus, a native of Colophon, who, at the head of a colony, built a town at the foot of Ida, which was abandoned for a situation nearer his native city. Strab. 14.—Paus. 7, c. 3.

Parrhăsius, I. a famous painter, son of Evenor of Ephesus, in the age of Zeuxis, about 415 years before Christ. He acquired himself great reputation by his pieces, but by none more than that in which he allegorically represented the people of Athens, with all the injustice, the clemency, the fickleness, timidity, the arrogance, and inconsistency, which so eminently characterized that celebrated nation. He once entered the lists against Zeuxis, and when they had produced their respective pieces, the birds came to pick with the greatest avidity the grapes which Zeuxis had painted. Immediately Parrhasius exhibited his piece, and Zeuxis said remove your curtain, that we may see the painting. The curtain was the painting, and Zeuxis acknowledged himself conquered by exclaiming, Zeuxis has deceived birds; but Parrhasius has deceived Zeuxis himself. Parrhasius grew so vain of his art, that he clothed himself in purple, and wore a crown of gold, calling himself the king of painters. Plut. in Thes. de Poet. aud.—Paus. 1, c. 28.—Plin. 35, v. 10.—Horat. 4, od. 8.——II. A son of Jupiter, or, according to some, of Mars, by a nymph called Philonomia.

Parthĕniæ and Parthĕnii, a certain number of desperate citizens of Sparta. During the Messenian war, the Spartans were absent from their city for the space of ten years, and it was unlawful for them to return, as they had bound themselves by a solemn oath not to revisit Sparta before they had totally subdued Messenia. This long absence alarmed the Lacedæmonian women, as well as the magistrates. The Spartans were reminded by their wives, that if they continued in their resolution, the state must at last decay for want of citizens; and when they had duly considered this embassy, they empowered all the young men in the army, who had come to the war while yet under age, and who therefore were not bound by the oath, to return to Sparta, and, by a familiar and promiscuous intercourse with all the unmarried women of the state, to raise a future generation. It was carried into execution, and the children that sprang from this union were called Partheniæ, or sons of virgins, (παρθενος.) The war with Messenia was some time after ended, and the Spartans returned victorious; but the cold indifference with which they looked upon the Partheniæ was attended with serious consequences. They joined with the Helots, and it was mutually agreed to murder all the citizens of Sparta, and to seize their possessions. This massacre was to be done at a general assembly, and the signal was the throwing of a cap in the air. The whole, however, was discovered through the diffidence and apprehensions of the Helots; and when the people had assembled, the Parthenie discovered that all was known, by the voice of a crier, who proclaimed that no man should throw up his cap. The Partheniæ, though apprehensive of punishment, were not visibly treated with greater severity; their calamitous condition was attentively examined, and the Spartans, afraid of another conspiracy, and awed by their numbers, permitted them to sail for Italy, with Phalantus, their ringleader, at their head. They settled in Magna Græcia, and built Tarentum, about 707 years before Christ. Justin. 3, c. 5.—Strab. 6.—Paus. in Lacon. &c.—Plut. in Apoph.

Parysătis, a Persian princess, wife of Darius Ochus, by whom she had Artaxerxes Mnenon and Cyrus the younger. The death of Cyrus, at the battle of Cunaxa, was revenged with the grossest barbarity, and Parysatis sacrificed to her resentment all such as she found concerned in his fall. She also poisoned Statira, the wife of his son Artaxerxes, and ordered one of the eunuchs of the court to be flayed alive, and his skin to be stretched on two poles before her eyes, because he had, by order of the king, cut off the hand and the head of Cyrus. These cruelties offended Artaxerxes, and he ordered his mother to be confined in Babylon; but they were soon after reconciled, and Parysatis regained all her power and influence till the time of her death. Plut. in Art.—Cles.

Pătrŏclus, one of the Grecian chiefs during the Trojan war, son of Menœtius by Sthenele, whom some called Philomela, or Polymela. The accidental murder of Clysonymus, the son of Amphidamus, in the time of his youth, obliged him to fly from Opus, where his father reigned. He retired to the court of Peleus, king of Phthia, where he was kindly received, and where he contracted the most intimate friendship with Achilles, the monarch's son. When his friend refused to appear in the field of battle, because he had been offended by Agamemnon, Patroclus imitated his example, and by his absence was the cause of the overthrow of the Greeks. But at last Nestor prevailed on him to return to the war, and Achilles permitted him to appear in his armour. The valour of Patroclus, together with the terror which the sight of the arms of Achilles inspired, soon routed the victorious arms of the Trojans, and obliged them to fly within their walls for safety. He would have broken down the walls of the city; but Apollo, who had interested himself for the Trojans, placed himself to oppose them, and Hector, at the instigation of the god, dismounted from his chariot to attack him, as he attempted to strip one of the Trojans whom he had slain. The engagement was obstinate, but at last Patroclus was overpowered by the valour of Hector and the interposition of Apollo. His arms became the property of the conqueror, and Hector would have severed his head from his body had not Ajax and Menelaus intervened. His body was at last recovered, and carried to the Grecian camp, where Achilles received it with the bitterest lamentations. His funeral was observed with the greatest solemnity. Achilles sacrificed near the burning pile twelve young Trojans, besides four of their horses and two of his dogs; and the whole was concluded by the exhibition of funeral games, in which the conquerors were liberally rewarded by Achilles. The death of Patroclus, as it is described by Homer, gave rise to new events; Achilles forgot his resentment against Agamemnon, and entered the field to avenge the fall of his friend, and his anger was gratified only by the slaughter of Hector, who had more powerfully kindled his wrath by appearing at the head of the Trojan armies in the armour which had been taken from the body of Patroclus. The patronymic of Actorides is often applied to Patroclus, because Actor was father to Menœtius. Dictys Cret. 4, &c.—Homer. Il. 9, &c.—Apollod. 3, c. 13.—Hygin. fab. 97 and 275.—*Ovid. PAULA, the first wife of the emperor Heliogabalus. She was daughter of the prefect of the pretorian guards. The emperor divorced her, and Paula retired to solitude and obscurity with composure.

PAULINA, I. a Roman lady who married Saturninus, a governor of Syria, in the reign of the emperor Tiberius. Her conjugal peace was disturbed, and violence was offered to her virtue by a young man named Mundus, who was enamoured of her, and who had caused her to come to the temple of Isis by means of the priests of the goddess, who declared that Anubis wished to communicate to her something of moment. Saturninus complained to the emperor of the violence which had been offered to his wife, and the temple of Isis was overturned and Mundus banished, &c. Joseph. A. 18, c. 4.——II. The wife of the philosopher Seneca, who attempted to kill herself when Nero had ordered her husband to die. The emperor, however, prevented her, and she lived some few days after, in the greatest melancholy. Tacit. Ann. 15, c. 63, &c.

PAULINUS POMPEIUS, I. an officer in Nero's reign, who had the command of the German armies, and finished the works on the banks of the Rhine, which Drusus had begun 63 years before. Tacit. Ann. 13, c. 53.—Suetonius.——II. A Roman general, the first who crossed mount Atlas with an army. He wrote a history of this expedition in Africa, which is lost. Paulinus also distinguished himself in Britain, &c. He followed the arms of Otho against Vitellius. Plin. 5, c. 1.

PAULUS ÆMYLIUS, I. a Roman, son of the Æmylius who fell at Cannæ, was celebrated for his victories, and received the surname of Macedonicus from his conquest of Macedonia. In his first consulship his arms were directed against the Ligurians, whom he totally subjected. His applications for a second consulship proved abortive; but when Perseus, the king of Macedonia, had declared war against Rome, the abilities of Paulus were remembered, and he was honoured with the consulship about the 60th year of his age. After this appointment he behaved with uncommon vigour, and soon a general engagement was fought near Pydna. The Romans obtained the victory, and Perseus saw himself deserted by all his subjects. In two days the conqueror made himself master of all Macedonia, and soon after the fugitive monarch was brought into his presence. Paulus did not exult over his fallen enemy; but when he had gently rebuked him for his temerity in attacking the Romans, he had addressed himself in a pathetic speech to the officers of his army who surrounded him, and feelingly enlarged on the instability of fortune and vicissitude of all human affairs. When he had finally settled the government of Macedonia with ten commissioners from Rome, and after he had sacked 70 cities of Epirus, and divided the booty among his soldiers, Paulus returned to Italy. He was received with the usual acclamations, and though some of the seditious soldiers attempted to prevent his triumphal entry into the capitol, yet three days were appointed to exhibit the fruits of his victories. Perseus, with his wretched family, adorned the triumph of the conqueror; and as they were dragged through the streets, before the chariot of Paulus, they drew tears of compassion from the people. The riches which the Romans derived from this conquest were immense, and the people were freed from all taxes till the consulship of Hirtius and Pansa; but while every one of the citizens received some benefit from the victories of Paulus, the conqueror himself was poor, and appropriated for his own use nothing of the Macedonian treasures except the library of Perseus. In the office of censor, to which he was afterwards elected, Paulus behaved with the greatest moderation, and at his death, which happened about 168 years before the Christian era, not only the Romans, but their very enemies confessed, by their lamentations, the loss which they had sustained. He had married Papiria, by whom he had two sons, one of which was adopted by the family of Maximus, and the other in that of Scipio Africanus. He had also two daughters, one of whom married a son of Cato, and the other Ælius Tubero. He afterwards divorced Papiria; and when his friends wished to reprobate his conduct in doing so, by observing that she was young and handsome, and that she had made him father of a fine family, Paulus replied, that the shoe which he then wore was new and well-made, but that he was obliged to leave it off, though no one but himself, as he said, knew where it pinched him. He married a second wife, by whom he had two sons, whose sudden death exhibited to the Romans, in the most engaging view, their father's philosophy and stoicism. The elder of these sons died five days before Paulus triumphed over Perseus, and the other, three days after the public procession. This domestic calamity did not shake the firmness of the conqueror; yet before he retired to a private station, he harangued the people, and in mentioning the severity of fortune upon his family, he expressed his wish that every evil might be averted from the republic by the sacrifice of the domestic prosperity of an individual. Plut. in vitâ.—Liv. 43, 44, &c.—Justin. 33, c. 1, &c.——II. Maximus. Vid. Maximus Fabius.——III. Æginēta, a Greek physician, whose work was edited apud Ald. fol. 1528.——IV. L. Æmylius, a consul, who, when opposed to Annibal in Italy, checked the rashness of his colleague Varro, and recommended an imitation of the conduct of the great Fabius, by harassing and not facing the enemy in the field. His advice was rejected, and the battle of Cannæ, so glorious to Annibal, and so fatal to Rome, soon followed. Paulus was wounded; but when he might have escaped from the slaughter, by accepting a horse generously offered by one of his officers, he disdained to fly, and perished by the darts of the enemy. Horat. od. 12, v. 38.—Liv. 22, c. 39.

Pausanias, I. a Spartan general, who greatly signalized himself at the battle of Platæa against the Persians; but the haughtiness of his behaviour created him many enemies, and the Athenians soon obtained a superiority in the affairs of Greece. Pausanias was dissatisfied with his countrymen, and he offered to betray Greece to the Persians, if he received in marriage, as the reward of his perfidy, the daughter of their monarch. His intrigues were discovered by means of a youth, who was intrusted with his letters to Persia, and who refused to go, on the recollection that such as had been employed in that office before had never returned. The letters were given to the Ephori of Sparta, and the perfidy of Pausanias laid open. He fled for safety to a temple of Minerva, and as the sanctity of the place screened him from the violence of his pursuers, the sacred building was surrounded with heaps of stones, the first of which was carried there by the indignant mother of the unhappy man. He was starved to death in the temple, and died about 471 years before the Christian era. There was a festival and solemn games instituted in his honour, in which only freeborn Spartans contended. There was also an oration spoken in his praise, in which his actions were celebrated, particularly the battle of Platæa and the defeat of Mardonius. C. Nep. in vitâ.—Plut. in Arist. & Them.—Herodot. 9.——II. Another, at the court of King Philip. He was grossly and unnaturally abused by Attalus, one of the friends of Philip, and when he complained of the injuries he had received, the king in some measure disregarded his remonstrances. This incensed Pausanias; he resolved to revenge himself, and stabbed Philip as he entered a public theatre. After this bloody action he attempted to make his escape to his chariot, which waited for him at the door of the city, but he was stopped accidentally by the twig of a vine, and fell down. Attalus, Perdiccas, and other friends of Philip, who pursued him, immediately fell upon him and despatched him. Some support that Pausanias committed this murder at the instigation of Olympias, the wife of Philip, and of her son Alexander. Diod. 16.—Justin. 9.—Plut. in Apoph.——III. A celebrated orator and historian, who settled at Rome, A. D. 170, where he died in a very advanced age. He wrote a history of Greece in ten books, in the Ionic dialect, in which he gives, with great precision and geographical knowledge, an account of the situation of its different cities, their antiquities, and the several curiosities which they contained. He has also interwoven mythology in his historical account, and introduced many fabulous traditions and superstitious stories. In each book the author treats of a separate country, such as Attica, Arcadia, Messenia, Elis, &c. Some suppose that he gave a similar description of Phœnicia and Syria. There was another Pausanias, a native of Cæsarea in Cappadocia, who wrote some declamations, and who is often confounded with the historian of that name. The best edition of Pausanias is that of Khunius, fol. Lips. 1696.——IV. A king of Sparta, of the family of the Eurysthenidæ, who died 397 B. C., after a reign of 14 years.

Pausias, a painter of Sicyon, the first who understood how to apply colours to wood or ivory by means of fire. He made a beautiful painting of his mistress, Glycere, whom he represented as sitting on the ground and making garlands with flowers, and from this circumstance the picture, which was bought afterwards by Lucullus for two talents, received the name of Stephanoplocos. Some time after the death of Pausias, the Sicyonians were obliged to part with the pictures they possessed to deliver themselves from an enormous debt, and M. Scaurus, the Roman, bought them all, in which were those of Pausias, to adorn the theatre, which had been built during his edileship. Pausias lived about 360 years before Christ. Plin. 35, c. 11.

Pelŏpēia, a festival observed by the people of Elis in honour of Pelops. It was kept in imitation of Hercules, who sacrificed to Pelops in a trench, as it was usual, when the manes and the infernal gods were the objects of worship.

Pelopīdas, a celebrated general of Thebes, son of Hippoclus. He was descended of an illustrious family, and was remarkable for his immense possessions, which he bestowed with great liberality to the poor and necessitous. Many were the objects of his generosity; but when Epaminondas had refused to accept his presents, Pelopidas disregarded all his wealth and preferred before it the enjoyment of his friend's conversation and of his poverty. From their friendship and intercourse the Thebans derived the most considerable advantages. No sooner had the interest of Sparta prevailed at Thebes, and the friends of liberty and national independence been banished from the city, than Pelopidas, who was in the number of the exiles, resolved to free his country from foreign slavery. His plan was bold and animated, and his deliberations were slow. Meanwhile Epaminondas, who had been left by the tyrants at Thebes, as being in appearance a worthless and insignificant philosopher, animated the youths of the city, and at last Pelopidas, with eleven of his associates, entered Thebes, and easily massacred the friends of the tyranny, and freed the country from foreign masters. After this successful enterprise, Pelopidas was unanimously placed at the head of the government; and so confident were the Thebans of his abilities as a general and a magistrate, that they successively re-elected him 13 times to fill the honourable office of governor of Bœotia. Epaminondas shared with him the sovereign power, and it was to their valour and prudence that the Thebans were indebted for a celebrated victory at the battle of Leuctra. In a war which Thebes carried on against Alexander, tyrant of Pheræ, Pelopidas was appointed commander; but his imprudence in trusting himself unarmed into the enemy's camp nearly proved fatal to him. He was taken prisoner, but Epaminondas restored him to liberty. The perfidy of Alexander irritated him, and he was killed, bravely fighting in a celebrated battle in which his troops obtained the victory, B. C. 364 years. Pelopidas is admired for his valour, as he never engaged an enemy without obtaining the advantage. It has been justly observed, that with Pelopidas and Epaminondas the glory and the independence of the Thebans rose and set. Plut. & C. Nep. in vitâ.—Xenoph. Hist. G.—Diod. 15.—Polyb.

Peloponnesiacum Bellum, a celebrated war, which continued for 27 years between the Athenians and the inhabitants of Peloponnesus with their respective allies. The circumstances which gave birth to this memorable war are these: the power of Athens, under the prudent and vigorous administration of Pericles, was already extended over Greece, and it had procured itself many admirers and more enemies, when the Corcyreans, who had been planted by a Corinthian colony, refused to pay to their founders those marks of respect and reverence which, among the Greeks, every colony was obliged to pay to its mother-country. The Corinthians wished to punish that infidelity; and when the people of Epidamus, a considerable town on the Adriatic, had been invaded by some of the barbarians of Illyricum, the people of Corinth gladly granted to the Epidamnians that assistance which had in vain been solicited from the Corcyreans, their founders and their patrons. The Corcyreans were offended at the interference of Corinth in the affairs of their colony; they manned a fleet, and obtained a victory over the Corinthian vessels which had assisted the Epidamnians. The subsequent conduct of the Corcyreans, and their insolence to some of the Elians who had furnished a few ships to the Corinthians, provoked the Peloponnesians, and the discontent became general. The Lacedæmonians, who had long beheld with concern and with jealousy the ambitious power of the Athenians, determined to support the cause of the Corinthians. However, before they proceeded to hostilities, an embassy was sent to Athens to represent the danger of entering into a war with the most powerful and flourishing of all the Grecian states, and the answer which was returned to the Spartans, was taken as a declaration of war. The Spartans were supported by all the republics of the Peloponnesus, except Argos and part of Achaia, besides the people of Megara, Bœotia, Phocis, Locris, Leucas, Ambracia, and Anactorium. The Platæans, the Lesbians, Carians, Chians, Messenians, Acarnanians, Zacynthians, Corcyreans, Dorians, and Thracians, were the friends of the Athenians, with all the Cyclades, except Eubœa, Samos, Melos, and Thera. The first blow had already been struck, May 7, B. C. 431, by an attempt of the Bœotians to surprise Platæa; and therefore Archidamus king of Sparta, who had in vain recommended moderation to the allies, entered Attica, at the head of an army of 60,000 men, and laid waste the country by fire and sword. Pericles, who was at the head of the government, did not attempt to oppose them in the field; but a fleet of one hundred and fifty ships set sail without delay, to ravage the coast of the Peloponnesus. Megara was also depopulated by an army of 20,000 men; and the campaign of the first year of the war was concluded in celebrating, with the most solemn pomp, the funerals of such as had nobly fallen in battle. The following year was remarkable for a pestilence which raged in Athens, and which destroyed the greatest part of the inhabitants. The public calamity was still heightened by the approach of the Peloponnesian army on the borders of Attica, and by the unsuccessful expedition of the Athenians against Epidaurus and in Thrace. The pestilence which had carried away so many of the Athenians proved also fatal to Pericles, and he died about two years and six months after the commencement of the Peloponnesian war. The following years did not give rise to decisive events; but, some time after, Demosthenes, the Athenian general, invaded Ætolia, where his arms were attended with the greatest success. He also fortified Pylos in the Peloponnesus, and gained so many advantages over the confederates, that they sued for peace, which the insolence of Athens refused. The fortune of war soon after changed, and the Lacedæmonians, under the prudent conduct of Brasidas, made themselves masters of many valuable places in Thrace. But this victorious progress was soon stopped by the death of their general, and that of Cleon, the Athenian commander; and the pacific disposition of Nicias, who was now at the head of Athens, made overtures of peace and universal tranquillity. Pistoanax, the king of the Spartans, wished them to be accepted; but the intrigues of the Corinthians prevented the discontinuation of the war, and therefore hostilities began anew. But while war was carried on with various success in different parts of Greece, the Athenians engaged in a new expedition; they yielded to the persuasive eloquence of Gorgias of Leontium, and the ambitious views of Alcibiades, and sent a fleet of 20 ships to assist the Sicilian states against the tyrannical power of Syracuse, B. C. 416. Syracuse implored the assistance of Corinth, and Gylippus was sent to direct her operations, and to defend her against the power of her enemies. After a campaign of two years of bloodshed, the fleets of Athens were totally ruined, and the few soldiers that survived the destructive siege made prisoners of war. Alcibiades, who had been treated with cruelty by his countrymen, and who had for some time resided in Sparta, and directed her military operations, now exerted himself to defeat the designs of the confederates, by inducing the Persians to espouse the cause of his country. The Athenians soon after obtained a naval victory, and the Peloponnesian fleet was defeated by Alcibiades. The Athenians beheld with rapture the success of their arms: but when their fleet, in the absence of Alcibiades, had been defeated and destroyed, near Andros, by Lysander, the Lacedæmonian admiral, they showed their discontent and mortification by eagerly listening to the accusations which were brought against their naval leader, to whom they gratefully had acknowledged themselves indebted for their former victories. Alcibiades was disgraced in the public assembly, and ten commanders were appointed to succeed him in the management of the republic. This change of admirals, and the appointment of Callicratidas to succeed Lysander, whose office had expired with the year, produced new operations. The Athenians fitted out a fleet, and the two nations decided their superiority near Arginusæ, in a naval battle. Callicratidas was killed, and the Lacedæmonians conquered; but the rejoicings which the intelligence of this victory occasioned were soon stopped, when it was known that the wrecks of some of the disabled ships of the Athenians, and the bodies of the slain had not been saved from the sea. The admirals were accused in the tumultuous assembly, and immediately condemned. Lysander was again placed at the head of the Peloponnesian forces, instead of Eteonicus, who had succeeded to the command at the death of Callicratidas. The superiority of the Athenians over that of the Peloponnesians, rendered the former insolent, proud, and negligent; and when they had imprudently forsaken their ships to indulge their indolence, or pursue their amusements on the seashore at Ægospotamos, Lysander attacked their fleet, and his victory was complete. Of one hundred and eighty sail, only nine escaped; eight of which fled, under the command of Conon, to the island of Cyprus, and the other carried to Athens the melancholy news of the defeat. The Athenian prisoners were all massacred; and when the Peloponnesian conquerors had extended their dominion over the states and communities of Europe and Asia, which formerly acknowledged the power of Athens, they returned home to finish the war by the reduction of the capital of Attica. The siege was carried on with vigour, and supported with firmness; and the first Athenian who mentioned capitulation to his countrymen, was instantly sacrificed to the fury and the indignation of the populace, and all the citizens unanimously declared, that the same moment would terminate their independence and their lives. This animated language, however, was not long continued. During four months, negociations were carried on with the Spartans by the aristocratical part of the Athenians, and at last it was agreed that, to establish the peace, the fortifications of the Athenian harbours must be demolished, together with the long walls which joined them to the city; all their ships, except 12, were to be surrendered to the enemy; they were to resign every pretension to their ancient dominions abroad; to recall from banishment all the members of the late aristocracy; to follow the Spartans in war; and, in time of peace, to frame the constitution according to the will and the prescriptions of their Peloponnesian conquerors. The terms were accepted, and the enemy entered the harbour, and took possession of the city that very day on which the Athenians had been accustomed to celebrate the anniversary of the immortal victory which their ancestors had obtained over the Persians, about 76 years before, near the island of Salamis. The walls and fortifications were instantly levelled with the ground; and the conquerors observed, that, in the demolition of Athens, succeeding ages would fix the era of Grecian freedom. The day was concluded with a festival, and the recitation of one of the tragedies of Euripides, in which the misfortunes of the daughter of Agamemnon, who was reduced to misery, and banished from her father's kingdom, excited a kindred sympathy in the bosom of the audience, who melted into tears at the recollection that one moment had likewise reduced to misery and servitude the capital of Attica, which was once called the common patroness of Greece and the scourge of Persia. This memorable event happened about 404 years before the Christian era, and 30 tyrants were appointed by Lysander over the government of the city. *Xen. Græc. Hist. —Plut. in. Lys. Per. Alcib. PĔNĔLŎPE, a celebrated princess of Greece, daughter of Icarius, and wife of Ulysses, king of Ithaca. Her marriage with Ulysses was celebrated about the same time that Menelaus married Helen, and she retired with her husband to Ithaca, against the inclination of her father, who wished to detain her at Sparta, her native country. She soon after became mother of Telemachus, and was obliged to part with great reluctance from her husband, whom the Greeks obliged to go to the Trojan war. Vid. Palamedes. She was soon beset by a number of importuning suiters, who wished her to believe that her husband was shipwrecked, and that therefore she ought not longer to expect his return, but forget his loss, and fix her choice and affections on one of her numerous admirers. She received their addresses with coldness and disdain; but as she was destitute of power, and a prisoner, as it were, in their hands, she yet flattered them with hopes and promises, and declared that she would make choice of one of them as soon as she had finished a piece of tapestry on which she was employed. The work was done in a dilatory manner, and she baffled their eager expectations, by undoing in the night what she had done in the daytime. This artifice of Penelope has given rise to the proverb of Penelope's web, which is applied to whatever labour can never be ended. The return of Ulysses, after an absence of twenty years, however, delivered her from fears and from her dangerous suiters. Penelope is described by Homer as a model of female virtue and chastity; but some more modern writers dispute her claims to modesty and continence, and they represent her as the most voluptuous of her sex. After the return of Ulysses, Penelope had a daughter, who was called Ptoliporthe; but if we believe the traditions that were long preserved at Mantinea, Ulysses repudiated his wife for her incontinence during his absence, and Penelope fled to Sparta, and afterwards to Mantinea, where she died and was buried. After the death of Ulysses, according to Hyginus, she married Telegonus, her husband's son by Circe, by order of the goddess Minerva. Some say that her original name was Arnea, or Amirace, and that she was called Penelope, when some river birds, called penelopes, had saved her from the waves of the sea when her father had exposed her. Icarius had attempted to destroy her, because the oracles had told him that his daughter by Peribœa would be the most dissolute of her sex and a disgrace to her family. Apollod. 3, c. 10.—Paus. 3, c. 12.—*Homer. Pentheus, a son of Orestes by Erigone, the daughter of Ægysthus, who reigned conjointly with his brother Tisamenus at Argos. He was driven some time after from his throne by the Heraclidæ, and he retired to Achaia, and thence to Lesbos, where he planted a colony. Paus. 5. c. 4.—Strab. 13.—Paterc. 1, c. 1.

Pentylus, a prince of Paphos, who assisted Xerxes with 12 ships. He was seized by the Greeks, to whom he communicated many important things concerning the situation of the Persians, &c. Herodot. 7, c. 195.

Perdiccas, I. the fourth king of Macedonia, B. C. 729, was descended from Temenus. He increased his dominions by conquest, and in the latter part of his life he showed his son Argeus where he wished to be buried, and told him that as long as the bones of his descendants and successors to the throne of Macedonia were laid in the same grave, so long would the crown remain in the family. These injunctions were observed till the time of Alexander, who was buried out of Macedonia. Herodot. 7 and 8.—Justin. 7, c. 2. ——II. Another king of Macedonia, son of Alexander. He reigned during the Peloponnesian war, and assisted the Lacedæmonians against Athens. He behaved with great courage on the throne, and died B. C. 413, after a long reign of glory and independence, during which he had subdued some of his barbarian neighbours.—— III. Another king of Macedonia, who was supported on his throne by Iphicrates the Athenian, against the intrusions of Pausanias. He was killed in a war against the Illyrians, B. C. 360. Justin. 7, &c.——IV. One of the friends and favourites of Alexander the Great. At the king's death he wished to make himself absolute; and the ring which he had received from the hand of the dying Alexander, seemed in some measure to favour his pretensions. The better to support his claims to the throne, he married Cleopatra, the sister of Alexander, and strengthened himself by making a league with Eumenes. His ambitious views were easily discovered by Antigonus and the rest of the generals of Alexander, who all wished, like Perdiccas, to succeed to the kingdom and honours of the deceased monarch. Antipater, Craterus, and Ptolemy, leagued with Antigonus against him, and after much bloodshed on both sides, Perdiccas was totally ruined, and at last assassinated in his tent in Egypt, by his own officers, about 321 years before the Christian era. Plut. in Alex. —Diod. 17 and 18.—Curt. 10.—*C. Perennis, a favourite of the emperor Commodus. He is described by some as a virtuous and impartial magistrate, while others paint him as a cruel, violent, and oppressive tyrant, who committed the greatest barbarities to enrich himself. He was put to death for aspiring to the empire. Herodian.

Periander, I a tyrant of Corinth, son of Cypselus. The first years of his government were mild and popular, but he soon learnt to become oppressive, when he had consulted the tyrant of Sicily about the surest way of reigning. He was not only cruel to his subjects, but his family also were objects of his vengeance. He committed incest with his mother, and put to death his wife Melissa, upon false accusation. He also banished his son Lycophron to the island of Corcyra, because the youth pitied and wept at the miserable end of his mother, and detested the barbarities of his father. Periander died about 585 years before the Christian era, in his 80th year; and by the meanness of his flatterers he was reckoned one of the seven wise men of Greece. Though he was tyrannical, yet he patronised the fine arts; he was fond of peace, and he showed himself the friend and protector of genius and of learning. He used to say, that a man ought solemnly to keep his word, but not to hesitate to break it if ever it clashed with his interest. He said, also, that not only crimes ought to be punished, but also every wicked and corrupt thought. Diog. in vitâ.—Arist. 5, Polit.—Paus. 2.——II. A tyrant of Ambracia, whom some rank with the seven wise men of Greece, and not the tyrant of Corinth.

Pericles, an Athenian of a noble family, son of Xanthippus and Agariste. He was naturally endowed with great powers, which he improved by attending the lectures of Damon, of Zeno, and of Anaxagoras. When he took a share in the administration of public affairs, he rendered himself popular by opposing Cimon, who was the favourite of the nobility; and, to remove every obstacle which stood in the way of his ambition, he lessened the dignity and the power of the court of the Areopagus, which the people had been taught for ages to respect and to venerate. He also attacked Cimon, and caused him to be banished by the ostracism. Thucydides also, who had succeeded Cimon on his banishment, shared the same fate, and Pericles remained for 15 years the sole minister, and, as it may be said, the absolute sovereign of a republic which always showed itself so jealous of its liberties, and which distrusted so much the honesty of her magistrates. In his ministerial capacity, Pericles did not enrich himself, but the prosperity of Athens was the object of his administration. He made war against the Lacedæmonians, and restored the temple of Delphi to the care of the Phocians, who had been illegally deprived of that honourable trust. He obtained a victory over the Sicyonians near Nemæa, and waged a successful war against the inhabitants of Samos at the request of his favourite mistress, Aspasia. The Peloponnesian war was fomented by his ambitious views. Vid. Peloponnesiacum Bellum. But an unfortunate expedition raised clamours against Pericles, and the enraged populace attributed all their losses to him, and condemned him to pay 50 talents. This loss of popular favour, by republican caprice, did not so much affect Pericles as the recent death of all his children; and when the tide of unpopularity was passed by, he was again restored to all his honours, and, if possible, invested with more power and more authority than before; but the dreadful pestilence which had diminished the number of his family, proved fatal to him, and about 429 years before Christ, in his 70th year, he fell a sacrifice to that terrible malady which robbed Athens of so many of her citizens. Pericles was for 40 years at the head of the administration, 25 years with others and 15 alone; and the flourishing state of the empire, during his government, gave occasion to the Athenians publicly to lament his loss, and to venerate his memory. As he was expiring, and seemingly senseless, his friends that stood around his bed expatiated with warmth on the most glorious actions of his life, and the victories which he had won, when he suddenly interrupted their tears and conversation, by saying, that in mentioning the exploits that he had achieved, and which were common to him with all generals, they had forgot to mention a circumstance which reflected far greater glory upon him as a minister, a general, and above all, as a man. It is, says he, that not a citizen in Athens has been obliged to put on mourning on my account. The Athenians were so pleased with his eloquence that they compared it to thunder and lightning, and, as to another father of the gods, they gave him the surname of Olympian. Yet great and venerable as this character may appear, we must not forget the follies of Pericles. Pericles lost all his legitimate children by the pestilence, and to call a natural son by his own name he was obliged to repeal a law which he had made against spurious children, and which he had enforced with great severity. This son, called Pericles, became one of the ten generals who succeeded Alcibiades in the administration of affairs, and, like his colleagues, he was condemned to death by the Athenians, after the unfortunate battle of Arginusæ. Paus. 1, c. 25.—Plut. in vitâ.—Quintil. 12, c. 9.—Cic. de Orat. 3.—Ælian. V. H. 4, c. 10.—Xenoph. Hist. G.—Thucyd.

Periegētes Dionysius, a poet. Vid. Dionysius.

Perilla, a daughter of Ovid the poet. She was extremely fond of poetry and literature. Ovid. Fast. 3, el. 7, v. 1.

Perillus, an ingenious artist at Athens, who made a brazen bull for Phalaris, tyrant of Agrigentum. This machine was fabricated to put criminals to death by burning them alive, and it was such that their cries were like the roaring of a bull. When Perillus gave it to Phalaris, the tyrant made the first experiment upon the donor, and cruelly put him to death by lighting a slow fire under the belly of the bull. Plin. 34, c. 8.—Ovid. in art. Am. 1, v. 653, in ib. 439.

Peripatetici, a sect of philosophers at Athens, disciples to Aristotle. They received this name from the place where they were taught, called Peripatos, in the Lyceum, or because they received the philosopher's lectures as they walked, (περιπατουντες). The peripatetics acknowledged the dignity of human nature, and placed their summum bonum not in the pleasure of passive sensation, but in the due exercise of the moral and intellectual faculties. Cic. Acad. 2, &c.

Periphēmus, an ancient hero of Greece, to whom Solon sacrificed at Salamis, by order of the oracle.

Pero, or Perone, a daughter of Cimon, remarkable for her filial affection. When her father had been sent to prison, where his judges had condemned him to starve, she supported his life by giving him the milk of her breasts as to her own child. Val. Max. 5, c. 4.

Perola, a Roman, who meditated the death of Hannibal in Italy. His father, Pacuvius, dissuaded him from assassinating the Carthaginian general.

Perpenna, (M.) I. a Roman, who conquered Aristonicus in Asia, and took him prisoner. He died B. C. 130.——II. Another, who joined the rebellion of Sertorius, and opposed Pompey. He was defeated by Metellus, and some time after he had the meanness to assassinate Sertorius, whom he had invited to his house. He fell into the hands of Pompey, who ordered him to be put to death. Plut. in Sert.—Paterc. 2, c. 30.——III. A Greek who obtained the consulship at Rome. Val. Mal. 3, c. 4.

Perseus, or Perses, a son of Philip, king of Macedonia. He distinguished himself like his father, by his enmity to the Romans, and when he had made sufficient preparations, he declared war against them. When Paulus was appointed to the command of the Roman armies in Macedonia, Perseus showed his inferiority by his imprudent encampments, and when he had at last yielded to the advice of his officers, who recommended a general engagement, and drawn up his forces near the walls of Pydna, B. C. 168, he was the first who ruined his own cause, and by flying as soon as the battle was begun, he left the enemy masters of the field. From Pydna, Perseus flew to Samothrace, but he was soon discovered in his obscure retreat, and brought into the presence of the Roman conqueror, where the meanness of his behaviour exposed him to ridicule, and not to mercy. He was carried to Rome, and dragged along the streets of the city to adorn the triumph of the conqueror. His family were also exposed to the sight of the Roman populace, who shed tears on viewing in their streets, dragged like a slave, a monarch who had once defeated their armies, and spread alarm all over Italy by the greatness of his military preparations and by his bold undertakings. Perseus died in prison, or, according to some, he was put to a shameful death the first year of his captivity. He had two sons, Philip and Alexander, and one daughter, whose name is not known. Alexander, the younger of these, was hired to a Roman carpenter, and led the greatest part of his life in obscurity, till his ingenuity raised him to notice. He was afterwards made secretary to the senate. Liv. 40, &c.—Justin. 33, c. 1, &c.—Plut. in Paulo.—Flor. 2, c. 12.—Propert. 4, el. 12, v. 39.

Persius Flaccus, Aulus, a Latin poet of Volaterræ. He was of an equestrian family, and he made himself known by his intimacy with the most illustrious Romans of the age. The early part of his life was spent in his native town, and at the age of sixteen he was removed to Rome, where he studied philosophy under Cornutus the celebrated stoic. He also received the instructions of Palemon, the grammarian, and Virginius, the rhetorician. Naturally of a mild disposition, his character was unimpeached, his modesty remarkable, and his benevolence universally admired. He distinguished himself by his satirical humour, and made the faults of the orators and poets of his age the subject of his poems. He did not even spare Nero, and the more effectually to expose the emperor to ridicule, he introduced into his satires some of his verses. The torva mimalloneis implerunt cornua bombis, with the three following verses, are Nero's according to some. But though he was so severe upon the vicious and ignorant, he did not forget his friendship for Cornutus, and he showed his regard for his character and abilities by making mention of his name with great propriety in his satires. It was by the advice of his learned preceptor that he corrected one of his poems in which he had compared Nero to Midas, and at his representation he altered the words Auriculas asini Mida rex habet, into Auriculas asini quis non habet? Persius died in the 30th year of his age, A. D. 62, and left all his books, which consisted of seven hundred volumes, and a large sum of money, to his preceptor; but Cornutus only accepted the books, and returned the money to the sisters and friends of the deceased. The satires of Persius are six in number, blamed by some for the obscurity of style and of language. But though they may appear almost unintelligible to some, it ought to be remembered that they were read with pleasure and with avidity by his contemporaries; and that the only difficulties which now appear to the moderns, arise from their not knowing the various characters which they described, the vices which they lashed, and the errors which they censured. The satires of Persius are generally printed with those of Juvenal, the best editions of which will be found to be Hennin. 4to. L. B. 1695, and Hawkey, 12mo. Dublin 1746. The best edition of Persius, separate, is that of Meric Casaubon, 12mo. Lond. 1647, Martial.—Quintil. 10, c. 1.—August. de Magist. 9.—Lactant.

Pertĭnax, Publius Helvius, a Roman emperor after the death of Commodus. He was descended from an obscure family, and, like his father, who was either a slave or the son of a manumitted slave, he for some time followed the mean employment of drying wood and making charcoal. His indigence, however, did not prevent him from receiving a liberal education, and indeed he was for some time employed in teaching a number of pupils the Greek and Roman languages in Etruria. He left his laborious profession for a military life, and by his valour and intrepidity he gradually rose to offices of the highest trust in the army, and was made consul by M. Aurelius for his eminent services. He was afterwards intrusted with the government of Mœsia, and at last he presided over the city of Rome as governor. When Commodus was murdered, Pertinax was universally selected to succeed to the imperial throne, and his refusal, and the plea of old age and increased infirmities, did not prevent his being saluted emperor and Augustus. He melted all the silver statues which had been raised to his vicious predecessor, and he exposed to public sale all his concubines, his horses, his arms, and all the instruments of his pleasure and extravagance. With the money raised from these he enriched the empire, and was enabled to abolish all the taxes which Commodus had laid on the rivers, ports, and highways through the empire. This patriotic administration gained him the affection of the worthiest and most discerning of his subjects; but the extravagant and luxurious raised their clamours against him, and when Pertinax attempted to introduce among the pretorian guards that discipline which was so necessary to preserve the peace and tranquillity of Rome, the flames of rebellion were kindled, and the minds of the soldiers totally alienated. Pertinax was apprized of this mutiny, but he refused to fly at the hour of danger. He scorned the advice of his friends, who wished him to withdraw from the impending storm, and he unexpectedly appeared before the seditious pretorians, and, without fear or concern, boldly asked them whether they, who were bound to defend the person of their prince and emperor, were come to betray him and to shed his blood. His undaunted assurance and his intrepidity would have had the desired effect, and the soldiers had already begun to retire, when one of the most seditious advanced and darted his javelin at the emperor's breast, exclaiming, The soldiers send you this! The rest immediately followed the example, and Pertinax, muffling up his head, and calling upon Jupiter to avenge his death, remained unmoved, and was instantly despatched. His head was cut off, and carried upon the point of a spear, as in triumph, to the camp. This happened on the 28th of March, A. D. 193. Pertinax reigned only 87 days, and his death was the more universally lamented as it proceeded from a seditious tumult, and robbed the Roman empire of a wise, virtuous, and benevolent emperor. Dio.—Herodian.—Capitol.

Petĕus, a son of Orneus and grandson of Erechtheus. He reigned in Attica, and became father of Menestheus, who went with the Greeks to the Trojan war. He is represented by some of the ancients as a monster, half a man and half a beast. Apollod. 3, c. 10.—Paus. 10, c. 35.

Petilii, two tribunes, who accused Scipio Africanus of extortion.

Petĭlius, I. a prætor, who persuaded the people of Rome to burn the books which had been found in Numa's tomb, about 400 years after his death. His advice was followed. Plut. in Num.——II. A plebeian decemvir, &c.——III. A governor of the capitol, who stole away the treasures intrusted to his care. He was accused, but, though guilty, he was acquitted as being the friend of Augustus. Horat. 1, Sat. 4, v. 94.

Petreius, I. a Roman soldier, who killed his tribune during the Cimbrian wars, because he hesitated to attack the enemy. He was rewarded for his valour with a crown of grass. Plin. 22, c. 6.——II. A lieutenant of C. Antonius, who defeated the troops of Catiline. He took the part of Pompey against Julius Cæsar. When Cæsar had been victorious in every part of the world, Petreius, who had retired into Africa, attempted to destroy himself by fighting with his friend, king Juba, in single combat. Juba was killed first, and Petreius obliged one of his slaves to run him through. Sallust. Catil.—Appian.—Cæs. 1, Civ.

Petrōnius, I. a governor of Egypt, appointed to succeed Gallus. He behaved with great humanity to the Jews, and made war against Candace, queen of Ethiopia. Strab. 17.——II. Maximus, a Roman emperor. Vid. Maximus.——III. Arbiter, a favourite of the emperor Nero, and one of the ministers and associates of all his pleasures and debaucheries. Whatever he did, seemed to be performed with an air of unconcern and negligence; he was affable in his behaviour, and his witticisms and satirical remarks appeared artless and natural. He was appointed proconsul of Bithynia, and afterwards he was rewarded with the consulship, in both of which honourable employments he behaved with all the dignity which became one of the successors of a Brutus or a Scipio. Tigellinus, one of Nero's favourites, jealous of his fame, accused him of conspiring against the emperor's life. The accusation was credited, and Petronius immediately resolved to withdraw himself from Nero's punishment, by a voluntary death. This was performed in a manner altogether unprecedented, A. D. 66. Petronius ordered his veins to be opened, but without the eagerness of terminating his agonies he had them closed at intervals. Some time after they were opened, and, as if he wished to die in the same careless and unconcerned manner as he had lived, he passed his time in discoursing with his friends upon trifles, and listened with the greatest avidity to love verses, amusing stories, or laughable epigrams. Sometimes he manumitted his slaves or punished them with stripes. In this ludicrous manner he spent his last moments, till nature was exhausted; and before he expired, he wrote an epistle to the emperor, in which he has described, with a masterly hand, his nocturnal extravagances and the daily impurities of his actions. This letter was carefully sealed, and after he had conveyed it privately to the emperor, Petronius broke his signet, that it might not, after his death, become a snare to the innocent. He is the author of many elegant but obscene compositions, still extant, among which is a poem on the civil wars of Pompey and Cæsar, superior, in some respects, to the Pharsalia of Lucan. There is also the feast of Trimalcion, in which he paints with too much licentiousness the pleasures and the debaucheries of a corrupted court of an extravagant monarch—reflections on the instability of human life—a poem on the vanity of dreams—another on the education of the Roman youth—two treatises, &c. The best editions of Petronius are those of Burman, 4to. Utr. 1709, and Reinesius, 8vo. 1731.

Peucestes, a Macedonian, set over Egypt by Alexander. He received Persia, at the general division of the Macedonian empire at the king's death. He behaved with great cowardice after he had joined himself to Eumenes. C. Nep. in Eum.—Plut.—Curt. 4, c. 8.

Phædon, I. an Athenian, put to death by the 30 tyrants. His daughters, to escape the oppressors and preserve their chastity, threw themselves together into a well.——II. A disciple of Socrates. He had been seized by pirates in his younger days, and the philosopher, who seemed to discover something uncommon and promising in his countenance, bought his liberty for a sum of money, and ever after esteemed him. Phædon, after the death of Socrates, returned to Elis, his native country, where he founded a sect of philosophers, called Elean. The name of Phædon is affixed to one of the dialogues of Plato. Macrob. Sat. 1, c. 11.—Diog.

Phædrus, a Thracian, who became one of the freedmen of the emperor Augustus. He translated into Iambic verses the fables of Æsop, in the reign of the emperor Tiberius. They are divided into five books, valuable for their precision, purity, elegance, and simplicity. They were discovered in the library of St. Remi at Rheims, and published by Peter Pithou, a Frenchman, at the end of the 16th century. Phædrus was for some time persecuted by Sejanus, because this corrupt minister believed that he was satirised and abused in the encomiums which the poet every where pays to virtue. The best editions of Phædrus are those of Burman 4to. Leyd. 1727; Hoogstraten, 4to. Amst. 1701, and Barbou, 12mo. Paris, 1754.

Phædȳma, a daughter of Otanes, who first discovered that Smerdis, who had ascended the throne of Persia at the death of Cambyses, was an imposter. Herodot. 3, c. 69.

Phænarēte, the mother of the philosopher Socrates. She was a midwife by profession.

Phagesia, a festival among the Greeks, observed during the celebration of the Dionysia. It received its name from the good eating and living that then universally prevailed, φαγειν.

Phalæcus, a general of Phocis against the Bœotians, killed at the battle of Cheronæa. Diod. 16.

Phalanthus, a Lacedæmonian, who founded Tarentum in Italy, at the head of the Parthenіæ. His fathers name was Aracas. As he went to Italy he was shipwrecked on the coast, and carried to shore by a dolphin, and from that reason there was a dolphin placed near his statue in the temple of Apollo at Delphi. Vid. Partheniæ. He received divine honours after death. Justin. 3, c. 4.—Paus. 10, c. 10.—Horat. 2, od. 6, v. 11.—Sil. Ital. 11, v. 16.

Phălăris, a tyrant of Agrigentum, who made use of the most excruciating torments to punish his subjects on the smallest suspicion. The people of Agrigentum revolted in the tenth year of his reign, and put him to death in the same manner as he had tortured Perillus and many of his subjects after him, B. C. 552. The brazen bull of Phalaris was carried by Amilcar to Carthage: when that city was taken by Scipio, it was delivered again to the inhabitants of Agrigentum by the Romans. There are now some letters extant, written by a certain Abaris to Phalaris, with their respective answers; but they are supposed by some to be spurious. The best edition is that of the learned Boyle, Oxon. 1718. Cic. in Verr. 4, ad Attic. 7, ep. 12, de offic. 2.—Ovid. de Art. Am. 1, v. 663.—Juv. 8, v. 81.—Plin. 34, c. 8. —Diod.

Phalērеus Demetrius. Vid. Demetrius.

Phallĭca, festivals observed by the Egyptians, in honour of Osiris. They receive their name from φαλλος simulachrum ligneum membri virilis. The festivals of the phallus were imitated by the Greeks, and introduced into Europe by the Athenians, who made the procession of the phallus part of the celebration of the Dionysia of the god of wine. Those that carried the phallus, at the end of a long pole, were called phallophori. They generally appeared, among the Greeks, besmeared with the dregs of wine, covered with skins of lambs, and wearing on their heads a crown of ivy. Lucian. de Deâ Syr.—Plut. de Isid. & Osir.—Paus. 1, c. 2.

PHANES, a man of Halicarnassus, who fled from Amasis, king of Egypt, to the court of Cambyses, king of Persia, whom he advised, when he invaded Egypt, to pass through Arabia. Herodot. 3, c. 4.

PHANOCLES, an elegiac poet of Greece, who wrote a poem on that unnatural sin of which Socrates is accused by some. He supported that Orpheus had been the first who disgraced himself by that indulgence. Some of his fragments are remaining. Clem. Alex. Str. 6.

PHANTASIA, a daughter of Nicarchas of Memphis, in Egypt. Some have supposed that she wrote a poem on the Trojan war, and another on the return of Ulysses to Ithaca, from which compositions Homer copied the greatest part of his Iliad and Odyssey, when he visited Memphis, where they were deposited.

PHAON. Vid. Part III.

PHARACIDES, a general of the Lacedæmonian fleet, who assisted Dionysius, the tyrant of Sicily, against the Carthaginians. Polyæn. 2.

PHARNABAZUS, a satrap of Persia, son of a person of the same name, B. C. 409. He assisted the Lacedæmonians against the Athenians, and gained their esteem by his friendly behaviour and support. His conduct, however, towards Alcibiades, was of the most perfidious nature, and he did not scruple to betray to his mortal enemies the man he had long honoured with his friendship. C. Nep. in Alc.—Plut.

PHARNACES, a son of Mithridates, king of Pontus, who favoured the Romans against his father. He revolted against Mithridates, and even caused him to be put to death, according to some accounts. In the civil wars of Julius Cæsar and Pompey, he interested himself for neither of the contending parties; upon which Cæsar turned his army against him, and conquered him. It was to express the celerity of his operations in conquering Pharnaces, that the victorious Roman made use of these words: Veni, vidi, vici. Flor. 3.—Suet. in Cæs. 37.—Paterc. 2, c. 55.

PHAVORINUS, a writer, the best edition of whose Greek Lexicon is that in fol. Venet. 1712.

PHEMIUS, I. a man introduced by Homer as a musician among Penelope's suiters. Some say that he taught Homer, for which the grateful poet immortalized his name. Homer. Od.—— II. A man, who, according to some, wrote an account of the return of the Greeks from the Trojan war. The word is applied by Ovid, Am. 3, v. 7, indiscriminately to any person who excels in music.

PHERECRATES, a comic poet of Athens, in the age of Plato and Aristophanes. He is supposed to have written 21 comedies, of which only a few verses remain. He introduced living characters on the stage, but never abused the liberty which he had taken, either by satire or defamation. He invented a sort of verse, which from him has been called Pherecration. It consisted of the three last feet of an hexameter verse, of which the first was always a spondee, as, for instance, the third verse of Horace's 1, od. 5, Grato Pyrrha sub antro.

PHERECYDES, a philosopher of Scyros, disciple to Pittacus, one of the first who delivered his thoughts in prose. He was acquainted with the periods of the moon, and foretold eclipses with the greatest accuracy. The doctrine of the immortality of the soul was first supported by him, as also that of the metempsychosis. Pythagoras was one of his disciples, remarkable for his esteem and his attachment to his learned master. When Pherecydes lay dangerously ill in the island of Delos, Pythagoras hastened to give him every assistance in his power, and when all his efforts had proved ineffectual, he buried him, and after he had paid him the last offices, he retired to Italy. Some, however, suppose that Pherecydes threw himself down from a precipice as he was going to Delphi; or, according to others, he fell a sacrifice to the lousy disease, B. C. 515, in the 85th year of his age. Diog.—Lactant.

PHERETIMA, the wife of Battus, king of Cyrene and mother of Arcesilaus. After her son's death she recovered the kingdom by means of Amasis, king of Egypt, and to avenge the murder of Arcesilaus, she caused all his assassins to be crucified round the walls of Cyrene, and she cut off the breasts of their wives, and hung them up near the bodies of their husbands. It is said she was devoured alive by worms. Polyæn. 8.—Herodot. 4, c. 204, &c.

PHERON, a king of Egypt, who succeeded Sesostris. He was blind, and he recovered his sight by washing his eyes, according to the directions of the oracle, in the urine of a woman who had never had any unlawful connexions. He tried his wife first, but she appeared to have been faithless to his bed, and she was burnt, with all those whose urine could not restore sight to the king. He married the woman whose urine proved beneficial. Herodot. 2, c. 111.

PHIDIAS, a celebrated statuary of Athens, who died B. C. 432. He made a statue of Minerva, at the request of Pericles, which was placed in the Pantheon. It was made with ivory and gold, and measured 39 feet in height. He was accused of having carved his own image and that of Pericles on the shield of the statue of the goddess, for which he was banished from Athens by the clamorous populace. He retired to Elis, where he determined to revenge the ill treatment he had received from his countrymen, by making a statue which should eclipse the fame of that of Minerva. He was successful in the attempt; and the statue he made of Jupiter Olympius was always reckoned the best of all his pieces, and has passed for one of the wonders of the world. The people of Elis were so sensible of his merit, and of the honour he had done to their city, that they appointed his descendants to the honourable office of keeping clean that magnificent statue, and of preserving it from injury. Paus. 9, c. 4.—Cic. de Orat.—Strab. 8.—Quintil. 12, c. 10.—Plut. in Per.

PHILIPPIDES, a celebrated courier, who ran from Athens to Lacedæmon, about 152 English miles, in two days, to ask of the Lacedæmonians assistance against the Persians. The Athenians raised a temple to his memory. Herodot. 6, c. 105.—C. Nep. in Milt.

PHEIDITIA, a public entertainment at Sparta, where much frugality was observed, as the word (φειδιτια, from φειδομαι, parco) denotes. Cic. Tusc. 5, c. 34. Paus. 3, c. 10.

PHEIDON, I. a man who enjoyed the sovereign power of Argos, and is supposed to have invented scales and measures, and coined silver at Ægina. He died B. C. 854. Arist.—Herodot. 6, c. 127.——II. An ancient legislator at Corinth.

PHILA, the eldest daughter of Antipater, who married Craterus. She afterwards married Demetrius, and when her husband had lost the kingdom of Macedonia, she poisoned herself. Plut.

PHILADELPHUS. Vid. Ptolemæus 2d.

PHILÆNI, two brothers of Carthage. When a contest arose between the Cyreneans and Carthaginians, about the extent of their territories, it was mutually agreed, that, at a stated hour, two men should depart from each city, and that wherever they met there they should fix the boundaries of their country. The Philæni accordingly departed from Carthage, and met the Cyreneans when they had advanced far into their territories. This produced a quarrel, and the Cyreneans supported that the Philæni had left Carthage before the appointment, and that therefore they must retire or be buried in the sand. The Philæni refused, upon which they were overpowered by the Cyrenæans, and accordingly buried in the sand. Vid. Philænorum Aræ, Part I.

PHILEMON, I. a Greek comic poet, contemporary with Menander. He obtained some poetical prizes over Menander, not so much by the merit of his compositions as by the intrigues of his friends. Plautus imitated some of his comedies. He lived to his 97th year, and died, as it is reported, of laughing, on seeing an ass eat figs, B. C. 274.——II. His son, who bore the same name, wrote 54 comedies, of which some few fragments remain, which do not seem to entitle him to great rank among the Greek comic writers. Val. Max. 9, c. 12.—Quintil. 10.—Plut. de ira. coh.—Strab. 14. Vid. Baucis.

PHILETÆRUS, a eunuch, made governor of Pergamus by Lysimachus. He quarrelled with Lysimachus, and made himself master of Pergamus, where he laid the foundations of a kingdom called the kingdom of Pergamus, B. C. 283. He reigned there for 20 years, and at his death he appointed his nephew Eumenes as his successor. Strab. 13.—Paus. 1, c. 8.

PHILETAS, a grammarian and poet of Cos, in the reign of king Philip and of his son Alexander the Great. He was made preceptor to Ptolemy Philadelphus. The elegies and epigrams which he wrote have been greatly commended by the ancients, and some fragments of them are still preserved by Athenæus. He was so small and slender, according to the improbable accounts of Ælian, that he always carried pieces of lead in his pockets to prevent being blown away by the wind. Ælian. V. H. 9, c. 14.—Ovid. Fast. 1, el. 5.—Propert. 3, el. 1.

PHILIDAS, a friend of Pelopidas, who favoured the conspiracy formed to expel the Spartans from Thebes. He received the conspirators in his own house.

PHILINUS, a native of Agrigentum, who fought with Annibal against the Romans. He wrote a partial history of the Punic wars. C. Nep. in Annib.—Polyb.

PHILIPPIDES, the son of Philocles, an Athenian, is the earliest writer of the new comedy. He flourished B. C. 335. He was in great favour with Lysimachus, the general, and afterwards one of the successors of Alexander. This intimacy was the cause of many benefits to the Athenians, bestowed by Lysimachus at the intercession of the patriotic poet. In B. C. 301, we find the poet, in a fragment preserved by Plutarch, ridiculing the flatteries shown to Demetrius Poliorcetes at Athens, through the exertions of Stratocles the demagogue. Philippides died at an advanced age, from excess of joy on obtaining the comic prize contrary to his expectations. The number of his plays was forty-five; the titles of nine have been collected.

PHILIPPUS, I. son of Argeus, succeeded his father on the throne of Macedonia, and reigned 38 years, B. C. 40.——The second of that name was the fourth son of Amyntas, king of Macedonia. He was sent to Thebes as a hostage, by his father, where he learnt the art of war, under Epaminondas, and studied with the greatest care the manners and the pursuits of the Greeks. He was recalled to Macedonia, and at the death of his brother Perdiccas, he ascended the throne as guardian and protector of the youthful years of his nephew. His ambition, however, soon discovered itself, and he made himself independent. Philip meditated no less than the destruction of a republic which had rendered itself so formidable to the rest of Greece, and had even claimed submission from the princes of Macedonia. But before he could make Athens an object of conquest, the Thracians and the Illyrians demanded his attention. He made himself master of a Thracian colony, to which he gave the name of Philippi, and from which he received the greatest advantages, on account of the golden mines in the neighbourhood. In the midst of his political prosperity Philip did not neglect the honour of his family. He married Olympias, the daughter of Neoptolemus, king of the Molossi; and when, some time after, he became father of Alexander, every thing seemed to conspire to his aggrandizement; and historians have observed, that Philip received in one day the intelligence of three things which could gratify the most unbounded ambition, and flatter the hopes of the most aspiring monarch: the birth of a son, an honourable crown at the Olympic games, and a victory over the barbarians of Illyricum. But all these increased rather than satiated his ambition; he declared his inimical sentiments against the power of Athens and the independence of all Greece, by laying siege to Olynthus, a place which, on account of its situation and consequence, would prove most injurious to the interests of the Athenians, and most advantageous to the intrigues and military operations of every Macedonian prince. The Athenians, roused by the eloquence of Demosthenes, sent 17 vessels and 200 men to the assistance of Olynthus, but the money of Philip prevailed over all their efforts. The greatest part of the citizens suffered themselves to be bribed by the Macedonian gold, and Olynthus surrendered to the enemy, and was instantly reduced to ruins. His successes were as great in every part of Greece; he was declared head of the Amphictyonic council, and was intrusted with the care of the sacred temple of Apollo at Delphi. By assuming the mask of a moderator and peace-maker, he gained confidence; and in attempting to protect the Peloponnesians against the encroaching power of Sparta, he rendered his cause popular, and by ridiculing the insults that were offered to his person, as he passed through Corinth, he displayed to the world his moderation and philosophic virtues. In his attempts to make himself master of Eubœa, Philip was unsuccessful; and Phocion, who despised his gold, obliged him to evacuate an island whose inhabitants were as insensible to the charms of money as they were unmoved at the horrors of war and the bold efforts of a vigilant enemy. From Eubœa he turned his arms against the Scythians, but the advantages he obtained over this indigent nation were inconsiderable, and he again made Greece an object of plunder and rapine. He advanced far into Bœotia, and a general engagement was fought at Chæronea. The fight was long and bloody, but Philip obtained the victory. His behaviour after the battle reflects great disgrace upon him as a man and as a monarch. In the hour of festivity, and during the entertainment which he had given to celebrate the trophies he had won, Philip sallied from his camp, and with the inhumanity of a brute, he insulted the bodies of the slain, and exulted over the calamities of the prisoners of war. His insolence, however, was checked, when Demedes, one of the Athenian captives, reminded him of his meanness by exclaiming, Why do you, O king, act the part of a Thersites, when you can represent with so much dignity the elevated character of an Agamemnon. The reproof was felt, Demades received his liberty, and Philip learned how to gain popularity, even among his fallen enemies, by relieving their wants and easing their distresses. At the battle of Chæronea, the independence of Greece was extinguished; and Philip, unable to find new enemies in Europe formed new enterprises, and meditated new conquests. He was nominated general of the Greeks against the Persians, and was called upon, as well from inclination as duty, to revenge those injuries which Greece had suffered from the invasions of Darius and of Xerxes. But he was stopped in the midst of his warlike preparations; he was stabbed by Pausanias, as he entered the theatre, at the celebration of the nuptials of his daughter Cleopatra. The character of Philip is that of a sagacious, artful, prudent, and intriguing monarch; he was brave in the field of battle, eloquent and dissimulating at home; and he possessed the wonderful art of changing his conduct according to the disposition and caprice of mankind, without ever altering his purpose or losing sight of his ambitious aims. He possessed much perseverance; and in the execution of his plans he was always vigorous. The private character of Philip lies open to censure and raises indignation. The admirer of his virtues is disgusted to find him disgracing himself by the most unnatural crimes and lascivious indulgences, which can make even the most debauched and the most profligate to blush. He was murdered in the 47th year of his age, and the 24th of his reign, about 336 years before the Christian era. His reign is become uncommonly interesting, and his administration a matter of instruction. He is the first monarch whose life and actions are described with peculiar accuracy and historical faithfulness. Philip was the father of Alexander the Great and of Cleopatra, by Olympias; he had also by Audata, an Illyrian, Cyna, who married Amyntas, the son of Perdiccas, Philip's elder brother; by Nicasipolis, a Thessalian, Nicæa, who married Cassander; by Philinna, a Larissean dancer, Aridæus, who reigned some time after Alexander's death; by Cleopatra, the niece of Attalus, Caranus and Europa, who were both murdered by Olympias; and Ptolemy the first, king of Egypt, by Arsinoe, who in the first month of her pregnancy was married to Lagus. Demosth. in Phil. & Olynth.—Justin. 7, &c.—Dion. 16.—Plut. in Alex.—Dem. & Apoph.—Isocrat. ad Phil.—Curt. 1. &c.—Æschines.—Paus.—Bœotic, &c.

——The last king of Macedonia, of that name, was son of Demetrius. His infancy, at the death of his father, was protracted by Antigonus, one of his friends, who ascended the throne, and reigned for 12 years with the title of independent monarch. When Antigonus died, Philip recovered his father's throne, though only fifteen years of age, and he early distinguished himself by his boldness and his ambitious views. His cruelty, however, to Aratus soon displayed his character in its true light; and to the gratification of every vice, and every extravagant propensity, he had the meanness to sacrifice this faithful and virtuous Athenian. Not satisfied with the kingdom of Macedonia, Philip aspired to become the friend of Annibal, and wished to share with him the spoils which the distresses and continual loss of the Romans seemed soon to promise. The consul Lævinus entered without delay his territories of Macedonia, and after he had obtained a victory over him near Apollonia, and reduced his fleet to ashes, he compelled him to sue for peace. This peaceful disposition was not permanent, and when the Romans discovered that he had assisted their immortal enemy Annibal with men and money, they appointed T. Q. Flaminius to punish his perfidy and the violation of the treaty. The Roman consul, with his usual expedition, invaded Macedonia, and in a general engagement, which was fought near Cynoscephalæ, the hostile army was totally defeated, and the monarch saved his life with difficulty by flying from the field of battle. In the midst of these public calamities, the peace of his family was disturbed; and Perses, the eldest of his sons by a concubine, raised seditions against his brother Demetrius, whose condescension and humanity had gained popularity among the Macedonians, and who, from his residence at Rome, as a hostage, had gained the good graces of the senate, and by the modesty and innocence of his manners had obtained forgiveness from that venerable body for the hostilities of his father. Philip listened with too much avidity to the false accusations of Perses; and when he heard it asserted that Demetrius wished to rob him of his crown, he no longer hesitated to punish with death so unworthy and so ungrateful a son. He died in the 42d year of his reign, 179 years before the Christian era. Philip has been compared with his great ancestor of the same name; but though they possessed the same virtues, the same ambition, and were tainted with the same vices, yet the father of Alexander was more sagacious and more intriguing, and the son of Demetrius was more suspicious, more cruel, and more implacable; and, according to the pretended prophecy of one of the sibyls, Macedonia was indebted to one Philip for her rise and consequence among nations, and under another Philip she lamented the loss of her power, her empire, and her dignity. Polyb. 16, &c.—Justin. 29, &c.—Plut. in Flam.—Paus. 7, c. 8.—Liv. 31, &c.—Val. Max. 4, c. 8.—Orosius. 4, c. 20.——M. Julius, a Roman emperor, of an obscure family in Arabia, from whence he was surnamed Arabian. From the lowest rank in the army he gradually rose to the highest offices, and when he was made general of the pretorian guards, he assassinated Gordian to make himself emperor, and was universally approved by the senate and the Roman people. Philip rendered his cause popular by his liberality and profusion; and it added much to his splendour and dignity, that the Romans during his reign commemorated the foundation of their city, a solemnity which was observed but once every hundred years, and which was celebrated with more pomp and more magnificence than under the preceding reigns. The people were entertained with games and spectacles, the theatre of Pompey was successively crowded during three days and three nights, and 2000 gladiators bled in the circus at once, for the amusement and pleasure of a gazing populace. His usurpation, however, was short; Philip was defeated by Dacius, who had proclaimed himself emperor in Pannonia, and he was assassinated by his own soldiers, near Verona, in the 45th year of his age and the 5th of his reign, A. D. 249. His son, who bore the same name, and who had shared with him the imperial dignity, was also massacred in the arms of his mother. Young Philip was then in the 12th year of his age, and the Romans lamented in him the loss of rising talents, of natural humanity, and endearing virtues. Aurel. Victor.—Zozim.——A native of Acarnania, physician to Alexander the Great. When the monarch had been suddenly taken ill, after bathing in the Cydnus, Philip undertook to remove the complaint, when the rest of the physicians believed that all medical assistance would be ineffectual. But as he was preparing his medicine, Alexander received a letter from Parmenio, in which he was advised to beware of his physician Philip, as he had conspired against his life. The monarch was alarmed, and when Philip presented him the medicine, he gave him Parmenio's letter to peruse, and began to drink the potion. The serenity and composure of Philip's countenance, as he read the letter, removed every suspicion from Alexander's breast, and he pursued the directions of his physician, and in a few days recovered. Plut. in Alex.—Curt. 3.—Arrian. 2.——A freedman of Pompey the Great. He found his master's body deserted on the seashore, in Egypt, and he gave it a decent burial, with the assistance of an old Roman soldier who had fought under Pompey.——The father-in-law of the emperor Augustus.——A native of Pamphylia, who wrote a diffuse history from the creation down to his own time. It was not much valued. He lived in the age of Theodosius 2d.

Philiscus, a famous sculptor, whose statues of Latona, Venus, Diana, the Muses, and a naked Apollo, were preserved in the portico belonging to Octavia.

Philistus, a Syracusan, who, during his banishment from his native country wrote a history of Sicily in 12 books, which was commended by some, though condemned for inaccuracy by Pausanias. He was afterwards sent against the Syracusans by Dionysius the younger, and he killed himself when overcome by the enemy, 356, B. C. Plut. in Dion.—Diod. 13.

Philo, I. a Jewish writer of Alexandria, A. D. 40, sent as ambassador from his nation to Caligula. He was unsuccessful in his embassy, of which he wrote an entertaining account; and the emperor, who wished to be worshipped as a god, expressed his dissatisfaction with the Jews, because they refused to place his statues in their temple. He was so happy in his expressions and elegant in his variety, that he has been called the Jewish Plato; and the book which he wrote on the sufferings of the Jews in the reign of Caius, met with such unbounded applause in the Roman senate, where he read it publicly, that he was permitted to consecrate it in the public libraries. His works were divided into three parts, of which the first related to the creation of the world, the second spoke of sacred history, and in the third the author made mention of the laws and customs of the Jewish nation. The best edition of Philo is that of Mangey, 2 vols. fol. London, 1742.——II. An architect of Byzantium, who flourished about three centuries before the Christian era. He built a dock at Athens, where ships were drawn in safety and protected from storms. Cic. in Orat. 1, c. 14.——III. A Greek Christian writer, whose work was edited at Rome, 4to. 1772.

Philochorus, a man who wrote a history of Athens in 17 books, a catalogue of the archons, two books of Olympiads, &c. He died B. C. 222.

Philŏcles, I. one of the admirals of the Athenian fleet during the Peloponnesian war. He recommended to his countrymen to cut off the right hand of such of the enemies as were taken, that they might be rendered unfit for service. His plan was adopted by all the 10 admirals except one; but their expectations were frustrated, and, instead of being conquerors, they were totally defeated at Ægospotamos by Lysander; and Philocles, with 3000 of his countrymen, was put to death, and denied the honours of a burial. Plut. in Lys.——II. Is said by Suidas to have been the nephew of Æschylus, and the father of Morsimus. A trilogy of his, entitled the Pandionid, was recorded by Aristotle in the Didascaliæ. The Tereus, one of the plays in this trilogy, written in imitation of the Tereus of Sophocles, is wittily ridiculed by Aristophanes in the Aves. This tragedian was termed Χολὴ or Bile, from his harsh and bitter language. In figure he was deformed: hence Aristophanes takes occasion to cut sundry jokes upon him. In the Thesmophoriazusæ, Mnesilochus, following up the principle laid down by Agathon, that as the man is, so is the poetry, begins:—

Ταὐτ' ἀρ' ὁ Φιλοκλῆς αἰσχρὸς ὢν αἰσχρῶς ποιεῖ.—168.

In the Aves he finds in his shape a similarity to the lark, κορυδὸς Φιλοκλέα.....v. 1295.

Philoctētes, a son of Pœan, and Demonasus, was one of the Argonauts according to Flaccus and Hyginus, and the arm-bearer and particular friend of Hercules. He was present at the death of Hercules, and because he had erected the burning pile on which the hero was consumed, he received from him the arrows, which had been dipped in the gall of the hydra, after he had bound himself by a solemn oath not to betray the place where his ashes were deposited. Like the rest of those princes who had courted the daughter of Tyndarus, and who had bound themselves to protect her from injury, he was called upon by Menelaus to accompany the Greeks to the Trojan war, and he immediately set sail from Melibœa with seven ships, and repaired to Aulis, the general rendezvous of the combined fleet. He was here prevented from joining his countrymen, and the offensive smell which arose from a wound in his foot, obliged the Greeks, at the instigation of Ulysses, to remove him from the camp; and he was accordingly carried to the island of Lemnos, or, as others say, to Chryse, where Phimacus, the son of Dolophion, was ordered to wait upon him. In this solitary retreat he was suffered to remain for some time, till the Greeks, on the tenth year of the Trojan war, were informed by the oracle that Troy could not be taken without the arrows of Hercules, which were then in the possession of Philoctetes. Upon this Ulysses, accompanied by Diomedes, or, according to others, by Pyrrhus, was commissioned by the rest of the Grecian army to go to Lemnos, and to prevail upon Philoctetes to come and finish the tedious siege. Philoctetes recollected the ill treatment he had received from the Greeks, and particularly from Ulysses; and therefore he not only refused to go to Troy, but he even persuaded Pyrrhus to conduct him to Melibœa. As he embarked, the manes of Hercules forbad him to proceed, but immediately to repair to the Grecian camp, where he should be cured of his wounds, and put an end to the war. Philoctetes obeyed, and after he had been restored to his former health by Æsculapius, or, according to some, by Machaon or Podaliris, he destroyed an immense number of the Trojan enemy, among whom was Paris, the son of Priam, with the arrows of Hercules. When by his valour Troy had been ruined, he set sail from Asia, but as he was unwilling to visit his native country, he came to Italy, where, by the assistance of his Thessalian followers, he was enabled to build a town in Calabria, which he called Petilia. Authors disagree about the causes of the wound which Philoctetes received on the foot. The most ancient mythologists support, that it was the bite of the serpent which Juno had sent to torment him, because he had attended Hercules in his last moments, and had buried his ashes. According to another opinion, the princes of the Grecian army obliged him to discover where the ashes of Hercules were deposited, and as he had made an oath not to mention the place, he only with his foot struck the ground where they lay, and by this means concluded he had not violated his solemn engagement. For this, however, he was soon after punished, and the fall of one of the poisoned arrows, from his quiver, upon the foot which had struck the ground, occasioned so offensive a wound, that the Greeks were obliged to remove him from their camp. The sufferings and adventures of Philoctetes are the subject of one of the best tragedies of Sophocles. Virg. Æn. 3, v. 46.—Pindar. Pyth. 1.—Dictys Cret. 1, c. 14.—Senec. in Herc.—*Sophocl. PHILOLAUS, a Pythagorean philosopher of Crotona, B. C. 374, who first supported the diurnal motion of the earth round its axis, and its annual motion round the sun. Cicero, in Acad. 4, c. 39, has ascribed this opinion to the Syracusan philosopher Nicetas, and likewise to Plato; and from this passage some suppose that Copernicus started the idea of the system which he afterwards established. Diog.—Cic. de Orat. 3.—Plut.

PHILOPŒMEN, 1. a celebrated general of the Achæan league, born at Megalopolis. His father's name was Grangis. His education was begun and finished under Cassander, Ecdemus, and Demophanes; and he early distinguished himself in the field of battle, and appeared fond of agriculture and a country life. He proposed himself Epaminondas for a model, and he was not unsuccessful in imitating the prudence and the simplicity, the disinterestedness and activity, of this famous Theban. When Megalopolis was attacked by the Spartans, Philopœmen, then in the 30th year of his age, gave the most decisive proofs of his valour and intrepidity. He afterwards assisted Antigonus, and was present in the famous battle in which the Ætolians were defeated. Raised to the rank of chief commander, he showed his ability to discharge that important trust, by killing, with his own hand, Mechanidas, the tyrant of Sparta; and if he was defeated in a naval battle by Nabis, he soon after repaired his losses by taking the capital of Laconia, B. C. 188, and by abolishing the laws of Lycurgus, which had flourished there for such a length of time. Sparta, after its conquest, become tributary to the Achæans, and Philopœmen enjoyed the triumph of having reduced to ruins one of the greatest and the most powerful of the cities of Greece. Some time after, the Messenians revolted from the Achæan league, and Philopœmen, who headed the Achæans, unfortunately fell from his horse, and was dragged to the enemy's camp. Dinocrates, the general of the Messenians, treated him with great severity; he was thrown into a dungeon, and obliged to drink a dose of poison. When he received the cup from the hand of the executioner, Philopœmen asked him how his countrymen had behaved in the field of battle; and when he heard that they had obtained the victory, he drank the whole with pleasure, exclaiming that this was comfortable news. The death of Philopœmen, which happened about 183 years before the Christian era, in his 70th year, was universally lamented; and the Achæans, to revenge his death, immediately marched to Messenia, where Dinocrates, to avoid their resentment, killed himself. The rest of his murderers were dragged to his tomb, where they were sacrificed; and the people of Megalopolis, to show farther their great sense of his merit, ordered a bull to be yearly offered on his tomb, and hymns to be sung in his praise, and his actions to be celebrated in a panegyrical oration. He had also statues raised to his memory, which some of the Romans attempted to violate and to destroy, to no purpose, when Mummius took Corinth. Philopœmen has been justly called by his countrymen the last of the Greeks. Plut. in vitâ.—Justin. 32, c. 4.—Polyb.——II. A native of Pergamus, who died B. C. 138.

Philostratus, I. a famous sophist, born at Lemnos, or, according to some, at Athens. He came to Rome, where he lived under the patronage of Julia, the wife of the emperor Severus, and he was intrusted by the empress with all the papers which contained some account or anecdotes of Apollonius Thyanæus, and he was ordered to review them, and with them to compile a history. The life of Apollonius is written with elegance; but the improbable accounts, the fabulous stories, and exaggerated details which it gives, render it disgusting. There is, besides, another treatise remaining of his writings, &c. He died A. D. 244. The best edition of his writings is that of Olearius, fol. Lips. 1709.——II. His nephew, who lived in the reign of Heliogabalus, wrote an account of sophists.

Philotas, a son of Parmenio, distinguished in the battles of Alexander, and at last accused of conspiring against his life. He was tortured and stoned to death, or, according to some, stuck through with darts by the soldiers, B. C. 330. Curt. 6, c. 11.—Plut.—Arrian.

Philotis, a servant-maid at Rome, who saved her countrymen from destruction. After the siege of Rome by the Gauls, the Fidenates assembled an army under the command of Lucius Posthumius, and marched against the capital, demanding all the wives and daughters in the city as the conditions of peace. This extraordinary demand astonished the senators, and when they refused to comply, Philotis advised them to send all their female slaves disguised in matron's clothes, and she offered to march herself at the head. Her advice was followed, and when the Fidenates had feasted late in the evening, and were quite intoxicated and fallen asleep, Philotis lighted a torch as a signal for her countrymen to attack the enemy. The whole was successful; the Fidenates were conquered, and the senate, to reward the fidelity of the female slaves, permitted them to appear in the dress of the Roman matrons. Plut. in Rom.—Varro. de L. L. 5.—Ovid. de Art. Am. 2.

Philoxenus, I. an officer of Alexander, who received Cilicia at the general division of the provinces.——II. A son of Ptolemy, who was given to Pelopidas as an hostage.——III. A dithyrambic poet of Cythera, who enjoyed the favour of Dionysius, tyrant of Sicily, for some time, till he offended him by seducing one of his female singers. During his confinement, Philoxenus composed an allegorical poem, called Cyclops, in which he had delineated the character of the tyrant under the name of Polyphemus, and represented his mistress under the name of Galatæa, and himself under that of Ulysses. The tyrant, who was fond of writing poetry and of being applauded, removed Philoxenus from his dungeon, but the poet refused to purchase his liberty by saying things unworthy of himself, and applauding the wretched verses of Dionysius, and therefore he was sent to the quarries. When he was asked his opinion at a feast about some verses which Dionysius had just repeated, and which the courtiers had received with the greatest applause, Philoxenus gave no answer, but he ordered the guards that surrounded the tyrant's table to take him back to the quarries. Dionysius was pleased with his pleasantry and with his firmness, and immediately forgave him. Philoxenus died at Ephesus, about 380 years before Christ. Plut.——IV. A philosopher, who wished to have the neck of a crane, that he might enjoy the taste of his aliments longer, and with more pleasure. Arist. eth. 3.

Phlegon, a native of Tralles in Lydia, one of the emperor Adrian's freed-men. He wrote different treatises on the long-lived, on wonderful things, besides an historical account of Sicily, sixteen books on the Olympiads, an account of the principal places in Rome, three books of fasti, &c. Of these some fragments remain. His style was not elegant, and he wrote without judgment or precision. His works have been edited by Meursius, 4to. L. Bat. 1620.

Phocilides, a Greek poet and philosopher of Miletus, about 540 years before the Christian era. The poetical piece now extant, called ποιήτικον, and attributed to him, is not of his composition, but of another poet who lived in the reign of Adrian.

Phocion, an Athenian, celebrated for his virtues, private as well as public. He was educated in the school of Plato and of Xenocrates, and as soon as he appeared among the statesmen of Athens, he distinguished himself by his prudence and moderation, his zeal for the public good, and his military abilities. He often checked the violent and inconsiderate measures of Demosthenes; and when the Athenians seemed eager to make war against Philip, king of Macedonia, Phocion observed that war should never be undertaken without the strongest and most certain expectations of victory and success. When Philip endeavoured to make himself master of Eubœa, Phocion stopped his progress, and soon obliged him to relinquish his enterprise. He was 45 times appointed governor of Athens, and no greater encomium can be passed upon his talents as a minister and statesman, than that he never solicited, that high, though dangerous office. In his rural retreat, or at the head of the Athenian armies, he always appeared barefooted and without a cloak; whence one of his soldiers had occasion to observe, when he saw him dressed more warmly than usual during a severe winter, that since Phocion wore his cloak it was a sign of the most inclement weather. Philip, as well as his son Alexander, attempted to bribe him, but to no purpose; and Phocion boasted in being one of the poorest of the Athenians, and in deserving the appellation of the Good. It was through him that Greece was saved from an impending war, and he advised Alexander rather to turn his arms against Persia than to shed the blood of the Greeks, who were either his allies or his subjects. Antipater, who succeeded in the government of Macedonia after the death of Alexander, also attempted to corrupt the virtuous Athenian, but with the same success as his royal predecessor; and when a friend had observed to Phocion, that if he could so refuse the generous offers of his patrons, yet he should consider the good of his children, and accept them for their sake, Phocion calmly replied, that if his children were like him, they could maintain themselves as well as their father had done; but if they behaved otherwise, he declared that he was unwilling to leave them any thing which might either supply their extravagances or encourage their debaucheries. When the Piræus was taken, Phocion was accused of treason, and therefore to avoid the public indignation, he fled for safety to Polyperchon. Polyperchon sent him back to Athens, where he was immediately condemned to drink the fatal poison. He received the indignities of the people with uncommon composure; and when one of his friends lamented his fate, Phocion exclaimed, This is no more than what I expected; this treatment the most illustrious citizens of Athens have received before me. He died about 318 years before the Christian era. His body was deprived of a funeral by order of the ungrateful Athenians, and if it was at last interred, it was by stealth, under a hearth, by the hand of a woman who placed this inscription over his bones: Keep inviolate, O sacred hearth, the precious remains of a good man, till a better day restores them to the monuments of their forefathers, when Athens shall be delivered from her phrensy, and shall be more wise. His countenance was stern and unpleasant, but he never behaved with severity, his expressions were mild and his rebukes gentle. At the age of 80 he appeared at the Athenian armies like the most active officer, and to his prudence and cool valour in every period of life his citizens acknowledged themselves much indebted. His merits were not buried in oblivion, the Athenians repented of their ingratitude, and honoured his memory by raising him statues, and putting to a cruel death his guilty accusers. Plut. & C. Nep. in vitâ.—Diod. 16.

Phocus, I. son of Phocion, was dissolute in his manners, and unworthy of the virtues of his great father. He was sent to Lacedæmon to imbibe there the principles of sobriety, of temperance, and frugality. He cruelly revenged the death of his father, whom the Athenians had put to death. Plut. in Phoc. & Apoph.——II. A son of Oryntion, who led a colony of Corinthians into Phocis. He cured Antiope, a daughter of Nycteus, of insanity, and married her, and by her became father of Panopeus and Crisus. Paus. 2, c. 4.

Phœbidas, a Lacedæmonian general, sent by the Ephori to the assistance of the Macedonians against the Thracians. He seized the citadel of Thebes: but though he was disgraced and banished from the Lacedæmonian army for this perfidious measure, yet his countrymen kept possession of the town. He died B. C. 377. C. Nep. in Pelop.—Diod. 14, &c.

Phœnix, son of Amyntor, king of Argos, by Cleobule, or Hippodamia, was preceptor to young Achilles. When his father proved faithless to his wife, on account of his fondness for a concubine, called Clytia, Cleobule, jealous of her husband, persuaded her son Phœnix to ingratiate himself into the favours of his father's mistress. Phœnix easily succeeded, but when Amyntor discovered his intrigues, he drew a curse upon him, and the son was soon after deprived of his sight by divine vengeance. According to some, Amyntor himself put out the eyes of his son, which so cruelly provoked him, that he meditated the death of his father. Reason and piety, however, prevailed over passion, and Phœnix, not to became a parricide, fled from Argos to the court of Peleus, king of Phthia. Peleus carried him to Chiron, who restored him to his eye-sight, and soon after he was made preceptor to Achilles. He was also presented with the government of many cities, and made king of the Dolopes. After the death of Achilles, Phœnix, with others, was commissioned by the Greeks to return into Greece, to bring to the war young Pyrrhus. This commission he performed with success, and after the fall of Troy he returned with Pyrrhus, and died in Thrace. He was burried at Æon, or, according to Strabo, near Trachinia, where a small river in the neighbourhood received the name of Phœnix. Strab. 9.—*Homer. Phormio, I. an Athenian general, whose father's name was Asopicus. He impoverished himself to maintain and support the dignity of his army. His debts were some time after paid by the Athenians, who wished to make him their general, an office which he refused while he had so many debts, observing that it was unbecoming an officer to be at the head of an army when he knew that he was poorer than the meanest of his soldiers.——II. A peripatetic philosopher of Ephesus, who once gave a lecture upon the duties of an officer and a military profession. The philosopher was himself ignorant of the subject which he treated; upon which Hannibal the Great, who was one of his auditors, exclaimed that he had seen many doting old men, but never one worse than Phormio. Cic. de Nat. D. 2.——III. A disciple of Plato, chosen by the people of Elis to make a reformation in their government and their jurisprudence.

Phormis, was the countryman and contemporary of Epicharmus, and tutor to the sons of Gelon, the elder brother and predecessor of Hiero. His comedies also appear to have been mythological parodies.

Phōrōneus. Vid. Part III.

Photinus, an eunuch, who was prime minister to Ptolemy, king of Egypt. When Pompey fled to the court of Ptolemy, after the battle of Pharsalia, Photinus advised his master not to receive him, but to put him to death. Julius Cæsar some time after visited Egypt, and Photinus raised seditions against him, for which he was put to death.

Photius, son of Antonina, who betrayed to Belisarius his wife's debaucheries.

PHRAATES I. a king of Parthia, who succeeded Arsaces the 3d, called also Phriapatius. He made war against Antiochus, king of Syria, and was defeated in three successive battles. He left many children behind him; but as they were all too young, and unable to succeed to the throne, he appointed his brother Mithridates king, of whose abilities and military prudence he had often been a spectator. Justin. 41, c. 5.——The 2d, succeeded his father Mithridates, as king of Parthia, and made war against the Scythians, whom he called to his assistance against Antiochus, king of Syria, and whom he refused to pay, on the pretence that they came too late. He was murdered by some Greek mercenaries, who had been once his captives, and who had enlisted in his army, B. C. 129. Justin. 42, c. 1.—Plut. in Pomp. ——The 3d, succeeded his father Pacorus on the throne of Parthia, and gave one of his daughters in marriage to Tigranes, the son of Tigranes, king of Armenia. Soon after he invaded the kingdom of Armenia, to make his son-in-law sit on the throne of his father. His expedition was attended with ill success. He renewed a treaty of alliance which his father had made with the Romans. At his return in Parthia, he was assassinated by his sons Orodes and Mithridates. Justin.——The 4th, was nominated king of Parthia by his father Orodes, whom he soon after murdered, as also his own brothers. He made war against M. Antony with great success, and obliged him to retire with much loss. Some time after he was dethroned by the Parthian nobility, but he soon regained his power, and drove away the usurper, called Tiridates. The usurper claimed the protection of Augustus, the Roman emperor, and Phraates sent ambassadors to Rome to plead his cause and gain the favours of his powerful judge. He was successful in his embassy: he made a treaty of peace and alliance with the Roman emperor, restored the ensigns and standards which the Parthians had taken from Crassus and Antony, and gave up his four sons with their wives as hostages, till his engagements were performed. Some suppose that Phraates delivered his children into the hands of Augustus to be confined at Rome, that he might reign with greater security, as he knew his subjects would revolt as soon as they found any one of his family inclined to countenance their rebellion, though, at the same time, they scorned to support the interest of any usurper who was not of the royal house of the Arsacidæ. He was, however, at last murdered by one of his concubines, who placed her son, called Phraatices, on the throne. Val. Max. 7, c. 6.—Justin. 42, c. 5.—Diod. Cas. 51, &c.—Plut. in Anton. &c. —Tacit. Ann. 6, c. 32.

PHRAATICES, a son of Phraates 4th. He, with his mother, murdered his father, and took possession of the vacant throne. His reign was short, he was deposed by his subjects, whom he had offended by cruelty, avarice, and oppression.

PHRAORTES succeeded his father Deioces on the throne of Media. He made war against the neighbouring nations, and conquered the greatest part of Asia. He was defeated and killed in a battle by the Assyrians, after a reign of 22 years, B. C. 625. His son Cyaxares succeeded him. It is supposed that the Arphaxad mentioned in Judith in Phraortes. Pasc.—Herodot. 1, c. 102.

PHRASICLES, a nephew of Themistocles, whose daughter Nicomacha he married. Plut. in Them.

PHRONIMA, a daughter of Etearchus, king of Crete. She was delivered to a servant to be thrown into the sea, by order of her father, at the instigation of his second wife. The servant was unwilling to murder the child, but as he was bound by an oath to throw her into the sea, he accordingly let her down into the water by a rope, and took her out again unhurt. Phronima was afterwards in the number of the concubines of Polymnetius, by whom she became mother of Battus, the founder of Cyrene. Herodot. 4. c. 154.

PHRYNE, I. a celebrated prostitute, who flourished at Athens about 328 years before the Christian era. She was mistress to Praxiteles, who drew her picture. Vid. Praxiteles. This was one of his best pieces, and it was placed in the temple of Apollo at Delphi. It is said that Apelles painted his Venus Anadyomene after he had seen Phryne on the sea-shore naked, and with dishevelled hair. Phryne became so rich by the liberality of her lovers, that she offered to rebuild, at her own expense, Thebes, which Alexander had destroyed, provided this inscription was placed on the walls: Alexander diruit sed meretrix Phryne refecit. This was refused. Plin. 34, c. 8.——II. There was also another of the same name, who was accused of impiety. When she saw that she was going to be condemned, she unveiled her bosom, which so influenced her judges that she was immediately acquitted. Quintil. 2, c. 15.

PHRYNICHUS, a tragic poet of Athens, disciple of Thespis. At the close of the sixth century before Christ, the elements of tragedy, though still in a separate state, were individually so fitted and prepared, as to require nothing but a master hand to unite them into one whole of life and beauty. The Dithyramb presented in its solemn tone and lofty strains a rich mine of choral poetry; the regular narrative and mimetic character of the Thespian chorus furnished the form and materials of dramatic exhibition. To him belongs the chief merit of this combination. Dropping the light and farcical cast of the Thespian drama, and dismissing altogether Bacchus with his satyrs, he sought for the subjects of his pieces in the grave and striking events registered in the mythology or history of his country. This, however, was not a practice altogether original or unexampled. The fact, casually mentioned by Herodotus, that the tragic choruses at Sicyon sung, not the adventures of Bacchus, but the woes of Adrastus, shows that, in the Cyclic chorus at least, melancholy incident and mortal personages had long before been introduced. There is also some reason for supposing, that the young tragedian was deeply indebted to Homer in the formation of his drama. Aristotle distinctly attributes to the author of the Iliad and Odyssey the primary suggestions of tragedy; as in his Margites was given the first idea of comedy. Now it is an historical fact that a few years before Phrynichus began to exhibit, the Homeric poems had been collected, revised, arranged and published by the care of Pisistratus. Such an event would naturally attract attention, and add a deeper interest to the study of this mighty master; and it is easy to conceive how his μιμήσεις δραματικαί, as Aristotle terms them, would strike and operate upon a mind, acute, ready, and ingenious, as that of Phrynichus must have been. At any rate these two facts stand in close chronological connexion—the first edition of Homer, and the birth of tragedy, properly so called. Taking then the ode and the tone of the Dithyramb, the mimetic personifications of Homer and the themes, which natural tradition or even recent events supplied. Phrynichus combined these several materials together, and so brought them forward under the dramatic form of the Thespian exhibition. Thus, at length, does tragedy dawn upon us. These changes in the character of the drama, necessarily produced corresponding alterations in its form and manner. The recitative was no longer a set of disjointed, rambling episodes of humorous legend, separated by the wild dance and noisy song of a Satyr choir, but a connected succession of serious narrative or grave conversation, with a chorus composed of personages involved in the story; all relating to one subject and all tending to one result. This recitative again alternated with a series of choral odes, composed in a spirit of deep thought and lofty poetry, themselves turning more or less directly upon the theme of the interwoven dialogue. In correspondency with these alterations in tone and composition, the actor and the choristers must have assumed a different aspect. The performers were now the representatives not of Silenus and the Satyrs, but of heroes, princes, and their attendants. The goat-skin guise and obstreperous sportiveness were laid aside for the staid deportment of persons engaged in matters of serious business or deep affliction, and a garb befitting the rank and state of several individuals employed in the piece. Nor are we to suppose, that, as the actor was still but one, so never more than one personage was introduced. For it is very probable that this one actor, changing his dress, appeared in different characters during the course of the play: a device frequently employed in later times, when the increased number of actors rendered such a contrivance less necessary. This actor sometimes represented female personages, for Phrynichus is stated to have first brought a female character on the stage. Thus from the midst of the coarse buffooneries and rude imitations of the Satyric chorus, did tragedy start up at once in her proper, though not her perfect, form. For mighty as had been the stride towards the establishment of the serious drama, yet in the exhibitions of Phrynichus we find the infancy not the maturity of tragedy. There was still many an excrescence to be removed; many a chasm to be filled up; many a rugged point to be smoothed into regularity; and many an embryo part to be expanded into its full and legitimate dimensions. The management of the piece was simple and inartificial even to rudeness. The argument was some naked incident, mythologic or historical, on which the chorus sung and the actor recited in a connected but desultory succession. There was no interweaving or development of plot; no studied arrangement of fact and catastrophe; no skilful contrivance to heighten the natural interest of the tale, and work up the feelings of the audience into a climax of terror or of pity. The odes of the chorus were sweet and beautiful; the dances scientific and dexterously given; but then these odes and dances still composed the principal part of the performance. They narrowed in the episodes of the actor, and threw them into comparative insignificance. Nay, not unfrequently, whilst the actor appeared in a posture of thought, wo, or consternation, the chorus would prolong its dance and chantings, and leave to the performer little more than the part of a speechless image. In short, the drama of Phrynichus was a serious opera of lyric song and skilful dance, and not a tragedy of artful plot and interesting dialogue. Such was Phrynichus as an inventor; but since the poet continued to exhibit during a space of nearly forty years, and since for more than twenty of those years he had in Æschylus a contemporary and a rival, his own experience and the improvements of such an opponent would give to the later plays of Phrynichus a character, an expansion, and a refinement, in which his earlier and unaided attempts were so deficient. The Capture of Miletus, which he composed at least seventeen years after his own first appearance as a dramatist, and five years after the first victory of Æschylus, was, to judge from its effects, a piece of no inconsiderable merit. Eighteen years after this, he won the tragic prize for his Choragus Themistocles, with the Phœnissæ, a play perhaps little inferior in dramatic excellence and arrangement to the Persæ, which, four years afterwards, Æschylus produced on the same subject. Indeed, the poet, whose odes were characterized, even in the days of Aristophanes, as reaped from the sacred meadow of the muses, sweet as the ambrosia of the bee; the poet, whose dramas were by the same admirable judge styled pieces of singular beauty; the poet, who so long and sometimes so successfully competed with an Æschylus—must, beyond all doubt, have been no ordinary composer; and the charge of plagiarism, which that great tragedian is represented as so studiously rebutting, is another high compliment to the powers of Phrynichus. Still we must remember, in tracing the inventive improvers of tragedy, that the real claims of Phrynichus are not to be measured by what he finally achieved through imitation of others, but by the productions of his own unassisted ingenuity and talent. In this view, those claims must almost entirely be restricted to the combination of the poetry of the Cyclic with the acting of the Thespian chorus; the conversion of Satyric gayety into the solemnity and pathos of what was thenceforth peculiarly styled tragedy. In all succeeding alterations and additions, Phrynichus seems to have been simply the follower of Æschylus.

PHRYNIS, a musician of Mitylene, the first who obtained a musical prize at the Panathenæa at Athens. He added two strings to the lyre, which had always been used with seven by all his predecessors, B. C. 438. It is said that he was originally a cook at the house of Hiero, king of Sicily.

Pindărus, a celebrated lyric poet of Thebes. He was carefully trained from his earliest years to the study of music and poetry, and he was taught how to compose verses with elegance and simplicity by Myrtis and Corinna. When he was young, it is said that a swarm of bees settled on his lips, and there left some honeycombs as he reposed on the grass. This was universally explained as a prognostic of his future greatness and celebrity, and indeed he seemed entitled to notice when he had conquered Myrtis in a musical contest. He was not, however, so successful against Corinna, who obtained five times, while he was competitor, a poetical prize, which was adjudged rather to the charms of her person, than to the brilliancy of her genius or the superiority of her composition. In the public assemblies of Greece, where females were not permitted to contend, Pindar was rewarded with the prize in preference to every other competitor; and as the conquerors at Olympia were the subject of his compositions, the poet was courted by statesmen and princes. His hymns and pæans were repeated before the most crowded assemblies in the temples of Greece; and the priestess of Delphi declared that it was the will of Apollo that Pindar should receive the half of all the first fruit-offerings that were annually heaped on his altars. This was not the only public honour which he received; after his death he was honoured with every mark of respect, even to adoration. His statue was erected at Thebes, in the public place where the games were exhibited, and six centuries after was viewed with pleasure and admiration by the geographer Pausanias. The honours which had been paid to him while alive were also shared by his posterity; and at the celebration of one of the festivals of the Greeks, a portion of the victim which had been offered in sacrifice was reserved for the descendants of the poet. Even the most inveterate enemies of the Thebans showed regard for his memory, and the Spartans spared the house which the prince of lyrics had inhabited when they destroyed the houses and the walls of Thebes. The same respect was also paid him by Alexander the Great, when Thebes was reduced to ashes. It is said that Pindar died at the advanced age of 86, B. C. 435. The greatest part of his works have perished. He had written some hymns to the gods, poems in honour of Apollo, dithyrambics to Bacchus, and odes on several victories obtained at the four greatest festivals of the Greeks, the Olympic, Isthmian, Pythian, and Nemean games. Of all these, the odes are the only compositions extant, admired for sublimity of sentiments, grandeur of expression, energy and magnificence of style, boldness of metaphors, harmony of numbers, and elegance of diction. He has been censured for his affectation in composing an ode from which the letter S was excluded. The best editions of Pindar are those of Heyne, 4to. Pisistrătidæ, the descendants of Pisistratus, tyrant of Athens. Vid. Pisistratus.

Pisistrătus, I. an Athenian, son of Hippocrates, who early distinguished himself by his valour in the field, and by his address and eloquence at home. After he had rendered himself the favourite of the populace by his liberality, and by the intrepidity with which he had fought their battles, particularly near Salamis, he resolved to make himself master of his country. Every thing seemed favourable to his views; but Solon alone, who was then at the head of affairs, and who had lately instituted his celebrated laws, opposed him, and discovered his duplicity and artful behaviour before the public assembly. Pisistratus was not disheartened by the measures of his relation, Solon, but he had recourse to artifice. In returning from his country-house, he cut himself in various places, and after he had exposed his mangled body to the eyes of the populace, deplored his misfortunes, and accused his enemies of attempts upon his life, because he was the friend of the people, the guardian of the poor, and the reliever of the oppressed, he claimed a chosen body of 50 men from the populace to defend his person in future from the malevolence and the cruelty of his enemies. The unsuspecting people unanimously granted his request, though Solon opposed it with all his influence; and Pisistratus had no sooner received an armed band, on whose fidelity and attachment he could rely, than he seized the citadel of Athens, and made himself absolute. The people too late perceived their credulity; yet, though the tyrant was popular, two of the citizens, Megacles and Lycurgus, conspired together against him, and by their means he was forcibly ejected from the city. His house and all his effects were exposed to sale, but there was found in Athens only one man who would buy them. The private dissentions of the friends of liberty proved favourable to the expelled tyrant; and Megacles, who was jealous of Lycurgus, secretly proposed to restore Pisistratus to all his rights and privileges in Athens, if he would marry his daughter. Pisistratus consented, and by the assistance of his father-in-law, he was soon enabled to expel Lycurgus, and to re-establish himself. By means of a woman called Phya, whose shape was tall, and whose features were noble and commanding, he imposed upon the people, and created himself adherents even among his enemies. Phya was conducted through the streets of the city, and showing herself subservient to the artifice of Pisistratus, she was announced as Minerva, the goddess of wisdom, and the patroness of Athens, who was come down from heaven to re-establish her favourite Pisistratus in a power which was sanctioned by the will of heaven, and favoured by the affection of the people. Some time after, when he repudiated the daughter of Megacles, he found that not only the citizens, but even his very troops, were alienated from him by the influence, the intrigues, and the bribery of his father-in-law. He fled from Athens, where he could no longer maintain his power, and retired to Eubœa. Eleven years after he was drawn from his obscure retreat, by means of his son Hippias, and he was a third time received by the people of Athens as their master and sovereign. He died about 527 years before the Christian era, after he had enjoyed the sovereign power at Athens for 33 years, including the years of his banishment, and he was succeeded by his son Hipparchus. Pisistratus claims our admiration for his justice, his liberality, and his moderation. He often refused to punish the insolence of his enemies, and when he had one day been virulently accused of murder, rather than inflict immediate punishment upon the man who had criminated him, he went to the areopagus, and there convinced the Athenians that the accusation of his enemies were groundless, and that his life was irreproachable. It is to his labours that we are indebted for the preservation of the poems of Homer; and he was the first, according to Cicero, who introduced them at Athens in the order in which they now stand. He also established a public library at Athens, and the valuable books which he had diligently collected were carried into Persia when Xerxes made himself master of the capital of Attica. Hipparchus and Hippias, the sons of Pisistratus, who had received the name of Pisistratidæ, rendered themselves as illustrious as their father, but the flames of liberty were too powerful to be extinguished. The Pisistratidæ governed with great moderation, yet the name of tyrant or sovereign was insupportable to the Athenians. Two of the most respectable of the citizens, called Harmodius and Aristogiton, conspired against them, and Hipparchus was despatched in a public assembly. This murder was not, however, attended with any advantages; and though the two leaders of the conspiracy, who have been celebrated through every age for their patriotism, were supported by the people, yet Hippias quelled the tumult by his uncommon firmness and prudence, and for a while preserved that peace in Athens which his father had often been unable to command. This was not long to continue. Hippias was at last expelled by the united efforts of the Athenians and of their allies of Peloponnesus, and he left Attica when he found himself unable to maintain his power and independence. After the banishment of the Pisistratidæ, the Athenians became more than commonly jealous of their liberty, and often sacrificed the most powerful of their citizens, apprehensive of the influence popularity, and a well-directed liberality, might gain among a fickle and unsettled populace. The Pisistratidæ were banished from Athens about 18 years after the death of Pisistratus, B. C. 510. *Ælian. V. Piso, a celebrated family at Rome, which was a branch of the Calpurnians, descended from Calpus, the son of Numa. Before the death of Augustus, eleven of this family had obtained the consulship, and many had been honoured with triumphs, on account of their victories in the different provinces of the Roman empire. Of this family, the most famous were, ——I. Lucius Calpurnius, who was tribune of the people about 149 years before Christ, and afterwards consul. His frugality procured him the surname of Frugi, and he gained the greatest honours as an orator, a lawyer, a statesman, and an historian. He made a successful campaign in Sicily, and rewarded his son, who had behaved with great valour during the war, with a crown of gold which weighed twenty pounds. He composed some annals and harangues, which were lost in the age of Cicero. His style was obscure and inelegant.——II. Caius, a Roman consul, A. U. C. 687, who supported the consular dignity against the tumults of the tribunes and the clamours of the people. He made a law to restrain the cabals which generally prevailed at the election of the chief magistrates. ——III. Cneius, another consul under Augustus. He was one of the favourites of Tiberius, by whom he was appointed governor of Syria, where he rendered himself odious by his cruelty. He was accused of having poisoned Germanicus, and when he saw that he was shunned and despised by his friends, he destroyed himself, A. D. 20.——IV. Lucius, a private man, accused of having uttered seditious words against the emperor Tiberius. He was condemned, but a natural death saved him from the hands of the executioner.——V. Lucius, a governor of Rome for twenty years, an office which he discharged with the greatest justice and credit. Some, however, say that Tiberius made him governor of Rome, because he had continued drinking with him a night and two days, or two days and two nights according to Pliny. Horace dedicated his poem de Arte Poetica to his two sons, whose partiality for literature had distinguished them among the rest of the Romans, and who were fond of cultivating poetry in their leisure hours. Plut. in Cæs.—Plin. 18, c. 3.——VI. Cneius, a factious and turbulent youth, who conspired against his country with Catiline. He was among the friends of Julius Cæsar.——VII. Caius, a Roman who was at the head of a celebrated conspiracy against the emperor Nero. He had rendered himself a favourite of the people by his private as well as public virtues, by the generosity of his behaviour, his fondness of pleasure with the voluptuous, and his austerity with the grave and the reserved. He had been marked by some as a proper person to succeed the emperor; but the discovery of the plot by a freedman, who was among the conspirators, soon cut him off, with all his partisans. He refused to court the affections of the people and of the army, when the whole had been made public; and, instead of taking proper measures for his preservation, either by proclaiming himself emperor, as his friends advised, or by seeking a retreat in the distant provinces of the empire, he retired to his own house, where he opened the veins of both his arms, and bled to death.——VIII. Lucius, a senator, who followed the emperor Valerian into Persia. He proclaimed himself emperor after the death of Valerian, but he was defeated and put to death a few weeks after, A. D. 261, by Valens, &c. Horat.—Tacit. Ann. & Hist.—Val. Max.—Liv.—Sueton.—Cic. de offic. &c.—Plut. in Cæs. &c.——IX. One of the 30 tyrants appointed over Athens by Lysander.

Pithōlion, an insignificant poet of Rhodes, who mingled Greek and Latin in his compositions. He wrote some epigrams against J. Cæsar, and drew upon himself the ridicule of Horace on account of the inelegance of his style. Sueton. de cl. Rh.—Horat. 1, sat. 10, v. 21.—Marcob. 2, sat. 2.

Pittăcus, a native of Mitylene in Lesbos, was one of the seven wise men of Greece. His father's name was Cyrradius. With the assistance of the sons of Alcæus, he delivered his country from the oppression of the tyrant Melanchrus; and in the war which the Athenians waged against Lesbos he appeared at the head of his countrymen, and challenged to single combat Phrynon, the enemy's general. Pittacus had recourse to artifice, and entangled his adversary in a net, which he had concealed under his shield, and easily despatched him. He was amply rewarded for his victory, and his countrymen, sensible of his merit, unanimously appointed him governor of their city with unlimited authority. In this capacity Pittacus behaved with great moderation and prudence, and after he had governed his fellow-citizens with the strictest justice, and after he had established and enforced the most salutary laws, he voluntarily resigned the sovereign power after he had enjoyed it for 10 years, observing that the virtues and innocence of private life were incompatible with the power and influence of a sovereign. His disinterestedness gained him many admirers; and when the Mitylenеans wished to reward his public services by presenting him with an immense tract of territory, he refused to accept more land than what should be contained within the distance to which he could throw a javelin. He died in the 82d year of his age, about 570 years before Christ, after he had spent the last ten years of his life in literary ease and peaceful retirement. Many of his maxims were inscribed on the walls of Apollo's temple at Delphi, to show the world how great an opinion the Mitylenеans entertained of his abilities as a philosopher, a moralist, and a man. By one of his laws, every fault committed by a man when intoxicated deserved double punishment. The titles of some of his writings are preserved by Laertius, among which are mentioned elegiac verses, some laws in prose addressed to his countrymen, epistles, and moral precepts called *adomena. Placidia, a daughter of Theodosius the Great, sister to Honorius and Arcadius. She married Adolphus, king of the Goths, and afterwards Constantius, by whom she had Valentinian the third. She died A. D. 449.

Plancina, a woman celebrated for her intrigues and her crimes, who married Piso, and was accused with him of having murdered Germanicus, in the reign of Tiberius. She was acquitted either by means of the emperess Livia, or on account of the partiality of the emperor for her person. Subservient in every thing to the will of Livia, she, at her instigation, became guilty of the greatest crimes to injure the character of Agrippina. After the death of Agrippina, Plancina put herself to death, A. D. 33. Tacit. Ann. 6, c. 26, &c.

Plancus, L. Munatius, I. a Roman, who rendered himself ridiculous by his follies and his extravagance. He had been consul, and had presided over a province in the capacity of governor, but he forgot all his dignity, and became one of the most servile flatterers of Cleopatra and Antony. At the court of the Egyptian queen in Alexandria, he appeared in the character of the meanest stage-dancer, and, in comedy, he personated Glaucus, and painted his body of a green colour, dancing on a public stage quite naked, only with a crown of green reeds on his head, while he had tied behind his back the tail of a large sea fish. This exposed him to the public derision, and when Antony had joined the rest of his friends in censuring him for his unbecoming behaviour, he deserted to Octavius, who received him with great marks of friendship and attention. It was he who proposed, in the Roman senate, that the title of Augustus should be conferred on his friend Octavius, as expressive of the dignity and the reverence which the greatness of his exploits seemed to claim. Horace has dedicated I od. 7 to him; and he certainly deserved the honour, from the elegance of his letters, which are still extant, written to Cicero. He founded a town in Gaul, which he called Lugdunum. Plut. in Anton.——II. A patrician, proscribed by the second triumvirate. His servants wished to save him from death, but he refused it rather than expose their persons to danger.

Plato, I. a celebrated philosopher at Athens, son of Ariston and Parectonia. His original name was Aristocles, and he received that of Plato from the largeness of his shoulders. As one of the descendants of Codrus, and as the offspring of a noble, illustrious, and opulent family, Plato was educated with care, his body was formed and invigorated with gymnastic exercises, and his mind was cultivated and enlightened by the study of poetry and of geometry, from which he derived that acuteness of judgment and warmth of imagination, which have stamped his character as the most subtile and flowery writer of antiquity. He first began his literary career by writing poems and tragedies; but he was soon disgusted with his own productions, when, at the age of 20, he was introduced into the presence of Socrates, and when he was enabled to compare and examine, with critical accuracy, the merit of his compositions with those of his poetical predecessors. During eight years he continued to be one of the pupils of Socrates; and after his death Plato retired from Athens, and began to travel over Greece. He visited Magara, Thebes, and Elis, where he met with the kindest reception from his fellow-disciples, whom the violent death of their master had likewise removed from Attica. He afterwards visited Magna Græcia, attracted by the fame of the Pythagorean philosophy, and by the learning, abilities, and reputation, of its professors, Philolaus, Archytas, and Eurytus. He afterwards passed into Sicily, and examined the eruptions and fires of the volcano of that island. He also visited Egypt, where then the mathematician Theodorus flourished, and where he knew that the tenets of the Pythagorean philosophy and metempsychosis had been fostered and cherished. When he had finished his travels, Plato retired to the groves of Academus, in the neighbourhood of Athens, where his lectures were soon attended by a crowd of learned, noble, and illustrious pupils; and the philosopher, by refusing to have a share in the administration of affairs, rendered his name more famous and his school more frequented. During forty years he presided at the head of the academy, and there he devoted his time to the instruction of his pupils, and composed those dialogues which have been the admiration of every age and country. His studies, however, were interrupted for a while, whilst he obeyed the pressing calls and invitations of Dionysius, and whilst he persuaded the tyrant to become a man, the father of his people, and the friend of liberty. Vid. Dionysius 2d. In his dress the philosopher was not ostentatious, his manners were elegant, but modest, simple, without affectation; and the great honours which his learning deserved were not paid to his appearance. When he came to the Olympian games, Plato resided in a family who were totally strangers to him. He told them his name was Plato, yet he never spoke of the employment he pursued at Athens; and when he returned home, attended by the family which had so kindly entertained him, he was desired to show them the great philosopher whose name he bore: their surprise was great when he told them that he himself was the Plato whom they wished to behold. In his diet he was moderate, and indeed, to sobriety and temperance in the use of food, and to the want of those pleasures which enfeeble the body and enervate the mind, some have attributed his preservation during the tremendous pestilence which raged at Athens with so much fury at the beginning of the Peloponnesian war. Plato died on his birthday, in the 81st year of his age, about 384 years before the Christian era. He expired, according to Cicero, as he was writing. The works of Plato are numerous; they are all written in the form of a dialogue, except 12 letters. He speaks always by the mouth of others; and for the elegance, melody, and sweetness of his expressions, he was distinguished by the appellation of the Athenian bee. Cicero had such an esteem for him, that in the warmth of panegyric he exclaimed errare mehercule malo cum Platone, quam cum istis vera sentire; and Quintilian said, that when he read Plato, he seemed to hear not a man, but a divinity speaking. His style, however, though admired and commended by the best and most refined critics among the ancients, has not escaped the censure of some of the moderns; and the philosopher has been blamed who supports that fire is a pyramid tied to the earth by numbers, that the world is a figure consisting of 12 pentagons, and who, to prove the metempsychosis and the immortality of the soul, asserts, that the dead are born from the living, and the living from the dead. In his system of philosophy, he followed the physics of Heraclitus, the metaphysical opinions of Pythagoras, and the morals of Socrates. He maintained the existence of two beings, one self-existent, and the other formed by the hand of a pre-existent creature, god and man. The world was created by that self-existent cause, from the rude undigested mass of matter which had existed from all eternity, and which had even been animated by an irregular principle of motion. The origin of evil could not be traced under the government of a deity, without admitting a stubborn intractability and wildness congenial to matter; and from these, consequently, could be demonstrated the deviations from the laws of nature, and from thence the extravagant passions and appetites of men. From materials like these were formed the four elements, and the beautiful structure of the heavens and the earth; and into the active, but irrational principle of matter, the divinity infused a rational soul. The souls of men were formed from the remainder of the rational soul of the world, which had previously given existence to the invisible gods and demons. The philosopher, therefore, supported the doctrine of ideal forms, and the pre-existence of the human mind, which he considered as emanations of the Deity, which can never remain satisfied with objects or things unworthy of their divine original. Men could perceive with their corporeal senses, the types of immutable things, and the fluctuating objects of the material world; but the sudden changes to which these are continually obnoxious, create innumerable disorders, and hence arises deception, and, in short, all the errors and miseries of human life. Yet, in whatever situation man may be, he is still an object of divine concern, and to recommend himself to the favour of the pre-existent cause, he must comply with the purposes of his creation, and by proper care and diligence he can recover those immaculate powers with which he was naturally endowed. All science the philosopher made to consist in reminiscence, and in recalling the nature, forms, and proportions of those perfect and immutable essences with which the human mind had been conversant. The passions were divided into two classes, the first consisted of the irascible passions, which originated in pride or resentment, and were seated in the breast: the other, founded on the love of pleasure, was the concupiscible part of the soul, seated in the belly and inferior parts of the body. These different orders induced the philosopher to compare the soul to a small republic, of which the reasoning and judging powers were stationed in the head, as in a firm citadel, and of which the senses were its guards and servants. By the irascible part of the soul men asserted their dignity, repelled injuries, and scorned danger; and the concupiscible part provided the support and the necessities of the body, and, when governed with propriety, it gave rise to temperance. Justice was produced by the regular dominion of reason, and by the submission of the passions; and prudence arose from the strength, acuteness, and perfection of the soul, without which all other virtues could not exist. Plato was the first who supported the immortality of the soul upon arguments solid and permanent, deduced from truth and experience. From doctrines like these, the great founder of Platonism concluded, that there might exist in the world a community of men whose passions could be governed with moderation, and who, from knowing the evils and miseries which arise from ill conduct, might aspire to excellence, and attain that perfection which can be derived from the proper exercise of the rational and moral powers. To illustrate this more fully, the philosopher wrote a book, well known by the name of the republic of Plato, in which he explains, with acuteness, judgment, and elegance, the rise and revolution of civil society; and so respected was his opinions as a legislator, that his scholars were employed in regulating the republics of Arcadia, Elis, and Cnidus, at the desire of those states, and Xenocrates gave political rules for good and impartial government to the conqueror of the east. Plautia Lex, was enacted by M. Plautius, the tribune A. U. C. 664. It required every tribe annually to choose fifteen persons of their body to serve as judges, making the honour common to all the three orders, according to the majority of votes in every tribe.——Another, called also Plotia, A. U. C. 675. It punished with the interdictio ignis et aquæ, all persons who were found guilty of attempts upon the state, or the senators or magistrates, or such as appeared in public armed with any evil design, or such as forcibly expelled any person from his legal possessions.

Plautianus Fulvius, an African of mean birth, who was banished for his seditious behaviour in the years of his obscurity. In his banishment, Plautianus formed an acquaintance with Severus, who some years after ascended the imperial throne. This was the beginning of his prosperity. Plautianus shared the favours of Severus in obscurity as well as on the throne. He was invested with as much power as his patron at Rome, and in the provinces, and indeed, he wanted but the name of emperor to be his equal. He was concerned in all the rapine and destruction which was committed through the empire, and he enriched himself with the possessions of those who had been sacrificed to the emperor's cruelty or avarice. To complete his triumph, and to make himself still greater, Plautianus married his favourite daughter Plautilla to Caracalla, the son of the emperor. The son of Severus had complied with great reluctance, and, though Plautilla was amiable in her manners, commanding in aspect, and of a beautiful countenance, yet the young prince often threatened to punish her haughty and imperious behaviour as soon as he succeeded to the throne. Plautilla reported the whole to her father, and, to save his daughter from the vengeance of Caracalla, Plautianus conspired against the emperor and his son. The conspiracy was discovered, the wicked minister was immediately put to death, and Plautilla banished to the island of Lipari, with her brother Plautius, where, seven years after, she was put to death by order of Caracalla, A. D. 211. Plautilla had two children, a son, who died in his childhood, and a daughter, whom Caracalla murdered in the arms of her mother. Dion. Cass.

Plautus, M. Accius, I. a comic poet, born at Sarsina in Umbria. Fortune proved unkind to him, and, from competence, he was reduced to the meanest poverty, by engaging in a commercial line. To maintain himself, he entered into the family of a baker as a common servant, and, while he was employed in grinding corn, he sometimes dedicated a few moments to the comic muse. Some, however, deny this account. He wrote 25 comedies, of which only 20 are extant. He died about 184 years before the Christian era; and Varro, his learned countryman, wrote this stanza, which deserved to be engraved on his tomb:—

Postquam morte captus est Plautus,
Comœdia luget, scena est deserta;
Deinde risus, ludus, jocusque, et numeri
Innumeri simul omnes collacrymârunt.

The plays of Plautus were universally esteemed at Rome; and Varro, whose judgment is great and generally decisive, declares, that if the Muses were willing to speak Latin, they would speak in the language of Plautus. In the Augustan age, however, when the Roman language became more pure and refined, the comedies of Plautus did not appear free from inaccuracy. The poet, when compared to the more elegant expressions of a Terence, was censured for his negligence in versification, his low wit, execrable puns, and disgusting obscenities. Yet, however censured as to language or sentiments, Plautus continued to be a favourite on the stage. If his expressions were not choice or delicate, it was universally admitted that he was more happy than other comic writers in his pictures, the incidents of his plays were more varied, the acts more interesting, the characters more truly displayed, and the catastrophe more natural. In

.he reign of the emperor Diocletian, his comedies were still acted on the public theatres; and no greater compliment can be paid to his abilities as a comic writer, and no greater censure can be passed upon his successors in dramatic composition, than to observe, that for 500 years, with all the disadvantage of obsolete language and diction, in spite of the change of manners and the revolutions of government, he commanded and received that applause which no other writer dared to dispute with him. The best editions of Plautus are, that of Gronovius, 8vo. L. Bat. 1664; that of Barbou, 12mo. in 3 vols. Paris, 1759; that of Ernesti, 2 vols. 8vo. Lips. 1760; and that of Glasgow, 3 vols. 12mo. 1763. Varro apud Quintil. 10, c. 1.—Cic. de Offic. 1, &c.—Do Orat. 3, &c.—Horat. 2, ep. 1, v. 58, 170, de art. poet. 54 and 270.——II. Plinius Secundus, (C.) I. surnamed the Elder, was born at Verona, of a noble family. He distinguished himself in the field, and after he had been made one of the augurs at Rome, he was appointed governor of Spain. In his public character he did not neglect the pleasures of literature, the day was employed in the administration of the affairs of his province, and the night was dedicated to study. Every moment of time was precious to him; at his meals one of his servants read to him books valuable for their information, and from them he immediately made copious extracts, in a memorandum book. He deemed every moment lost which was not dedicated to study, and from these reasons he never appeared at Rome but in a chariot, and wherever he went he was always accompanied by his amanuensis. He even censured his nephew, Pliny the younger, because he had indulged himself with a walk; and sternly observed, that he might have employed those moments to better advantage. He was courted and admired by the emperors Titus and Vespasian, and he received from them all the favours which a virtuous prince could offer and an honest subject receive. As he was at Misenum, where he commanded the fleet which was then stationed there, Pliny was surprised at the sudden appearance of a cloud of dust and ashes. He was then ignorant of the cause which produced it, and he immediately set sail in a small vessel for mount Vesuvius, which he at last discovered to have made a dreadful eruption. The sight of a number of boats, that fled from the coast to avoid the danger, might have deterred another; but the curiosity of Pliny excited him to advance with more boldness, and, though his vessel was often covered with stones and ashes that were continually thrown up by the mountain, yet he landed on the coast. The place was deserted by the inhabitants, but Pliny remained there during the night, the better to observe the mountain, which, during the obscurity, appeared to be one continual blaze. He was soon disturbed by a dreadful earthquake, and the contrary wind on the morrow prevented him from returning to Misenum. The eruption of the volcano increased, and, at last, the fire approached the place where the philosopher made his observations. Pliny endeavoured to fly before it, but though he was supported by two of his servants he was unable to escape. His body was found three days after, and decently buried by his nephew, who was then at Misenum with the fleet. This memorable event happened in the 79th year of the Christian era; and the philosopher who perished by the eruptions of the volcano, has been called by some the martyr of nature. He was then in the 56th year of his age. Of the works which he composed none are extant, but his natural history in 37 books. It is a work, as Pliny the younger says, full of erudition, and as varied as nature itself. It treats of the stars, the heavens, wind, rain, hail, minerals, trees, flowers, and plants, besides an account of all living animals, birds, fishes, and beasts; a geographical description of every place on the globe, and a history of every art and science, of commerce and navigation, with their rise, progress, and several improvements. He is happy in his descriptions as a naturalist, he writes with force and energy; and though many of his ideas and conjectures are sometimes ill-founded, yet he possesses that fecundity of imagination, and vivacity of expression, which are requisite to treat a subject with propriety, and to render a history of nature pleasing, interesting, and, above all, instructive. His style possesses not the graces of the Augustan age; he has neither its purity and elegance, nor its simplicity; but is rather cramped, obscure, and sometimes unintelligible. He had written 160 volumes of remarks and annotations on the various authors which he had read; and so great was the opinion, in his contemporaries, of his erudition and abilities, that a man called Lartius Latinus offered to buy his notes and observations for the enormous sum of about 3242*l.* English money. The philosopher, who was himself rich and independent, rejected the offer, and his compilations, after his death, came into the hands of his nephew Pliny. The best editions of Pliny are that of Harduin, 3 vols. fol. Paris, 1723, that of Frantzius, 10 vols. 8vo. Lips. 1778, that of Brotier, 6 vols. 12mo. Paris, 1779. and the Variorum, 8vo. in 8 vols. Lips. 1778 to 1789. Tacit. Ann. 1. c. 69, l. 13, c. 20, l. 15, c. 53.—Plin. ep. &c.——II. C. Cæcilius Secundus, surnamed the younger, was son of L. Cæcilius by the sister of Pliny the elder. He was adopted by his uncle, whose name he assumed, and whose estates and effects he inherited. He received the greatest part of his education under Quintilian, and at the age of 19 he appeared at the bar, where he distinguished himself so much by his eloquence, that he and Tacitus were reckoned the two greatest orators of their age. He did not make his profession an object of gain like the rest of the Roman orators, but he refused fees from the rich as well as from the poorest of his clients, and declared that he cheerfully employed himself for the protection of innocence, the relief of the indigent, and the detection of vice. He published many of his harangues and orations, which have been lost. When Trajan was invested with the imperial purple, Pliny was created consul by the emperor. This honour the consul acknowledged in a celebrated panegyric, which, at the request of the Roman senate, and in the name of the whole empire, he pronounced on Trajan. Some time after he presided over Pontus and Bithynia, in the office, and with the power, of proconsul; and by his humanity and philanthropy the subject was freed from the burden of partial taxes, and the persecution which had been begun against the Christians of his province was stopped, when Pliny solemnly declared to the emperor, that the followers of Christ were a meek and inoffensive sect of men, that their morals were pure and innocent, that they were free from all crimes, and that they voluntarily bound themselves, by the most solemn oaths, to abstain from vice and to relinquish every sinful pursuit. If he rendered himself popular in his province, he was not less respected at Rome. His native country shared among the rest his unbounded benevolence; and Comum, a small town of Insubria, which gave him birth, boasted of his liberality in the valuable and choice library of books which he collected there. He made his preceptor Quintilian, and the poet Martial, objects of his benevolence; and when the daughter of the former was married, Pliny wrote to the father with the greatest civility; and while he observed that he was rich in the possession of learning, though poor in the goods of fortune, he begged of him to accept, as a dowry for his beloved daughter, 50,000 sesterces, about 300*l*. I would not, continued he, be so moderate were I not assured from your modesty and disinterestedness, that the smallness of the present will render it acceptable. He died in the 52d year of his age, A. D. 113. He had written a history of his own times, which is lost. It is said that Tacitus did not begin his history till he had found it impossible to persuade Pliny to undertake that laborious task; and, indeed, what could not have been expected from the panegyrist of Trajan, if Tacitus acknowledged himself inferior to him in delineating the character of the times. Some suppose, but falsely, that Pliny wrote the lives of illustrious men universally ascribed to Cornelius Nepos. He also wrote poetry, but his verses have all perished, and nothing of his learned works remain but his panegyric on the emperor Trajan, and ten books of letters, which he himself collected and prepared for the public, from a numerous and respectable correspondence. They are written with elegance and great purity; and the reader every where discovers that affability, that condescension and philanthropy, which so eminently marked the advocate of the Christians. These letters are esteemed by some equal to the voluminous epistles of Cicero. In his panegyric, Pliny's style is florid and brilliant; he has used, to the greatest advantage, the liberties of the panegyrist and the elegance of the courtier. His ideas are new and refined, but his diction is distinguished by that affectation and pomposity which marked the reign of Trajan. The best editions of Pliny are those of Gesner, 8vo. Lips. 1770, and of Lallemand, 12mo. Paris, apud Barbou; and of the Panegyric separate, that of Schwartz, 4to. 1746, and of the Epistles, the Variorum, L. Bat. 1669, 8vo. Plin. ep.—Vossius.—Sidonius.

Plistoănax, and Plistŏnax, son of Pausanias, was general of the Lacedæmonian armies in the Peloponnesian war. He was banished from his kingdom of Sparta for 19 years, and was afterwards recalled by order of the oracle of Delphi. He reigned 58 years. He had succeeded Plistarchus. Thucyd.

Plotĭna Pompeia, a Roman lady, who married Trajan while he was yet a private man. She entered Rome in the procession with her husband when he was saluted emperor, and distinguished herself by the affability of her behaviour, her humanity, and liberal offices to the poor and friendless. She accompanied Trajan in the east, and at his death she brought back his ashes to Rome, and still enjoyed all the honours and titles of a Roman emperess under Adrian, who, by her means, had succeeded to the vacant throne. Dion.

Plotĭnus, a Platonic philosopher of Lycopolis in Egypt. He was for eleven years a pupil of Ammonius the philosopher, and after he had profited by all the instructions of his learned preceptor, he determined to improve his knowledge, and to visit the territories of India and Persia to receive information. He accompanied Gordian in his expedition into the east, but the day which proved fatal to the emperor, nearly terminated the life of the philosopher. He saved himself by flight, and the following year he retired to Rome, where he publicly taught philosophy. His school was frequented by people of every sex, age, and quality; and many, on their deathbed, left all their possessions to his care, and intrusted their children to him as a superior being. It is even said, that the emperor and the emperess Salonina intended to rebuild a decayed city of Campania, and to appoint the philosopher over it, that there he might experimentally know, while he presided over a colony of philosophers, the validity and the use of the ideal laws of the republic of Plato. This plan was not executed through the envy and malice of the enemies of Plotinus. The philosopher, at last became helpless and infirm, returned to Campania, where the liberality of his friends for a while maintained him. He died A. D. 270, in the 66th year of his age, and as he expired, he declared that he made his last and most violent efforts to give up what there was most divine in him and in the rest of the universe. Amidst the great qualities of the philosopher, we discover some ridiculous singularities. Plotinus never permitted his picture to be taken, and he observed, that to see a painting of himself in the following age was beneath the notice of an enlightened mind. His writings have been collected by his pupil Porphyry. They consist of 54 different treatises, divided into six equal parts, written with great spirit and vivacity; and the reasonings are abstruse, and the subject metaphysical. The best edition is that of Picinus, fol. Basil, 1580.

Plotius Crispinus, I. a stoic philosopher and poet, whose verses were very inelegant, and whose disposition was morose, for which he has been ridiculed by Horace, and called Artalogus. Horat. 1, sat. 1. v. 4.——II. Tucca, a friend of Horace and of Virgil, who made him his heir. He was selected by Augustus, with Varius, to review the Æneid of Virgil. Horat. 1, sat. 5. v. 40.

Plutarchus, a native of Chæronea, descended of a respectable family. His father, whose name is unknown, was distinguished for his learning and virtues; and his grandfather, called Lamprias, was also as conspicuous for his eloquence and the fecundity of his genius. Under Ammonius, a reputable teacher at Delphi, Plutarch was made acquainted with philosophy and mathematics; and after he had visited, like a philosopher and historian, the territories of Egypt and Greece, he retired to Rome, where he opened a school. The emperor Trajan admired his abilities, and honoured him with the office of consul, and appointed him governor of Illyricum. After the death of his imperial benefactor, Plutarch removed from Rome to Chæronea, where he lived in the greatest tranquillity, respected by his fellow-citizens, and raised to all the honours which his native town could bestow. In this peaceful and solitary retreat Plutarch closely applied himself to study, and wrote the greatest part of his works, and particularly his lives. He died in an advanced age at Chæronea, about the 140th year of the Christian era. Plutarch had five children by his wife, called Timoxena, four sons and one daughter. Two of the sons and the daughter died when young, and those that survived were called Plutarch and Lamprias, and the latter did honour to his father's memory, by giving to the world an accurate catalogue of his writings. In his private and public character, the historian of Chæronea was the friend of discipline. He boldly asserted the natural right of mankind, liberty; but he recommended obedience and submissive deference to magistrates, as necessary to preserve the peace of society. He always carried a commonplace-book with him, and preserved with the greatest care whatever judicious observations fell in the course of conversation. The most esteemed of his works are his lives of illustrious men. He writes with precision; and though his diction is neither pure nor elegant, yet there is energy and animation, and in many descriptions he is inferior to no historian. In some of his narrations, however, he is often too circumstantial, his remarks are often injudicious; and when he compares the heroes of Greece with those of Rome, the candid reader can easily remember which side of the Adriatic gave the historian birth. He is the most entertaining, the most instructive and interesting, of all the writers of ancient history; and were a man of true taste and judgment asked what book he wished to save from destruction of all the profane compositions of antiquity, he would perhaps without hesitation reply, the Lives of Plutarch. The best editions of Plutarch are that of Francfort, 2 vols. fol. 1599; that of Stephens, 6 vols. 8vo. 1572; the Lives by Reiske, 12 vols. 8vo. Lips. 1775: and the Moralia, &c. by Wyttenbach. Plut.

Plynteria, a festival among the Greeks, in honour of Aglauros, or rather of Minerva, who received from the daughter of Cecrops the name of Aglauros. The word seems to be derived from πλυνειν, lavare, because, during the solemnity, they undressed the statue of the goddess, and washed it. The day on which it was observed was universally looked upon as unfortunate and inauspicious, and on that account no person was permitted to appear in the temples, as they were purposely surrounded with ropes. The arrival of Alcibiades in Athens that day was deemed very unfortunate; but, however, the success that ever after attended him, proved it to be otherwise. It was customary at this festival to bear in procession a cluster of figs, which intimated the progress of civilization among the first inhabitants of the earth, as figs served them for food after they had found a dislike for acorns. Pollux.

Polemocratia, a queen of Thrace, who fled to Brutus after the murder of Cæsar. She retired from her kingdom because her subjects had lately murdered her husband.

Pōlĕmon, I. a youth of Athens, son of Philostratus. He once, when intoxicated, entered the school of Xenocrates, while the philosopher was giving his pupils a lecture upon the effects of intemperance, and he was so struck with the eloquence of the academician, and the force of his arguments, that from that moment he renounced the dissipated life he had led, and applied himself totally to the study of philosophy. He was then in the 30th year of his age, and from that time never drank any other liquor but water; and after the death of Xenocrates he succeeded in the school where his reformation had been effected. He died about 270 years before Christ, in an extreme old age. Diog. in vitâ.—Horat. 2, sat. 3, v. 254.—Val. Max. 6, c. 9.——II. A son of Zeno the rhetorician, made king of Pontus by Antony. He attended his patron in his expedition against Parthia. After the battle of Actium he was received into favour by Augustus, though he had fought in the cause of Antony. He was killed some time after by the barbarians near the Palus Mæotis, against whom he had made war. Strab.—Dion.—— III. His son, of the same name, was confirmed on his father's throne by the Roman emperors, and the province of Cilicia was also added to his kingdom by Claudius.——IV. A rhetorician at Rome, who wrote a poem on weights and measures, still extant. He was master to Persius, the celebrated satirist, and died in the age of Nero.——V. A sophist of Laodicea in Asia Minor, in the reign of Adrian. He was often sent to the emperor with an embassy by his countrymen, which he executed with great success. He was greatly favoured by Adrian, from whom he exacted much money. In the 56th year of his age he buried himself alive, as he laboured with the gout. He wrote declamations in Greek.

Poliēia, a festival at Thebes in honour of Apollo, who was represented there with grey hair, (πολιος), contrary to the practice of all other places. The victim was a bull, but when it happened once that no bull could be found, an ox was taken from the cart and sacrificed. From that time the sacrifice of labouring oxen was deemed lawful, though before it was looked upon as a capital crime.

Pollēs, a Greek poet, whose writings were so obscure and unintelligible that his name became proverbial. Suidas.

Pollio, (C. Asinius,) I. a Roman consul, under the reign of Augustus, who distinguished himself as much by his eloquence and writings as by his exploits in the field. He defeated the Dalmatians, and favoured the cause of Antony against Augustus. He patronised, with great liberality, the poets Virgil and Horace, who have immortalized him in their writings. He was the first who raised a public library at Rome. In his library were placed the statues of all the learned men of every age, and Varro was the only person who was honoured there during his lifetime. He was with J. Cæsar when he crossed the Rubicon. He was greatly esteemed by Augustus when he had become one of his adherents after the ruin of Antony. Pollio wrote some tragedies, orations, and a history, which was divided into 17 books. All these compositions are lost, and nothing remains of his writings except a few letters to Cicero. He died in the 80th year of his age, A. D. 4. He is the person in whose honour Virgil has inscribed his fourth eclogue, Pollio, as a reconciliation was effected between Augustus and Antony during his consulship. The poet, it is supposed by some, makes mention of a son of the consul born about this time, and is lavish in his excursions into futurity, and his predictions of approaching prosperity. Paterc. 2, c. 86.—Horat. 2, od. 1, Sat. 10, l. 1.—Virg. Ecl. 3 and 4.—Val. Max. 8, c. 13.—Quint. 10.——II. Vedius, one of the friends of Augustus, who used to feed his fishes with human flesh. This cruelty was discovered when one of his servants broke a glass in the presence of Augustus, who had been invited to a feast. The master ordered the servant to be seized; but he threw himself at the feet of the emperor, and begged him to interfere, and not to suffer him to be devoured by fishes. Upon this the causes of his apprehension were examined, and Augustus, astonished at the barbarity of his favourite, caused the servant to be dismissed, all the fishponds to be filled up, and the crystal glasses of Pollio to be broken to pieces.——III. A man who poisoned Britannicus, at the instigation of Nero.

Pollius Felix, a friend of the poet Statius, to whom he dedicated his second Sylva.

Pollux. Vid. Castor. A Greek writer, who flourished A. D. 186, in the reign of Commodus, and died in the 58th year of his age. He was born at Naucratis, and taught rhetoric at Athens, and wrote a useful work called Onomasticon, of which the best edition is that of Hemsterhusius, 2 vols. fol. Amst. 1706.

Polus, a celebrated Grecian actor.

Polyænus, a native of Macedonia, who wrote eight books, in Greek, of stratagems, which he dedicated to the emperors Antoninus and Verus, while they were making war against the Parthians. He wrote also other books, which have been lost, among which was a history, with a description of the city of Thebes. The best editions of his stratagems are those of Masvicius, 8vo. L. Bat. 1690, and of Mursinna, 12mo. Berlin, 1756.

Polybius, a native of Megalopolis in Peloponnesus, son of Lycortas. He was early initiated in the duties, and made acquainted with the qualifications of a statesman by his father, who was a strong supporter of the Achæan league, and under him Philopœmen was taught the art of war. In Macedonia he distinguished himself by his valour against the Romans, and when Perseus had been conquered, he was carried to the capital of Italy as a prisoner of war. Scipio and Fabius were acquainted with his uncommon abilities as a warrior and as a man of learning, and they made him their friend by kindness and attention. He accompanied Scipio in his expeditions, and was present at the taking of Carthage and Numantia. After the death of Scipio, he retired from Rome, and passed the rest of his days at Megalopolis. He died in the 82d year of his age, about 124 years before Christ, of a wound which he had received by a fall from his horse. He wrote a universal history in Greek, divided into 40 books, which began with the wars of Rome with the Carthaginians, and finished with the conquest of Macedonia by Paulus. The greatest part of this valuable history is lost; the five first books are extant, and of the twelve following, the fragments are numerous. The history of Polybius is admired for its authenticity, and he is, perhaps, the only historian among the Greeks who was experimentally and professedly acquainted with the military operations and the political measures of which he makes mention. Polybius, however great and entertaining, is sometimes censured for his unnecessary digressions, for his uncouth and ill-digested narrations, for his negligence, and the inaccurate arrangement of his words. But every where there is instruction to be found, information to be collected, and curious facts to be obtained; and it reflects not much honour upon Livy for calling the historian, from whom he has copied whole books, almost word for word, without gratitude or acknowledgment, haud quaquam spernendus auctor. Dionysius, also of Halicarnassus, is one of his most violent accusers; but the historian has rather exposed his ignorance of true criticism than discovered inaccuracy or inelegance. The best editions of Polybius are those of Gronovius, 3 vols. 8vo. Amst. 1670, or Ernesti, 3 vols. 8vo. 1764, and of Schweighæuser, 7 vols. 8vo. Lips. 1785. Plut. in Phil. in præc.—Liv. 30, c. 45.—Paus. 8, c. 30.

Polycarpus, a famous Greek writer, born at Smyrna, and educated at the expense of a rich but pious lady. Some suppose that he was St. John's disciple. He became bishop of Smyrna, and went to Rome to settle the festival of Easter, but to no purpose. He was condemned to be burnt at Smyrna, A. D. 167. His epistle to the Philippians is simple and modest, yet replete with useful precepts and rules for the conduct of life. The best editions of Polycarp's epistle is that of Oxon. 8vo. 1708, being annexed to the works of Ignatius.

Polychares, a rich Messenian, said to have been the cause of the war which was kindled between the Spartans and his countrymen, which was called the first Messenian war.

Polycles, I. an Athenian, in the time of Demetrius, &c. Polyæn. 5.——II. A famous athlete, often crowned at the four solemn games of the Greeks. He had a statue in Jupiter's grove at Olympia. Paus. 6, c. 1.

Polyclētus, a celebrated statuary of Sicyon, about 232 years before Christ. He was universally reckoned the most skilful artist of his profession among the ancients, and the second rank was given to Phidias. One of his pieces, in which he had represented a body-guard of the king of Persia, was so happily executed, and so nice and exact in all its proportions, that it was looked upon as a most perfect model, and accordingly called the Rule. He was acquainted with architecture. Paus. 2 and 6.—Quintil. 12, c. 10.

Polycrātes, I. a tyrant of Samos, well known for the continual flow of good fortune which attended him. He had a fleet of a hundred ships of war, and was so universally respected, that Amasis, the king of Egypt, made a treaty of alliance with him. The Egyptian monarch, however, terrified by his continual prosperity, advised him to checker his enjoyments by relinquishing some of his most favourite objects. Polycrates complied, and threw into the sea a beautiful seal, the most valuable of his jewels; but a few days after, he received as a present a large fish, in whose belly the jewel was found. Amasis no sooner heard this, than he rejected all alliance with the tyrant of Samos; and observed, that sooner or later his good fortune would vanish. Some time after, Polycrates visited Magnesia, on the Mæander, where he had been invited by Orœtes, the governor. He was shamefully put to death, 522 years before Christ, merely because the governor wished to terminate the prosperity of Polycrates. Paus. 8, c. 14.—Strab. 14.—Herodot. 3, c. 39, &c.——II. A sophist of Athens, who, to engage the public attention, wrote a panegyric on Busiris and Clytemnestra. Quintil. 2, c. 17.

Polyctor, an athlete of Elis. It is said that he obtaincd a victory at Olympia by bribing his adversary, Sosander, who was superior to him in strength and courage. Paus. 5, c. 21.

Polydămas, I. a Trojan, son of Antenor by Theano, the sister of Hecuba. He married Lycaste, a natural daughter of Priam. He is accused by some of having betrayed his country to the Greeks. Dares Phryg.——II. a son of Panthous, born the same night as Hector. He was inferior in valour to none of the Trojans except Hector; and his prudence, the wisdom of his counsels, and the firmness of his mind, claimed equal admiration. He was at last killed by Ajax, after he had slaughtered a great number of the enemy. Dictys Cret. 1, &c.—Homer. Il. 12, &c.——III. A celebrated athlete, son of Nicias, who imitated Hercules in whatever he did. He killed a lion with his fist, and it is said that he could stop a chariot with his hand in its most rapid course. He was one day with some of his friends in a cave, when on a sudden a large piece of rock came tumbling down, and while all fled away, he attempted to receive the fallen fragment in his arms. His prodigious strength, however, was insufficient, and he was instantly crushed to pieces under the rock. Paus. 6, c. 5.

Polydectes, a king of Sparta, of the family of the Proclidæ. He was son of Eunomus. Paus. 3, c. 7. Vid. Part III.

Polydōrus, I. a son of Alcamenes, king of Sparta. He put an end to the war, which had been carried on during 20 years, between Messenia and his subjects; and during his reign the Lacedæmonians planted two colonies, one at Crotona, and the other at Locri. He was universally respected. He was assassinated by a nobleman called Polymarchus. His son Eurycrates succeeded him 724 years before Christ. Paus. 3.—Herodot. 7, c. 204.——II. A celebrated carver of Rhodes, who, out of a single block, made the famous statue of Laocoon and his children. Plin. 34, c. 8.——III. A son of Priam by Hecuba, or, according to others, by Laothoe, the daughter of Altes, king of Pedasus. As he was young and inexperienced when Troy was besieged by the Greeks, his father removed him to the court of Polymnestor, king of Thrace, and also intrusted to the care of the monarch a large sum of money and the greatest part of his treasures. Polymnestor assassinated young Polydorus, and threw his body into the sea, where it was found by Hecuba. Vid. Polymnestor. According to Virgil, the body of Polydorus was buried near the shore by his assassin, and there grew on his grave a myrtle, whose boughs dropped blood, when Æneas, going to Italy, attempted to tear them from the tree. Virg. Æn. 3, v. 21, &c.—Apollod. 3, c. 12.—Ovid. Met. 13, v. 432.—Homer. Il. 20.—Dictys Cret. 2, c. 18.

Polygnōtus, I. a celebrated painter of Thasos, about 422 years before the Christian era. His father's name was Aglaophon. He adorned one of the public porticoes of Athens with his paintings, in which he had represented the most striking events of the Trojan war. He particularly excelled in giving grace, liveliness, and expression to his pieces. The Athenians were so pleased with him that they offered to reward his labours with whatever he pleased to accept. He declined this generous offer, and the Amphictyonic council, which was composed of the representatives of the principal cities of Greece, ordered that Polygnotus should be maintained at the public expense wherever he went. Quintil. 12, c. 10.—Plin. 33 and 34.—Plut. in Cim.—Paus. 10, c. 25, &c.——II. A statuary. Plin. 34.

Polymnestor, I. A king of the Thracian Chersonesus, who married Ilione, the eldest of Priam's daughters. When the Greeks besieged Troy, Priam sent the greatest part of his treasures, together with Polydorus, the youngest of his sons, to Thrace, where they were intrusted to the care of Polymnestor. The Thracian monarch paid every attention to his brother-in-law, but when he was informed that Priam was dead, he murdered him to become master of the riches which were in his possession. At that time the Greeks were returning victorious from Troy, followed by all the captives, among whom was Hecuba, the mother of Polydorus. The fleet stopped on the coast of Thrace, where one of the female captives discovered on the shore the body of Polydorus, whom Polymnestor had thrown into the sea. The dreadful intelligence was immediately communicated to the mother, who did not doubt but Polymnestor was the cruel assassin. She resolved to revenge her son's death, and immediately she called out Polymnestor, as if wishing to impart to him a matter of the most important nature. The tyrant was drawn into the snare, and was no sooner introduced into the apartments of the Trojan princess, than the female captives rushed upon him and put out his eyes with their pins, while Hecuba murdered his two children who had accompanied him. According to Euripides, the Greeks condemned Polymnestor to be banished into a distant island for his perfidy. Hyginus, however, relates the whole differently, and observes that when Polydorus was sent to Thrace, Ilione, his sister, took him instead of her son Deiphilus, who was of the same age, apprehensive of her husband's cruelty. The monarch was unacquainted with the imposition, he looked upon Polydorus as his own son, and treated Deiphilus as the brother of Ilione. After the destruction of Troy, the conquerors, who wished the house and family of Priam to be totally extirpated, offered Electra, the daughter of Agamemnon to Polymnestor, if he would destroy Ilione and Polydorus. The monarch accepted the offer, and immediately despatched his own son Deiphilus, whom he had been taught to regard as Polydorus. Polydorus, who passed as the son of Polymnestor, consulted the oracle after the murder of Deiphilus, and when he was informed that his father was dead, his mother a captive in the hands of the Greeks, and his country in ruins, he communicated the answer of the god to Ilione, whom he had always regarded as his mother. Ilione told him the measures she had pursued to save his life, and upon this he avenged the perfidy of Polymnestor by putting out his eyes. Eurip. in Hecub.—Hygin. fab. 109.—Virg. Æn. 3, v. 45, &c.—Ovid. Met. 13, v. 430, &c.——II. A young Milesian, who took a hare in running, and afterwards obtained a prize at the Olympic games.

Polyperchon, or Polysperchon, one of the officers of Alexander. Antipater, at his death, appointed him governor of the kingdom of Macedonia in preference to his son Cassander. Polyperchon, though old, and a man of experience, showed great ignorance in the administration of the government. He became cruel not only to the Greeks, or such as opposed his ambitious views, but even to the helpless and innocent children and friends of Alexander, to whom he was indebted for his rise and military reputation. He was killed in a battle 309 B. C. Curt.—Died. 17, &c.—Justin. 13.

Polystratus, I. a Macedonian soldier, who found Darius after he had been stabbed by Bessus, and who gave him water to drink, and carried the last injunctions of the dying monarch to Alexander. Curt. 5, c. 13.——II. An Epicurean philosopher, who flourished B. C. 238.

Polyxena, a daughter of Priam and Hecuba, celebrated for her beauty and accomplishments. Achilles became enamoured of her, and solicited her hand; and their marriage would have been consummated had not Hector, her brother, opposed it. Polyxena, according to some authors, accompanied her father when he went to the tent of Achilles to redeem the body of his son Hector. Some time after the Grecian hero came into the temple of Apollo to obtain a sight of the Trojan princess, but he was murdered there by Paris; and Polyxena, who had returned his affection, was so afflicted at his death, that she went and sacrificed herself on his tomb. Some, however, suppose that that sacrifice was not voluntary, but that the manes of Achilles appeared to the Greeks as they were going to embark, and demanded of them the sacrifice of Polyxena. The princess, who was in the number of the captives, was upon this dragged to her lover's tomb, and there immolated by Neoptolemus, the son of Achilles. Ovid. Met. 13, fab. 5, &c.—Dictys Cret. 3 and 5.—Virg. Æn. 3, v. 321.—Catull. ep. 65.—Hygin. fab. 90.

Polyzelus, a Greek poet of Rhodes. He had written a poem on the origin and birth of Bacchus, Venus, the Muses, &c. Some of his verses are quoted by Athenæus. Hygin. P. A. 2, c. 14.

Pompeia, I. a daughter of Sextus Pompey, by Scribonia. She was promised to Marcellus, as a means of procuring a reconciliation between her father and the triumvirs, but she married Scribonius Libo.——II. A daughter of Pompey the Great, Julius Cæsar's third wife. She was accused of incontinence, because Clodius had introduced himself in women's clothes into the room where she was celebrating the mysteries of Cybele. Cæsar repudiated her upon this accusation. Plut.

Pompeia Lex, by Pompey the Great, de ambitu, A. U. C. 701. It ordained that whatever person had been convicted of the crime of ambitus, should be pardoned, provided he could impeach two others of the same crime, and occasion the condemnation of one of them.—Another by the same, A. U. C. 701, which forbade the use of laudatores in trials, or persons who gave a good character of the prisoner then impeached.——Another by the same, A. U. C. 683. It restored to the tribunes their original power and authority, of which they had been deprived by the Cornelian law.——Another by the same, A. U. C. 701. It shortened the forms of trials, and enacted that the three first days of a trial should be employed in examining witnesses, and it allowed only one day to the parties to make their accusation and defence. The plaintiff was confined to two hours, and the defendant to three. This law had for its object the riots which happened from the quarrels of Clodius and Milo.——Another by the same, A. U. C. 698. It required that the judges should be the richest of every century, contrary to the usual form. It was, however, requisite that they should be such as the Aurelian law prescribed.

Pompeianus, I. a Roman knight of Antioch, raised to offices of the greatest trust under the emperor Aurelius, whose daughter Lucilla he married. He lived in great popularity at Rome, and retired from the court when Commodus succeeded to the imperial crown. He ought, according to Julian's opinion, to have been chosen and adopted as successor by M. Aurelius.——II. A general of Maxentius, killed by Constantine.

Pompeius, (Q.) I. a consul, who carried on war against the Numantines, and made a shameful treaty. He is the first of that noble family of whom mention is made. Flor. 2, c. 18.——II. Cneus, a Roman general, who made war against the Marsi, and triumphed over the Piceni. He declared himself against Cinna and Marius, and supported the interest of the republic. He was surnamed Strabo, because he squinted. While he was marching against Marius, a plague broke out in his army, and raged with such violence that it carried away 11,000 men in a few days. He was killed by a flash of lightning; and as he had behaved with cruelty while in power, the people dragged his body through the streets of Rome with an iron hook, and threw it into the Tiber. Paterc. 2.—Plut. in Pomp.——III. Rufus, a Roman consul with Sylla. He was sent to finish the Marsian war, but the army mutinied at the instigation of Pompeius Strabo, whom he was to succeed in command, and he was assassinated by some of the soldiers. Appian. Civ. 1.——IV. Cneus, surnamed Magnus, from the greatness of his exploits, was son of Pompeius Strabo and Lucilia. He early distinguished himself in the field of battle, and fought with success and bravery under his father, whose courage and military prudence he imitated. He began his career with great popularity, the beauty and elegance of his person gained him admirers, and by pleading at the bar, he displayed his eloquence, and received the most unbounded applause. In the disturbances which agitated Rome, by the ambition and avarice of Marius and Sylla, Pompey followed the interest of the latter, and by levying three legions for his service, he gained his friendship and his protection. In the 26th year of his age he conquered Sicily, which was in the power of Marius and his adherents, and in 40 days he regained all the territories of Africa which had forsaken the interest of Sylla. This rapid success astonished the Romans, and Sylla, who admired and dreaded the rising power of Pompey, recalled him to Rome. Pompey immediately obeyed, and the dictator, by saluting him with the appellation of the Great, showed to the world what expectations he formed from the maturer age of his victorious lieutenant. This sounding title was not sufficient to gratify the ambition of Pompey; he demanded a triumph, and when Sylla refused to grant it, he emphatically exclaimed, that the sun shone with more ardour at his rising than at his setting. His assurance gained what petitions and entreaties could not obtain; and he was the first Roman knight who, without an office under the appointment of the senate, marched in triumphal procession through the streets of Rome. He now appeared, not as a dependant, but as a rival of the dictator, and his opposition to his measures totally excluded him from his will. After the death of Sylla, Pompey supported himself against the remains of the Marian faction, which were headed by Lepidus. He defeated them, put an end to the war which the revolt of Sertorius in Spain had occasioned, and obtained a second triumph, though still a private citizen, about 73 years before the Christian era. He was soon after made consul, and in that office he restored the tribunitial power to its original dignity, and in forty days removed the pirates from the Mediterranean, where they had reigned for many years, and by their continual plunder and audacity almost destroyed the whole naval power of Rome. While he prosecuted the piratical war, Pompey was empowered to finish the war against two of the most powerful monarchs of Asia, Mithridates, king of Pontus, and Tigranes, king of Armenia. His operations against the king of Pontus were bold and vigorous, and in a general engagement the Romans so totally defeated the enemy, that the Asiatic monarch escaped with difficulty from the field of battle. Vid. Mithridaticum Bellum. Pompey did not lose sight of the advantages despatch would ensure; and he entered Armenia, received the submission of King Tigranes, and after he had conquered the Albanians and Iberians, visited countries which were scarce known to the Romans, and, like a master of the world, disposed of kingdoms and provinces, and received homage from 12 crowned heads at once; he entered Syria, and pushed his conquests as far as the Red Sea. Part of Arabia was subdued, Judæa became a Roman province; and when he had now nothing to fear from Mithridates, who had voluntarily destroyed himself, Pompey returned to Italy with all the pomp and majesty of an eastern conqueror. The Romans dreaded his approach; they knew his power and his influence among his troops; and they feared the return of another tyrannical Sylla. Pompey, however, banished their fears; he disbanded his army, and the conqueror of Asia entered Rome like a private citizen. He was honoured with a triumph, and the Romans, for three successive days, gazed with astonishment on the riches and the spoils which their conquests had acquired in the east, and by which the revenues of the republic were raised from 50 to 85 millions of drachmæ. Pompey soon after united his interest with that of Cæsar and Crassus, and formed the first triumvirate, by solemnly swearing that their attachment should be mutual, their cause common, and their union permanent. The agreement was completed by the marriage of Pompey with Julia, the daughter of Cæsar, and the provinces of the republic were arbitrarily divided among the triumvirs. Pompey was allotted Africa and the two Spains, while Crassus repaired to Syria, to add Parthia to the empire of Rome, and Cæsar remained satisfied with the rest, and the continuation of his power as governor of Gaul for five additional years. But this powerful confederacy was soon broken; the sudden death of Julia, and the total defeat of Crassus in Syria, shattered the political bands which held the jarring interest of Cæsar and Pompey united. Pompey dreaded his father-in-law, and yet he affected to despise him; and by suffering anarchy to prevail in Rome, he convinced his fellow-citizens of the necessity of investing him with a dictatorial power. But while the conqueror of Mithridates was as a sovereign at Rome, the adherents of Cæsar were not silent. They demanded that either the consulship should be given to him, or that he should be continued in the government of Gaul. This just demand would perhaps have been granted, but Cato opposed it; and when Pompey sent for the two legions which he had lent to Cæsar, the breach became more wide, and a civil war inevitable. Cæsar was privately preparing to meet his enemies, while Pompey remained indolent, and gratified his pride in seeing all Italy celebrate his recovery from an indisposition by universal rejoicings. Cæsar was now near Rome; and Pompey, who had once boasted that he could raise legions to his assistance by stamping on the ground with his foot, fled from the city with precipitation, and retired to Brundusium with the consuls and part of the senators. His cause, indeed, was popular; he had been invested with discretionary power, the senate had entreated him to protect the republic against the usurpation and tyranny of Cæsar; and Cato, by embracing his cause, and appearing in his camp, seemed to indicate that he was the friend of the republic and the assertor of Roman liberty and independence. But when Cæsar had gained to his cause the western parts of the Roman empire, he crossed Italy and arrived in Greece, where Pompey had retired, supported by all the powers of the east, the wishes of the republican Romans, and by a numerous and well-disciplined army. In the plains of Pharsalia the two armies engaged. The cavalry of Pompey soon gave way, and the general retired to his camp, overwhelmed with grief and shame. But here there was no safety; the conqueror pushed on every side, and Pompey disguised himself, and fled to the sea-coast, whence he passed to Egypt, where he hoped to find a safe asylum, till better and more favourable moments returned, in the court of Ptolemy, a prince whom he had once protected and ensured on his throne. A boat was sent to fetch him on shore, and the Roman general left his galley, after an affectionate and tender parting with his wife Cornelia. The Egyptian sailors sat in sullen silence in the boat, and when Pompey disembarked, Achillas and Septimius assassinated him. His wife, who had followed him with her eyes to the shore, was a spectator of the bloody scene, and she hastened away from the bay of Alexandria, not to share his miserable fate. He died B. C. 48, in the 58th or 59th year of his age, the day after his birthday. His head was cut off and sent to Cæsar, who turned away from it with horror, and shed a flood of tears. The body was left for some time naked on the seashore, till the humanity of Philip, one of his freedmen, an old soldier who had once followed his standard to victory, raised a burning pile, and deposited his ashes under a mound of earth. Cæsar erected a monument on his remains; and the emperor Adrian, two centuries after, when he visited Egypt, ordered it to be repaired at his own expense, and paid particular honour to the memory of a great and good man. The character of Pompey is that of an intriguing and artful general; yet amidst all his dissimulation, we perceive many other striking features. Pompey was kind and clement to the conquered, and generous to his captives; and he buried, at his own expense, Mithridates, with all the pomp and the solemnity which the greatness of his power and the extent of his dominions seemed to claim. He lived with great temperance and moderation; and his house was small, and not ostentatiously furnished. He destroyed, with great prudence, the papers which were found in the camp of Sertorius, lest mischievous curiosity should find cause to accuse the innocent, and to meditate their destruction. With great disinterestedness he refused the presents which princes and monarchs offered to him, and he ordered them to be added to the public revenue. He might have seen a better fate, and terminated his days with more glory, if he had not acted with such imprudence when the flames of civil war were first kindled; and he reflected with remorse, after the battle of Pharsalia, upon his want of usual sagacity, and military prudence, in fighting at such a distance from the sea, and in leaving the fortified places of Dyrrachium to meet in the open plain an enemy, without provisions, without friends, and without resources. Pompey married four different times. His first matrimonial connexion was with Antistia, the daughter of the prætor Antistius, whom he divorced with great reluctance to marry Æmylia, the daughter-in-law of Sylla. Æmylia died in childbed; and Pompey's marriage with Julia, the daughter of Cæsar, was a step more of policy than affection. Yet Julia loved Pompey with great tenderness, and her death in childbed was the signal of war between her husband and father. He afterwards married Cornelia, the daughter of Martellus Scipio, a woman commended for her virtues, beauty, and accomplishments. Plut. in vitâ.—Flor. 4.—Paterc. 2, c. 29.—Dio. Cass.—Lucan.—Appian.—Cæs. Bell. Civ.—Cic. Orat. 68, ad Attic. 7, ep. 25, ad fam. 13, ep. 19.—Eutrop.——The two sons of Pompey the Great, called Cneus and Sextus, were masters of a powerful army when the death of their father was known. They prepared to oppose the conqueror, but Cæsar pursued them with his usual vigour and success, and at the battle of Munda they were defeated, and Cneius was left among the slain. Sextus fled to Sicily, where he for some time supported himself; but the murder of Cæsar gave rise to new events, and if Pompey had been as prudent and as sagacious as his father, he might have become, perhaps, as great and as formidable. He treated with the triumvirs as an equal, and when Augustus and Antony had the imprudence to trust themselves without arms and without attendants in his ship, Pompey, by following the advice of his friend Menas, who wished him to cut off the illustrious persons who were masters of the world, and now in his power, might have made himself as absolute as Cæsar; but he refused, and observed it was unbecoming the son of Pompey to act with such duplicity. This friendly meeting of Pompey with two of the triumvirs was not productive of advantages to him, he wished to have no superior, and hostilities began. Pompey was at the head of 350 ships, and appeared so formidable to his enemies, and so confident of success in himself, that he called himself the son of Neptune and the lord of the sea. He was, however, soon defeated in a naval engagement by Octavius and Lepidus; and of all his numerous fleet, only 17 sail accompanied his flight to Asia. Here for a moment he raised seditions, but Antony ordered him to be seized and put to death, about 35 years before the Christian era. Plut. in Anton., &c.—Paterc 2, c.55, &c.—Flor. 4, c. 2, &c.——Trogus. *Vid. Pompĭlia, a daughter of Numa Pompilius. She married Numa Martius, by whom she had Ancus Martius, the fourth king of Rome.

Pompōnia, the wife of Q. Cicero, sister to Pomponius Atticus. She punished with the greatest cruelty Philologus, the slave who had betrayed her husband to Antony, and she ordered him to cut his flesh by piecemeal, and afterwards to boil it and eat it in her presence.

Pompōnius, I. the father of Numa, advised his son to accept the regal dignity which e Roman ambassadors offered to him.——II. Flaccus, a man appointed governor of Mœsia and Syria by Tiberius, because he had continued drinking and eating with him for two days without intermission. Suet. in Theb. 42.——III. A tribune of the people in the time of Servilius Ahala, the consul.——IV. Mela. Vid. Mela.——V. A Roman, who accused Manlius the dictator of cruelty. He triumphed over Sardinia, of which he was made governor. He escaped from Rome and the tyranny of the triumvirs, by assuming the habit of a prætor, and by travelling with his servants disguised in the dress of lictors with their fasces.——VI. Secundus, an officer in Germany in the age of Nero. He was honoured with a triumph for a victory over the barbarians of Germany. He wrote some poems, greatly celebrated by the ancients for their beauty and elegance. They are lost.

Pontĭcus, a poet of Rome, contemporary with Propertius, by whom he is compared to Homer. He wrote an account of the Theban war in heroic verse. Propert. 1, el. 7.

Pontĭmus, I. a friend of Cicero.——II. A tribune of the people, who refused to rise up when Cæsar passed in triumphal procession. He was one of Cæsar's murderers, and was killed at the battle of Mutina. Sueton. in Cæsar. 78.—Cic. 10, ad fam.

Pontius Aufidianus, I. a Roman citizen, who, upon hearing that violence had been offered to his daughter, punished her and her ravisher with death. Val. Max. 6, c. 1.——II. Herennius, a general of the Samnites, who surrounded the Roman army under the consuls T. Veturius and P. Posthumius. As there was no possibility of escaping for the Romans, Pontius consulted his father what he could do with an army that were prisoners in his hands. The old man advised him either to let them go untouched, or put them all to the sword. Pontius rejected his father's advice, and spared the lives of the enemy, after he had obliged them to pass under the yoke, with the greatest ignominy. He was afterwards conquered, and obliged in his turn to pass under the yoke. Fabius Maximus defeated him, when he appeared again at the head of another army, and he was afterwards shamefully put to death by the Romans, after he had adorned the triumph of the conqueror. Liv. 9, c. 1, &c.

Popilius, (M.) I. a consul who was informed, as he was offering a sacrifice, that a sedition was raised in the city against the senate. Upon this he immediately went to the populace in his sacerdotal robes, and quieted the multitude with a speech. He lived about the year of Rome 404. Liv. 9, c. 21.—Val. Max. 7, c. 8.——II. Lænas, a Roman ambassador to Antiochus, king of Syria. He was commissioned to order the monarch to abstain from hostilities against Ptolemy, king of Egypt, who was an ally of Rome. Antiochus wished to evade him by his answers, but Popilius, with a stick which he had in his hand, made a circle round him on the sand, and bade him, in the name of the Roman senate and people, not to go beyond it before he spoke decisively. This boldness intimidated Antiochus; he withdrew his garrisons from Egypt, and no longer meditated a war against Ptolemy. Val. Max. 6, c. 4.—Liv. 45, c. 12—Paterc. 1. c. 10. ——III. A tribune of the people who murdered Cicero, to whose eloquence he was indebted for his life when he was accused of parricide. Plut.

Poppæa Sabīna, a celebrated Roman matron, daughter of Titus Ollius. She married a Roman knight called Rufus Crispinus, by whom she had a son. Her personal charms, and the elegance of her figure, captivated Otho, who was then one of Nero's favourites. He carried her away and married her; but Nero, who had seen her, and had often heard her accomplishments extolled, soon deprived him of her company, and sent him out of Italy on pretence of presiding over one of the Roman provinces. After he had taken this step, Nero repudiated his wife Octavia, on pretence of barrenness, and married Poppæa. She died of a blow which she received from his foot when many months advanced in her pregnancy, about the 65th year of the Christian era. Her funeral was performed with great pomp and solemnity, and statues were raised to her memory. It is said that she was so anxious to preserve her beauty and the elegance of her person, that 500 asses were kept on purpose to afford her milk, in which she used daily to bathe. Even in her banishment she was attended by 50 of these animals for the same purpose, and from their milk she invented a kind of ointment, or pomatum, to preserve beauty, called poppæanum from her. Plin. 11, c. 41.—Dio. 62.—Juv. 6.—Sueton. in Ner. & Oth.—Tacit. 13 and 14.

Porcia, a daughter of Cato of Utica, who married Bibulus, and, after his death, Brutus. She was remarkable for her prudence, philosophy, courage, and conjugal tenderness. She gave herself a heavy wound in the thigh, to see with what fortitude she could bear pain; and when her husband asked her the reason of it, she said that she wished to try whether she had courage enough to share not only his bed, but to partake of his most hidden secrets. Brutus was astonished at her constancy, and no longer detained from her knowledge the conspiracy which he and many other illustrious Romans had formed against J. Cæsar. Porcia wished them success, and though she betrayed fear, and fell into a swoon the day that her husband was gone to assassinate the dictator, yet she was faithful to her promise, and dropped nothing which might affect the situation of the conspirators. When Brutus was dead, she refused to survive him, and attempted to end her life as a daughter of Cato. Her friends attempted to terrify her; but when she saw that every weapon was removed from her reach, she swallowed burning coals, and died, about 42 years before the Christian era. Valerius Maximus says that she was acquainted with her husband's conspiracy against Cæsar when she gave herself the wound. Val. Max. 3, c. 2. l. 4, c. 6.—Plut. in Brut. &c.

Porcia Lex, de civitate, by M. Porcius the tribune, A. U. C. 453. It ordained that no magistrate should punish with death, or scourge with rods, a Roman citizen when condemned, but only permit him to go into exile. Sallust. in Cat.—Liv. 10.—Cic. pro Rab.

Porcina, a surname of the orator M. Æ. Lepidus, who lived a little before Cicero's age, and was distinguished for his abilities. Cic. ad Her. 4, c. 5.

Porcius Latro, (M.) I. a celebrated orator, who killed himself when labouring under a quartan ague, A. U. C. 750.——II. Licinius, a Latin poet, during the time of the third Punic war, commended for the elegance, the graceful ease, and happy wit of his epigrams.

Poredorax, one of the 40 Gauls whom Mithridates ordered to be put to death, and to remain unburied for conspiring against him. His mistress, at Pergamus, buried him against the orders of the monarch. Plut. de Vert. Mul.

Porphyrius, a Platonic philosopher of Tyre. He studied eloquence at Athens, under Longinus, and afterwards retired to Rome, where he perfected himself under Plotinus. He expressed his sentiments with elegance and dignity; and while other philosophers studied obscurity in their language, his style was remarkable for its simplicity and grace. The books that he wrote were numerous, and some of his smaller treatises are still extant. His much celebrated work, which is now lost, was against the religion of Christ; and in this theological contest he appeared so formidable, that most of the fathers of the church have been employed in confuting his arguments and developing the falsehood of his assertions. Porphyry resided for some time in Sicily, and died at the advanced age of 71, A. D. 304. The best edition of his life of Pythagoras is that of Kuster, 4to. Amst. 1707, that of his treatise De abstinentia, is De Rhoer. Traj. ad Rhen. 8vo. 1767, and that De Antro Nympharum is 8vo. Traj. ad Rhen. 1765.

Porsenna, or Porsĕna, a king of Etruria, who declared war against the Romans because they refused to restore Tarquin to his throne and to his royal privileges. He was at first successful, the Romans were defeated, and Porsenna would have entered the gates of Rome, had not Cocles stood at the head of a bridge and supported the fury of the whole Etrurian army, while his companions behind were cutting off the communication with the opposite shore. This act of bravery astonished Porsenna; but when he had seen Mutius Scævola enter his camp with an intention to murder him, and when he had seen him burn his hand without emotion, he made peace with the Romans, and never after supported the claims of Tarquin. The generosity of Porsenna's behaviour to the captives was admired by the Romans, and to reward his humanity, they raised a brazen statue to his honour. Liv. 2, c. 9, &c.—Plut. in Public.—Flor. 1, c. 10.—Horat. ep. 16.—Virg. Æn. 8, v. 646.

Portumnalia, festivals of Portumnus at Rome, celebrated on the 17th of August, in a very solemn and lugubrious manner, on the borders of the Tiber. Ovid. Fast. 6, v. 547.—Varro de L. L. 5, c. 3.

Porus, a king of India. When Alexander invaded Asia, he marched a large army to the banks of the Hydaspes. The stream of the river was rapid, but Alexander crossed it in the obscurity of the night, and defeated one of the sons of the Indian monarch. Porus himself renewed the battle, but the valour of the Macedonians prevailed, and the Indian prince retired, covered with wounds, on the back of one of his elephants. Alexander sent one of the kings of India to demand him to surrender, but Porus, killed the messenger, exclaiming, Is not this the voice of the wretch who has abandoned his country? and when he at last was prevailed upon to come before the conqueror, he approached him as an equal. Alexander demanded of him how he wished to be treated: Like a king, replied the Indian monarch. This magnanimous answer so pleased the Macedonian conqueror, that he not only restored him his dominions, but he increased the kingdom by the conquest of new provinces; and Porus, in acknowledgment of such generosity and benevolence, became one of the most faithful and attached friends of Alexander. Plut. in Alex.—Philostr. 2, c. 10.—Curt. 8, c. 8, &c.—Claud. Cons. Honor. 4.

Posides, a eunuch and freedman of the emperor Claudius, who rose to honours by the favour of his master. Juv. 14, v. 94.

Posidippus, the last poet of the new comedy, was a Macedonian, and born at Cassandria. He did not begin to exhibit till three years after Menander's death, B. C. 289. He attained great fame by the excellence of his dramatic compositions, of which he published upwards of fifty.

Posidonius, a philosopher of Apamea. He lived at Rhodes for some time, and afterwards came to Rome, where, after cultivating the friendship of Pompey and Cicero, he died in his 84th year. He wrote a treatise on the nature of the gods, and also attempted to measure the circumference of the earth; he accounted for the tides from the motion of the moon, and calculated the height of the atmosphere to be 400 stadia, nearly agreeing to the ideas of the moderns. Cic. Tusc. 5, c. 37.—Strab. 14.

Postumius Albinus, I. a man who suffered himself to be bribed by Jugurtha, against whom he had been sent with an army.——II. A writer at Rome whom Cato ridiculed for composing a history in Greek, and afterwards offering apologies for the inaccuracy and inelegance of his expressions.——III. Tubero, a master of horse to the dictator Æmilius Mamercus. He was himself made dictator in the war which the Romans waged against the Volsci, and he punished his son with death for fighting against his orders, A. U. C. 312. Liv. 4, c. 23.——IV. Spurius, a consul sent against the Samnites. He was taken in an ambush by Pontius, the enemy's general, and obliged to pass under the yoke with all his army. He saved his life by a shameful treaty, and when he returned to Rome, he persuaded the Romans not to reckon as valid the engagement he had made with the enemy, as it was without their advice. He was given up to the enemy because he could not perform his engagement; but he was released by Pontius for his generous and patriotic behaviour.——V. A general who defeated the Sabines, and who was the first who obtained an ovation.——VI. A general who conquered the Æqui, and who was stoned by the army because he refused to divide the promised spoils. Flor. 22.——VII. Lucius, a Roman consul, who was defeated by the Boii. He was left among the slain, and his head was cut off from his body, and carried in triumph by the barbarians into their temples, where they made with a scull a sacred vessel to offer libations to their gods.——VIII. Marcus Crassus Latianus, an officer proclaimed emperor in Gaul, A. D. 260. He reigned with great popularity, and gained the affection of his subjects by his humanity and moderation. He took his son of the same name as a colleague on the throne. They were both assasainated by their soldiers, after a reign of six years.——IX. Albus, a Roman decemvir, sent to Athens to collect the most salutary laws of Solon, &c. Liv. 3, c. 31.

Potheinus, a eunuch, tutor of Ptolemy, king of Egypt. He advised the monarch to murder Pompey, when he claimed his protection after the battle of Pharsalia. He stirred up commotions in Alexandria when Cæsar came there, upon which the conqueror ordered him to be put to death. Lucan. 8, v. 483, l. 10, v. 95.

Prætor, one of the chief magistrates at Rome. The office of prætor was first instituted A. U. C. 388, by the senators, who wished by some new honour to compensate for the loss of the consulship, of which the plebeians had claimed a share. The prætor received his name a præeundo. Only one was originally elected, and another A. U. C. 501. One of them was totally employed in administering justice among the citizens, whence he was called prætor urbanus; and the other appointed judge in all causes which related to foreigners. In the year of Rome 520, two more prætors were created to assist the consul in the government of the provinces of Sicily and Sardinia, which had been lately conquered, and two more when Spain was reduced into the form of a Roman province, A. U. C. 551. Sylla the dictator added two more, and Julius Cæsar increased the number to 10, and afterwards to 16, and the second triumvirate to 64. After this their numbers fluctuated, being sometimes 18, 16, or 12, till, in the decline of the empire, their dignity decreased, and their numbers were reduced to three. In his public capacity the prætor administered justice, protected the rights of widows and orphans, presided at the celebration of public festivals, and in the absence of the consul assembled or prorogued the senate as he pleased. He also exhibited shows to the people; and in the festivals of the Bona Dea, where no males were permitted to appear, his wife presided over the rest of the Roman matrons. Feasts were announced and proclaimed by him, and he had the power to make and repeal laws, if it met with the approbation of the senate and people. The quæstors were subject to him, and in the absence of the consuls, he appeared at the head of the armies, and in the city he kept a register of all the freedmen of Rome, with the reasons for which they had received their freedom. In the provinces the prætors appeared with great pomp, six lictors with the fasces walked before them; and when the empire was increased by conquests, they divided, like the consuls, their government, and provinces were given them by lot. When the year of their prætorship was elapsed, they were called proprætors if they still continued at the head of the province. At Rome the prætors appeared also with much pomp, two lictors preceded them, they wore the prætexta, or the white robe with purple borders; they sat in curule chairs; and their tribunal was distinguished by a sword and a spear while they administered justice. The tribunal was called prætorium. When they rode they appeared on white horses at Rome, as a mark of distinction. The prætor who appointed judges to try foreign causes, was called prætor peregrinus. The prætors Cereales, appointed by Julius Cæsar, were employed in providing corn and provisions for the city. They were on that account often called frumentarii.

Prætorius, a name ironically applied to A. Sempronius Rufus, because he was disappointed in his solicitations for the prætorship, as being too dissolute and luxurious in his manners He was the first who had a stork brought to his table. Horat. 2, Sat. 2, v. 50.

Pratinas, a Greek poet of Phlius, contemporary with Æschylus. He was the first among the Greeks who composed satires, which were represented as farces. Borrowing from tragedy its external form and mythological materials, Pratinas added a chorus of Satyrs, with their lively songs, gestures, and movements. This new composition was called the Satyric Drama. The novelty was exceedingly well timed. The innovations of Thespis and Phrynichus had banished the satyric chorus with its wild pranks and merriment, to the great displeasure of the commonalty; who retained a strong regret for their old amusement amidst the new and more refined exhibitions. The satyric drama gave them back under an improved form the favourite diversion of former times: and was received with such universal applause, that the tragic poets, in compliance with the humour of their auditors, deemed it advisable to combine this ludicrous exhibition with their graver pieces. One satyric drama was added to each tragic trilogy, as long as the custom of contending with a series of plays, and not with single pieces, continued. Æschylus, Sophocles, and Euripides were all distinguished satyric composers; and in the Cyclops of the latter we possess the only extant specimen of this singular composition.

Praxagoras, an Athenian writer, who published a history of the kings of his own country. He was then only 19 years old, and three years after, he wrote the life of Constantine the Great. He had also written the life of Alexander, all now lost.

Praxitēles, a famous sculptor of Magna Græcia, who flourished about 324 years before the Christian era. He chiefly worked on Parian marble, on account of its beautiful whiteness. The most famous of his pieces was a Cupid, which he gave to Phryne. This celebrated courtesan, who wished to have the best of all the statues of Praxiteles, and who could not depend upon her own judgment in the choice, alarmed the sculptor by telling him his house was on fire. Praxiteles upon this showed his eagerness to save his Cupid from the flames above all his other pieces; but Phryne restrained his fears, and by discovering her artifice, obtained the favourite statue. The sculptor employed his chisel in making a statue of this beautiful courtesan, which was dedicated in the temple of Delphi, and placed between the statues of Archidamus, king of Sparta, and Philip, king of Macedon. He also made a statue of Venus, at the request of the people of Cos, and gave them the choice of the goddess, either naked or veiled. The former was superior to the other in beauty and perfection, but the inhabitants of Cos preferred the latter. The Cnidians, who did not wish to patronise modesty and decorum with the same eagerness as the people of Cos, bought the naked Venus; and it was so universally esteemed, that Nicomedes, king of Bithynia, offered the Cnidians to pay an enormous debt, under which they laboured, if they would give him their favourite statue. This offer was not accepted. The famous Cupid was bought of the Thespians by Caius Cæsar, and carried to Rome; but Claudius restored it to them, and Nero afterwards obtained possession of it. Paus. 1, c. 40, l. 8, c. 9.—Plin. 7, c. 34 and 36.

Prexaspes, a Persian, who put Smerdis to death by order of king Cambyses. Herodot. 3, c. 30.

Priamus, the last king of Troy, was son of Laomedon, by Strymo, called Placia by some. When Hercules took the city of Troy (Vid. Laomedon) Priam was in the number of his prisoners, but his sister Hesione redeemed him from captivity, and he exchanged his original name of Podarces for that of Priam, which signifies bought or ransomed. Vid. Pordarces. He was also placed on his father's throne by Hercules, and he employed himself with well-directed diligence in repairing, fortifying, and embellishing the city of Troy. He had married, by his father's orders, Arisba, whom he divorced for Hecuba, the daughter of Dimas, or Cisseus, a neighbouring prince. He had by Hecuba, 17 children, according to Cicero, or according to Homer, 19; the most celebrated of whom are Hector, Paris, Deiphobus, Helenus, Troilus, Creusa, Polyxena, and Cassandra. Besides these he had many others by concubines. After he had reigned for some time in the greatest prosperity, Priam expressed a desire to recover his sister Hesione, whom Hercules had carried into Greece, and married to Telamon his friend. To carry this plan into execution, Priam manned a fleet, of which he gave the command to his son, Paris, with orders to bring back Hesione. Paris neglected in some measure his father's injunctions, and carried away Helen, the wife of Menelaus, king of Sparta, during the absence of her husband. Priam beheld this with satisfaction, and he countenanced his son by receiving in his palace the wife of the king of Sparta. This rape kindled the flames of war; Troy was soon besieged, and Priam had the misfortune to see the greatest part of his children massacred by the enemy. Some time after, Troy was betrayed into the hands of the Greeks by Antenor and Æneas, and Priam upon this resolved to die in the defence of his country. He put on his armour and advanced to meet the Greeks; but Hecuba, by her tears and entreaties, detained him near an altar of Jupiter, whither she had fled for protection. While Priam yielded to the prayers of his wife, Polites, one of his sons, fled also to the altar before Neoptolemus, who pursued him with fury. Polites, wounded and overcome, fell dead at the feet of his parents, and the aged father, fired with indignation, vented the most bitter invectives against the Greek, who paid no regard to the sanctity of altars and temples, and, raising his spear, darted it upon him. The spear, hurled by the feeble hand of Priam, touched the buckler of Neoptolemus and fell to the ground. This irritated the son of Achilles, he seized the gray hairs of Priam, and without compassion or reverence for the sanctity of the place, he plunged his dagger into his breast. His head was cut off, and the mutilated body was left among the heaps of slain. Dictys Cret. 1, &c.—Dares Phryg.—Herodot. 2, c. 120.—Paus. 10, c. 27.—*Homer. Priscus Servilius, (Vid. Tarquinius,) a governor of Syria, brother to the emperor Philip. He proclaimed himself emperor in Macedonia when he was informed of his brother's death, but he was soon after conquered and put to death by Decius, Philip's murderer.

Proba, I. the wife of the emperor Probus. ——II. A woman who opened the gates of Rome to the Goths.

Probus, I. (M. Aurelius Severus,) a native of Sirmium in Pannonia. His father was originally a gardener, who, by entering the army, rose to the rank of a military tribune. His son obtained the same office in the 22d year of his age, and he distinguished himself so much by his probity, his valour, his intrepidity, moderation and clemency, that, at the death of the emperor Tacitus, he was invested with the imperial purple by the voluntary and uninfluenced choice of his soldiers. His election was universally approved by the Roman senate and the people; and Probus, strengthened on his throne by the affection and attachment of his subjects, marched against the enemies of Rome in Gaul and Germany. Several battles were fought, and after he had left 400,000 barbarians dead in the field, Probus turned his arms against the Sarmatians. The same success attended him; and the military character of the emperor was so well established, that the king of Persia sued for peace by his ambassadors, and attempted to buy the conqueror's favours by the most splendid presents. Probus was then feasting upon the most common food when the ambassadors were introduced; but, without even casting his eyes upon them, he said, that if their master did not give proper satisfaction to the Romans, he would lay his territories desolate, and as naked as the crown of his head. As he spoke the emperor took off his cap, and showed the baldness of his head to the ambassadors. His conditions were gladly accepted by the Persian monarch, and Probus retired to Rome to convince his subjects of the greatness of his conquests, and to claim from them the applause which their ancestors had given to the conqueror of Macedonia, or the destroyer of Carthage, as he passed along the streets of Rome. He attempted to drain the waters which were stagnated in the neighbourhood of Sirmium, by conveying them to the sea by artificial canals. His armies were employed in this laborious undertaking; but as they were unaccustomed to such toils, they soon mutinied, and fell upon the emperor as he was passing into one of the towns of Illyricum. He fled into an iron tower, which he himself had built to observe the marshes, but as he was alone and without arms, he was soon overpowered and murdered in the 50th year of his age, after a reign of six years and four months, on the second of November, after Christ 282. The news of his death was received with the greatest consternation; not only his friends, but his very enemies deplored his fate: and even the army which had been concerned in his fall erected a monument over his body, and placed upon it this inscription:—Hic Probus imperator, vere probus, situs est, victor omnium gentium barbararum, victor etiam tyrannorum. He was then preparing in a few days to march against the Persians that had revolted, and his victories there might have been as great as those he obtained in the two other quarters of the globe. He was succeeded by Carus, and his family, who had shared his greatness, immediately retired from Rome, not to become objects either of private or public malice. Zos.—Prob.—Saturn.——II. Æmilius, a grammarian in the age of Theodosius. The lives of excellent commanders, written by Cornelius Nepos, have been falsely attributed to him by some authors.

Procles, a Carthaginian writer, son of Eucrates. He wrote some historical treatises, of which Pausanias has preserved some fragments. Paus. 4, c. 35.

Proclidæ, the descendants of Procles, who sat on the throne of Sparta together with the Eurysthenidæ. Vid. Lacedæmon and Eurysthenes.

Procopius, I. a celebrated officer of a noble family in Cilicia, related to the emperor Julian, with whom he lived in great intimacy. He was universally admired for his integrity, but he was not destitute of ambition or pride. After he had signalized himself under Julian and his successor, he retired from the Roman provinces among the barbarians in the Thracian Chersonesus, and some time after he suddenly made his appearance at Constantinople, when the emperor Valens had marched into the east, and he proclaimed himself master of the eastern empire. His usurpation was universally acknowledged, and his victories were so rapid, that Valens would have resigned the imperial purple had not his friends intervened. But now fortune changed, Procopius was defeated at Phrygia, and abandoned by his army. His head was cut off, and carried to Valentinian, in Gaul, A. D. 366. Procopius was slain in the 42d year of his age, and he had usurped the title of emperor for about eight months. Ammian. Marcel. 25 and 26.——II. A Greek historian of Cæsarea in Palestine, secretary to the celebrated Belisarius, A. D. 534. He wrote the history of the reign of Justinian, and greatly celebrated the hero, whose favours and patronage he enjoyed. This history is divided into eight books, two of which give an account of the Persian war, two of the Vandals, and four of the Goths, to the year 553, which was afterwards continued in five books by Agathias till 559. Of this performance the character is great, though perhaps the historian is often too severe on the emperor. The works of Procopius were edited in 2 vols. folio, Paris, 1662.

Procŭlēius, a Roman knight very intimate with Augustus. He is celebrated for his humanity and fraternal kindness to his brothers Muræna and Scipio, with whom he divided his possessions, after they had fortified their estates, and incurred the displeasure of Augustus for siding with young Pompey. He was sent by Augustus to Cleopatra, to endeavour to bring her alive into his presence, but to no purpose. He destroyed himself when labouring under a heavy disease. Horat. 2, od. 2.—Plut. in Anton.—Plin. 36, c. 24.

Procŭlus Julius, I. a Roman, who, after the death of Romulus, declared that he had seen him in his appearance more than human, and that he had ordered him to bid the Romans to offer him sacrifices under the name of Quirinus, and to rest assured that Rome was destined by the gods to become the capital of the world. Plut. in Rom.—Liv. 1, c. 16.——II. An African in the age of Aurelius. He published a book entitled de regionibus, or religionibus, on foreign countries, &c.——III. An officer who proclaimed himself emperor in Gaul, in the reign of Probus. He was soon after defeated, and exposed on a gibbet. He was very debauched and licentious in his manners, and had acquired riches by piratical excursions.

Procyon, a star near Sirius, or the dog-star, before which it generally rises in July. Cicero calls it Anticanis, which is of the same signification (προ κυνος.) Horat. 3, od. 29.—Cic. de Nat. D. 2, c. 44.

Prodicus, a sophist and rhetorician of Cos, about 396 years before Christ. He was sent as ambassador by his countrymen to Athens, where he publicly taught, and had among his pupils Euripides, Socrates, Theramenes, and Isocrates. He travelled from town to town in Greece, to procure admirers and get money. He made his auditors pay to hear him harangue, which has given occasion to some of the ancients to speak of the orations of Prodicus, for 50 drachms. In his writings, which were numerous, he composed a beautiful episode, in which virtue and pleasure were introduced as attempting to make Hercules one of their votaries. The hero at last yielded to the charms of virtue, and rejected pleasure. This has been imitated by Lucian. Prodicus was at last put to death by the Athenians, on pretence that he corrupted the morals of their youth. Xenophon. Memor.

Prœtus, a king of Argos, son of Abas and Ocalea. He was twin brother to Acrisius, with whom he quarrelled even before their birth. This dissention between the two brothers increased with their years. After their father's death, they both tried to obtain the kingdom of Argos; but the claims of Acrisius prevailed, and Prœtus left Peloponnesus, and retired to the court of Jobates, king of Lycia, where he married Stenobœa, called by some Antea or Antiope. He afterwards returned to Argolis, and by means of his father-in-law, he made himself master of Tirynthus. Stenobœa had accompanied her husband to Greece, and she became by him mother of the Prœtides, and of a son called Megapenthes, who, after his father's death, succeeded to the throne of Tirynthus. Homer. Il. 6, v. 160.—Apollod. 2, c. 2.

Promenæa, one of the priestesses of the temple of Dodona. It was from her that Herodotus received the tradition that two doves had flown from Thebes, in Egypt, one to Dodona, and the other to the temple of Jupiter Ammon, where they gave oracles. Herodot. 2, c. 55.

Pronŏmus, a Theban, who played so skilfully on the flute, that the invention of that musical instrument is attributed to him. Paus. 9, c. 12.—Athen. 14, c. 7.

Propertius, (Sextus Aurelius,) a Latin poet, born at Mevania in Umbria. His father was a Roman knight, whom Augustus proscribed because he had followed the interest of Antony. Mecænas, Gallus, and Virgil, became his friends, and Augustus his patron. Mecænas wished him to attempt an epic poem, of which he proposed the emperor for hero; but Propertius refused, observing that his abilities were unequal to the task. He died about 19 years before Christ, in the 40th year of his age. His works consist of four books of elegies, which are written with so much spirit, vivacity, and energy, that many authors call him the prince of the elegiac poets among the Latins. Cynthia, who is the heroine of all his elegies, was a Roman lady, whose real name was Hostia, or Hostilia, of whom the poet was deeply enamoured. Though Mevania is more generally supposed to be the place of his birth, yet four other cities in Umbria have disputed the honour of it; Hespillus, Ameria, Perusia, and Assisium. The best edition is that of Santenius, 4to. Traj. ad Rh. 1780, and when published together with Catullus and Tibullus, those of Grævius, 8vo. Utr. 1680, and of Vulpius, 4 vols. Patavii, 1737, 1749, 1755, and the edition of Barbou, 12mo. Paris, 1754. Ovid. Trist. 2, v. 465, l. 4, el. 10, v. 53, *de Art. Protagoras, a Greek philosopher of Abdera in Thrace, who was originally a porter. He became one of the disciples of Democritus, when that philosopher had seen him carrying fagots on his head, poised in a proper equilibrium. He soon rendered himself ridiculous by his doctrines, and in a book which he published he denied the existence of a Supreme Being. This book was publicly burnt at Athens, and the philosopher banished from the city. Protagoras visited, from Athens, different islands in the Mediterranean, and died in Sicily in a very advanced age, about 400 years before the Christian era. He generally reasoned by dilemmas, and always left the mind in suspense about all the questions which he proposed. Some suppose that he was drowned. Diog. 9.—Plut. in Protag.

Protogenes, a painter of Rhodes, who flourished about 328 years before Christ. He was originally so poor that he painted ships to maintain himself. His countrymen were ignorant of his ingenuity before Apelles came to Rhodes and offered to buy all his pieces. This opened the eyes of the Rhodians, they became sensible of the merit of their countryman, and liberally rewarded him. Protogenes was employed for seven years in finishing a picture of Jalysus, a celebrated huntsman, supposed to have been the son of Apollo and the founder of Rhodes. During all this time the painter lived only upon lupines and water, thinking that such aliment would leave him greater flights of fancy; but all this did not seem to make him more successful in the perfection of his picture. He was to represent in the piece a dog panting, and with froth at his mouth, but this he never could do with satisfaction to himself; and when all his labours seemed to be without success, he threw his sponge upon the piece in a fit of anger. Chance alone brought to perfection what the utmost labours of art could not do; the fall of the sponge upon the picture represented the froth of the mouth of the dog in the most perfect and natural manner, and the piece was universally admired. Protogenes was very exact in his representations, and copied nature with the greatest nicety, but this was blamed as a fault by his friend Apelles. When Demetrius besieged Rhodes, he refused to set fire to a part of the city which might have made him master of the whole, because he knew that Protogenes was then working in that quarter. When the town was taken, the painter was found closely employed in a garden in finishing a picture; and when the conqueror asked him why he showed not more concern in the general calamity, he replied that Demetrius made war against the Rhodians, and not against the fine arts. Paus. 1, c. 3.—Plin. 35, c. 10.—*Ælian. Prudentius, (Aurelius Clemens,) a Latin poet, who flourished A. D. 392, and was successively a soldier, an advocate, and a judge. His poems are numerous and all theological, devoid of the elegance and purity of the Augustan age, and yet greatly valued. The best editions are the Delphin, 4to. Paris, 1687; that of Cellarius, 12mo. Halæ, 1703; and that of Parma, 2 vols. 4to. 1788.

Prusias, surnamed Venator, who made an alliance with the Romans when they waged war with Antiochus, king of Syria. He gave a kind reception to Annibal, and by his advice he made war against Eumenes, king of Pergamus, and defeated him. Eumenes, who was an ally of Rome as well as Prusias, complained before the Romans of the hostilities of the king of Bithynia. Q. Flaminius was sent from Rome to settle the disputes of the two monarchs, and he was no sooner arrived in Bithynia, than Prusias, to gain his favour, prepared to deliver to him, at his request, the celebrated Carthaginian, to whom he was indebted for all the advantages he had obtained over Eumenes; but Annibal prevented it by a voluntary death. When, some time after, he visited the capital of Italy, he appeared in the habit of a manumitted slave, called himself the freedman of the Romans; and when he was introduced into the senate-house, he saluted the senators by the name of visible deities, of saviours, and deliverers. Such abject behaviour rendered him contemptible, not only in the eyes of the Romans, but of his subjects, and when he returned home, the Bithynians revolted, and placed his son Nicomedes on the throne. The banished monarch fled to Nicomedia, where he was assassinated near the altar of Jupiter, about 149 years before Christ. Polyb.—Liv.—Justin, 31, &c.—C. Nep. in Anib.—Plut. in Flam. &c.

Prytanes, certain magistrates at Athens, who presided over the senate, and had the privilege of assembling it when they pleased, festivals excepted. They generally met in a large hall, called prytaneum, where they gave audiences, offered sacrifices, and feasted together with all those who had rendered signal service to their country. The prytanes were elected from the senators, which were in number 500, fifty of which were chosen from each tribe. When they were elected, the names of the 10 tribes of Athens were thrown into one vessel, and into another were placed nine black beans and a white one. The tribe whose name was drawn with the white bean, presided the first, and the rest in the order in which they were drawn. They presided each for 35 days, as the year was divided into 10 parts; but it is unknown what tribe presided the rest of those days which were supernumerary. When the number of tribes was increased to 12, each of the prytanes presided one full month.——Some of the principal magistrates of Corinth were also called prytanes.

Psammenitus, succeeded his father Amasis on the throne of Egypt. Cambyses made war against him. Psammenitus was twice beaten, at Pelusium and in Memphis, and became one of the prisoners of Cambyses, who treated him with great humanity. Psammenitus, however, raised seditions against the Persian monarch; and attempted to make the Egyptians rebel, for which he was put to death by drinking bull's blood. He had reigned about six months. He flourished about 525 years before the Christian era. Herodot. 3, c. 10, &c.

Psammetichus, a king of Egypt. He was one of the 12 princes who shared the kingdom among themselves; but as he was more popular than the rest, he was banished from his dominions, and retired into the marshes near the seashore. A descent of some of the Greeks upon Egypt proved favourable to his cause; he joined the enemy, and defeated the 11 princes who had expelled him from the country. He rewarded the Greeks by whose valour he had recovered Egypt; he allotted them some territory on the seacoast, patronised the liberal arts, and encouraged commerce among his subjects. He made useless inquiries to find the sources of the Nile; and he stopped, by bribes and money, a large army of Scythians that were marching against him. He died 617 years before the Christian era, and was buried in Minerva's temple at Sais. During his reign there was a contention among some of the neighbouring nations about the antiquity of their language. Psammetichus took a part in the contest. He confined two young children, and fed them with milk; the shepherd to whose care they were intrusted, was ordered never to speak to them, but to watch diligently their articulations. After some time the shepherd observed, that whenever he entered the place of their confinement they repeatedly exclaimed Beccos, and he gave information of this to the monarch. Psammetichus made inquiries, and found that the word Beccos signified bread in the Phœnician language, and from that circumstance, therefore, it was universally concluded that the language of Phœnicia was of the greatest antiquity. Herodot. 2, c. 28, &c.—Polyæn. 8.—Strab. 16.

Ptolemæus I. surnamed Lagus, a king of Egypt, son of Arsinoe, who, when pregnant by Philip of Macedonia, married Lagus, a man of mean extraction. Vid. Lagus. Ptolemy was educated in the court of the king of Macedonia; he became one of the friends and associates of Alexander, and when that monarch invaded Asia, the son of Arsinoe attended him as one of his generals. During the expedition, he behaved with uncommon valour; he killed one of the Indian monarchs in single combat, and it was to his prudence and courage that Alexander was indebted for the reduction of the rock Aornus. After the conqueror's death, in the general division of the Macedonian empire, Ptolemy obtained as his share the government of Egypt, with Libia, and part of the neighbouring territories of Arabia. He made himself master of Cœlosyria, Phœnicia, and the neighbouring coast of Syria; and when he had reduced Jerusalem, he carried above 100,000 prisoners to Egypt, to people the extensive city of Alexandria, which became the capital of his dominions. After he had rendered these prisoners the most attached and faithful of his subjects, by his liberality and the grant of privileges, Ptolemy assumed the title of king of Egypt, and soon after reduced Cyprus under his power. He made war with success against Demetrius and Antigonus, who disputed his right to the provinces of Syria; and from the assistance he gave to the people of Rhodes against their common enemies, he received the name of Soter. The bay of Alexandria being dangerous of access, he built a tower to conduct the sailors in the obscurity of the night; (Vid. Pharos,) and that his subjects might be acquainted with literature, he laid the foundation of a library, which, under the succeeding reigns, became the most celebrated in the world. He also established in the capital of his dominions a society called museum, of which the members, maintained at the public expense, were employed in philosophical researches, and in the advancement of science and the liberal arts. Ptolemy died in the 84th year of his age, after a reign of 39 years, about 284 years before Christ. He was succeeded by his son Ptolemy Philadelphus, who had been his partner on the throne the last ten years of his reign. Ptolemy Lagus has been commended for his abilities, not only as a sovereign, but as a writer; and among the many valuable compositions which have been lost, we are to lament a history of Alexander the Great, by the king of Egypt, greatly admired and valued for elegance and authenticity. All his successors were called Ptolemies from him. Paus. 10, c. 8.—Justin. 13, &c.—Polyb. 2.—Arrian.—Curt.—Plut. in Alex.——The 2d son of Ptolemy the first, succeeded his father on the Egyptian throne, and was called Philadelphus by Antiphrasis, because he killed two of his brothers. He showed himself worthy in every respect to succeed his great father, and, conscious of the advantages which arise from an alliance with powerful nations, he sent ambassadors to Italy to solicit the friendship of the Romans, whose name had become universally known for the victories which they had just obtained over Pyrrhus and the Tarentines. But while Ptolemy strengthened himself by alliances with foreign powers, the internal peace of his kingdom was disturbed by the revolt of Magas, his brother, king of Cyrene. The sedition, however, was stopped, though kindled by Antiochus, king of Syria, and the death of the rebellious prince re-established peace for some time in the family of Philadelphus. Antiochus, the Syrian king, married Berenice the daughter of Ptolemy, and the father, though old and infirm, conducted his daughter to her husband's kingdom, and assisted at the nuptials. Philadelphus died in the 64th year of his age, 246 years before the Christian era. He left two sons and a daughter, by Arsinoe the daughter of Lysimachus. He had afterwards married his sister Arsinoe, whom he loved with uncommon tenderness, and to whose memory he began to erect a celebrated monument. Vid. Dinocrates. The inhabitants of the adjacent countries were allured by promises and presents to increase the number of the Egyptian subjects, and Ptolemy could boast of reigning over 33,339 well-peopled cities. He gave every possible encouragement to commerce, and by keeping two powerful fleets, one in the Mediterranean and the other in the Red Sea, he made Egypt the mart of the world. His army consisted of 200,000 foot, 40,000 horse, besides 300 elephants and 2000 armed chariots. With justice, therefore, he has been called the richest of all the princes and monarchs of his age; and, indeed, the remark is not false when it is observed, that at his death he left in his treasury 750,000 Egyptian talents, a sum equivalent to two hundred millions sterling. His palace was the asylum of learned men, whom he admired and patronised. He paid particular attention to Euclid, Theocritus, Callimachus, and Lycophron; and by increasing the library which his father had founded, he showed his taste for learning and his wish to encourage genius. This celebrated library at his death contained 200,000 volumes of the best and choicest books, and it was afterwards increased to 700,000 volumes. Part of it was burnt by the flames of Cæsar's fleet when he set it on fire to save himself, a circumstance, however, not mentioned by the general, and the whole was again magnificently repaired by Cleopatra, who added to the Egyptian library that of the kings of Pergamus. It is said that the Old Testament was translated into Greek during his reign, a translation which has been called Septuagint, because translated by the labours of 70 different persons. Eutr.—Justin. 17, c. 2, &c.—Liv.—Plut.—Theocrit.—Athen. 12.—Plin. 13, c. 12.—Dio. 42.—Gellius. 6, c. 17.——The 3d, succeeded his father Philadelphus on the Egyptian throne. He early engaged in a war against Antiochus Theus, for his unkindness to Berenice the Egyptian king's sister, whom he had married with the consent of Philadelphus. With the most rapid success he conquered Syria and Silicia, and advanced as far as the Tigris; but a sedition at home stopped his progress, and he returned to Egypt loaded with the spoils of conquered nations. Among the immense riches which he brought, he had above 2500 statues of the Egyptian gods, which Cambyses had carried away into Persia, when he conquered Egypt. These were restored to the temples, and the Egyptians called their sovereign Evergetes, in acknowledgment of his attention, beneficence, and religious zeal for the gods of his country. The last years of Ptolemy's reign were passed in peace, if we except the refusal of the Jews to pay the tribute of 20 silver talents which their ancestors had always paid to the Egyptian monarchs. He also interested himself in the affairs of Greece, and assisted Cleomenes, the Spartan king, against the leaders of the Achæan league; but he had the mortification to see his ally defeated, and even a fugitive in Egypt. Evergetes died 221 years before Christ, after a reign of 25 years, and, like his two illustrious predecessors, he was the patron of learning; and indeed he is the last of the Lagides who gained popularity among his subjects by clemency, moderation, and humanity, and who commanded respect, even from his enemies, by valour, prudence, and reputation. It is said that he deposited 15 talents in the hands of the Athenians to be permitted to translate the original manuscripts of Æschylus, Euripides, and Sophocles. Plut. in Cleom. &c.—Polyb. 2.—Justin. 29, &c.——The fourth succeeded his father Evergetes on the throne of Egypt, and received the surname of Philopater by antiphrasis, because, according to some historians, he destroyed his father by poison. He began his reign with acts of the greatest cruelty, and he successively sacrificed to his avarice his own mother, his wife, his sister, and his brother. He received the name of Typhon, from his extravagance and debauchery, and that of Gallus, because he appeared in the streets of Alexandria like one of the bacchanals, and with all the gestures of the priests of Cybele. In the midst of his pleasures Philopater was called to war against Antiochus, king of Syria, and at the head of a powerful army he soon invaded his enemy's territories, and might have added the kingdom of Syria to Egypt, if he had made a prudent use of the victories which attended his arms. In his return he visited Jerusalem, but the Jews prevented him forcibly from entering their temple, for which insolenee to his majesty the monarch determined to extirpate the whole nation. He ordered an immense number of Jews to be exposed in a plain, and trodden under the feet of elephants; but by a supernatural instinct, the generous animals turned their fury not on those that had been devoted to death, but upon the Egyptian spectators. This circumstance terrified Philopater, and he behaved with more than common kindness to a nation which he had so lately devoted to destruction. In the latter part of his reign, the Romans, whom a dangerous war with Carthage had weakened, but at the same time roused to superior activity, renewed, for political reasons, the treaty of alliance which had been made with the Egyptian monarchs. Philopater, at last, weakened and enervated by intemperance and continual debauchery, died in the 37th year of his age, after a reign of 17 years, 204 years before the Christian era. His death was immediately followed by the murder of the companions of his voluptuousness and extravagance, and their carcasses were dragged with the greatest ignominy through the streets of Alexandria. Polyb.—Justin. 30, &c.—Plut. in Cleom.——The 5th, succeeded his father Philopater as king of Egypt, though only in the 4th year of his age. During the years of his minority he was under the protection of Sosicius and of Aristomenes, by whose prudent administration Antiochus was dispossessed of the provinces of Cœlosyria and Palestine, which he had conquered by war. The Romans also renewed their alliance with him after their victories over Annibal and the conclusion of the second Punic war. This flattering embassy induced Aristomenes to offer the care of the patronage of the young monarch to the Romans, but the regent was confirmed in his honourable office; and by making a treaty of alliance with the people of Achaia, he convinced the Egyptians that he was qualified to wield the sceptre and to govern the nation. But now that Ptolemy had reached his 14th year, according to the laws and customs of Egypt, the years of his minority had expired. He received the surname of Epiphanes, or illustrious, and was crowned at Alexandria with the greatest solemnity. Young Ptolemy was no sooner delivered from the shackles of a superior, than he betrayed the same vices which had characterized his father; the counsels of Aristomenes were despised; and the minister, who for ten years had governed the kingdom with equity and moderation, was sacrificed to the caprice of the sovereign, who abhorred him for the salutary advice which his own vicious inclinations did not permit him to follow. In the midst of his extravagance, Epiphanes did not forget his alliance with the Romans; above all others he showed himself eager to cultivate friendship with a nation from which he could derive so many advantages, and during their war against Antiochus, he offered to assist them with money against a monarch, whose daughter Cleopatra he had married, but whom he hated on account of the seditions he raised in the very heart of Egypt. After a reign of 24 years, 180 years before Christ, Ptolemy was poisoned by his ministers, whom he had threatened to rob of their possessions, to carry on a war against Seleucus, king of Syria. Liv. 35, c. 13, &c.—Justin. &c.—— The 6th, succeeded his father Epiphanes on the Egyptian throne, and received the surname of Philometor, on account of his hatred against his mother Cleopatra. He was in the 6th year of his age when he ascended the throne, and during his minority the kingdom was governed by his mother, and at her death by a eunuch who was one of his favourites. He made war against Antiochus Epiphanes, king of Syria, to recover the provinces of Palestine and Cœlosyria, which were part of the Egyptian dominions, and after several successes he fell into the hands of the enemy, who retained him in confinement. During the captivity of Philometer, the Egyptians raised to the throne his younger brother, Ptolemy Evergetes, or Physcon, also son of Epiphanes; but he was no sooner established in his power than Antiochus turned his arms against Egypt, drove the usurper, and restored Philometor to all his rights and privileges as king of Egypt. This artful behaviour of Antiochus was soon comprehended by Philometer, and when he saw that Pelusium, the key of Egypt, had remained in the hands of his Syrian ally, he recalled his brother Physcon, and made him partner on the throne, and concerted with him how to repel their common enemy. This union of interest in the two royal brothers incensed Antiochus; he entered Egypt with a large army, but the Romans checked his progress and obliged him to retire. No sooner were they delivered from the impending war, when Philometor and Physcon, whom the fear of danger had united, began with mutual jealousy to oppose each other's views. Physcon was at last banished by the superior power of his brother, and as he could find no support in Egypt, he immediately repaired to Rome. To excite more effectually the compassion of the Romans, and to gain their assistance, he appeared in the meanest dress, and took his residence in the most obscure corner of the city. He received an audience from the senate, and the Romans settled the dispute between the two royal brothers, by making them independent of one another, and giving the government of Libya and Cyrene to Physcon, and confirming Philometor in the possession of Egypt and the island of Cyprus. These terms of accommodation were gladly accepted, but Physcon soon claimed the dominion of Cyprus, and in this he was supported by the Romans, who wished to aggrandize themselves by the diminution of the Egyptian power. Philometor refused to deliver up the island of Cyprus, and to call away his brother's attention, he fomented the seeds of rebellion in Cyrene. But the death of Philometor, 145 years before the Christian era, left Physcon master of Egypt and all the dependant provinces. Philometor has been commended by some historians for his clemency and moderation. Diod.—Liv.—Polyb.——The 7th Ptolemy, surnamed Physcon, ascended the throne of Egypt after the death of his brother Philometor; and as he had reigned for some time conjointly with him, (Vid Ptolemæus 6th,) his succession was approved, though the wife and the son of the deceased monarch laid claim to the crown. Cleopatra was supported in her claims by the Jews, and it was at last agreed that Physcon should marry the queen, and that her son should succeed on the throne at his death. The nuptials were accordingly celebrated, but on that very day the tyrant murdered Cleopatra's son in her arms. He ordered himself to be called Evergetes, but the Alexandrians refused to do it, and stigmatized him with the appellation of Kakergetes, or evil-doer, a surname which he deserved by his tyranny and oppression. A series of barbarity rendered him odious, but as no one attempted to rid Egypt of her tyranny, the Alexandrians abandoned their habitations, and fled from a place which continually streamed with the blood of their massacred fellow-citizens. The king at last, disgusted with Cleopatra, repudiated her, and married her daughter, by Philometor, called also Cleopatra. He still continued to exercise the greatest cruelty upon his subjects, but the prudence and vigilance of his ministers kept the people in tranquillity, till all Egypt revolted when the king had basely murdered all the young men of Alexandria. Without friends or support in Egypt he fled to Cyprus, and Cleopatra, the divorced queen, ascended the throne. In his banishment Physcon dreaded lest the Alexandrians should also place the crown on the head of his son by his sister Cleopatra, who was then governor of Cyrene, and under these apprehensions he sent for the young prince, called Memphitis to Cyprus, and murdered him as soon as he had reached the shore. To make the barbarity more complete, he sent the limbs of Memphitis to Cleopatra, and they were received as the queen was going to celebrate her birthday. Soon after this he invaded Egypt with an army, and obtained a victory over the forces of Cleopatra, who, being left without friends or assistance, fled to her eldest daughter Cleopatra, who had married Demetrius king of Syria. This decisive blow restored Physcon to his throne, where he continued to reign for some time, hated by his subjects and feared by his enemies. He died at Alexandria in the 67th year of his age, after a reign of 29 years, about 116 years before Christ. Some authors have extolled Physcon for his fondness for literature; they have observed, that from his extensive knowledge he was called the philologist, and that he wrote a comment upon Homer, besides a history in 24 books, admired for its elegance, and often quoted by succeeding authors whose pen was employed on the same subject. Diod.—Justin. 38, &c.—Athen. 2.—Porphyr.——The 8th, surnamed Lathyrus, from an excrescence like a pea on the nose, succeeded his father Physcon as king of Egypt. He had no sooner ascended the throne, than his mother Cleopatra, who reigned conjointly with him, expelled him to Cyprus, and placed the crown on the head of his brother Ptolemy Alexander, her favourite son. Lathyrus, banished from Egypt, became king of Cyprus, and soon after he appeared at the head of a large army, to make war against Alexander Jannæus, king of Judæa, through whose assistance and intrigue he had been expelled by Cleopatra. The Jewish monarch was conquered, and 50,000 of his men were left on the field of battle. Lathyrus, after he had exercised the greatest cruelty upon the Jews, and made vain attempts to recover the kingdom of Egypt, retired to Cyprus till the death of his brother Alexander restored him to his native dominions. Some of the cities of Egypt refused to acknowledge him as their sovereign, and Thebes, for its obstinacy, was closely besieged for three successive years, and from a powerful and populous city it was reduced to ruins. In the latter part of his reign, Lathyrus was called upon to assist the Romans with a navy for the conquest of Athens, but Lucullus, who had been sent to obtain the supply, though received with kingly honours, was dismissed with evasive and unsatisfactory answers, and the monarch refused to part with troops which he deemed necessary to preserve the peace of his kingdom. Lathyrus died 81 years before the Christian era, after a reign of 36 years since the death of his father Physcon, eleven of which he had passed with his mother Cleopatra on the Egyptian throne, eighteen in Cyprus, and seven after his mother's death. He was succeeded by his only daughter, Cleopatra, whom Alexander, the son of Ptolemy Alexander, by means of the dictator Sylla, soon after married and murdered. Joseph. Hist.—Justin. 39.—Plut. in Luc.—Appian. in Milhrid.——The 9th. Vid. Alexander Ptolemy 1st; for the 10th Ptolemy, vid. Alexander Ptolemy 2d; for the 11th, vid. Alexander Ptolemy 3d.——The 12th, the illegitimate son of Lathyrus, ascended the throne of Egypt at the death of Alexander 3d. He received the surname of Auletes, because he played skilfully on the flute. His rise showed great marks of prudence and circumspection; and as his predecessor by his will had left the kingdom of Egypt to the Romans, Auletes knew that he could not be firmly established on his throne without the approbation of the Roman senate. He was successful in his applications, and Cæsar, who was then consul, and in want of money, established his succession, and granted him the alliance of the Romans, after he had received the enormous sum of about a million and 162,500*l* sterling. But these measures rendered him unpopular at home, and when he had suffered the Romans quietly to take possession of Cyprus, the Egyptians revolted, and Auletes was obliged to fly from his kingdom, and seek protection among the most powerful of his allies. His complaints were heard at Rome, at first with indifference, and the murder of 100 noblemen of Alexandria, whom the Egyptians had sent to justify their proceedings before the Roman senate, rendered him unpopular and suspected. Pompey, however, supported his cause, and the senators decreed to re-establish Auletes on his throne; but as they proceeded slowly in the execution of their plans, the monarch retired from Rome to Ephesus, where he lay concealed for some time in the temple of Diana. During his absence from Alexandria, his daughter Berenice had made herself absolute, and established herself on the throne by a marriage with Archelaus, a priest of Bellona's temple at Comana, but she was soon driven from Egypt when Gabinius, at the head of a Roman army, approached to replace Auletes on his throne. Auletes was no sooner restored to power than he sacrificed to his ambition his daughter Berenice, and behaved with the greatest ingratitude and perfidy to Rabirius, a Roman, who had supplied him with money when expelled from his kingdom. Auletes died four years after his restoration, about 51 years before the Christian era. He left two sons and two daughters, and by his will ordered the eldest of his sons to marry the eldest of his sisters, and to ascend with her the vacant throne. As these children were young, the dying monarch recommended them to the protection and paternal care of the Romans, and accordingly Pompey the Great was appointed by the senate to be their patron and their guardian. Their reign was as turbulent as that of their predecessors; and it is remarkable for no uncommon events; only we may observe that the young queen was the Cleopatra who soon after became so celebrated as being the mistress of J. Cæsar, the wife of M. Antony, and the last of the Egyptian monarchs of the family of Lagus. Cic. pro Rabir.—Strab. 17.—Dion. 39.—Appian. de Civ.——The 13th, surnamed Dionysius or Bacchus ascended the throne of Egypt conjointly with his sister Cleopatra, whom he had married according to the directions of his father Auletes. He was under the care and protection of Pompey the Great, (Vid. Ptolemæus 12th,) but the wickedness and avarice of his ministers soon obliged him to reign independent. He was then in the 13th year of his age, when his guardian, after the fatal battle of Pharsalia, came to the shores of Egypt and claimed his protection. He refused to grant the required assistance, and by the advice of his ministers, he basely murdered Pompey after he had brought him to shore under the mask of friendship and cordiality. To curry the favour of the conqueror of Pharsalia, Ptolemy cut off the head of Pompey, but Cæsar turned with indignation from such perfidy, and when he arrived at Alexandria he found the king of Egypt as faithless to his cause as that of his fallen enemy. Cæsar sat as judge to hear the various claims of the brother and sister to his throne; and, to satisfy the people, he ordered the will of Auletes to be read, and confirmed Ptolemy and Cleopatra in the possession of Egypt, and appointed the two younger children masters of the island of Cyprus. This fair and candid decision might have left no room for dissatisfaction, but Ptolemy was governed by cruel and avaricious ministers, and therefore he refused to acknowledge Cæsar as a judge or mediator. The Roman enforced his authority by arms, and three victories were obtained over the Egyptian forces. Ptolemy, who had been for some time a prisoner in the hands of Cæsar, now headed his armies, but a defeat was fatal, and as he attempted to save his life by flight, he was drowned in the Nile, about 48 years before Christ, and three years and eight months after the death of Auletes. Cleopatra, at the death of her brother, became sole mistress of Egypt; but as the Egyptians were no friends to female government, Cæsar obliged her to marry her younger brother Ptolemy, who was then in the eleventh year of his age. Appian. Civ.—Cæs. in Alex.—Strab. 17.—Joseph. Ant.—Dio.—Plut. in Ant. &c.——Sueton. in Cæs.——Apion, king of Cyrene, was the illegitimate son of Ptolemy Physcon. The Romans presented his subjects with their independence. Liv. 70.——Ceraunus, a son of Ptolemy Soter, by Eurydice, the daughter of Antipater. Unable to succeed to the throne of Egypt, Ceraunus fled to the court of Seleucus where he was received with friendly marks of attention. Seleucus was then king of Macedonia, an empire which he had lately acquired by the death of Lysimachus, in a battle in Phrygia; but his reign was short, and Ceraunus perfidiously murdered him and ascended his throne, 280 B. C. The murderer, however, could not be firmly established in Macedonia as long as Arsinoe, the widow, and the children of Lysimachus were alive, and entitled to claim his kingdom as the lawful possession of their father. To remove these obstacles Ceraunus made offers of marriage to Arsinoe, who was his own sister. The queen at first refused, but the protestations and solemn promises of the usurper at last prevailed upon her to consent. The nuptials, however, were no sooner celebrated, than Ceraunus murdered the two young princes, and confirmed his usurpation by rapine and cruelty. But now three powerful princes claimed the kingdom of Macedonia as their own, Antiochus, the son of Seleucus; Antigonus, the son of Demetrius; and Pyrrhus the king of Epirus. These enemies, however, were soon removed; Ceraunus conquered Antigonus in the field of battle, and stopped the hostilities of his other two rivals by promises and money. He did not long remain inactive, a barbarian army of Gauls claimed a tribute from him, and the monarch immediately marched to meet them in the field. The battle was long and bloody. The Macedonians might have obtained the victory if Ceraunus had shown more prudence. He was thrown down from his elephant, and taken prisoner by the enemy, who immediately tore his body to pieces. Ptolemy had been king of Macedonia only 18 months. Justin. 24, &c. Paus. 10, c. 10.——An illegitimate son of Ptolemy Lathyrus, king of Cyprus, of which he was tyrannically dispossessed by the Romans. This offer was rejected with the indignation which it merited, and the monarch poisoned himself at the approach of the enemy. He was a native of Alexandria, or, according to others, of Pelusium, and on account of his great learning, he received the name of the most wise and most divine among the Greeks. In his system of the world, he places the earth in the centre of the universe, a doctrine universally believed and adopted till the 16th century, when it was confuted and rejected by Copernicus. His geography is valued for its learning, and the very useful information which it gives. Besides his system and his geography, Ptolemy wrote other books, in one of which he gives an account of the fixed stars; of 1022 of which he gives the certain and definite longitude and latitude. The best edition of Ptolemy's geography is that of Bertius, fol. Amst. 1618, and that of his treatise de Judiciis Astrologicis, by Camerar, 4to. 1535, and of the Harmonica, 4to. Wallis, Oxon. 1683.

Publilia Lex, was made by Publilius Philo, the dictator, A. U. C. 445. It permitted one of the censors to be elected from the plebeians, since one of the consuls were chosen from that body. Liv. 8, c. 12.——Another, by which it was ordained that all laws should be previously approved by the senators before they were proposed by the people.

Publius Syrus, a Syrian mimic poet, who flourished about 44 years before Christ. This celebrated Mime was brought from Asia to Italy in early youth, in the same vessel with his countryman and kinsman, Manlius Antiochus, the professor of astrology, and Staberius Eros, the grammarian, who all, by some desert in learning, rose above their original fortune. He received a good education and liberty from his master, in reward for his witticisms and facetious disposition. He first represented his Mimes in the provincial towns of Italy, whence, his fame having spread to Rome, he was summoned to the capital, to assist in those public spectacles which Cæsar afforded his countrymen, in exchange for their freedom. On one occasion, he challenged all persons of his own profession to contend with him on the stage; and in this competition he successively overcame every one of his rivals. By his success in the representation of their popular entertainments, he amassed considerable wealth, and lived with such luxury, that he never gave a great supper without having sow's udder at the table—a dish which was prohibited by the censors, as being too great a luxury even for the table of patricians. Nothing farther is known of his history, except that he was still continuing to perform his Mimes with applause at the period of the death of Laberius. We have not the names of any of the Mimes of Publius; nor do we precisely know their nature or subject,—all that is preserved from them being a number of detached sentiments or maxims to the number of 800 or 900, seldom exceeding a single line, but containing reflections of unrivalled force, truth, and beauty, on all the various relations, situations, and feelings of human life—friendship, love, fortune, pride, adversity, avarice, generosity. Both the writers and actors of Mimes were probably careful to have their memory stored with commonplaces and precepts of morality, in order to introduce them appropriately in their extemporaneous performances. The maxims of Publius were interspersed through his dramas, but being the only portion of those productions now remaining, they have just the appearance of thoughts or sentiments, like those of Rochefoucauld. His Mimes must either have been very numerous, or very thickly loaded with those moral aphorisms. It is also surprising that they seem raised far above the ordinary tone even of regular comedy, and appear for the greater part to be almost lyrical maxims. Seneca has remarked that many of his eloquent verses are fitter for the buskin than the slipper. How such exalted precepts should have been grafted on the lowest farce, and how passages, which would hardly be appropriated in the most serious sentimental comedy, were adapted to the actions or manners of gross and drunken buffoons, is a difficulty which could only be solved had we fortunately received entire a larger portion of these productions, which seem to have been peculiar to Roman genius. The sentiments of Publius Syrus now appear trite. They have become familiar to mankind, and have been re-echoed by poets and moralists from age to age. All of them are most felicitously expressed, and few of them seem erroneous, while at the same time they are perfectly free from the selfish or worldly-minded wisdom of Rochefoucauld, or Lord Burleigh. It would be endless to quote the lines of the different Latin poets, particularly Horace and Juvenal, which are nearly copied from the maxims of Publius Syrus. Seneca, too, has availed himself of many of his reflections, and, at the same time, does full justice to the author from whom he has borrowed. Publius, says he, is superior in genius both to tragic and comic writers: whenever he gives up the follies of the Mimes, and that language which is directed to the crowd, he writes many things not only above that species of composition, but worthy of the tragic buskin.

Publius, a prænomen common among the Romans.——Caius, a man who conspired with Brutus against J. Cæsar.——A prætor who conquered Palæpolis. He was only a plebeian, and, although neither consul nor dictator, he obtained a triumph in spite of the opposition of the senators. He was the first who was honoured with a triumph during a prætorship.

Pulchĕria, I. a daughter of the emperor Theodosius the Great, famous for her piety, moderation, and virtues.——II. A daughter of Arcadius, who held the government of the Roman empire for many years. She was mother of Valentinian. Her piety, and her private as well as public virtues, have been universally admired. She died A. D. 452, and was interred at Ravenna, where her tomb is still to be seen.

Punĭcum Bellum. The first Punic war was undertaken by the Romans against Carthage, B. C. 264. For upwards of 240 years, the two nations had beheld with secret jealousy each other's power, but they had totally eradicated every cause of contention, by settling, in three different treaties, the boundaries of their respective territories, the number of their allies, and how far one nation might sail into the Mediterranean without giving offence to the other. Sicily was the seat of the first dissentions. The Mamertini, a body of Italian mercenaries, were appointed by the king of Syracuse to guard the town of Messana; but this tumultuous tribe, instead of protecting the citizens, basely massacred them, and seized their possessions. This act of cruelty raised the indignation of all the Sicilians, and Hiero, king of Syracuse, who had employed them, prepared to punish their perfidy; and the Mamertini, besieged in Messana, and without friends or resources, resolved to throw themselves for protection into the hands of the first power that could relieve them. They were, however, divided in their sentiments, and while some implored the assistance of Carthage, others called upon the Romans for protection. Without hesitation or delay the Carthaginians entered Messana, and the Romans also hastened to give to the Mamertini that aid which had been claimed from them with as much eagerness as from the Carthaginians. At the approach of the Roman troops, the Mamertini, who had implored their assistance, took up arms, and forced the Carthaginians to evacuate Messana. Fresh forces were poured in on every side, and though Carthage seemed superior in arms and in resources, yet the valour and intrepidity of the Romans daily appeared more formidable, and Hiero, the Syracusan king who hitherto embraced the interests of the Carthaginians, became the most faithful ally of the republic. From a private quarrel the war became general. The Romans obtained a victory in Sicily, but as their enemies were masters at sea, the advantages they gained were small and inconsiderable. To make themselves equal to their adversaries, they aspired to the dominion of the sea, and in sixty days timber was cut down, and a fleet of 120 galleys completely manned and provisioned. The successes they met with at sea were trivial, and little advantage could be gained over an enemy that were sailors by actual practice and long experience. Duilius at last obtained a victory, and he was the first Roman who ever received a triumph after a naval battle. The losses they had already sustained induced the Carthaginians to sue for peace, and the Romans, whom an unsuccessful descent upon Africa, under Regulus, (Vid. Regulus,) had rendered diffident, listened to the proposal, and the first punic war was concluded B. C. 241, on the following terms:—The Carthaginians pledged themselves to pay to the Romans, within twenty years, the sum of 3000 Euboic talents, they promised to release all the Roman captives without ransom, to evacuate Sicily and the other islands in the Mediterranean, and not to molest Hiero, king of Syracuse, or his allies. After this treaty the Carthaginians, who had lost the dominion of Sardinia and Sicily, made new conquests in Spain, and soon began to repair their losses by industry and labour. They planted colonies and secretly prepared to revenge themselves upon their powerful rivals. The Romans were not insensible of their successes in Spain, and to stop their progress towards Italy, they made a stipulation with the Carthaginians, by which they were not permitted to cross the Iberus, or to molest the cities of their allies, the Saguntines. This was for some time observed, but when Annibal succeeded to the command of the Carthaginian armies in Spain, he spurned the boundaries which the jealousy of Rome had set to his arms, and he immediately formed the siege of Saguntum. The Romans were apprized of the hostilities which had been begun against their allies, but Saguntum was in the hands of the active enemy before they had taken any steps to oppose him. Complaints were carried to Carthage, and war was determined upon by the influence of Annibal in the Carthaginian senate. Without delay or diffidence, B. C. 218, Annibal marched a numerous army of 90,000 foot and 12,000 horse towards Italy, resolved to carry the war to the gates of Rome. He crossed the Alps and the Appenines with uncommon celerity, and the Roman consuls who were stationed to stop his progress were universally defeated. After this, Annibal called his brother Asdrubal from Spain with a large reinforcement; but the march of Asdrubal was intercepted by the Romans, his army was defeated, and himself slain. Affairs had now taken a different turn, and Marcellus, who had the command of the Roman legions in Italy, soon taught his countrymen that Annibal was not invincible in the field. The conquests of young Scipio in Spain meanwhile had raised the expectations of the Romans, and he had no sooner returned to Rome than he proposed to remove Annibal from the capital of Italy by carrying the war to the gates of Carthage. The conquests of the young Roman were as rapid in Africa as in Spain, and the Carthaginians, apprehensive of the fate of their capital, recalled Annibal from Italy, and preferred their safety at home to the maintaining of a long and expensive war in another quarter of the globe. Annibal received their order with indignation, and with tears in his eyes he left Italy, where for 16 years he had known no superior in the field of battle. At his arrival in Africa, the Carthaginian general soon collected a large army, and met his exulting adversary in the plains of Zama. The Romans obtained the victory, and Annibal, who had sworn eternal enmity to the gods of Rome, fled from Carthage after he had advised his countrymen to accept the terms of the conqueror. This battle of Zama was decisive, the Carthaginians sued for peace, which the haughty conquerors granted with difficulty. The conditions were these: Carthage was permitted to hold all the possessions which she had in Africa before the war, and to be governed by her own laws and institutions. She was ordered to make restitution of all the ships and other effects which had been taken in violation of a truce that had been agreed upon by both nations. She was to surrender the whole of her fleet, except 10 galleys; she was to release and deliver up all the captives, deserters, or fugitives, taken or received during the war; to indemnify Masinissa for all the losses which he had sustained; to deliver up all her elephants, and for the future never more to tame or break any more of these animals. She was not to make war upon any nation whatever without the consent of the Romans, and was to reimburse the Romans, to pay the sum of 10,000 talents, at the rate of 200 talents a year for 50 years, and she was to give up hostages from the noblest families for the performance of these several articles; and, till the ratification of the treaty, to supply the Roman forces with money and provisions. These humiliating conditions were accepted 201 B. C. and immediately 4000 Roman captives were released, five hundred galleys were delivered and burnt on the spot; but the immediate exaction of 200 talents was more severely felt, and many of the Carthaginian senators burst into tears. During the 50 years which followed the conclusion of the second Punic war, the Carthaginians were employed in repairing their losses by unwearied application and industry; but they found still in the Romans a jealous rival and a haughty conqueror, and in Masinissa, the ally of Rome, an intriguing, and ambitious monarch. The king of Numidia made himself master of one of their provinces; and as they were unable to make war without the consent of Rome, the Carthaginians sought relief by embassies, and made continual complaints in the Roman senate of the tyranny and oppression of Masinissa. While the senate were debating about the existence of Carthage, and while they considered it as a dependant power, and not as an ally, the wrongs of Africa were without redress, and Masinissa continued his depredations. Upon this the Carthaginians resolved to do to their cause that justice which the Romans had denied them; they entered the field against the Numidians, but they were defeated in a bloody battle by Masinissa, who was then 90 years old. In this bold measure they had broken the peace; and as their late defeat had rendered them desperate, they hastened with all possible speed to the capital of Italy to justify their proceedings, and to implore the forgiveness of the Roman senate. The news of Masinissa's victory had already reached Italy, and immediately some forces were sent to Sicily, and from thence ordered to pass into Africa. The ambassadors of Carthage received evasive and unsatisfactory answers from the senate. The consuls replied, that to prevent every cause of quarrel, the Carthaginians must deliver into their hands 300 hostages, all children of senators, and of the most noble and respectable families. The demand was great and alarming, but it was no sooner granted, than the Romans made another demand, and the Carthaginians were told that peace could not continue if they refused to deliver up all their ships, their arms, engines of war, with all their naval and military stores. The Carthaginians complied, and immediately 40,000 suits of armour, 20,000 large engines of war, with a plentiful store of ammunition and missile weapons, were surrendered. After this duplicity had succeeded, the Romans laid open the final resolutions of the senate, and the Carthaginians were then told, that, to avoid hostilities, they must leave their ancient habitations and retire into the inland parts of Africa, and found another city, at the distance of no less than ten miles from the sea. This was heard with horror and indignation; the Romans were fixed and inexorable, and Carthage was filled with tears and lamentations. But the spirit of liberty and independence was not yet extinguished in the capital of Africa, and the Carthaginians determined to sacrifice their lives for the protection of their gods, the tombs of their forefathers, and the place which had given them birth. Before the Roman army approached the city, preparations to support a siege were made, and the ramparts of Carthage were covered with stones, to compensate for the weapons and instruments of war which they had ignorantly betrayed to the duplicity of their enemies. Asdrubal, whom the despair of his countrymen had banished on account of the unsuccessful expedition against Masinissa, was immediately recalled; and, in the moment of danger, Carthage seemed to have possessed more spirit and vigour, than when Annibal was victorious at the gates of Rome. The town was blocked up by the Romans, and a regular siege begun. Two years were spent in useless operations, and Carthage seemed still able to rise from its ruins, to dispute for the empire of the world; when Scipio, the descendant of the great Scipio, who finished the second Punic war, was sent to conduct the siege. The vigour of his operations soon baffled the efforts and the bold resistance of the besieged; the communications which they had with the land were cut off, and the city, which was twenty miles in circumference, was completely surrounded on all sides by the enemy. Despair and famine now raged in the city, and Scipio gained access to the city walls, where the battlements were low and unguarded. His entrance into the streets was disputed with uncommon fury, the houses as he advanced were set on fire to stop his progress; but when a body of 50,000 persons of either sex had claimed quarter, the rest of the inhabitants were disheartened, and such as disdained to be prisoners of war, perished in the flames, which gradually destroyed their habitations, 147 B. C., after a continuation of hostilities for three years. During 17 days Carthage was in flames; and the soldiers were permitted to redeem from the fire whatever possessions they could. This remarkable event happened about the year of Rome 606. The news of this victory caused the greatest rejoicings at Rome; and immediately commissioners were appointed by the Roman senate, not only to raze the walls of Carthage, but even to demolish and burn the very materials with which they were made; and in a few days, that city which had been once the seat of commerce, and model of magnificence, the common store of the wealth of nations, and one of the most powerful states of the world, left behind no traces of its splendour, of its power, or even of its existence. Polyb.—Orosius.—Appian. de Punic., &c.—Flor.—Plut. in Cat. &c.—Strab.—Liv. epit.—Diog.

Pupiēnus, (Marcus Claudius Maximus,) a man of an obscure family, who raised himself by his merit to the highest offices in the Roman armies, and gradually became a prætor, consul, prefect of Rome, and a governor of the provinces. His father was a blacksmith. After the death of the Gordians, Pupienus was elected with Balbinus to the imperial throne, and soon after prepared to make war against the Persians; but in this he was prevented, and massacred, A. D. 236, by the prætorian guards. Balbinus shared his fate. Pupienus is sometimes called Maximus. In his private character he appeared always grave and serious; he was the constant friend of justice, moderation, and clemency; and no greater encomium can be passed upon his virtues, than to say that he was invested with the purple without soliciting for it, and that the Roman senate said that they had selected him from thousands, because they knew no person more worthy or better qualified to support the dignity of an emperor.

Puppius, a tragic poet in the age of J. Cæsar. His tragedies were so pathetic, that when they were represented on the Roman stage, the audience melted into tears; from which circumstance Horace calls them lacrymosa, 1, ep. v. 67.

Pygmālion, I. a king of Tyre, son of Belus, and brother to the celebrated Dido, who founded Carthage. At the death of his father, he ascended the vacant throne, and soon became odious by his cruelty and avarice. He sacrificed every thing to the gratification of his predominant passions, and he did not even spare the life of Sichæus, Dido's husband, because he was the most powerful and opulent of all the Phœnicians. This murder he committed in a temple, of which Sichæus was the priest; but instead of obtaining the riches which he desired, Pygmalion was shunned by his subjects, and Dido, to avoid further acts of cruelty, fled away with her husband's treasure, and a large colony, to the coast of Africa, where she founded a city. Pygmalion died in the 56th year of his age and in the 47th of his reign. Virg. Æn. 1, v. 347, &c.—Justin. 18, c. 5.—Apollod. 3. Ital. 1.——II. A celebrated statuary of the island of Cyprus. He became enamoured of a beautiful statue of marble which he had made, and at his earnest request and prayers, according to the mythologists, the goddess of beauty changed the favourite statue into a woman, whom the artist married, and by whom he had a son called Paphus, who founded the city of that name in Cyprus. Ovid. Met. 10, fab. 9.

Pylădes, I. a son of Strophius, king of Phocis, by one of the sisters of Agamemnon. He was educated together with his cousin Orestes, with whom he formed the most inviolable friendship, and whom he assisted to revenge the murder of Agamemnon, by assassinating Clytemnestra and Ægysthus. He also accompanied him to Taurica Chersonesus, and for his services Orestes rewarded him, by giving him his sister Electra in marriage. Pylades had by her two sons, Medon and Strophius. The friendship of Orestes and Pylades became proverbial. Vid. Orestes. Eurip. in Iphig.—Æschyl. in Ag., &c.—Paus. 1, c. 28.——II. A celebrated Roman pantomime, was a native of Cilicia. He was brought to Rome in the flower of youth, and first gave grace and dignity to the pantomimic stage, on which only unmeaning attitudes and rude gesticulations had been hitherto exhibited. The recitation, however, of the regular tragedy had always been accompanied with vehement and significant gestures. In consequence of one person thus gesticulating while the other declaimed, the Roman people had probably become expert in the interpretation of mimetic action; and, before the time of Pylades, certain signs, both natural and conventional, would be recognised as the tokens of corresponding emotions. It was principally tragic and majestic parts that Pylades represented, such as Œdipus and Hercules Furens; and his dancing chiefly expressed the grandeur of heroic sentiments.

Pylas, a king of Megara. He had the misfortune accidentally to kill his uncle Bias, for which he fled away, leaving his kingdom to Pandion, his son-in-law, who had been driven from Athens. Apollod. 3, c. 15.—Paus. 1, c. 39.

Pyrămus, a youth of Babylon, who became enamoured of Thisbe, a beautiful virgin who dwelt in the neighbourhood. The flame was mutual, and the two lovers, whom their parents forbade to marry, regularly received each other's addresses through the chink of a wall which separated their houses. After the most solemn vows of sincerity, they both agreed to elude the vigilance of their friends, and to meet one another at the tomb of Ninus, under a white mulberry-tree, without the walls of Babylon. Thisbe came first to the appointed place, but the sudden arrival of a lioness frightened her away; and as she fled into a neighbouring cave she dropped her veil, which the lioness found and besmeared with blood. Pyramus soon arrived, he found Thisbe's veil all bloody, and concluding that she had been torn to pieces by the wild beasts of the place, he stabbed himself with his sword. Thisbe, when her fears were vanished, returned from the cave, and at the sight of the dying Pyramus, she fell upon the sword which still reeked with his blood. This tragical scene happened under a white-mulberry-tree, which, as the poets mention, was stained with the blood of the lovers, and ever after bore fruit of the colour of blood. Ovid. Met. 4, v. 55, &c.—Hygin. fab. 243.

Pyrgoteles, a celebrated engraver on gems, in the age of Alexander the Great. He had the exclusive privilege of engraving the conqueror, as Lysippus was the only sculptor who was permitted to make statues of him. Plin. 37, c. 1.

Pyrodes, a son of Cilix, said to be the first who discovered and applied to human purposes the fire concealed in flints. Plin. 7, c. 56.

Pyrrhias, a boatman of Ithaca, remarkable for his humanity. He delivered from slavery an old man who had been taken by pirates, and robbed of some pots full of pitch. The old man was so grateful for his kindness, that he gave the pots to his deliverer, after he had told him that they contained gold under the pitch. Pyrrhias upon this offered the sacrifice of a bull to the old man, and retained him in his house, with every act of kindness and attention, till the time of his death. Plut. in quæst. G.

Pyrrhicha, a kind of dance, said to be invented and introduced into Greece by Pyrrhus the son of Achilles. The dancers were generally armed. Plin. 7, c. 56.

Pyrrho, a philosopher of Elis, disciple to Anaxarchus, and originally a painter. His father's name was Plistarchus, or Pistocrates. He was in continual suspense of judgment, he doubted of every thing, never made any conclusions, and when he had carefully examined a subject, and investigated all its parts, he concluded by still doubting of its evidence. This manner of doubting in the philosopher has been called Pyrrhonism, and his disciples have received the appellation of skeptics, inquisitors, examiners, &c. He pretended to have acquired an uncommon dominion over opinion and passions. The former of these virtues he called ataraxia, and the latter matriopathia; and so far did he carry his want of common feeling and sympathy, that he passed with unconcern near a ditch in which his master Anaxarchus had fallen, and where he nearly perished. As he showed so much indifference in every thing, and declared that life and death were the same thing, some of his disciples asked him, why he did not hurry himself out of the world: Because, says he, there is no difference between life and death. When he walked in the streets he never looked behind or moved from the road of a chariot, even in its most rapid course; and, indeed, as some authors remark, this indifference for his safety often exposed him to the greatest and most imminent dangers, from which he was saved by the interference of his friends who followed him. He flourished B. C. 304, and died at the advanced age of 90. He left no writings behind him. His countrymen were so partial to him, that they raised statues to his memory, and exempted all the philosophers of Elis from taxes. Diog. 9.—Cic. de Orat. 3, c. 17.—Aul. Gel. 11, c. 5.—Paus. 6, c. 24.

PYRRHUS, (Vid. Neoptolimus,) I. a king of Epirus, descended from Achilles, by the side of his mother, and from Hercules by that of his father, and son of Æacides and Phthia. He was saved when an infant, by the fidelity of his servants, from the pursuits of the enemies of his father, who had been banished from his kingdom, and he was carried to the court of Glaucias, king of Illyrium, who educated him with great tenderness. Cassander, king of Macedonia, wished to despatch him, as he had so much to dread from him; but Glaucias not only refused to deliver him up into the hands of his enemy, but he even went with an army, and placed him on the throne of Epirus, though only 12 years of age. About five years after, the absence of Pyrrhus, to attend the nuptials of one of the daughters of Glaucias, raised new commotions. The monarch was expelled from the throne by Neoptolemus, who had usurped it after the death of Æacides; and being still without resources, he applied to his brother-in-law Demetrius for assistance. He accompanied Demetrius at the battle of Ipsus, and fought there with all the prudence and intrepidity of an experienced general. He afterwards passed into Egypt, where, by his marriage with Antigone, the daughter of Berenice, he soon obtained a sufficient force to attempt the recovery of his throne. He was successful in the undertaking; but to remove all causes of quarrel, he took the usurper to share with him the royalty, and some time after he put him to death under pretence that he had attempted to poison him. In the subsequent years of his reign Pyrrhus engaged in the quarrels which disturbed the peace of the Macedonian monarchy, he marched against Demetrius, and gave the Macedonian soldiers fresh proofs of his valour and activity. By dissimulation he ingratiated himself in the minds of his enemy's subjects, and when Demetrius laboured under a momentary illness, Pyrrhus made an attempt upon the crown of Macedonia, which, if not then successful, soon after rendered him master of the kingdom. This he shared with Lysimachus for seven months, till the jealousy of the Macedonians, and the ambition of his colleague, obliged him to retire. Pyrrhus was meditating new conquests, when the Tarentines invited him to Italy to assist them against the encroaching power of Rome. He gladly accepted the invitation, but his passage across the Adriatic proved nearly fatal, and he reached the shores of Italy after the loss of the greatest part of his troops in a storm. At his entrance into Tarentum, B. C. 280, he began to reform the manners of the inhabitants, and by introducing the strictest discipline among their troops, to accustom them to bear fatigue and to despise dangers. In the first battle which he fought with the Romans he obtained the victory, but for this he was more particularly indebted to his elephants, whose bulk and uncommon appearance astonished the Romans and terrified their cavalry. The number of the slain was equal on both sides, and the conqueror said that such another victory would totally ruin him. He also sent Cineas, his chief minister, to Rome, and though victorious, he sued for peace. These offers of peace were refused, and when Pyrrhus questioned Cineas, about the manners and the character of the Romans, the sagacious minister replied, that their senate was a venerable assembly of kings, and that to fight against them was to attack another Hydra. A second battle was fought near Asculum, but the slaughter was so great, and the valour so conspicuous on both sides, that the Romans and their enemies reciprocally claimed the victory as their own. Pyrrhus still continued the war in favour of the Tarentines, when he was invited into Sicily by the inhabitants, who laboured under the yoke of Carthage and the cruelty of their own petty tyrants. His fondness of novelty soon determined him to quit Italy, he left a garrison at Tarentum, and crossed over to Sicily, where he obtained two victories over the Carthaginians, and took many of their towns. He was for a while successful, and formed the project of invading Africa; but soon his popularity vanished, his troops became insolent, and he behaved with haughtiness, and showed himself oppressive, so that his return to Italy was deemed a fortunate event for all Sicily. He had no sooner arrived at Tarentum than he renewed hostilities with the Romans with great acrimony, but when his army of 80,000 men had been defeated by 20,000 of the enemy under Curius, he left Italy with precipitation, B. C. 274, ashamed of the enterprise, and mortified by the victories which had been obtained over one of the descendants of Achilles. In Epirus he began to repair his military character by attacking Antigonus, who was then on the Macedonian throne. He gained some advantages over his enemy, and was at last restored to the throne of Macedonia. He afterwards marched against Sparta, at the request of Cleonymus, but when all his vigorous operations were insufficient to take the capital of Laconia, he retired to Argos, where the treachery of Aristeus invited him. The Argives desired him to retire, and not to interfere in the affairs of their republic, which were confounded by the ambition of two of their nobles. He complied with their wishes, but in the night he marched his forces into the town, and might have made himself master of the place had he not retarded his progress by entering it with his elephants. The combat that ensued was obstinate and bloody; and the monarch, to fight with more boldness, and to encounter dangers with more facility, exchanged his dress. He was attacked by one of the enemy, but as he was going to run him through in his own defence, the mother of the Argive, who saw her son's danger from the top of a house, threw down a tile and brought Pyrrhus to the ground. His head was cut off and carried to Antigonus, who gave his remains a magnificent funeral, and presented his ashes to his son Helenus, 272 years before the Christian era. Pyrrhus has been deservedly commended for his talents as a general; and not only his friends, but also his enemies, have been warm in extolling him; and Annibal declared, that for experience and sagacity the king of Epirus was the first of commanders. He had chosen Alexander the Great as a model, and in every thing he wished not only to imitate, but to surpass him. In the art of war none were superior to him; he not only made it his study as a general, but he even wrote many books on encampments, and the different ways of training up an army; and whatever he did was by principle and rule. Pyrrhus married many wives, and all for political reasons; besides Antigone, he had Lanassa the daughter of Agathocles, as also a daughter of Autoleon king of Pæonia. His children, as his biographer observes, derived a warlike spirit from their father, and when he was asked by one to which of them he should leave the kingdom of Epirus, he replied, To him who has the sharpest sword. *Elian. PYTHAGORAS, I. a celebrated philosopher, born at Samos. His father, Mnesarchus, was a person of distinction, and therefore the son received that education which was most calculated to enlighten his mind and invigorate his body. Like his contemporaries, he was early made acquainted with poetry and music; eloquence and astronomy became his private studies, and in gymnastic exercises he often bore the palm for strength and dexterity. He first made himself known in Greece, at the Olympic games, where he obtained, in the 18th year of his age, the prize for wrestling; and, after he had been admired for the elegance and the dignity of his person, and the brilliancy of his understanding, he retired into the east. In Egypt and Chaldea he gained the confidence of the priests, and learned from them the artful policy, and the symbolic writings, by which they governed the princes as well as the people; and after he had spent many years in gathering all the information which could be collected from antique traditions, concerning the nature of the gods and the immorality of the soul, Pythagoras revisited his native island. The tyranny of Polycrates at Samos disgusted the philosopher, who was a great advocate for national independence; and though he was the favourite of the tyrant, he retired from the island, and a second time assisted at the Olympic games. His fame was too well known to escape notice; he was saluted in the public assembly by the name of Sophist, or wise man; but he refused the appellation, and was satisfied with that of Philosopher, or the friend of wisdom. "At the Olympic games," said he, in explanation of this new appellation he wished to assume, "some are attracted with the desire of obtaining crowns and honours, others come to expose their different commodities to sale, while curiosity draws a third class, and the desire of contemplating whatever deserves notice in that celebrated assembly; thus, on the more extensive theatre of the world, while many struggle for the glory of a name, and many pant for the advantages of fortune, a few, and indeed but a few, who are neither desirous of money, nor ambitious of fame, are sufficiently gratified to be spectators of the wonder, the hurry, and the magnificence of the scene." From Olympia, the philosopher visited the republics of Elis and Sparta, and retired to Magna Græcia, where he fixed his habitation in the town of Crotona, about the 40th year of his age. Here he founded a sect which has received the name of the Italian; and he soon saw himself surrounded by a great number of pupils, which the recommendation of his mental, as well as his personal accomplishments, had procured. His skill in music and medicine, and his knowledge of mathematics and of natural philosophy, gained him friends and admirers; and amidst the voluptuousness that prevailed among the inhabitants of Crotona, the Samian sage found his instructions respected and his approbation courted: the most debauched and effeminate were pleased with the eloquence and the graceful delivery of the philosopher, who boldly upbraided them for their vices, and called them to more virtuous and manly pursuits. These animated harangues were attended with rapid success, and a reformation soon took place in the morals and the life of the people of Crotona. The females were exhorted to become modest, and they left off their gaudy ornaments; the youths were called away from their pursuits of pleasure, and instantly they forgot their intemperance, and paid to their parents that submissive attention and deference which the precepts of Pythagoras required. As to the old, they were directed no longer to spend their time in amassing money, but to improve their understanding, and to seek that peace and those comforts of mind which frugality, benevolence, and philanthropy alone can produce. The sober and religious behaviour of the philosopher strongly recommended the necessity and importance of these precepts. Pythagoras was admired for his venerable aspect; his voice was harmonious, his eloquence persuasive, and the reputation he had acquired by his distant travels, and by being crowned at the Olympic games, was great and important. He regularly frequented the temples of the gods, and paid his devotion to the divinity at an early hour; he lived upon the purest and most innocent food, he clothed himself like the priests of the Egyptian gods, and by his continual purifications and regular offerings, he seemed to be superior to the rest of mankind in sanctity. These artful measures united to render him an object, not only of reverence but of imitation. To set himself at a greater distance from his pupils, a number of years was required to try their various dispositions, but the most talkative were not permitted to speak in the presence of their master before they had been his auditors for five years; and those who possessed a natural taciturnity were allowed to speak after a probation of two years. When they were capable of receiving the secret instructions of the philosopher, they were taught the use of ciphers and hieroglyphic writings; and Pythagoras might boast that his pupils could correspond together, though in the most distant regions, in unknown characters; and by the signs and words which they had received, they could discover, though strangers and barbarians, those that had been educated in the Pythagorean school. So great was his authority among his pupils, that to dispute his word was deemed a crime, and the most stubborn were drawn to coincide with the opinions of their opponents, when they helped their arguments by the words of the master said so, an expression which became proverbial in jurare in verba magistri. The great influence which the philosopher possessed in his school was transferred to the world; the pupils divided the applause and the approbation of the people with their venerated master, and in a short time, the rulers and the legislators of all the principal towns of Greece, Sicily, and Italy, boasted in being the disciples of Pythagoras. The Samian philosopher was the first who supported the doctrine of metempsychosis, or transmigration of the soul into different bodies; and those notions he seemed to have imbibed among the priests of Egypt, or in the solitary retreats of the Brachmans. More strenuously to support his chimerical system, he declared he recollected the different bodies his soul had animated before that of the son of Mnesarchus. He remembered to have been Æthalides, the son of Mercury; to have assisted the Greeks during the Trojan war, in the character of Euphorbus; (Vid. Euphorbus,) to have been Hermotimus; afterwards a fisherman; and last of all, Pythagoras. He forbade his disciples to eat flesh, as also beans, because he supposed them to have been produced from the same putrefied matter from which, at the creation of the world, man was formed. In his theological system, Pythagoras supported that the universe was created from a shapeless heap of passive matter, by the hands of a powerful being, who himself was the mover and soul of the world, and of whose substance the souls of mankind were a portion. He considered numbers as the principles of every thing, and perceived in the universe, regularity, correspondence, beauty, proportion, and harmony, as intentionally produced by the creator. In his doctrines of morality, he perceived in the human mind propensities common to us with the brute creation; and besides these, and the passions of avarice and ambition, he discovered the nobler seeds of virtue, and supported that the most ample and perfect gratification was to be found in the enjoyment of moral and intellectual pleasures. The thoughts of the past he considered as always present to us, and he believed that no enjoyment could be had where the mind was disturbed by consciousness of guilt or fears about futurity. This opinion induced the philosopher to recommend to his followers a particular mode of education. The tender years of the Pythagoreans were employed in continual labour, in study, in exercise, and repose; and the philosopher maintained his well-known and important maxim, that many things, especially love, are best learned late. In a more advanced age the adult was desired to behave with caution, spirit, and patriotism, and to remember that the community and civil society demanded his exertions, and that the good of the public, and not his own private enjoyments, were the ends of his creation. From lessons like these, the Pythagoreans were strictly enjoined to call to mind, and carefully to review, the actions, not only of the present, but of the preceding days. In their acts of devotion they early repaired to the most solitary places of the mountains, and after they had examined their private and public conduct, and conversed with themselves, they joined in the company of their friends, and early refreshed their body with light and frugal aliments. Their conversation was of the most innocent nature; political or philosophic subjects were discussed with propriety, but without warmth; and, after the conduct of the following day was regulated, the evening was spent with the same religious ceremony as the morning, in a strict and impartial self-examination. From such regularity, nothing but the most salutary consequences could arise; and it will not appear wonderful that the disciples of Pythagoras were so much respected and admired as legislators, and imitated for their constancy, friendship, and humanity. The authors that lived in, and after the age of Alexander, have rather tarnished than brightened the glory of the founder of the Pythagorean school, and they have obscured his fame by attributing to him actions which were dissonant with his character as a man and a moralist. To give more weight to his exhortations, as some writers mention, Pythagoras retired into a subterraneous cave, where his mother sent him intelligence of every thing which happened during his absence. After a certain number of months he again reappeared on the earth, with a grim and ghastly countenance, and declared, in the assembly of the people, that he was returned from hell. From similar exaggerations it has been asserted that he appeared at the Olympic games with a golden thigh, and that he could write in letters of blood whatever he pleased on a looking-glass, and that by setting it opposite to the moon, when full, all the characters which were on the glass became legible on the moon's disk. They also support, that, by some magical words, he tamed a bear, stopped the flight of an eagle, and appeared on the same day and at the same instant in the cities of Crotona and Metapontum, &c. The time and the place of the death of this great philosopher are unknown; yet many suppose that he died at Metapontum, about 497 years before Christ: and so great was the veneration of the people of Magna Græcia for him, that he received the same honours as were paid to the immortal gods, and his house became a sacred temple. Succeeding ages likewise acknowledged his merits; and when the Romans, A. U. C. 411, were commanded by the oracle of Delphi to erect a statue to the bravest and wisest of the Greeks, the distinguished honour was conferred on Alcibiades and Pythagoras. Pythagoras had a daughter, called Damo. There is now extant a poetical composition ascribed to the philosopher, and called the golden verses of Pythagoras, which contains the greatest part of his doctrines and moral precepts; but many support that it is a supposititious composition, and that the true name of the writer was Lysis. Pythagoras distinguished himself also by his discoveries in geometry, astronomy, and mathematics; and it is to him that the world is indebted for the demonstrations of the 47th proposition of the first book of Euclid's elements, about the square of the hypothenuse. It is said that he was so elated after making the discovery, that he made an offering of a hetacomb to the gods; but the sacrifice was undoubtedly of small oxen, made with wax, as the philosopher was ever an enemy to shedding the blood of all animals. His system of the universe, in which he placed the sun in the centre, and all the planets moving in elliptical orbits round it, was deemed chimerical and improbable, till the deep inquiries and the philosophy of the 16th century proved it, by the most accurate calculations, to be true and incontestable. Diogenes, Porphyry, Iamblicus, and others, have written an account of his life, but with more erudition, perhaps, than veracity. *Cic. de Nat. Pytheas, I. an archon at Athens.——II. A native of Massilia, famous for his knowledge of astronomy, mathematics, philosophy, and geography. He also distinguished himself by his travels; and with a mind that wished to seek information in every corner of the earth, he advanced far into the northern seas, and discovered the island of Thule, and entered that then unknown sea which is now called the Baltic. His discoveries in astronomy and geography were ingenious, and, indeed, modern navigators have found it expedient to justify and accede to his conclusions. He was the first who established a distinction of climate by the length of days and nights. He wrote different treatises in Greek, which have been lost, though some of them were extant in the beginning of the fifth century. Pytheas lived, according to some, in the age of Aristotle. Strab. 2, &c.—Plin. 37.——III. An Athenian rhetorician in the age of Demosthenes, who distinguished himself by his intrigues, rapacity, and his opposition to the measures of Demosthenes, of whom he observed that his orations smelt of the lamp. Pytheas joined Antipater after the death of Alexander the Great. His orations were devoid of elegance, harsh, unconnected, and diffuse; and from this circumstance he has not been ranked among the orators of Athens. Ælian. V. H. 7, c. 7.—*Plut. in. Pythes, a native of Abdera in Thrace, son of Andromache, who obtained a crown at the Olympian games. Plin. 34, c. 7.—Paus. 6, c. 14.

Pytheus, a Lydian, famous for his riches in the age of Xerxes. He kindly entertained the monarch and all his army when he was marching on his expedition against Greece, and offered him to defray the expenses of the whole war. Xerxes thanked him with much gratitude, and promised to give him whatever he should require. Pytheus asked him to dismiss his son from the expedition: upon which the monarch ordered the young man to be cut in two, and one half of the body to be placed on the right hand of the way, and the other on the left, that his army might march between them. Plut. de mul. virt.—Herodot.

Pythia, the priestess of Apollo at Delphi. She delivered the answer of the god to such as came to consult the oracle, and was supposed to be suddenly inspired by the sulphurous vapours which issued from the hole of a subterraneous cavity within the temple, over which she sat bare on a three-legged stool, called a tripod. In the stool was a small aperture, through which the vapour was exhaled by the priestess, and at this divine inspiration, her eyes suddenly sparkled, her hair stood on end, and a shivering ran all over her body. In this convulsive state she spoke the oracles of the god, often with loud howlings and cries, and her articulations were taken down by the priest and set in order. Sometimes the spirit of inspiration was more gentle, and not always violent; yet Plutarch mentions one of the priestesses who was thrown into such excessive fury, that not only those that consulted the oracle, but also the priests that conducted her to the sacred tripod, and attended her during the inspiration, were terrified and forsook the temple; and so violent was the fit, that she continued for some days in the most agonizing situation, and at last died. The Pythia, before she placed herself on the tripod, used to wash her whole body, and particularly her hair, in the waters of the fountain Castalis, at the foot of mount Parnassus. She also shook a laurel-tree that grew near the place, and sometimes eat the leaves with which she crowned herself. The priestess was originally a virgin, but the institution was changed when Echecrates, a Thessalian, had offered violence to one of them, and none but women who were above the age of fifty were permitted to enter upon that sacred office. They always appeared dressed in the garments of virgins, to intimate their purity and modesty; and they were solemnly bound to observe the strictest laws of temperance and chastity, that neither fantastical dresses nor lascivious behaviour might bring the office, the religion, or the sanctity of the place into contempt. There was originally but one Pythia, besides subordinate priests, and afterwards two were chosen, and sometimes more. The most celebrated of all these is Phemonoe, who is supposed by some to have been the first who gave oracles at Delphi. The oracles were always delivered in hexameter verses, a custom which was some time after discontinued. The Pythia was consulted only one month in the year, about the spring. It was always required that those who consulted the oracle should make large presents to Apollo, and from thence arose the opulence, splendour, and the magnificence of that celebrated temple of Delphi. Sacrifices were also offered to the divinity, and if the omens proved unfavourable, the priestess refused to give an answer. There were generally five priests who assisted at the offering of the sacrifices, and there was also another who attended the Pythia, and assisted her in receiving the oracle. Vid. Delphi, Oraculum. Paus. 10, c. 5.—Diod. 16.—Strab. 6 and 9.—Justin. 24, c. 5.—Plut. de orat. def.—Eurip. in Ion.—Chrysost.——Games celebrated in honour of Apollo near the temple of Delphi. They were first instituted, according to the more received opinion, by Apollo himself, in commemoration of the victory which he had obtained over the serpent Python, from which they received their name; though others maintain that they were first established by Agamemnon, or Diomedes, or by Amphictyon, or lastly, by the council of the Amphictyons, B. C. 1263. They were originally celebrated once in nine years, but afterwards every fifth year, on the second year of every Olympiad, according to the number of the Parnassian nymphs who congratulated Apollo after his victory. The gods themselves were originally among the combatants; and, according to some authors, the first prizes were won by Pollux, in boxing; Castor, in horseraces; Hercules, in the pancratium; Zetes, in fighting with the armour; Calais, in running; Telamon, in wrestling; and Peleus, in throwing the quoit. These illustrious conquerors were rewarded by Apollo himself, who was present, with crowns and laurel. Some however observe, that it was nothing but a musical contention, in which he who sung best the praises of Apollo obtained the prize, which was presents of gold or silver, which were afterwards exchanged for a garland of the palm-tree or of the beach leaves. It is said that Hesiod was refused admission to these games because he was not able to play upon the harp, which was required of all such as entered the lists. The songs which were sung were called πυθικοι νομοι, the Pythian modes, divided into five parts, which contained a representation of the fight and victory of Apollo over Python; αναπαισις, the preparation for the fight; εμπειρια, the first attempt; καταστενασμος, taking breath and collecting courage; ιαμβοι και δακτυλοι, the insulting sarcasms of the god over his vanquished enemy; συριγγες, an imitation of the hisses of the serpent; just as he expired under the blows of Apollo. A dance was also introduced; and in the 48th Olympiad, the Amphictyons, who presided over the games, increased the number of musical instruments by the addition of a flute, but as it was more particularly used in funeral songs and lamentations, it was soon rejected as unfit for merriment, and the festivals which represented the triumph of Apollo over the conquered serpent. The Romans, according to some, introduced them into their city, and called them Apollinares ludi. Paus. 10, c. 13 and 37.—Strab. 9.—Ovid. Met. 1, v. 447.—Plin. 7.—Liv. 25.

Pythŏcles, an Athenian, descended from Aratus. It is said, that on this account, and for his instruction, Plutarch wrote the life of Aratus.

Python, a native of Byzantium, in the age of Philip of Macedonia. He was a great favourite of the monarch, who sent him to Thebes, when that city, at the instigation of Demosthenes, was going to take arms against Philip. Plut. in Dem.—Diod.

Pythonĭce, an Athenian prostitute, greatly honoured by Harpalus, whom Alexander some time before had intrusted with the treasures of Babylon. He married her; and, according to some, she died the very moment that the nuptials were going to be celebrated. He raised her a splendid monument on the road which led from Athens to Eleusis, which cost him 30 talents. Diod. 17.—Paus. 1.—Athen. 13, &c.

Q.

Quadrigarius, Q. Claudius, composed annals of Rome in twenty-four books, which, though now almost entirely lost, were in existence as late as the end of the 12th century, being referred to by John of Salisbury in his book De Nugis Curialibus. Some passages, however, are still preserved, particularly the account of the defiance by the gigantic Gaul, adorned with a chain, to the whole Roman army, and his combat with Titus Manlius, afterwards surnamed Torquatus, from this chain which he took from his antagonist. "Who the enemy was," says Au. Gellius, "of how great and formidable stature, how audacious the challenge, and in what kind of battle they fought, Q. Claudius has told with much purity and elegance, and in the simple unadorned sweetness of ancient language. There is likewise extant from these Annals the story of the consul Q. Fabius Maximus making his father, who was then proconsul, alight from his horse when he came out to meet him. We have also the letter of the Roman consuls, Fabricius and Q. Emilius, to Pyrrhus, informing him of the treachery of his confidant, Nicias, who had offered to the Romans to make away with his master for a reward. The Annals of Quadrigarius must at least have brought down the history to the civil wars of Marius and Sylla, since, in the nineteenth book, the author details the circumstances of the defence of the Pirœus against Sylla, by Archelaus, the prefect of Mithridates. As to the style of these Annals, Aulus Gellius reports, that they were written in a conversational manner."

Quæstŏres, two officers at Rome, first created A. U. C. 269. They received their name, a quærendo, because they collected the revenues of the state, and had the total management of the public treasury. The quæstorship was the first office which could be had in the state. It was requisite that the candidates should be 24 or 25 years of age, or, according to some, 27. In the year 332 U. C. two more were added to the others, to attend the consuls, to take care of the pay of the armies abroad, and sell the plunder and booty which had been acquired by conquest. These were called Peregrini, whilst the others, whose employment was in the city, received the name of Urbani. When the Romans were masters of all Italy, four more were created, A. U. C. 439, to attend the proconsuls and proprætors in their provinces, and to collect all the taxes and customs which each particular district owed to the republic. They were called Provinciales. Sylla, the dictator, created 20 quæstors, and J. Cæsar 40, to fill up the vacant seats in the senate; from whence it is evident that the quæstors ranked as senators in the senate. The quæstors were always appointed by the senate at Rome, and if any person was appointed to the quæstorship without their permission, he was only called Proquæstor. The quæstores urbani were apparently of more consequence than the rest, the treasury was intrusted to their care, they kept an account of all receipts and disbursements, and the Roman eagles or ensigns were always in their possession when the armies were not on an expedition. They required every general before he triumphed, to tell them, upon his oath, that he had given a just account of the number of the slain on both sides, and that he had been saluted imperator by the soldiers, a title which every commander generally received from his army after he had obtained a victory, and which was afterwards confirmed and approved by the senate. The city quæstors had also the care of the ambassadors; they lodged and received them, and some time after, when Augustus was declared emperor, they kept the decrees of the senate, which had been before intrusted with the ediles and the tribunes. This gave rise to two new offices of trust and honour, one of which was Quæstor palatii, and the other quæstor principis or augusti, sometimes called candidatus principis. The tent of the quæstor in the camp was called quæstorium. It stood near that of the general. Varro. de L. L. 4.—Liv. 4, c. 43.—Dio. 43.

QUINCTIUS, (T.) I. a Roman consul who gained some victories over the Æqui and the Volsci, and obtained a triumph for subduing Præneste. ——II. A Roman consul when Annibal invaded Italy.

QUINDECIMVIRI, an order of priests whom Tarquin the proud appointed to take care of the Sibylline books. They were originally two, but afterwards the number was increased to ten, to whom Sylla added five more, whence their name. Vid. Decemviri and Duumviri.

QUINQUATRIA, a festival in honour of Minerva at Rome, which continued during five days. The beginning of the celebration was the 18th of March. The first day sacrifices and oblations were presented, but, however, without the effusion of blood. On the second, third and fourth days, shows of gladiators were exhibited, and on the fifth day there was a solemn procession through the streets of the city. On the days of the celebration, scholars obtained holydays, and it was usual for them to offer prayers to Minerva for learning and wisdom, which the goddess patronised; and on their return to school, they presented their master with a gift, which has received the name of Minerval. They were much the same as the Panathenæa of the Greeks. Plays were also acted and disputations were held on subjects of literature. They received their names from the five days which were devoted for their celebration.

QUINQUENNALES LUDI, games celebrated by the Chians in honour of Homer every fifth year. There were also some games among the Romans which bore this name. They are the same as the Actian games. Vid. Actia.

QUINTILIANUS, (Marcus Fabius,) a celebrated rhetorician born in Spain. He opened a school of rhetoric at Rome, and was the first who obtained a salary from the state as being a public teacher. After he had remained twenty years in this laborious employment, and obtained the merited applause of the most illustrious Romans, not only as a preceptor but as a pleader of the bar, Quintilian, by the permission of the emperor Domitian retired to enjoy the fruits of his labours and industry. In his retirement he assiduously dedicated his time to the study of literature, and wrote a treatise on the causes of the corruption of eloquence. Some time after, at the pressing solicitation of his friends, he wrote the institutiones oratoricæ, the most perfect and complete system of oratory extant. He was appointed preceptor to the two young princes whom Domitian destined for his successors on the throne; but the pleasures which the rhetorician received from the favours and the attention of the emperor, and from the success which his writings met in the world, were imbittered by the loss of his wife and of his two sons. It is said that Quintilian was poor in his retirement, and that his indigence was relieved by the liberality of his pupil, Pliny the younger. He died A. D. 95. His institutions were discovered in the 1415th year of the Christian era, in the old tower of a monastery of St. Gal, by Poggio Bracciolini, a native of Florence. The best editions of Quintilian are those of Gesner, 4to. Gotting. 1738; of L. Bat. 8vo. cum notis variorum, 1665; of Gibson, 4to. Oxon. 1693; and that of Rollin, republished in 8vo. London, 1792.

QUINTILLUS, (M. Arelius Claudius,) a brother of Claudius, who proclaimed himself emperor, and 17 days after destroyed himself by opening his veins in a bath, when he heard that Aurelian was marching against him, about the 270th year of the Christian era.

QUINTUS CURTIUS RUFUS, a Latin historian, who flourished, as some suppose, in the reign of Vespasian or Trajan. He has rendered himself known by his history of the reign of Alexander the Great. The history was divided into 10 books, of which the two first, the end of the fifth, and the beginning of the sixth, are lost. The work is admired for the purity of the style. It is, however, blamed for great anachronisms, and glaring mistakes in geography as well as history. Freinshemius has written a supplement to Curtius, from all the different authors who have employed their pen in writing an account of Alexander, and of his Asiatic conquests. Some suppose that the historian is the same with that Curtius Rufus, who lived in the age of Claudius, under whom he was made consul. This Rufus was born of an obscure family, and he attended a Roman quæstor in Africa, when he was met at Adrumetum by a woman above human shape, in the middle of the day, who told him that the day should come in which he should govern Africa with consular power. He repaired to Rome, where he gained the favours of the emperor, obtained consular honours, and at last retired as proconsul to Africa, where he died. The best edition of Curtius are those of Elzevir, 8vo. Amst. 1673; or of Snakenburg, 4to. L. Bat. 1724; and of Barbou, 12mo. Paris, 1757. Tacit. Ann. 11, c. 23, &c.

QUIRINALIA, festivals in honour of Romulus, surnamed Quirinus, celebrated on the 13th of the calends of March.

QUIRINUS, (Sulpitius,) a Roman consul, born at Lanuvium. Though descended of an obscure family, he was raised to the greatest honours by Augustus. He was appointed governor of Syria, and was afterwards made preceptor to Caius, the grandson of the emperor. He married Æmilia Lepida, the grand-daughter of Sylla and Pompey, but some time after, he shamefully repudiated her. He died A. D. 22. Tacit. Ann. 3, &c.

QUIRITES, a name given to the Roman citizens, because they admitted into their city the Sabines, who inhabited the town of Cures, and who on that account were called Quirites. After this union, the two nations were indiscriminately and promiscuously called by that name. It is, however, to be observed, that the word was confined to Rome, and not used in the armies, as we find some of the generals applying it only to such of their soldiers as they dismissed or disgraced. Even some of the emperors appeased a sedition by calling their rebellious soldiers by the degrading appellation of Quirites. Suelon. Cæs. 70.—Lamprid. 53.—Lucan. 5, v. 558.—Horat. 4, od. 14, v. 1.—Varro. de L. L. 4.—Liv. 1, c. 13.—Ovid. Fast. 2, v. 479.

R.

Rabirius, (C.) I. a Roman knight, who lent an immense sum of money to Ptolemy Auletes, king of Egypt. The monarch afterwards not only refused to repay him, but even confined him, and endangered his life. Rabirius escaped from Egypt with difficulty, but at his return to Rome he was accused by the senate of having lent money to an African prince for unlawful purposes. He was ably defended by Cicero, and acquitted with difficulty. Cic. pro Rab.—II. A Latin poet, in the age of Augustus, who wrote, besides satires and epigrams, a poem on the victory which the emperor had gained over Antony at Actium. Seneca has compared him to Virgil for elegance and majesty, but Quintilian is not so favourable to his poetry.—III. An architect in the reign of Domitian, who built a celebrated palace for the emperor, of which the ruins are still seen at Rome.

Regillianus, Q. Nonius, a Dacian, who entered the Roman armies, and was raised to the greatest honours under Valerian. He was elected emperor by the populace, who were dissatisfied with Gallienus, and was soon after murdered by his soldiers, A. D. 262.

Regŭlus, I. (M. Atilius,) a consul during the first Punic war. He reduced Brundusium, and in his second consulship he took 64 and sunk 30 galleys of the Carthaginian fleet on the coast of Sicily. Afterwards he landed in Africa, and so rapid was his success, that in a short time he defeated three generals, and made himself master of about 200 places of consequence on the coast. The Carthaginians sued for peace, but the conqueror refused to grant it, and soon after he was defeated in a battle by Xanthippus, and 30,000 of his men were left on the field of battle, and 15,000 taken prisoners. Regulus was in the number of the captives, and he was carried in triumph to Carthage. He was afterwards sent by the enemy to Rome, to propose an accommodation and an exchange of prisoners; and if his commission was unsuccessful, he was bound by the most solemn oaths to return to Carthage without delay. When he came to Rome, Regulus dissuaded his countrymen from accepting the terms which the enemy proposed, and when his opinions had had due influence on the senate, Regulus retired to Carthage agreeable to his engagements. The Carthaginians were told that their offers of peace had been rejected at Rome by the means of Regulus, and therefore they prepared to punish him with the greatest severity. His eyebrows were cut, and he was exposed for some days to the excessive heat of the meridian sun, and afterwards confined in a barrel, whose sides were every where filled with large iron spikes, till he died in the greatest agonies. His sufferings were heard at Rome, and the senate permitted his widow to inflict whatever punishment she pleased on some of the most illustrious captives of Carthage who were in their hands. She confined them also in presses filled with sharp iron points, and was so exquisite in her cruelty, that the senate at last interfered, and stopped the barbarity of her punishments. Regulus died about 251 years before Christ. Sil. 6, v. 319.—Flor. 2, c. 3.—Horat. 3, od. 5.—Cic. de Off. 1, c. 13.—Val. Max. 1, c. 1, l. 9, c. 2.—Liv. ep. 16.—II. Memmius, a Roman, made governor of Greece by Caligula. While Regulus was in his province, the emperor wished to bring the celebrated statue of Jupiter Olympius, by Phidias, to Rome; but this was supernaturally prevented, and, according to ancient authors, the ship which was to convey it was destroyed by lightning, and the workmen who attempted to remove the statue were terrified away by sudden noises. Dio. Cass.

Rĕmŭlus Sylvius, a king of Alba, destroyed by lightning on account of his impiety. Ovid. Trist. 4, v. 50.

Remuria, festivals established at Rome by Romulus, to appease the manes of his brother Remus. They were afterwards called Lemuria, and celebrated yearly.

Remus, the brother of Romulus, was exposed, together with him, by the cruelty of his grandfather. In the contest between the two brothers about building a city, Romulus obtained the preference, and Remus, for ridiculing the rising walls, was put to death by his brother's orders, or by Romulus himself. Vid. Romulus. The Romans were afflicted with a plague after this murder, upon which the oracle was consulted, and the manes of Remus appeased by the institution of the Remuria. Ovid.

Rhadamistus, a son of Pharnasmanes, king of Iberia. He married Zenobia, the daughter of his uncle Mithridates, king of Armenia, and some time after put him to death. He was put to death by his father for his cruelties, about the year 52 of the Christian era. Tacit. Ann. 13, c. 37.

Rhampsinītus, an opulent king of Egypt, who succeeded Proteus. He built a large tower with stones, at Memphis, where his riches were deposited, and of which he was robbed by the artifice of the architect, who had left a stone in the wall easily moveable, so as to admit a plunderer. Herodot. 2, c. 121, &c.

Rhamses, or Ramises, a powerful king of Egypt, who, with an army of 700,000 men, conquered Æthiopia, Libya, Persia, and other eastern nations. In his reign, according to Pliny, Troy was taken. Some authors consider him to be the same as Sesostris. Tacit. Ann. 2, c. 60.—Plin. 36, c. 8.

Rhascupŏris, a king of Thrace, who invaded the possessions of Cotys, and was put to death by order of Tiberius, &c. Tacit. Ann. 2, c. 64.

Rhesus. Vid. Part III.

Rhianus, a Greek poet of Thrace, originally a slave. He wrote an account of the war between Sparta and Messenia, which continued for twenty years; as also a history of the principal revolutions and events which had taken place in Thessaly. Of this poetical composition nothing but a few verses are extant. He flourished about 200 years before the Christian era. Paus. 4, c. 6.

Rhimotăcles, a king of Thrace, who revolted from Antony to Augustus: He boasted of his attachment to the emperor's person at an entertainment, upon which Augustus said, proditionem amo, proditores vero odi.

Rhŏdŏpe, or Rhodŏpis, a celebrated courtezan of Greece, who was fellow-servant with Æsop at the court of a king of Samos. She was carried to Egypt by Xanthus, and her liberty was at last bought by Charaxes of Mitylene, the brother of Sappho, who was enamoured of her, and who married her. She sold her favours at Naucratis, where she collected so much money, that, to render her name immortal, she consecrated a number of spits in the temple of Apollo at Delphi; or, according to others, erected one of the pyramids of Egypt. Ælian says, that as Rhodope was one day bathing herself, an eagle carried away one of her sandals, and dropped it near Psammetichus, king of Egypt, at Memphis. The monarch was struck with the beauty of the sandal, strict inquiry was made to find the owner, and Rhodope, when discovered, married Psammetichus. Herodot. 2, c. 134, &c.—Ovid. Heroid. 15.—Ælian. V. H. 13, c. 33. Vid. Part I.

Rhœtus, a king of the Marubii, who married a woman called Casperia, to whom Archemorus, his son by a former wife, offered violence. After this incestuous attempt, Archemorus fled to Turnus, king of the Rutuli. Virg. Æn. 10, v. 388.

RhyntHon, a dramatic writer of Syracuse, who flourished at Tarentum, where he wrote 38 plays. Authors are divided with respect to the merit of his compositions and the abilities of the writer. Vid. Rhinthon.

Romulus, a son of Mars and Ilia, grandson of Numitor, king of Alba, was born at the same birth with Remus. These two children were thrown into the Tiber by order of Amulius, who usurped the crown of his brother Numitor; but they were preserved, and, according to Florus, the river stopped its course, and a she-wolf came and fed them with her milk till they were found by Faustulus, one of the king's shepherds, who educated them as his own children. When they knew their real origin, the twins, called Romulus and Remus, put Amulius to death, and restored the crown to their grandfather Numitor. They afterwards undertook to build a city, and, to determine which of the two brothers should have the management of it, they had recourse to omens and the flight of birds. Remus went to mount Aventine, and Romulus to mount Palatine. Remus saw first a flight of six vultures, and soon after Romulus twelve; and, therefore, as the number was greater, he began to lay the foundations of the city, and marked with a furrow the place where he wished to erect the walls; but their slenderness was ridiculed by Remus, who leaped over them with the greatest contempt. This irritated Romulus, and Remus was immediately put to death, either by the hand of his brother or one of the workmen. When the walls were built, the city was without inhabitants; but Romulus, by making an asylum of a sacred grove, soon collected a multitude of fugitives, foreigners, and criminals, whom he received as his lawful subjects. Yet, however numerous these might be, they were despised by the neighbouring inhabitants, and none were willing to form matrimonial connexions with them. But Romulus obtained by force what was denied to his petitions. The Romans celebrated games in honour of the god Consus, and forcibly carried away all the females who had assembled there to be spectators of these unusual exhibitions. A violent engagement was begun in the middle of the Roman forum; but the Sabines were conquered, or, according to Ovid, the two enemies laid down their arms when the women had rushed between the two armies, and by their tears and entreaties raised compassion in the bosoms of their parents and husbands. The Sabines left their original possessions, and came to live in Rome, where Tatius, their king, shared the sovereign power with Romulus. Afterwards Romulus divided the lands which he had obtained by conquest; one part was reserved for religious uses, to maintain the priests, to erect temples, and to consecrate altars; the other was appropriated for the expenses of the state; and the third part was equally distributed among his subjects, who were divided into three classes or tribes. The most aged and experienced, to the number of 100, were also chosen, whom the monarch might consult in matters of the highest importance, and from their age they were called senators, and from their authority patres. The whole body of the people were also distinguished by the name of patricians and plebeians, patron and client, who by mutual interest were induced to preserve the peace of the state, and to promote the public good. Some time after, Romulus disappeared as he was giving instructions to the senators, and the eclipse of the sun, which happened at that time, was favourable to the rumour which asserted that the king had been taken up to heaven, 714 B. C. after a reign of 39 years. This was further confirmed by J. Proculus, one of the senators, who solemnly declared, that as he returned from Alba he had seen Romulus in a form above human, and that he had directed him to tell the Romans to pay him divine honours under the name of Quirinus, and to assure them that their city was doomed one day to become the capital of the world. This report was immediately credited, and the more so as the senators dreaded the resentment of the people, who suspected them of having offered him violence. A temple was raised to him, and a regular priest, called Flamen Quirinalis, was appointed to offer him sacrifices. Romulus was ranked by the Romans among the 12 great gods, and it is not to be wondered that he received such distinguished honours, when the Romans considered him as the founder of their city and empire, and the son of the god of war. He is generally represented like his father, so much that it is difficult to distinguish them. The fable of the two children of Rhea Sylvia being nourished by a she-wolf, arose from Lupa, Faustulus's wife, having brought them up. *Vid. Acca. Dionys. Romŭlus Sylvius, or Alladius, (Momyllus Augustulus,) the last of the emperors of the western empire of Rome. His country was conquered, A. D. 476, by the Heruli, under Odoacer, who assumed the name of king of Italy.

Romus, I. a son of Æneas, by Lavinia. Some suppose that he was the founder of Rome.—— II. A son of Æmathion, sent by Diomedes to Italy, and also supposed by some to be the founder of Rome.

Roscia Lex, de theatris, by L. Roscius Otho, the tribune, A. U. C. 685. It required that none should sit in the first 14 seats of the theatre, if they were not in possession of 400 sestertia, which was the fortune required to be a Roman knight.

Roscius, (Q.) I. a Roman actor, born at Lanuvium, so celebrated on the stage, that every comedian of excellence and merit has received his name. His eyes were naturally distorted, and he always appeared on the stage with a mask, but the Romans obliged him to act his characters without, and they overlooked the deformities of his face, that they might the better hear his elegant pronunciation, and be delighted with the sweetness of his voice. He was accused on suspicion of dishonourable practices; but Cicero, who had been one of his pupils, undertook his defence, and cleared him of the malevolent aspersions of his enemies, in an elegant oration still extant. Roscius wrote a treatise, in which he compared, with great success and much learning, the profession of the orator with that of the comedian. He died about 60 years before Christ. Horat. 2, ep. 1. —Quintil.—Cic. pro Ros. de Orat. 3, de Div. 1, &c. Tusc. 3, &c.—Plut. in Cic.——II. Sextus, a rich citizen of Ameria, murdered in the dictatorship of Sylla. His son, of the same name, was accused of the murder, and eloquently defended by Cicero, in an oration still extant, A. U. C. 673. Cic. pro S. Roscio Amer.

Roxana, I. a Persian woman, taken prisoner by Alexander. The conqueror became enamoured of her and married her. She behaved with great cruelty after Alexander's death, and she was at last put to death by Cassander's order. She was daughter of Darius, or, according to others, of one of his satraps. Curt. 3, c. 4, l. 10, c. 6.—Plut. in Alex.——II. A wife of Mithridates the Great, who poisoned herself.

Rufus, (Vid. Quintius), one of the ancestors of Sylla, degraded from the rank of a senator, because ten pounds weight of gold was found in his house.

Rupilius, I. an officer surnamed Rex, for his authoritative manners. He was proscribed by Augustus, and fled to Brutus. Horat. 1, sat. 7, v. 1.——II. A writer, whose treatises de figuris sententiarum, &c., were edited by Runken, 8vo. L. Bat. 1786.

Rusticus, L. Jun. Arulenus, a man put to death by Domitian. He was the friend and preceptor of Pliny the younger, who praises his abilities; and he is likewise commended by Tacitus, 16, H. c. 26.—Plin. 1, ep. 14.—Suet. in Dom.

Rutilius Rufus, (P.) I. a Roman consul in the age of Sylla, celebrated for his virtues and writings. When Sylla had banished him from Rome he retired to Smyrna, amidst the acclamations and praises of the people; and when some of his friends wished him to be recalled home by means of a civil war, he severely reprimanded them, and said that he wished rather to see his country blush at his exile than to plunge it into distress by his return. He was the first who taught the Roman soldiers the principles of fencing, and by thus mixing dexterity with valour, rendered their attacks more certain and more irresistible. During his banishment he employed his time in study, and wrote a history of Rome in Greek, and an account of his own life in Latin, besides many other works. Ovid. Fast. 6, v. 563.—Seneca de Benef.—Cic. in Brut. de Orat. 1, c. 53.—Val. Max. 2, c. 3, l. 6, c. 4.—Paterc. 2, c. 9.—— II. Claud. Numantianus, a poet of Gaul in the reign of Honorius. According to some, he wrote a poem on mount Ætna. He wrote also an Itinerary, published by Burman in the poetæ Latini minores, L. Bat. 4to. 1731.

Sabichus, or Sabacon, a king of Æthiopia, who invaded Egypt, and reigned there after the expedition of the king of Amasis. After a reign of fifty years he was terrified by a dream, and retired into his own kingdom. Herodot. 2, c. 137, &c.

Sabina, Julia, a Roman matron, who married Adrian. She is celebrated for her private as well as public virtues. Adrian treated her with the greatest asperity, though he had received from her the imperial purple; and the empress was so sensible of his unkindness, that she boasted in his presence that she had disdained to make him a father, lest his children should become more odious and more tyrannical than he himself was. The behaviour of Sabina at last so exasperated Adrian, that he poisoned her, or, according to some, obliged her to destroy herself. The emperor at that time laboured under a mortal disease, and therefore he was the more encouraged to sacrifice Sabina to his resentment, that she might not survive him. Divine honours were paid to her memory. She died after she had been married 38 years to Adrian, A. D. 138.

Sabini. Vid. Part I.

Sabinus Aulus, I. a Latin poet intimate with Ovid. He wrote some epistles and elegies, in the number of which were mentioned an epistle from Æneas to Dido, from Hippolytus to Phædra, and from Jason to Hipsipyle, from Demophoon to Phyllis, from Paris to Œnone, from Ulysses to Penelope; the three last of which, though said to be his composition, are spurious. Ovid. Am. 2, el. 18, v. 27.——II. A man from whom the Sabines received their name. He received divine honours after death, and was one of those deities whom Æneas invoked when he entered Italy. He was supposed to be of Lacedæmonian origin, Virg. Æn. 7, v. 171.——III. Julius, an officer, who proclaimed himself emperor in the beginning of Vespasian's reign. He was soon after defeated in a battle; and, to escape from the conqueror, he hid himself in a subterraneous cave, with two faithful domestics, where he continued unseen for nine successive years. His wife found out his retreat, and spent her time with him, till her frequent visits to the cave discovered the place of his concealment. He was dragged before Vespasian, and by his orders put to death though his friends interested themselves in his cause, and his wife endeavoured to raise the emperor's pity by showing him the twins she had brought forth in their subterraneous retreat.——IV. Titius, a Roman senator, shamefully accused and condemned by Sejanus. His body, after execution, was dragged through the streets of Rome, and treated with the greatest indignities. His dog constantly followed the body, and when it was thrown into the Tiber, the faithful animal plunged in after it, and was drowned. Plin. 8, c. 40.——V. Poppæus, a Roman consul, who presided above 24 years over Mœsia, and obtained a triumph for his victories over the barbarians. He was a great favourite of Augustus and of Tiberius. Tacit. Ann.——VI. Flavius, a brother of Vespasian, killed by the populace. He was well known for his fidelity to Vitellius. He commanded in the Roman armies 35 years, and was governor of Rome for 12.——VII. A friend of Domitian.——VIII. A Roman who attempted to plunder the temple of the Jews. ——IX. A friend of the emperor Alexander. ——X. A lawyer.

Saburānus, an officer of the prætorian guards. When he was appointed to this office by the emperor Trajan, the prince presented him with a sword, saying, Use this weapon in my service so long as my commands are just; but turn it against my own breast whenever I become cruel or malevolent.

Sabus, the same as Sabinus. Vid. Sabinus.

Sacădas, a musician and poet of Argos, who obtained three several times the prize at the Pythian games. Plut. de mus.—Paus. 6, c. 14.

Sacrāta Lex, militaris, A. U. C. 411, by the dictator Valerius Corvus, as some suppose, enacted that the name of no soldier which had been entered in the muster roll should be struck out but by his consent, and that no person who had been a military tribune should execute the office of ductor ordinum.

Sacrum Bellum, a name given to the wars carried on concerning the temple of Delphi. The first began B. C. 448, and in it the Athenians and Lacedæmonians were auxiliaries on opposite sides. The second war began 357 B. C. and was finished nine years after by Philip of Macedonia, who destroyed all the cities of the Phocians. Vid. Phocis.

Sadales, a son of Cotys, king of Thrace, who assisted Pompey with a body of 500 horsemen. Cæs. Bell. G. 3.—Cic. Ver. 1.

Sadyātes, one of the Mermnadæ, who reigned in Lydia 12 years after his father Gyges. He made war against the Milesians for six years. Herodot. 1, c. 16, &c.

Saleius, a poet of great merit in the age of Domitian, yet pinched by poverty, though born of illustrious parents, and distinguished by purity of manners and integrity of mind. Juv. 7, v. 80.—Quint. 10, c. 1.

Salii, a college of priests at Rome instituted in honour of Mars, and appointed by Numa, to take care of the sacred shields called Ancylia, B. C. 709. Vid. Ancyle. They were twelve in number, the three elders among them had the superintendence of all the rest; the first was called præsul, the second vates, and the third magister. Their number was afterwards doubled by Tullus Hostilius, after he had obtained a victory over the Fidenates, in consequence of a vow which he had made to Mars. The Salii were all of patrician families, and the office was very honourable. The first of March was the day on which the Salii observed their festivals in honour of Mars. They were generally dressed in a short scarlet tunic, of which only the edges were seen; they wore a large purple coloured belt about the waist, which was fastened with brass buckles. They had on their heads round bonnets, with two corners standing up, and they wore in their right hand a small rod, and in their left a small buckler. In the observation of their solemnity they first offered sacrifices, and afterwards went through the streets dancing in measured motions, sometimes all together, or at other times separately, while musical instruments were playing before them. They placed their body in different attitudes, and struck with their rods the shields which they held in their hands. They also sung hymns in honour of the gods, particularly of Mars, Juno, Venus, and Minerva, and they were accompanied in the chorus by a certain number of virgins, habited like themselves, and called Saliæ. The Salii instituted by Numa were called Palatini, in contradistinction from the others, because they lived on mount Palatine, and offered their sacrifices there. Those that were added by Tullus were called Collini, Agonales, or Quirinales, from a mountain of the same name, where they had fixed their residence. Their name seems to have been derived a saliendo, or saltando, because, during their festivals, it was particularly requisite that they should leap and dance. Their feasts and entertainments were uncommonly rich and sumptuous, whence dapes saliares is proverbially applied to such repasts as are most splendid and costly. It was usual among the Romans, when they declared war, for the Salii to shake their shields with great violence, as if to call upon the god Mars to come to their assistance. Liv. 1, c. 20.—Varro de L. L. 4, c. 15.—Ovid. Fast. 3, v. 387.—Dionys. 3.—Flor. 1, c. 2, &c.—Virg. Æn. 8, v. 285.

Salinātor, a surname common to the family of the Livii and others.

Salius, an Acarnanian, at the games exhibited by Æneas in Sicily, and killed in the wars with Turnus. It is said by some that he taught the Latins those ceremonies, accompanied with dancing, which afterwards bore his name in the appellation of the Salii. Virg. Æn. 5, v. 298, l. 10, v. 753.

Sallustius, I. (Crispus), has been generally considered as the first among the Romans who merited the title of historian. This celebrated writer was born at Amiternum, in the territory of the Sabines, in the year 668. He received his education at Rome, and, in his early youth, appears to have been desirous to devote himself to literary pursuits. But it was not easy for one residing in the capital to escape the contagious desire of military or political distinction. At the age of twenty-seven, he obtained the situation of quæstor, which entitled him to a seat in the senate, and about six years afterwards he was elected tribune of the people. While in this office, he attached himself to the fortunes of Cæsar, and along with one of his colleagues of the tribunate, conducted the prosecution against Milo for the murder of Clo-dius. In the year 704, he was excluded from the senate, on pretext of immoral conduct, but more probably from the violence of the patrician party, to which he was opposed. Aulus Gellius, on the authority of Varro's treatise, Pius aut de Pace, informs us that he incurred this disgrace in consequence of being surprised in an intrigue with Fausta, the wife of Milo, by the husband, who made him be scourged by his slaves. It has been doubted, however, by modern critics, whether it was the historian Sallust who was thus detected and punished, or his nephew, Crispus Sallustius, to whom Horace has addressed the second ode of the second book. It seems, indeed, unlikely, that in such a corrupt age, an amour with a woman of Fausta's abandoned character, should have been the real cause of his expulsion from the senate. After undergoing this ignominy, which, for the present, baffled all his hopes of preferment, he quitted Rome, and joined his patron, Cæsar, in Gaul. He continued to follow the fortunes of that commander, and, in particular, bore a share in the expedition to Africa, where the scattered remains of Pompey's party had united. That region being finally subdued, Sallust was left by Cæsar as prætor of Numidia; and about the same time he married Terentia, the divorced wife of Cicero. He remained only a year in his government, but during that period he enriched himself by despoiling the province. On his return to Rome, he was accused by the Numidians, whom he had plundered, but escaped with impunity, by means of the protection of Cæsar, and was quietly permitted to betake himself to a luxurious retirement with his ill-gotten wealth. He chose for his favourite retreat a villa at Tibur, which had belonged to Cæsar; and he also built a magnificent palace in the suburbs of Rome, surrounded by delightful pleasure-grounds, which were afterwards well known and celebrated by the name of the Gardens of Sallust. The Sallustian palace and gardens became, after the death of their original proprietor, the residence of successive emperors. Augustus chose them as the scene of his most sumptuous entertainments. The taste of Vespasian preferred them to the palace of the Cæsars. Even the virtuous Nerva, and stern Aurelian, were so attracted by their beauty, that, while at Rome, they were their constant abode. In his urban gardens, or villa at Tibur, Sallust passed the close of his life, dividing his time between literary avocations and the society of his friends—among whom he numbered Lucullus, Messala, and Cornelius Nepos. Such having been his friends and studies, it seems highly improbable that he indulged in that excessive libertinism which has been attributed to him, on the erroneous supposition that he was the Sallust mentioned by Horace in the first book of his Satires. The subject of Sallust's character is one which has excited some investigation and interest, and on which very different opinions have been formed. That he was a man of loose morals is evident; and it cannot be denied that he rapaciously plundered his province, like other Roman governors of the day. But it seems doubtful if he was that monster of iniquity he has been sometimes represented. He was extremely unfortunate in the first permanent notice taken of his character by his contemporaries. The decided enemy of Pompey and his faction, he had said of that celebrated chief, in his general history, that he was a man "oris probi, animo inverecundo." Lenæus, the freedman of Pompey, avenged his master, by the most virulent abuse of his enemy, in a work which should rather be regarded as a frantic satire than an historical document. Of the injustice which he had done to the life of the historian we may, in some degree, judge, from what he said of him as an author. He called him, as we learn from Suetonius, "Nebulonem, vitâ scriptisque monstrosum; præterea, priscorum Catonisque incruditissimum furem." The life of Sallust, by Asconius Pedianus, which was written in the age of Augustus, and might have acted, in the present day, as a corrective, or palliative, of the unfavourable impressions produced by this injurious libel, has unfortunately perished; and the next work on the subject now extant is professedly rhetorical declamation against the character of Sallust, which was given to the world in the name of Cicero, but was not written till long after the death of that orator, and is now generally assigned by critics, to a rhetorician, in the reign of Claudius, called Porcius Latro. The calumnies invented or exaggerated by Lenæus, and propagated in the scholiastic theme of Porcius Latro, have been adopted by Le Clerc, professor of Hebrew at Amsterdam, and by Professor Meisner, of Prague, in their respective accounts of the life of Sallust. His character has received more justice from the prefatory Memoir and Notes of De Brosses, his French translator, and from the researches of Wieland in Germany. The first book of Sallust was the Conspiracy of Catiline. There exists, however, some doubt as to the precise period of its composition. The general opinion is, that it was written immediately after the author went out of office as tribune of the people, that is, in the year 703: and the composition of the Jugurthine War, as well as of his general history, are fixed by Le Clerc between that period and his appointment to the prætorship of Numidia. The subjects chosen by Sallust form two of the most important and prominent topics in the history of Rome. The periods, indeed, which he describes, were painful, but they were interesting. Full of conspiracies, usurpations, and civil wars, they chiefly exhibit the mutual rage and iniquity of imbittered factions, furious struggles between the patricians and plebeians, open corruption in the senate, venality in the courts of justice, and rapine in the provinces. This state of things, so forcibly painted by Sallust, produced the conspiracy, and even in some degree formed the character of Catiline: but it was the oppressive debts of individuals, the temper of Sylla's soldiers, and the absence of Pompey with his army, which gave a possibility, and even prospect of success to a plot which affected the vital existence of the commonwealth, and which, although arrested in its commencement, was one of those violent shocks which hasten the fall of a state. The History of the Jugurthine War, if not so important or menacing to the vital interests and immediate safety of Rome, exhibits a more extensive field of action, and a greater theatre of war. No prince, except Mithridates, gave so much employment to the arms of the Romans. In the course of no war in which they had ever been engaged, not even the second Carthaginian, were the people more desponding, and in none were they more elated with ultimate success. Nothing can be more interesting than the account of the vicissitudes of this contest. The endless resources and hair-breadth escapes of Jugurtha—his levity, his fickle, faithless disposition, contrasted with the perseverance and prudence of the Roman commander, Metellus, are all described in a manner the most vivid and picturesque. In general, Sallust's painting of character is so strong, that we almost foresee how each individual will conduct himself in the situation in which he is placed. Tacitus attributes all the actions of men to policy—to refined, and sometimes imaginary views; but Sallust, more correctly, discovers their chief springs in the passions and dispositions of individuals. Besides the Conspiracy of Catiline and the Jugurthine War, which have been preserved entire, and from which our estimate of the merits of Sallust must be chiefly formed, he was author of a civil and military history of the republic, in five books, entitled, Historia rerum in Republica Romana Gestarum. This work, inscribed to Lucullus, the son of the celebrated commander of that name, was the mature fruit of the genius of Sallust, having been the last history he composed. It included, properly speaking, only a period of thirteen years—extending from the resignation of the dictatorship by Sylla, till the promulgation of the Manilian law, by which Pompey was invested with authority equal to that which Sylla had relinquished, and obtained, with unlimited power in the East, the command of the army destined to act against Mithridates. This period, though short, comprehends some of the most interesting and luminous points which appear in the Roman Annals. During this interval, and almost at the same moment, the republic was attacked in the East by the most powerful and enterprising of the monarchs with whom it had yet waged war; in the West, by one of the most skilful of its own generals; and in the bosom of Italy, by its gladiators and slaves. This work also was introduced by two discourses—the one presenting a picture of the government and manners of the Romans, from the origin of their city to the commencement of the civil wars, the other containing a general view of the dissensions of Marius and Sylla; so that the whole book may be considered as connecting the termination of the Jugurthine war and the breaking out of Catiline's conspiracy. The loss of this valuable production is the more to be regretted, as all the accounts of Roman history which have been written, are defective during the interesting period it comprehended. Nearly 700 fragments belonging to it have been amassed, from scholiasts and grammarians, by De Brosses, the French translator of Sallust; but they are so short and unconnected, that they merely serve as landmarks, from which we may conjecture what subjects were treated of, and what events were recorded. The only parts of the history which have been preserved in any degree entire, are four orations and two letters. Pomponius Lætus discovered the orations in a MS. of the Vatican, containing a collection of speeches from Roman history. The first is an oration pronounced against Sylla by the turbulent Marcus Æmilius Lepidus; who (as is well known) being desirous, at the expiration of his year, to be appointed a second time consul, excited, for that purpose, a civil war, and rendered himself master of a great part of Italy. The second oration, which is that of Lucius Philippus, is an invective against the treasonable attempt of Lepidus, and was calculated to rouse the people from the apathy with which they beheld proceedings that were likely to terminate in the total subversion of the government. The third harangue was delivered by the tribune Licinius; it was an effort of that demagogue to depress the patrician and raise the tribunitial power, for which purpose he alternately flatters the people and reviles the senate. The oration of Marcus Cotta is unquestionably a fine one. He addressed it to the people, during the period of his consulship, in order to calm their minds, and allay their resentment at the bad success of public affairs, which, without any blame on his part, had lately, in many respects, been conducted to an unprosperous issue. Of the two letters which are extant, the one is from Pompey to the senate, complaining, in very strong terms, of the deficiency in the supplies for the army which he commanded in Spain against Sertorius; the other is feigned to be addressed from Mithridates to Arsaces, king of Parthia, and to be written when the affairs of the former monarch were proceeding unsuccessfully. It exhorts him, nevertheless, with great eloquence and power of argument, to join him in an alliance against the Romans: for this purpose, it places in a strong point of view that unprincipled policy, and ambitious desire of universal empire—all which could not, without this device of an imaginary letter by a foe, have been so well urged by a national historian. It concludes with showing the extreme danger which the Parthians would incur from the hostility of the Romans, should they succeed in finally subjugating Pontus and Armenia. The only other fragment, of any length, is the description of a splendid entertainment given to Metellus, on his return, after a year's absence, to his government of Farther Spain. It appears, from several other fragments that Sallust had introduced, on occasion of the Mithridatic war, a geographical account of the shores and countries bordering on the Euxine, in the same manner as he enters into a topographical description of Africa in his history of the Jugurthine war. This part of his work has been much applauded by ancient writers for exactness and liveliness; and is frequently referred to, as the highest authority, by Strabo, Pomponius Mela, and other geographers. Besides his historical works, there exist two political discourses, concerning the administration of the government, in the form of letters to Julius Cæsar, which have generally, though not on sufficient grounds, been attributed to the pen of Sallust. The best editions of Sallust are those of Anthon, New-York, 1836; of Haverkamp, 2 vols. 4to. Amst. 1742; and of Edinburgh, 12mo. 1755. Quintil. 10, c. 1.—Suet. de Gram. in Cæs.—Martial. 14, ep. 191.——II. A nephew of the historian by whom he was adopted. He imitated the moderation of Mæcenas, and remained satisfied with the dignity of a Roman knight, when he could have made himself powerful by the favours of Augustus and Tiberius. He was very effeminate and luxurious. Horace dedicated 2, od. 2, to him. Tacit. Ann. 1.—Plin. 34.—— III. Secundus Promotus, a native of Gaul, very intimate with the emperor, Julian. He is remarkable for his integrity and the soundness of his counsels. Julian made him prefect of Gaul. —— There is also another Sallust, called Secundus, whom some have improperly confounded with Promotus. Secundus was also one of Julian's favourites, and was made by him prefect of the East. He conciliated the good graces of the Romans by the purity of his morals, his fondness for discipline, and his religious principles. After the death of the emperor Jovian, he was universally named by the officers of the Roman empire to succeed to the imperial throne; but he refused this great though dangerous honour, and pleaded infirmities of body and old age. The Romans wished upon this to invest his son with the imperial purple, but Secundus opposed it, and observed that he was too young to support the dignity.

Salonina, a celebrated matron, who married the emperor Gallienus, and distinguished herself by her private as well as public virtues. She was a patroness of all the fine arts; and to her clemency, mildness and benevolence, Rome was indebted some time for her peace and prosperity. She accompanied her husband in some of his expeditions, and often called him away from the pursuits of pleasure to make war against the enemies of Rome. She was put to death by the hands of the conspirators, who also assassinated her husband and family about the year 268 of the Christian era.

Salonīnus, I. a son of Asinius Pollio. He received his name from the conquest of Salona, by his father. Some suppose that he is the hero of Virgil's fourth eclogue, in which he return of the golden age is so warmly and beautifully anticipated.——II. P. Licinius Cornelius, a son of Gallienus, by Salonina, sent into Gaul, there to be taught the art of war. He remained there some time, till the usurper Posthumius arose and proclaimed himself emperor. Saloninus was upon this delivered up to his enemy, and put to death in the 10th year of his age.

Salvian, one of the fathers of the 5th century, of whose works the best edition is the 12mo. Paris, 1684.

Salvius, a flute-player saluted king by the rebellious slaves of Sicily in the age of Marius. He maintained for some time war against the Romans.

Samnītes. Vid. Part I.

Sanchoniathon, a Phœnician historian, born at Berytus, or, according to others, at Tyre. He flourished a few years before the Trojan war, and wrote, in the language of his country, a history in nine books, in which he amply treated of the theology and antiquities of Phœnicia and the neighbouring places. It was compiled from the various records found in cities, and the annals which were usually kept in the temples of the gods among the ancients. This history was translated into Greek by Philo, a native of Byblus, who lived in the reign of the emperor Adrian. Some few fragments of this Greek translation are extant. Some, however, suppose them to be spurious, while others contend that they are true and authentic.

Sandrocottus, an Indian of a mean origin. His impertinence to Alexander was the beginning of his greatness; the conqueror ordered him to be seized, but Sandrocottus fled away, and at last dropped down overwhelmed with fatigue. As he slept on the ground, a lion came to him and gently licked the sweat from his face. This uncommon tameness of the animal appeared supernatural to Sandrocottus, and raised his ambition. He aspired to the monarchy, and after the death of Alexander he made himself master of a part of the country which was in the hands of Seleucus. Justin. 15, c. 4.

Sannyrion, a tragic poet of Athens. He composed many dramatic pieces, one of which was called Io, and another Danae. Athens. 9.

Sapor, a king of Persia, who succeeded his father Artaxerxes about the 238th year of the Christian era. Naturally fierce and ambitious, Sapor wished to increase his paternal dominions by conquest; and as the indolence of the emperors of Rome seemed favourable to his views, he laid waste the provinces of Mesopotamia, Syria, and Cilicia; and he might have become master of all Asia, if Odenatus had not stopped his progress. If Gordian attempted to repel him, his efforts were weak, and Philip, who succeeded him on the imperial throne, bought the peace of Sapor with money. Valerian, who was afterwards invested with the purple, marched against the Persian monarch, but he was defeated and taken prisoner. Odenatus no sooner heard that the Roman emperor was a captive in the hands of Sapor, than he attempted to release him by force of arms. The forces of Persia were cut to pieces, the wives and the treasures of the monarch fell into the hands of the conqueror, and Odenatus penetrated, with little opposition, into the very heart of the kingdom. Sapor, soon after this defeat, was assassinated by his subjects, A. D. 273, after a reign of 32 years. He was succeeded by his son, called Hormisdas. Marcellin. &c. ——The 2d of that name succeeded his father Hormisdas on the throne of Persia. He was as great as his ancestor of the same name; and by undertaking a war against the Romans, he attempted to enlarge his dominions, and to add the provinces on the west of the Euphrates to his empire. His victories alarmed the Roman emperors, and Julian would have perhaps seized him in the capital of his dominions, if he had not received a mortal wound. Jovian, who succeeded Julian, made peace with Sapor; but the monarch, always restless and indefatigable, renewed hostilities, invaded Armenia, and defeated the emperor Valens. Sapor died A. D. 308, after a reign of 70 years, in which he had often been the sport of fortune. He was succeeded by Artaxerxes, and Artaxerxes by Sapor the third, a prince who died after a reign of five years, A. D. 389, in the age of Theodosius the Great. Marcellin. &c.

Sappho, or Sapho, celebrated for her beauty, her poetical talents, and her amorous disposition, was born in the island of Lesbos, about 600 years before Christ. Her father's name, according to Herodotus, was Scamandronymus, or, according to others, Symon, or Semus, or Etarchus, and her mother's name was Cleis. She conceived such a passion for Phaon, a youth of Mitylene, that upon his refusal to gratify her desires, she threw herself into the sea from mount Leucas. She had composed nine books in lyric verses, besides epigrams, elegies, &c. Of all these compositions nothing now remains but two fragments. Her compositions were all extant in the age of Horace. The Lesbians were so sensible of the merits of Sappho, that after her death they paid her divine honours, and raised her temples and altars, and stamped their money with her image. The Sapphic verse has been called after her name. Ovid. Heroid. 15. Tvist. 2. v. 365.—Horat. 2, Od. 13.—Herodot. 2, c. 135.—Stat. 5. Sylv. 3, v. 155.—*Ælian. V. Sardanapălus, the 40th and last king of Assyria, celebrated for his luxury and voluptuousness. His effeminacy irritated his officers; Bolesis and Arsaces conspired against him, and collected a numerous force to dethrone him. The rebels were defeated in three successive battles, but at last Sardanapalus was beaten and besieged in the city of Ninus for two years. When he despaired of success, he burned himself in his palace, with his eunuchs, concubines, and all his treasures; and the empire of Assyria was divided among the conspirators. This famous event happened B. C. 820, according to Eusebius; though Justin and others, with less probability, place it 80 years earlier. Sardanapalus was made a god after death. Herodot, 2, c. 150.—Diod. 2.—Strab. 14.—Cic. Tusc. 5, c. 35.

Saturnālia, festivals in honour of Saturn; celebrated the 16th or the 17th, or, according to others, the 18th of December. Some suppose that the Saturnalia were first observed at Rome in the reign of Tullus Hostilius, after a victory obtained over the Sabines; while others support that Janus first instituted them in gratitude to Saturn, from whom he had learned agriculture. Others suppose that they were first celebrated in the year of Rome 257, after a victory obtained over the Latins by the dictator of Posthumius. The Saturnalia were originally celebrated only for one day, but afterwards the solemnity continued for 3, 4, 5, and at last for 7 days. The celebration was remarkable for the liberty which universally prevailed. The slaves were permitted to ridicule their masters, and to speak with freedom upon every subject. It was usual for friends to make presents one to another. In the sacrifices the priests made their offerings with their heads uncovered, a custom which was never observed at other festivals. Sencc. ep. 18.—*Cato. de R. Saturnīnus, (P. Sempronius,) I. a general of Valerian, proclaimed emperor in Egypt by his troops. His integrity, his complaisance and affability, had gained him the affection of the people; but his fondness of ancient discipline provoked his soldiers, who wantonly murdered him in the 43d year of his age, A. D. 262.——II. Sextius Junius, a Gaul, intimate with Aurelian. The emperor esteemed him greatly, not only for his private virtues, but for his abilities as a general. He was saluted emperor at Alexandria, and compelled by the clamorous army to accept of the purple. Probus, who was then emperor, marched his forces against him, and besieged him in Apamea, where he destroyed himself when unable to make head against his powerful adversary.——III. Appuleius, a tribune of the people, who raised a sedition at Rome, intimidated the senate, and tyrannised for three years. Meeting at last with opposition, he seized the capitol, but being induced by the hopes of a reconciliation to trust himself amidst the people, he was suddenly torn to pieces. His sedition has received the name of Appuleiana in the Roman annals. Flor.——IV. Lucius, a seditious tribune, who supported the oppression of Marius. He was at last put to death on account of his tumultuous disposition. Plut. in Mario.—Flor. 5. c. 16.——V. Pompeius, a writer in the reign of Trajan. He was greatly esteemed by Pliny, who speaks of him with great warmth and approbation as an historian, a poet, and an orator. Pliny always consulted the opinion of Saturninus before he published his compositions.

Satȳrus, I. a Rhodian, sent by his countrymen to Rome, when Eumenes had accused some of the allies of intentions to favour the interest of Macedonia against the republic.——II. A peripatetic philosopher and historian, who flourished B. C. 148.——III. A tyrant of Heraclea, 346 B. C.——IV. An architect who, together with Petus, is said to have planned and built the celebrated tomb which Artemisia had erected to the memory of Mausolus, and which became one of the wonders of the world. The honour of erecting it is ascribed to others.

Scantilla, the wife of Didius Julianus. It was by her advice that her husband bought the empire which was exposed to sale at the death of Pertinax.

Scapŭla, a native of Corduba, who defended the town against Cæsar, after the battle of Munda. When he saw that all his efforts were useless against the Roman general, he destroyed himself. Cæs. Bell. H. 33.

Scatinia Lex de pudicitia, by C. Scatinius Aricinus, the tribune, was enacted against such as prostituted themselves to any unnatural service. The penalty was originally a fine, but it was afterwards made a capital crime under Augustus. It is sometimes called Scatinia, from a certain Scantinius upon whom it was first executed.

Scaurus, I. (M. Æmilius,) a Roman consul, who distinguished himself by his eloquence at the bar, and by his successes in Spain in the capacity of commander. He was sent against Jugurtha, and some time after accused of suffering himself to be bribed by the Numidian prince. Scaurus conquered the Ligurians, and in his censorship he built the Milvian bridge at Rome, and began to pave the road, which from him was called the Æmilian. He was originally very poor. He wrote some books, and among these a history of his own life, all now lost. His son of the same name, made himself known by the large theatre he built during his edileship. Scaurus married Murcia. Cic. in Brut.—Val. Max. 4, c. 4.—Plin. 34, c.

7, l. 36, c. 2.——II. A Roman of consular dignity. When the Cimbri invaded Italy, the son of Scaurus behaved with great cowardice, upon which the father sternly ordered him never to appear again in the field of battle. The severity of this command renderedyoung Scaurus melancholy, and he plunged a sword into his own heart, to free himself from farther ignominy.——III. Aurelius, a Roman consul taken prisoner by the Gauls. He was put to a cruel death because he told the king of the enemy not to cross the Alps to invade Italy, which was universally deemed unconquerable.——IV. M. Æmilius, a man in the reign of Tiberius, accused of adultery with Livia, and put to death. He was an eloquent orator, but very lascivious and debauched in his morals.——V. Terentius, a Latin grammarian. He had been preceptor to the emperor Adrian. A. Gellius. 11, c. 15.

Scipio, a celebrated family at Rome, who obtained the greatest honours in the republic. The name seems to be derived from scipio, which signifies a stick, because one of the family had conducted his blind father, and had been to him as a stick. The Scipios were a branch of the Cornelian family. The most illustrious were—I. P. Corn. a man made master of horse by Camillus, &c.——II. A Roman dictator. ——III. L. Cornel, a consul, A. U. C. 454, who defeated the Etrurians near Volaterra. ——IV. Another consul, A. U. C. 493.——V. Cn. surnamed Asina, was consul A. U. C. 492. and 498. He was conquered in his first consulship in a naval battle, and lost 17 ships. The following year he took Aleria in Corsica, and defeated Hanno, the Carthaginian general, in Sardinia. He also took 200 of the enemy's ships, and the city of Panormum in Sicily. He was father to Publius and Cneus Scipio.—— VI. Publius, in the beginning of the second Punic war, was sent with an army to Spain to oppose Annibal; but when he heard that his enemy had passed over into Italy, he attempted, by his quick marches and secret evolutions, to stop his progress. He was conquered by Annibal near the Ticinus, where his son saved his life. He again passed into Spain, where he obtained some memorable victories over the Carthaginians and the inhabitants of the country. His brother Cneus shared the supreme command with him, but their great confidence proved their ruin. They separated their armies, and soon after Publius was furiously attacked by the two Asdrubals and Mago, who commanded the Carthaginian armies. The forces of Publius were too few to resist with success the three Carthaginian generals. Tho Romans were cut to pieces, and their commander was left on the field of battle. No sooner had the enemy obtained this victory than they immediately marched to meet Cneus Scipio, whom the revolt of 30,000 Celtiberians had weakened and alarmed. The general, who was already apprized of his brother's death, secured an eminence, where he was soon surrounded on all sides. After desperate acts of valour he was left among the slain, or, according to some, he fled into a tower, where he was burnt with some of his friends by the victorious enemy. Liv. 21, &c.—Polyb. 4.—Flor. 2, c. 6, &c.—Eutrop. 3, c. 8, &c.——VII. Publius Cornelius, surnamed Africanus, was son of Publius Scipio, who was killed in Spain. He first distinguished himself at the battle of Ticinus, where he saved his father's life by deeds of unexampled valour and boldness. The battle of Cannæ which proved so fatal to the Roman arms, instead of disheartening Scipio, raised his expectations, and he no sooner heard that some of his desperate countrymen wished to abandon Italy, and to fly from the insolence of the conqueror, than with sword in hand he obliged them to swear eternal fidelity to Rome, and to put to immediate death the first man who attempted to retire from his country. In his 21st year Scipio was made an edile, an honourable office, which was never given but to such as had reached their 27th year. Some time after, the Romans were alarmed by the intelligence that the commanders of their forces in Spain, Publius and Cneus Scipio, had been slaughtered, and immediately young Scipio was appointed to avenge the death of his father and of his uncle, and to vindicate the military honour of the republic. It was soon known how able he was to be at the head of an army; the various nations of Spain were conquered, and in four years the Carthaginians were banished from that part of the continent, and the whole province became tributary to Rome; new Carthage submitted in one day, and in a battle 54,000 of the enemy were left dead on the field. After these signal victories, Scipio was recalled to Rome, which still trembled at the continual alarms of Annibal, who was at their gates. The conqueror of the Carthaginians in Spain was looked upon as a proper general to encounter Annibal in Italy; but Scipio opposed the measures which his countrymen wished to pursue, and he declared in the senate that if Annibal was to be conquered, he must be conquered in Africa. These bold measures were immediately adopted, though opposed by the eloquence, age, and experience of the great Fabius, and Scipio was empowered to conduct the war on the coasts of Africa. With the dignity of consul he embarked for Carthage. Success attended his arms, his conquests were here as rapid as in Spain; the Carthaginian armies were routed, the camp of the crafty Asdrubal was set on fire during the night, and his troops totally defeated. These repeated losses alarmed Carthage; Annibal, who was victorious at the gates of Rome, was instantly recalled to defend the walls of his country, and the two greatest generals of the age met each other in the field. This celebrated battle was fought near Zama. About 20,000 Carthaginians were slain, and the same number made prisoners of war, B. C. 202. Only 200 of the Romans were killed. The battle was decisive; the Carthaginians sued for peace, which Scipio granted on the most severe and humiliating terms. The conqueror, after this returned to Rome, where he was received with the most unbounded applause, honoured with a triumph, and dignified with the appellation of Africanus. He offended the populace, however, in wishing to distinguish the senators from the rest of the people at the public exhibitions; and when he canvassed for the consulship for two of his friends, he had the mortification to see his application slighted. He retired from Rome, no longer to be spectator of the ingratitude of his countrymen; and in the capacity of lieutenant he accompanied his brother against Antiochus, king of Syria. In this expedition his arms were attended with usual success, and the Asiatic monarch submitted to the conditions which the conquerors dictated. At his return to Rome, Africanus found the malevolence of his enemies still unabated. Cato, his inveterate rival, raised seditions against him and the Petilii, two tribunes of the people, accused the conqueror of Annibal of extortion in the provinces of Asia, and of living in an indolent and luxurious manner. Scipio condescended to answer to the accusation of his calumniators; the first day was spent in hearing the different charges, but when he again appeared on the second day of his trial, the accused interrupted his judges, and exclaimed, Tribunes and fellow-citizens, on this day, this very day, did I conquer Annibal and the Carthaginians: come, therefore, with me, Romans; let us go to the capitol, and there return our thanks to the immortal gods for the victories which have attended our arms. These words had the desired effect; all the assembly followed Scipio, and the tribunes were left alone in the seat of judgment. Yet when this memorable day was past, Africanus was a third time summoned to appear; but he had retired to his country-house at Liternum. The accusation, however, was stopped when one of the tribunes, formerly distinguished for his malevolence against Scipio, rose to defend him, and declared in the assembly, that it reflected the highest disgrace on the Roman people that the conqueror of Annibal should be exposed to the malice and envy of disappointed ambition. Some time after, Scipio died in the place of his retreat, about 184 years before Christ, in the 48th year of his age; and so great an aversion did he express, as he expired, for the depravity of the Romans and the ingratitude of their senators, that he ordered his bones not to be conveyed to Rome. They were accordingly inhumated at Liternum, where his wife Æmilia, the daughter of Paulus Æmilius, who fell at the battle of Cannæ, raised a mausoleum on his tomb, and placed upon it his statue, with that of the poet Ennius, who had been the companion of his peace and of his retirement. If Scipio was robbed during his lifetime of the honours which belonged to him as a conqueror of Africa, he was not forgotten when dead. The Romans viewed his character with reverence; with raptures they read of his warlike actions, and Africanus was regarded in the following age as a pattern of virtue, of innocence, courage, and liberality. As a general, the fame and the greatness of his conquests explain his character; and indeed we hear that Annibal declared himself inferior to no general that ever lived except Alexander the Great, and Pyrrhus king of Epirus; and when Scipio asked him what rank he would claim if he had conquered him, the Carthaginian general answered, If I had conquered you, Scipio, I would call myself greater than the conqueror of Darius and the ally of the Tarentines. As an instance of Scipio's continence, ancient authors have recorded that he refused to see a beautiful princess that had fallen into his hands after the taking of New Carthage; and that he not only restored her inviolate to her parents, but also added immense presents for the person to whom she was betrothed. It was to the artful complaisance of Africanus that the Romans owed their alliance with Masinissa, king of Numidia, and also that with King Syphax. The friendship of Scipio and Lælius is well known. Polyb. 6.—Plut.—Flor. 2, c. 6.—Cic. in Brut. &c.—Eutrop.——II. Lucius Cornelius, surnamed Asiaticus, accompanied his brother Africanus in his expeditions in Spain and Africa. He was rewarded with the consulship, A. U. C. 562, for his services to the state, and he was empowered to attack Antiochus, king of Syria, who had declared war against the Romans. Lucius was accompanied in this campaign by his brother Africanus; and by his own valour, and the advice of the conquerors of Annibal, he routed the enemy in a battle near the city of Sardis. Peace was soon after settled by the submission of Antiochus, and the conqueror, at his return home, obtained a triumph, and the surname of Asiaticus. He did not, however, long enjoy his prosperity. Cato, after the death of Africanus, turned his fury against Asiaticus, and the two Petilii, his devoted favourites, presented a petition to the people, in which they prayed that an inquiry might be made to know what money had been received from Antiochus and his allies. The petition was instantly received, and Asiaticus was summoned to appear before Terentius Culeo, who was on this occasion created prætor. The judge, who was an inveterate enemy to the family of the Scipios, soon found Asiaticus, with his two lieutenants, and his quæstor, guilty of having received, the first 6000 pounds weight of gold and 480 pounds weight of silver, and the others nearly an equal sum, from the monarch against whom, in the name of the Roman people, they were enjoined to make war. Immediately they were condemned to pay large fines; but while the others gave security, Scipio declared that he had accounted to the public for all the money that he had brought from Asia, and therefore that he was innocent. For this obstinacy he was dragged to prison, but his cousin Nasica pleaded his cause before the people, and the prætor instantly ordered the goods of the prisoner to be seized and confiscated. The sentence was executed, but the effects of Scipio were insufficient to pay the fine, and it was the greatest justification of his innocence, that whatever was found in his house had never been in the possession of Antiochus or his subjects. This, however, did not totally liberate him, he was reduced to poverty, and refused to accept the offers of his friends and of his clients. Some time after he was appointed to settle the disputes between Eumenes and Seleucus, and at his return, the Romans, ashamed of their severity towards him, rewarded his merit with such uncommon liberality, that Asiaticus was enabled to celebrate games in honour of his victory over Antiochus, for ten successive days, at his own expense. Liv. 38, c. 55, &c.—Eutrop. 4.——III. Nasica, was son of Cneus Scipio and cousin to Scipio Africanus. He was refused the consulship, though supported by the interest and the fame of the conqueror of Annibal. Afterwards, having obtained it, he conquered the Boii, and gained a triumph. He was also successful in an expedition which he undertook in Spain. When the statue of Cybele was brought to Rome from Phrygia, the Roman senate delegated one of their body, who was the most remarkable for the innocence of his life, to go and meet the goddess in the harbour of Ostia. Nisica was the object of their choice. He distinguished himself by the active part he took in confuting the accusations laid against the two Scipios, Africanus and Asiaticus. There was also another of the same name, who distinguished himself by his enmity against the Gracchi, to whom he was nearly related. Paterc. 2, c. 1, &c.—Flor. 2, c. 15.—Liv. 29, c. 14. &c.—IV. Publ. Æmilianus, son of Paulus, the conqueror of Perseus, was adopted by the son of Scipio Africanus. He received the same surname as his grandfather, and was called Africanus the younger, on account of his victories over Carthage. Æmilianus first appeared in the Roman armies under his father, and afterwards distinguished himself as a legionary tribune in the Spanish provinces. He passed into Africa to demand a reinforcement from King Masinissa, the ally of Rome; and he was the spectator of a long and bloody battle which was fought between that monarch and the Carthaginians, and which soon produced the third Punic war. Some time after Æmilianus was made edile, and next appointed consul, though under the age required for that important office. The surname which he had received from his grandfather he was doomed lawfully to claim as his own. He was empowered to finish the war with Carthage, and as he was permitted by the senate to choose his colleague, he took with him his friend Lælius, whose father of the same name had formerly enjoyed the confidence and shared the victories of the first Africanus. The siege of Carthage was already begun, but the operations of the Romans were not continued with vigour. Scipio had no sooner appeared before the walls of the enemy than every communication with the land was cut off; and, that they might not have the command of the sea, a stupendous mole was thrown across the harbour with immense labour and expense. All the inhabitants, without distinction of rank, age, or sex, employed themselves without cessation to dig another harbour, and to build and equip another fleet. In a short time, in spite of the vigilance and activity of Æmilianus, the Romans were astonished to see another harbour formed, and 50 galleys suddenly issuing under sail, ready for the engagement. This unexpected fleet, by immediately attacking the Roman ships, might have gained the victory, but the delay of the Carthaginians proved fatal to their cause, and the enemy had sufficient time to prepare themselves. Scipio soon got possession of a small eminence in the harbour, and by his subsequent operations, he broke open one of the gates of the city, and entered the streets, where he made his way by fire and sword. The surrender of about 50,000 men was followed by the reduction of the citadel, and the total submission of Carthage, B. C. 147. The captive city was set on fire, and though Scipio was obliged to demolish its very walls to obey the orders of the Romans, yet he wept bitterly over the melancholy and tragical scene; and in bewailing the miseries of Carthage, he expressed his fears lest Rome, in her turn, in some future age, should exhibit such a dreadful conflagration. The return of Æmilianus to Rome was that of another conqueror of Annibal; and, like him, he was honoured with a magnificent triumph, and received the surname of Africanus. He was chosen consul a second time, and appointed to finish the war which the Romans had hitherto carried on without success against Numantia. The fall of Numantia was more noble than that of the capital of Africa, and the conqueror of Carthage obtained the victory only when the enemies had been consumed by famine or by self-destruction, B. C. 133. From his conquests in Spain, Æmilianus was honoured with a second triumph, and with the surname of Numantinus. Yet his popularity was short, and, by telling the people that the murder of their favourite, his brother-in-law Gracchus, was lawful, Scipio incurred the displeasure of the tribunes, and was received with hisses. His firmness, however, silenced the murmurs of the assembly, and some time after he retired from the clamours of Rome to Caieta, where, with his friend Lælius, he passed the rest of his time in innocent pleasures and amusements. Though fond of retirement and literary ease, yet Scipio often interested himself in the affairs of the state. His enemies accused him of aspiring to the dictatorship, and the clamours were most loud against him when he had opposed the Sempronian law, and declared himself the patron of the inhabitants of the provinces of Italy. This active part of Scipio was seen with pleasure by the friends of the republic, and not only the senate, but also the citizens, the Latins, and neighbouring states, conducted their illustrious friend and patron to his house. It seemed also the universal wish that the troubles might be quieted by the election of Scipio to the dictatorship, and many presumed that that honour would be on the morrow conferred upon him. In this, however, the expectations of Rome were frustrated, Scipio was found dead in his bed to the astonishment of the world; and those who inquired for the causes of this sudden death perceived violent marks on his neck, and concluded that he had been strangled, B. C. 128. This assassination, as it was then generally believed, was committed by the triumvirs, Papirius Carbo, C. Gracchus, and Fulvius Flaccus, who supported the Sempronian law, and by his wife Sempronia, who is charged with having introduced the murderers into his room. No inquiries were made after the authors of his death; Gracchus was the favourite of the mob, and the only atonement which the populace made for the death of Scipio was to attend his funeral, and to show their concern by their cries and loud lamentations. Æmilianus, like his grandfather, was fond of literature, and he saved from the flames of Carthage many valuable compositions, written by Phœnician and Punic authors. In the midst of his greatness he died poor, and his nephew, Q. Fabius Maximus, who inherited his estate, scarce found in his house thirty-two pounds weight of silver, and two and a half of gold. His liberality to his brother and to his sisters deserves the greatest commendations; and, indeed, no higher encomium can be passed upon his character, private as well as public, than the words of his rival Metellus, who told his sons, at the death of Scipio, to go and attend the funeral of the greatest man that ever lived or should live in Rome. Liv. 44, &c.—*Cic. de Senect. He adopted as his son young Æmilianus, the son of Paulus Æmilius, who was afterwards surnamed Africanus. Like his father Scipio, he distinguished himself by his fondness for literature and his valour in the Roman armies.——VI. Metellus, the father-in-law of Pompey, appointed commander in Macedonia. He was present at the battle of Pharsalia, and afterwards retired to Africa with Cato. He was defeated by Cæsar at Thapsus. Plut.——VII. Salutio, a mean person in Cæsar's army in Africa. The general appointed him his chief commander, either to ridicule him, or because there was an ancient oracle that declared that the Scipios would ever be victorious in Africa. Plut.——VIII. L. Cornelius, a consul who opposed Sylla. He was at last deserted by his army and proscribed.

Scopas, I. an architect and sculptor of Ephesus, for some time employed in making the mausoleum which Artemisia raised to her husband. One of his statues of Venus was among the antiquities with which Rome was adorned. Scopas lived about 430 years before Christ. Paus. 1, c. 43, &c.——Horat. 4, Od. 8.—Virg. 9, c. 9.—Plin. 34, c. 8. l. 36, c. 5.——II. He afterwards conspired against the Egyptian monarch, and was put to death, B. C. 196.

Scordisci, and Scordiscæ. Vid. Part III.

Scribonia, a daughter of Scribonius, who married Augustus after he had divorced Claudia. He had by her a daughter, the celebrated Julia. Scribonia was some time after repudiated that Augustus might marry Livia. She had been married twice before she became the wife of the emperor. Sueton. in Aug. 62.

Scylax, a geographer and mathematician of Caria, in the age of Darius, son of Hystaspes, about 550 years before Christ. He was commissioned by Darius to make discoveries in the East, and after a journey of 30 months he visited Egypt. Some suppose that he was the first who invented geographical tables. The latest edition of the Periplus of Scylax, is that of Gronovius, 4to. L. Bat. 1597.—Herodot. 4, c. 44.—Strab.

Scyllis and Dipœnus, statuaries of Crete, before the age of Cyrus, king of Persia. They were said to be sons and pupils of Dædalus, and they established a school at Sicyon, where they taught the principles of their profession. Paus.—Plin. 36, c. 4.

Scylūrus, a monarch who left 80 sons. He called them to his bedside as he expired, and by enjoining them to break a bundle of sticks tied together, and afterwards separately, he convinced them that when altogether firmly united their power would be insuperable, but if ever disunited, they would fall an easy prey to their enemies. Plut. de garr.

Sejānus, Ælius, a native of Vulsinum in Tuscany, who distinguished himself in the court of Tiberius. His father's name was Seius Strabo, a Roman knight, commander of the prætorian guards. His mother was descended from the Junian family. Sejanus first gained the favour of Caius Cæsar, the grandson of Augustus, but afterwards he attached himself to the interest and the views of Tiberius, who then sat on the imperial throne. The emperor, while he distrusted others, communicated his greatest secrets to his fawning favourite. Sejanus improved his confidence, and when he had found that he possessed the esteem of Tiberius, he next endeavoured to become the favourite of the soldiers and of the senate. As commander of the prætorian guards he was the second man in Rome, and in that important office he made use of every mean artifice to make himself beloved. His affability and condescension gained him the hearts of the common soldiers, and by appointing his own favourites and adherents to places of trust and honour, all the officers and centurions of the army became devoted to his interest. The views of Sejanus in this were well known; yet to advance with more success, he attempted to gain the affection of the senators. In this he met with no opposition. A man who had the disposal of places of honour and dignity, and who had the command of the public money, cannot but be a favourite of those who are in need of his assistance. It is even said that Sejanus gained to his views all the wives of the senators by a private and most secret promise of marriage to each of them whenever he had made himself independent and sovereign of Rome. Yet, however successful with the best and noblest families in the empire, Sejanus had to combat numbers in the house of the emperor; but these seeming obstacles were soon removed. All the children and grandchildren of Tiberius were sacrificed to the ambition of the favourite under various pretences; and Drusus, the son of the emperor, by striking Sejanus, made his destruction sure and inevitable. Livia, the wife of Drusus, was gained by Sejanus, and, though the mother of many children, she was prevailed upon to assist her adulterer in the murder of her husband, and she consented to marry him when Drusus was dead. No sooner was Drusus poisoned, than Sejanus openly declared his wish to marry Livia. This was strongly opposed by Tiberius; and the emperor, by recommending Germanicus to the senators for his successor, rendered Sejanus bold and determined. He was more urgent in his demands; and when he could not gain the consent of the emperor, he persuaded him to retire to solitude from the noise of Rome and the troubles of the government. Tiberius, naturally fond of ease and luxury, yielded to his representations, and retired to Campania, leaving Sejanus at the head of the empire. This was highly gratifying to the favourite, and he was now without a master. Prudence and moderation might have made him what he wished to be, but he offended the whole empire when he declared that he was emperor of Rome, and Tiberius only the dependant prince of the island of Capreæ, where he had retired. Tiberius was upon this fully convinced of the designs of Sejanus, and when he had been informed that his favourite had had the meanness and audacity to ridicule him by introducing him on the stage, the emperor ordered him to be accused before the senate. Sejanus was deserted by all his pretended friends as soon as by fortune; and the man who aspired to the empire, and who called himself the favourite of the people, the darling of the prætorian guards, and the companion of Tiberius, was seized without resistance, and the same day strangled in prison, A. D. 31. His remains were exposed to the fury and insolence of the populace, and afterwards thrown into the Tiber. His children and all his relations were involved in his ruin, and Tiberius sacrificed to his resentment and suspicions all those who were even connected with Sejanus, or had shared his favours and enjoyed his confidence. Tacit. 3, Ann. &c.—Dio. 58.—Suet. in Tib.

Seius, Cn. a Roman who had a famous horse, of large size and uncommon beauty. He was put to death by Antony, and it was observed, that whoever obtained possession of his horse, which was supposed to be of the same race as the horses of Diomedes destroyed by Hercules, and which was called Sejanus equus, became unfortunate, and lost all his property, with every member of his family. Hence arose the proverb, ille homo habet Sejanum equum, applied to such as were oppressed with misfortunes. Au. Gellius, 3, c. 9.

Seius Strabo, the father of Sejanus, was a Roman knight, and commander of the prætorian guards.

Selene, the wife of Antiochus, king of Syria, put to death by Tigranes, king of Armenia. She was daughter of Physcon, king of Egypt, and had first married her brother Lathurus, according to the custom of her country, and afterwards by desire of her mother, her other brother Gryphus. At the death of Gryphus, she had married Antiochus, surnamed Eusebes, the son of Antiochus Cyzicenus, by whom she had two sons. According to Appian, she first married the father, and after his death, his son Eusebes. Appian. Syr. &c.

Seleucidæ, a surname given to those monarchs who sat on the throne of Syria, which was founded by Seleucus the son of Antiochus, from whom the word is derived. The era of the Seleucidæ begins with the taking of Babylon by Seleucus, B. C. 312, and ends at the conquest of Syria by Pompey, B. C. 65. The order in which these monarchs reigned is shown in the account of Syria. Vid. Syria.

Seleucus, 1st, one of the captains of Alexander the Great, surnamed Nicator or Victorious, was son of Antiochus. After the king's death he received Babylon as his province; but his ambitious views, and his attempt to destroy Eumenes as he passed through his territories, rendered him so unpopular that he fled for safety to the court of his friend Ptolemy, king of Egypt. He was soon after enabled to recover Babylon, which Antigonus had seized in his absence, and he increased his dominions by the immediate conquest of Media, and some of the neighbouring provinces. When he had strengthened himself in his empire, Seleucus imitated the example of the rest of the generals of Alexander, and assumed the title of independent monarch. He afterwards made war against Antigonus, with the united forces of Ptolemy, Cassander, and Lysimachus; and after this monarch had been conquered and slain, his territories were divided among his victorious enemies. When Seleucus became master of Syria, he built a city there, which he called Antioch, in honour of his father, and made it the capital of his dominions. He also made war against Demetrius and Lysimachus, though he had originally married Stratonice, the daughter of the former, and had lived in the closest friendship with the latter. Seleucus was at last murdered by one of his servants, called Ptolemy Ceraunus, a man on whom he bestowed the greatest favours. According to Arrian, Seleucus was the greatest and most powerful of the princes who inherited the Macedonian empire after the death of Alexander. His benevolence has been commended; and it has been observed, that he conquered not to enslave nations, but to make them more happy. He founded no less than 34 cities in different parts of his empire, which he peopled with Greek colonies, whose national industry, learning, religion, and spirit, were communicated to the indolent and luxurious inhabitants of Asia. Seleucus was a great benefactor to the Greeks, he restored to the Athenians the library and statues which Xerxes had carried away from their city when he invaded Greece, and among them were those of Harmodius and Aristogiton. Seleucus was murdered 280 years before the Christian era, in the 32d year of his reign, and the 78th, or, according to others, the 73d year of his age, as he was going to conquer Macedonia, where he intended to finish his days in peace and tranquillity in that province where he was born. He was succeeded by Antiochus Soter. Justin. 13, c. 4, l. 15, c. 4, l. 16, c. 3, &c.—Plut. in Dem.—Plin. 6, c. 17.—Paus. 8, c. 51.—Joseph. Ant. 12.——The 2d, surnamed Callinicus, succeeded his father Antiochus Theus on the throne of Syria. He attempted to make war against Ptolemy, king of Egypt, but his fleet was shipwrecked in a violent storm, and his armies soon after conquered by his enemy. He was at last taken prisoner by Arsaces, an officer who made himself powerful by the dissensions which reigned in the house of the Seleucidæ, between the two brothers, Seleucus and Antiochus; and after he had been a prisoner for some time in Parthia, he died of a fall from his horse, B. C. 226, after a reign of 20 years. Seleucus had received the surname of Pogon, from his long beard, and that of Callinicus, ironically to express his very unfortunate reign. He had married Laodice, the sister of one of his generals, by whom he had two sons, Seleucus and Antiochus, and a daughter whom he gave in marriage to Mithridates king of Pontus. Strab. 16.—Justin. 27.—Appian. de Syr.——The 3d, succeeded his father Seleucus 2d, on the throne of Syria, and received the surname of Ceraunus, by antiphrasis, as he was a very weak, timid, and irresolute monarch. He was murdered by two of his officers after a reign of three years, B. C. 223, and his brother Antiochus, though only 15 years old, ascended the throne and rendered himself so celebrated that he acquired the name of the Great. Appian.——The 4th, succeeded his father Antiochus the Great, on the throne of Syria. He was surnamed Philopator, or, according to Josephus, Soter. His empire had been weakened by the Romans when he became monarch, and the yearly tribute of a thousand talents to these victorious enemies concurred in lessening his power and consequence among nations. Seleucus was poisoned after a reign of 12 years, B. C. 175. His son Demetrius had been sent to Rome, there to receive his education, and he became a prince of great abilities. Strab. 16.—Justin. 32.—Appian——The 5th, succeeded his father Demetrius Nicator on the throne of Syria, in the 20th year of his age. He was put to death in the first year of his reign by Cleopatra, his mother, who had also sacrificed her husband to her ambition. He is not reckoned by many historians in the number of the Syrian monarchs.——The 6th, one of the Seleucidæ, son of Antiochus Gryphus, killed his uncle Antiochus Cyzicenus, who wished to obtain the crown of Syria. He was some time after banished from his kingdom by Antiochus Pius, son of Cyzicenus, and fled to Cilicia, where he was burnt in a palace by the inhabitants, B. C. 93. Appian.—Joseph.——A prince of Syria to whom the Egyptians offered the crown of which they had robbed Auletes. Seleucus accepted it, but he soon disgusted his subjects, and received the surname of Cybiosactes, or Scullion, for his meanness and avarice. He was at last murdered by Berenice, whom he had married.

Semiramis, a celebrated queen of Assyria, daughter of the goddess Derceto by a young Assyrian. She was exposed in a desert, but her life was preserved by doves for one whole year, till Simmas, one of the shepherds of Ninus, found her and brought her up as his own child. Semiramis, when grown up, married Menones, the governor of Niniveh, and accompanied him to the siege of Bactra, where, by her advice and prudent directions, she hastened the king's operations and took the city. These eminent services, but chiefly her uncommon beauty, endeared her to Ninus. The monarch asked her of her husband, and offered him instead, his daughter Sosana; but Menones, who tenderly loved Semiramis, refused, and and when Ninus had added threats to entreaties, he hung himself. No sooner was Menones dead, than Semiramis, who was of an aspiring soul, married Ninus, by whom she had a son called Ninyas. Ninus was so fond of Semiramis, that at her request he resigned the crown to her, and commanded her to be proclaimed queen and sole emperess of Assyria. Of this, however, he had cause to repent; Semiramis put him to death, the better to establish herself on the throne; and when she had no enemies to fear at home, she began to repair the capital of her empire, and by her means, Babylon became the most superb and magnificent city in the world. She visited every part of her dominions, and left every where immortal monuments of her greatness and benevolence. To render the roads passable and communications easy, she hollowed mountains and filled up valleys; and water was conveyed at a great expense, by large and convenient aqueducts, to barren deserts and unfruitful plains. She was not less distinguished as a warrior; many of the neighbouring nations were conquered; and when Semiramis was once told, as she was dressing her hair, that Babylon had revolted, she left her toilet with precipitation, and, though only half dressed, she refused to have the rest of her head adorned before the sedition was quelled and tranquillity re-established. Semiramis has been accused of licentiousness, and some authors have observed, that she regularly called the strongest and stoutest men in her army to her arms, and afterwards put them to death that they might not be living witnesses of her incontinence. Her passion for her son was also unnatural, and it was this criminal propensity which induced Ninyas to destroy his mother with his own hands. Some say that Semiramis was changed into a dove after death, and received immortal honours in Assyria. It is supposed that she lived about 1965 years before the Christian era, and that she died in the 62d year of her age and the 25th of her reign. Many fabulous reports have been propagated about Semiramis, and some have declared that for some time she disguised herself and passed for her son Ninyas. *Val. Sempronia, I. a Roman matron, mother of the two Gracchi, celebrated for her learning, and her private as well as public virtues.——II. Also a sister of the Gracchi, who is accused of having assisted the triumvirs Carbo, Gracchus, and Flaccus, to murder her husband, Scipio Africanus the younger. The name of Sempronia was common to the female descendants of the family of the Sempronii, Gracchi, and Scipios.

Sempronia Lex de magistratibus, by C. Sempronius Gracchus, the tribune, A. U. C. 630, ordained that no person who had been legally deprived of a magistracy for misdemeanors, should be capable of bearing an office again. This law was afterwards repealed by the author.——Another, de civitate, by the same, A. U. C. 630. It ordained that no capital judgment should be passed over a Roman citizen without the concurrence and authority of the senate. There were also some other regulations included in this law.——Another, de comitiis, by the same, A. U. C. 635. It ordained that in giving their votes, the centuries should be chosen by lot, and not give it according to the order of their classes.——Another de comitiis, by the same, the same year, which granted to the Latin allies of Rome, the privilege of giving their votes at elections, as if they were Roman citizens.——Another, de provinciis, by the same, A. U. C. 630. It enacted that the senators should be permitted, before the assembly of the consular comitia, to determine as they pleased the particular provinces which should be proposed to the consuls, to be divided by lot, and that the tribunes should be deprived of the power of interposing against a decree of the senate.——Another, called Agraria prima, by T. Sempronius Gracchus, the tribune, A. U. C. 620. It confirmed the lex agraria Licinia, and enacted that all such as were in possession of more lands than that law allowed, should immediately resign them to be divided among the poorer citizens. Three commissioners were appointed to put this law into execution, and its consequences were so violent, as it was directly made against the nobles and senators, that it cost the author his life.——Another, called Agraria altera, by the same. It required that all the ready money which was found in the treasury of Attalus, king of Pergamus, who had left the Romans his heirs, should be divided among the poorer citizens of Rome, to supply them with all the various instruments requisite in husbandry, and that the lands of that monarch should be farmed by the Roman censors, and the money drawn from thence should be divided among the people.——Another, frumentaria, by C. Sempronius Gracchus. It required that a certain quantity of corn should be distributed among the people, so much to every individual, for which it was required that they should only pay the trifling sum of a semissis and a triens.——Another, de usurâ, by M. Sempronius, the tribune, A. U. C. 560. It ordained that in lending money to the Latins and the allies of Rome, the Roman laws should be observed as well as among the citizens.——Another, de judicibus, by the tribune C. Sempronius, A. U. C. 630. It required that the right of judging, which had been assigned to the senatorian order by Romulus, should be transferred from them to the Roman knights.——Another, militaris, by the same, A. U. C. 630. It enacted that the soldiers should be clothed at the public expense without any diminution of their usual pay. It also ordered that no person should be obliged to serve in the army before the age of 17.

Sempronius, I. (A. Atratinus,) a senator who opposed the Agrarian law, which was proposed by the consul Cassius soon after the election of the tribunes.——II. L. Atratinus, a consul, A. U. C. 311. He was one of the first censors with his colleague in the consulship, Papirius.——III. Caius, a consul, summoned before an assembly of the people because he had fought with ill success against the Volsci.——IV. Sophus, a consul against the Æqui. He also fought against the Picentes, and during the engagement there was a dreadful earthquake. The soldiers were terrified, but Sophus encouraged them, and observed that the earth trembled only for fear of changing its old masters.——V. A man who proposed a law that no person should dedicate a temple or altar without the previous approbation of the magistrates, A. U. C. 449. He repudiated his wife because she had gone to see a spectacle without his permission or knowledge.——VI. A legionary tribune, who led away from Cannæ the remaining part of the soldiers who had not been killed by the Carthaginians. He was afterwards consul, and fought in the field against Annibal with great success. He was killed in Spain.——VII. Tiberius Longus, a Roman consul, defeated by the Carthaginians, in an engagement which he had begun against the approbation of his colleague C. Scipio. He afterwards obtained victories over Hanno and the Gauls.——VIII. Tiberius Gracchus, a consul who defeated the Carthaginians and the Campanians. He was afterwards betrayed by Fulvius, a Lucanian, into the hands of the Carthaginians, and was killed, after he had made a long and bloody resistance against the enemy. Hannibal showed great honour to his remains; a funeral pile was raised at the head of the camp, and the enemy's cavalry walked round it in solemn procession.——IX. The father of the Gracchi. Vid. Gracchus.

Senatus, the chief counsel of the state among the Romans. The members of this body, called senatores, on account of their age, and patres, on account of their authority, were of the greatest consequence in the republic. The senate was first instituted by Romulus, to govern the city, and to preside over the affairs of the state during his absence. The senators whom Romulus created were a hundred, to whom he afterwards added the same number when the Sabines had migrated to Rome. Tarquin the ancient made the senate consist of 300, and this number remained fixed for a long time. After the expulsion of the last Tarquin, whose tyranny had thinned the patricians as well as the plebeians, 164 new senators were chosen to complete the 300; and as they were called conscripti, the senate ever afterwards consisted of members who were denominated patres and conscripti. The number continued to fluctuate during the times of the republic, but gradually increased to 700, and afterwards to 900 under Julius Cæsar, who filled the senate with men of every rank and order. Under Augustus the senators amounted to 1000, but this number was reduced to 300, which being the cause of complaints, induced the emperor to limit the number to 600. The place of a senator was always bestowed upon merit; the monarchs had the privilege of choosing the members, and after the expulsion of the Tarquins it was one of the rights of the consuls, till the election of the censors, who from their office seemed most capable of making choice of men whose characters were irreproachable. Sometimes the assembly of the people elected senators, but it was only upon some extraordinary occasions; there was also a dictator chosen to fill up the number of the senate after the battle of Cannæ. Only particular families were admitted into the senate; and when the plebeians were permitted to share the honours of the state, it was then required that they should be born of free citizens. It was also required that the candidates should be knights before their admission into the senate. They were to be above the age of 25, and to have previously passed through the inferior offices of quæstor, tribune of the people, edile, prætor, and consul. Some, however, suppose that the senators whom Romulus chose were all old men; yet his successors neglected this, and often men who were below the age of 25 were admitted by courtesy into the senate. The dignity of a senator could not be supported without the possession of 80,000 sesterces, or about 700*l.* English money; and therefore such as squandered away their money, and whose fortune was reduced below this sum, were generally struck out of the list of senators. This regulation was not made in the first age of the republic, when the Romans boasted of their poverty. The senators were not permitted to be of any trade or profession. They were distinguished from the rest of the people by their dress; they wore the laticlave, half boots of a black colour, with a crescent or silver buckle in the form of a C; but this last honour was confined only to the descendants of those hundred senators who had been elected by Romulus, as the letter C seems to imply. They had the sole right of feasting publicly in the capital in ceremonial habits; they sat in curule chairs, and at the representation of plays and public spectacles they were honoured with particular seats. Whenever they travelled abroad, even on their own business, they were maintained at the public expense, and always found provisions for themselves and their attendants ready prepared on the road; a privilege that was generally termed free legation. On public festivals they wore the prætexta, or long white robe with purple borders. The right of convocating the senate belonged only to the monarchs; and after the expulsion of the Tarquins, to the consuls, the dictator, master of the horse, governor of Rome, and tribunes of the people; but no magistrate could exercise this privilege except in the absence of a superior officer, the tribunes excepted. The time of meeting was generally three times a month, on the calends, nones, and ides. Under Augustus they were not assembled on the nones. It was requisite that the place where they assembled should have been previously consecrated by the augurs. This was generally in the temple of Concord, of Jupiter Capitolinus, Apollo, Castor and Pollux, &c., or in the Curiæ called Hostilia, Julia Pompeia, &c. When audience was given to foreign ambassadors, the senators assembled without the walls of the city, either in the temples of Bellona or of Apollo; and the same ceremony as to their meeting was also observed when they transacted business with their generals. To render their decrees valid and authentic, a certain number of members was requisite, and such as were absent without some proper cause, were always fined. In the reign of Augustus, 400 senators were requisite to make a senate. Nothing was transacted before sunrise or after sunset. In their office the senators were the guardians of religion, they disposed of the provinces as they pleased, they prorogued the assemblies of the people, they appointed thanksgivings, nominated their ambassadors, distributed the public money, and, in short, had the management of every thing political or civil in the republic, except the creating of magistrates, the enactment of laws, and the declarations of war or peace, which was confined to the assemblies of the people. Rank was always regarded in their meetings; the chief magistrates of the state, such as the consuls, the prætors, and censors, sat first; after these the inferior magistrates, such as the ediles and quæstors; and, last of all, those that then exercised no office in the state. Their opinions were originally collected, each according to his age; but when the office of censor was instituted, the opinion of the princeps senatus, or the person whose name stood first on the censor's list, was first consulted, and afterwards those who were of consular dignity, each in their respective order. In the age of Cicero the consuls elect were first consulted; and in the age of Cæsar, he was permitted to speak first till the end of the year, on whom the consul had originally conferred that honour. Under the emperors, the same rules were observed, but the consuls were generally consulted before all others. When any public matter was introduced into the senate, which was always called referre ad senatum, any senator whose opinion was asked, was permitted to speak upon it as long as he pleased, and on that account it was often usual for the senators to protract their speeches till it was too late to determine. When the question was put, they passed to the side of that speaker whose opinion they approved, and a majority of votes was easily collected without the trouble of counting the numbers. This mode of proceeding was called pedibus in alicujus sententiam ire, and therefore on that account, the senators who had not the privilege of speaking, but only the right of giving a silent vote, such as bore some curule honours, and on that account were permitted to sit in the senate, but not to deliberate, were denominated pedarii senatores. After the majority had been known, the matter was determined, and the senatus consultum was immediately written by the clerks of the house, at the feet of the chief magistrates, and it was signed by all the principal members of the house. When there was not a sufficient number of members to make a senate, the decision was called senatus auctoritas, but it was of no consequence if it did not afterwards pass into a senatus consultum. The tribunes of the people, by the word veto, could stop the debates, and the decrees of the assembled senate, as also any one who was of equal authority with him who had proposed the matter. The senatus consulta were left in the custody of the consuls, who suppress or preserve them; but about the year of Rome 304, they were always deposited in the temple of Ceres, and afterwards in the treasury, by the ediles of the people. The degradation of the senators was made by the censor, by omitting their name when he called over the list of the senate. This was called præterire. A senator could be again introduced into the senate if he could repair his character, or fortune, which had been the causes why the censor had lawfully called him unqualified. The meeting of the senate was often sudden, except the particular times already mentioned, upon any emergency. After the death of J. Cæsar they were not permitted to meet on the ides of March, which were called parricidium, because on that day the dictator had been assassinated. The sons of the senators, after they had put on the toga virilis, were permitted to come into the senate, but this was afterwards limited. Vid. Papirius. The rank and authority of the senators, which were so conspicuous in the first ages of the republic, and which caused the minister of Pyrrhus to declare that the Roman senate was a venerable assembly of kings, dwindled into nothing under the emperors. Men of the lowest character were admitted into the senate; the emperors took pleasure in robbing this illustrious body of their privileges and authority; and the senators themselves by their meanness and servility, contributed, as much as the tyranny of the sovereign, to diminish their own consequence; and by applauding the follies of a Nero and the cruelties of a Domitian, they convinced the world that they no longer possessed sufficient prudence or authority to be consulted on matters of weight and importance. In the election of successors to the imperial purple after Augustus, the approbation of the senate was consulted; but it was only a matter of courtesy, and the concurrence of a body of men was little regarded who were without power, and under the control of a mercenary army. The title of Clarissimus was given to the senators under the emperors, and indeed this was the only distinction they had in compensation for the loss of their independence. The senate was abolished by Justinian, 13 centuries after its first institution by Romulus.

Senèca, M. Annæus, a native of Corduba in Spain, who married Helvia, a woman of Spain, by whom he had three sons, Seneca the philosopher, Annæus Novatus, and Annæus Mela, the father of the poet Lucan. Seneca made himself known by some declamations of which he made a collection from the most celebrated orators of the age, and from that circumstance, and for distinction, he obtained the appellation of declamator. He left Corduba and went to Rome, where he became a Roman knight. His son, L. Annæus Seneca, who was born about six years before Christ, was early distinguished by his extraordinary talents. He was taught eloquence by his father, and received lessons in philosophy from the best and most celebrated stoics of the age. As one of the followers of the Pythagorean doctrines, Seneca observed the most reserved abstinence, and in his meals never ate the flesh of animals; but this he abandoned at the representation of his father, when Tiberius threatened to punish some Jews and Egyptians, who abstained from certain meats. In the character of a pleader, Seneca appeared with great advantage; but the fear of Caligula, who aspired to the name of an eloquent speaker, and who consequently was jealous of his fame, deterred him from pursuing his favourite study, and he sought a safer employment in canvassing for the honours and offices of the state. He was made quæster, but the aspersions which were thrown upon him on account of a shameful amour with Julia Livilla, removed him from Rome, and the emperor banished him for some time into Corsica. During his banishment, the philosopher wrote some spirited epistles to his mother, remarkable for elegance of language and sublimity; but he soon forgot his philosophy, and disgraced himself by his flatteries to the emperor, and in wishing to be recalled, even at the expense of his innocence and character. The disgrace of Messalina at Rome, and the marriage of Agrippina with Claudius, proved favourable to Seneca, and after he had remained five years in Corsica, he was recalled by the emperess to take care of the education of her son Nero, who was destined to succeed to the empire. In the honourable duty of preceptor, Seneca gained applause, and as long as Nero followed his advice, Rome enjoyed tranquillity, and believed herself safe and happy under the administration of the son of Agrippina. Some, however, are clamorous against the philosopher, and observe that Seneca initiated his pupil in those vices which disgraced him as a monarch and as a man. This may be the language of malevolence or the insinuation of jealousy. In the corrupted age of Nero, the preceptor had to withstand the clamours of many wicked and profligate ministers, and if he had been the favourite of the emperor, and shared his pleasures, his debauchery, and extravagance, Nero would not perhaps have been so anxious of destroying a man whose example, from vicious inclinations, he could not follow, and whose salutary precepts his licentious associates forbade him to obey. Seneca was too well acquainted with the natural disposition of Nero to think himself secure; he had been accused of having amassed the most ample riches, and of having built sumptuous houses and adorned beautiful gardens, during the four years in which he had attended Nero as a preceptor, and therefore he desired his imperial pupil to accept of the riches and the possessions which his attendance on his person had procured, and to permit him to retire to solitude and study. Nero refused, and Seneca, to avoid further suspicions, kept himself at home for some time as if labouring under a disease. In the conspiracy of Piso, which happened some time after, Seneca's name was mentioned by Natalis, and Nero ordered him to destroy himself. He was at table with his wife Paulina and two of his friends when the messenger from Nero arrived. He heard the words which commanded him to destroy himself with philosophical firmness. As for his wife, he attempted to calm her emotions, and when she seemed resolved to die with him, he said he was glad to find his example followed with so much constancy. Their veins were opened at the same moment, but the life of Paulina was preserved, and Nero, who was partial to her, ordered the blood to be stopped, and from that moment, according to some authors, the philosopher's wife seemed to rejoice that she could still enjoy the comforts of life. Seneca's veins bled but slowly, and the conversation of his dying moments was collected by his friends. To hasten his death he drank a dose of poison, but it had no effect; and therefore he ordered himself to be carried into a hot bath, to accelerate the operation of the draught, and to make the blood flow more freely. This was attended with no better success, and as the soldiers were clamorous, he was carried into a stove, and suffocated by the steam, on the 12th of April, in the 65th year of the Christian era, in his 53d year. His body was burnt without pomp or funeral ceremony, according to his will, which he had made when he enjoyed the most unbounded favours of Nero. The compositions of Seneca were numerous, and chiefly on moral subjects. He is so much admired for his refined sentiments and virtuous precepts, for his morality, his constancy, and his innocence of manners, that St. Jerome has not hesitated to rank him among Christian writers. His style is nervous, it abounds with ornaments, and seems well suited to the taste of the age in which he lived. His treatises are de irâ, de consolatione, de providentiâ, de tranquillitate animi, de clementiâ, de sapientis constantiâ, de otis sapientis, de brevitate vitæ, de beneficiis, de vitâ beatâ, besides his naturales quæstiones, ludus in Claudium, moral letters, &c. There are also some tragedies ascribed to Seneca. Quintilian supposes that the Medea is his composition, and, according to others, Troas and the Hippolytus were also written by him, and the Agamemnon, Hercules, furens Thyestes & Hercules in Oeta, by his father, Seneca the declaimer. The best editions of Seneca are those of Antwerp, fol. 1615, and of Gronovius, 3 vols. Amst. 1672; and those of his tragedies, are that of Schroder, 4to. Delph. 1728, and the 8vo. of Gronovius, L. Bat. 1682. Tacit. Ann. 12, &c.—Dio.—Suetan. in Ner. &c.—Quintil.

SENTIA LEX, de senatu, by C. Sentius, the consul, A. U. C. 734, enacting the choosing of proper persons to fill up the number of senators.

SENTIUS, CN. a writer in the reign of the emperor Alexander, of whose life he wrote an account in Latin, or, according to others, in Greek.

SEPTERION, a festival observed once in nine years at Delphi, in honour of Apollo. It was a representation of the pursuit of Python by Apollo, and of a victory obtained by the god.

SEPTIMIUS, I. (TIT.) a Roman knight, distinguished by his poetical compositions, both lyric and tragic. He was intimate with Augustus as well as Horace, who has addressed the 6 of his 2 lib. of Odes to him.——II. A native of Africa, who distinguished himself at Rome as a poet. He wrote, among other things, a hymn in praise of Janus. Only 11 of his verses are preserved. M. Terent.—Crinitus in vitâ.

SEQUANI. Vid. Part. I.

SERAPIO, a Greek poet, who flourished in the age of Trajan. He was intimate with Plutarch.

SERENUS SAMONICUS, a physician in the age of the emperor Severus and Caracalla. There remains a poem of his composition on medicine, the last edition of which is that of 1706, in 8vo. Amst.

SERGIUS, one of the names of Catiline.——A military tribune at the siege of Veii. The family of the Sergii was patrician, and branched out into the several families of the Fidenates, Sili, Catilinæ, Nattæ, Ocellæ, and Planci.

SERRANUS, a surname given to Cincinnatus, because he was found sowing his fields when told that he had been elected dictator. Some however suppose that Serranus was a different person from Cincinnatus. Plin. 18, c. 3.—Liv. 3, c. 26.—Virg. Æn. 6, v. 844.——A poet of some merit in Domitian's reign. Juv. 7, v. 80.

SERTORIUS, QUINTUS, a Roman general, son of Quintus and Rhea, born at Nursia. His first campaign was under the great Marius, against the Teutones and Cimbri. He had the misfortune to lose one eye in the first battle he fought. When Marius and Cinna entered Rome and slaughtered all their enemies, Sertorius accompanied them, but he expressed his sorrow and concern at the melancholy death of so many of his countrymen. He afterwards fled for safety into Spain, when Sylla had proscribed him, and in this distant province he behaved himself with so much address and valour that he was looked upon as the prince of the country. He instituted public schools, and educated the children of the country in the polite arts, and the literature of Greece and Rome. He had established a senate, over which he presided with consular authority, and the Romans who followed his standard, paid equal reverence to his person. He pretended to hold commerce with heaven by means of a white hind which he had tamed with great success, and which followed him every where, even in the field of battle. The success of Sertorius in Spain, and his popularity among the natives, alarmed the Romans. They sent some troops to oppose him, but with little success. Four armies were found insufficient to crush, or even hurt Sertorius; and Pompey and Metellus, who never engaged an enemy without obtaining the victory, where driven with dishonour from the field. But the favourite of the Lusitanians was exposed to the dangers which usually attend greatness. Perpenna, one of his officers, who was jealous of his fame, and tired of a superior, conspired against him. At a banquet the conspirators began to open their intentions by speaking with freedom and licentiousness in the presence of Sertorius, whose age and character had hitherto claimed deference from others. Perpenna overturned a glass of wine as a signal to the rest of the conspirators, and immediately Antonius, one of his officers, stabbed Sertorius, and the example was followed by all the rest, 73 years before Christ. Sertorius has been commended for his love of justice and moderation. The flattering description he heard of the Fortunate Islands when he passed into the west of Africa, almost tempted him to bid adieu to the world. Plut. in vitâ.—Paterc. 2, c. 30, &c.—Flor. 3, c. 21, &c.—Appian. de Civ.—*Val. SERVILIA, I. a sister of Cato of Utica, greatly enamoured of J. Cæsar, though her brother was one of the most inveterate enemies of her lover. To convince Cæsar of her affection, she sent him a letter filled with the most tender expressions of regard for his person. The letter was delivered to Cæsar in the senate-house, while they were debating about punishing the associates of Catiline's conspiracy; and when Cato saw it, he exclaimed that it was a letter from the conspirators, and insisted immediately on its being made public. Upon this Cæsar gave it to Cato, and the stern senator had no sooner read its contents, than he threw it back with the words of, take it, drunkard. From the intimacy which existed between Servilia and Cæsar, some have supposed that the dictator was the father of M. Brutus. Plut. in Cæs.—C. Nep. in Attic.——II. Another sister of Cato, who married Silanus. Id.——III. A daughter of Trasea, put to death by order of Nero, with her father. Her crime was the consulting of magicians, only to know what would happen in her family.

SERVILIA LEX de pecuniis repetundis, by C. Servilius the prætor, A. U. C. 653. It punished severely such as were guilty of peculation and extortion in the provinces. Its particulars are not precisely known.——Another, de judiciis, by Q. Servilius Cæpio, the consul, A. U. C. 648. It divided the right of judging between the senators and the equites, a privilege which, though originally belonging to the senators, had been taken from them and given to the equites.——Another, de civitate, by C. Servilius, ordained that if a Latin accused a Roman senator, so that he was condemned, the accuser should be honoured with the name and the privileges of a Roman citizen.——Another, Agraria, by P. Servilius Rullus, the tribune, A. U. C. 690. It required the immediate sale of certain houses and lands which belonged to the people, for the purchase of others in a different part of Italy. It reported that ten commissioners should be appointed to see it carried into execution, but Cicero prevented its passing into a law by the three orations which he pronounced against it.

Servilius Quintus, I. a Roman, who in his dictatorship defeated the Æqui.——II. Publius, a consul, who supported the cause of the people against the nobles, and obtained a triumph in spite of the opposition of the senate, after defeating the Volsci. He afterwards changed his opinions, and very violently opposed the people, because they had illiberally treated him.——III. A proconsul killed at the battle of Cannæ by Annibal.——IV. Ahala, a master of horse to the dictator Cincinnatus. When Mælius refused to appear before the dictator, to answer the accusations which were brought against him on suspicion of his aspiring to tyranny, Ahala slew him in the midst of the people whose protection he claimed. Ahala was accused for this murder, and banished, but his sentence was afterwards repealed. He was raised to the dictatorship.——V. Publius, a proconsul of Asia during the age of Mithridates. He conquered Isauria, for which service he was surnamed Isauricus, and rewarded with a triumph.——VI. Geminus, a Roman consul, who opposed Annibal with success.——VII. Nonianus, a Latin historian, who wrote a history of Rome in the reign of Nero. There were more than one writer of this name, as Pliny speaks of a Servilius remarkable for his eloquence and learning; and Quintilian mentions another also illustrious for his genius and literary merit.——VIII. Casca, one of Cæsar's murderers.——The family of the Servilii was of patrician rank, and came to settle at Rome after the destruction of Alba, where they were promoted to the highest offices of the state. To the several branches of this family were attached the different surnames of Ahala, Axilla, Priscus, Cæpio, Structus, Geminus, Pulex, Vatia, Casca, Fidenas, Longus, and Tucca.

Servius Tullius, I. the sixth king of Rome, was son of Ocrisia, a slave of Corniculum, by Tullius, a man slain in the defence of his country against the Romans. Ocrisia was given by Tarquin to Tanaquil, his wife, and she brought up her son in the king's family, and added the name of Servius to that which he had inherited from his father to denote his slavery. Young Servius was educated in the palace of the monarch with great care, and, though originally a slave, Tarquin gave him his daughter in marriage. His own private merit and virtues recommended him to notice not less than the royal favours, and Servius, become the favourite of the people and the darling of the soldiers by his liberality and complaisance, was easily raised to the throne on the death of his father-in-law. Rome had no reason to repent of her choice. Servius endeared himself still more as a warrior and as a legislator. He defeated the Veientes and the Tuscans, and by a proper act of policy he established the census. He increased the number of the tribes, he beautified and adorned the city, and enlarged its boundaries by taking within its walls the hills Quirinalis, Viminalis, and Esquilinus. That he might not seem to neglect the worship of the gods, he built several temples to the goddess of fortune, to whom he deemed himself particularly indebted for obtaining the kingdom. He also built a temple to Diana on mount Aventine, and raised himself a palace on the hill Esquilinus. Servius married his two daughters to the grandsons of his father-in-law; the elder to Tarquin, and the younger to Aruns. This union, as might be supposed, tended to insure the peace of his family; but if such were his expectations, he was unhappily deceived. The wife of Aruns, naturally fierce and impetuous, murdered her own husband to unite herself to Tarquin, who had likewise assassinated his wife. These bloody measures were no sooner pursued, than Servius was murdered by his own son-in-law, and his daughter Tullia showed herself so inimical to filial gratitude and piety, that she ordered her chariot to be driven over the mangled body of her father, B. C. 534. His death was universally lamented, and the slaves annually celebrated a festival in his honour, in the temple of Diana, on mount Aventine, the day that he was murdered. Tarquinia, his wife, buried his remains privately, and died the following day. Liv. 1, c. 41.—Dionys. Hal. 4.—Flor. 1, c. 6.—Cic. de Div. 1, c. 53.—Val. Max. 1, c. 6.—Ovid. Fast. 6, v. 601.——II. Sulpitius, an orator in the age of Cicero and Hortensius. He was sent as ambassador to M. Antony, and died before his return. Cicero obtained a statue for him from the senate and the Roman people, which was raised in the Campus Martius. Besides orations, he wrote verses, which were highly censured for their indelicacy. His works are lost. Cic. in Brut. Phil. &c.—Plin. 5, ep. 3.

Sesostris, a celebrated king of Egypt some ages before the Trojan war. His father ordered all the children in his dominions who were born on the same day with him to be publicly educated, and to pass their youth in the company of his son. This succeeded in the highest degree, and Sesostris had the pleasure to find himself surrounded by a number of faithful ministers and active warriors, whose education and intimacy with their prince rendered them inseparably devoted to his interest. When Sesostris had succeeded on his father's throne, he became ambitious of military fame, and after he had divided his kingdom into 36 different districts, he marched at the head of a numerous army to make the conquest of the world. Libya; Æthiopia, Arabia, with all the islands of the Red Sea, were conquered; and the victorious monarch marched through Asia, and penetrated farther into the east than the conqueror of Darius. He also invaded Europe, and subdued the Thracians; and that the fame of his conquests might long survive him, he placed columns in the several provinces he had subdued; and many ages after, this pompous inscription was read in many parts of Asia, Sesostris, the king of kings, has conquered this territory by his arms. At his return home the monarch employed his time in encouraging the fine arts, and in improving the revenues of his kingdom. He erected 100 temples to the gods for the victories he had obtained, and mounds of earth were heaped up in several parts of Egypt, where cities were built for the reception of the inhabitants during the inundations of the Nile. Some canals were also dug near Memphis, to facilitate navigation and the communication of one province with another. In his old age Sesostris, grown infirm and blind, destroyed himself, after a reign of 44 years, according to some. His mildness towards the conquered has been admired, while some have upbraided him for his cruelty and insolence in causing his chariot to be drawn by some of the monarchs whom he had conquered. The age of Sesostris is so remote from every authentic record, that many have supported that the actions and conquests ascribed to this monarch are uncertain and totally fabulous. Herodot. 2, c. 102, &c.—Diod. 1.—*Val. Sethon, a priest of Vulcan, who made himself king of Egypt after the death of Anysis. He was attacked by the Assyrians an ddelivered from this powerful enemy by an immense number of rats, which in one night gnawed their bow strings and thongs, so that on the morrow their arms were found to be useless. From this wonderful circumstance Sethon had a statue which represented him with a rat in his hand, with the inscription of Whoever fixes his eyes upon me, let him be pious. Herod. 2, c. 141.

Severus, I. (Lucius Septimius,) a Roman emperor, born at Leptis in Africa, of a noble family. He gradually exercised all the offices of the state, and recommended himself to the notice of the world by an ambitious mind and a restless activity, that could, for the gratification of avarice, endure the most complicated hardships. After the murder of Pertinax, Severus resolved to remove Didius Julianus, who had bought the imperial purple when exposed to sale by the pretorians, and therefore he proclaimed himself emperor on the borders of Illyricum, where he was stationed against the barbarians. To support himself in this bold measure, he took as his partner in the empire Albinus, who was at the head of the Roman forces in Britain, and immediately marched towards Rome, to crush Didius and his partisans. He was received as he advanced through the country with universal acclamations, and Julianus was assassinated by his own soldiers. The reception of Severus at Rome was sufficient to gratify his pride; the streets were strewed with flowers, and the submissive senate were ever ready to grant whatever honours or titles the conqueror claimed. In professing that he had assumed the purple only to avenge the death of the virtuous Pertinax, Severus gained many adherents, and was enabled not only to disarm, but to banish the pretorians, whose insolence and avarice were become alarming not only to the citizens but to the emperor. But while he was victorious at Rome, Severus did not forget that there was another competitor for the imperial purple. Pescennius Niger was in the East at the head of a powerful army, and with the name and ensigns of Augustus. Many obstinate battles were fought between the troops and officers of the imperial rivals, till, on the plains of Issus, which had been above five centuries before covered with the blood of the Persian soldiers of Darius, Niger was totally ruined by the loss of 20,000 men. The head of Niger was cut off and sent to the conqueror, who punished in a most cruel manner all the partisans of his unfortunate rival. Severus afterwards pillaged Byzantium, which had shut her gates against him; and after he had conquered several nations in the East, he returned to Rome, resolved to destroy Albinus, with whom he had hitherto reluctantly shared the imperial power. He attempted to assassinate him by his emissaries; but when this had failed of success, Severus had recourse to arms, and the fate of the empire was again decided on the plains of Gaul. Albinus was defeated, and the conqueror was so elated with the recollection that he had now no longer a competitor for the purple, that he insulted the dead body of his rival, and ordered it to be thrown into the Rhone, after he had suffered it to putrify before the door of his tent, and to be torn to pieces by his dogs. The family and adherents of Albinus shared his fate; and the return of Severus to the capital rivalled the bloody triumphs of Marius and Sylla. The richest of the citizens were sacrificed, and their money became the property of the emperor. The wicked Commodus received divine honours, and his murderers were punished in the most wanton manner. Tired of the inactive life he had led in Rome, Severus marched into the East, with his two sons Caracalla and Geta, and with uncommon success made himself master of Selucia, Babylon, and Ctesiphon; and advanced without opposition far into the Parthian territories. From Parthia the emperor marched towards the more southern provinces of Asia; after he had visited the tomb of Pompey the Great, he entered Alexandria; and granted a senate to this celebrated city. The revolt of Britain recalled him from the East. After he had reduced it under his power, he built a wall across the northern parts of the island, to defend it against the frequent invasions of the Caledonians. Hitherto successful against his enemies, Severus now found the peace of his family disturbed. Caracella attempted to murder his father as he was concluding a treaty of peace with the Britons; and the emperor was so shocked at the undutifulness of his son, that on his return home he called him into his presence, and after he had upbraided him for his ingratitude and perfidy, he offered him a drawn sword, adding, If you are so ambitious of reigning alone, now imbrue your hands in the blood of your father, and let not the eyes of the world be witness of your want of filial tenderness. If these words checked Caracalla, yet he did not show himself concerned; and Severus, worn out with infirmities, which the gout and the uneasiness of his mind increased, soon after died, exclaiming he had been every thing man could wish, but that he was then nothing. Some say that he wished to poison himself, but that when this was denied, he eat to great excess, and soon after expired at York, on the fourth of February, in the 211th year of the Christian era, in the 66th year of his age, after a reign of 17 years 8 months and 3 days. Severus has been so much admired for his military talents, that some have called him the most warlike of the Roman emperors. As a monarch he was cruel, and it has been observed that he never did an act of humanity or forgave a fault. In his diet he was temperate, and he always showed himself an open enemy to pomp and splendour. He loved the appellation of a man of letters, and he even composed a history of his own reign, which some have praised for its correctness and veracity. Dio.—Herodian.—Victor, &c.——II. Alexander, (Marcus Aurelius,) a native of Phœnicia, adopted by Heliogabalus. His father's name was Genesius Marcianus, and his mother's Julia Mammæa, and he received the surname of Alexander because he was born in a temple sacred to Alexander the Great. He was carefully educated, and his mother, by paying particular attention to his morals and the character of his preceptors, preserved him from licentiousness. At the death of Heliogabalus, who had been jealous of his virtues, Alexander, though only in the 14th year of his age, was proclaimed emperor, and his nomination was approved by the shouts of the army and the congratulations of the senate. He had not been long on the throne before the peace of the empire was disturbed by the incursions of the Persians. Alexander marched into the east without delay, and soon obtained a decisive victory over the barbarians. At his return to Rome he was honoured with a triumph, but the revolt of the Germans soon after called him away from the indolence of the capital. His expedition in Germany was attended with some success, but the virtues and the amiable qualities of Alexander were forgotten in the stern and sullen strictness of the disciplinarian. His soldiers, fond of repose, murmured against his severity; their clamours were fomented by the artifice of Maximinus, and Alexander was murdered in his tent, after a reign of 13 years and 9 days, on the 18th of March, A. D. 235. His mother Mammæa shared his fate with all his friends; but this was no sooner known than the soldiers punished with immediate death all such as had been concerned in the murder, except Maximinus. Alexander has been admired for his many virtues, and every historian, except Herodian, is bold to assert, that if he had lived the Roman empire might soon have been freed from those tumults and abuses which continually disturbed her peace, and kept the lives of her emperors and senators in perpetual alarms. His severity in punishing offences was great; and such as had robbed the public, were they even the most intimate friends of the emperor, were indiscriminately sacrificed to the tranquillity of the state which they had violated. The great offices of the state which had before his reign been exposed to sale, and occupied by favourites, were now bestowed upon merit; and Alexander could boast that all his officers were men of trust and abilities. He was a patron of literature, and he dedicated the hours of relaxation to the study of the best Greek and Latin historians, orators, and poets; and in the public schools which his liberality and the desire of encouraging learning had founded, he often heard with pleasure and satisfaction the eloquent speeches and declamations of his subjects. The provinces were well supplied with provisions, and Rome was embellished with many stately buildings and magnificent porticos. Alex. vit.—Herodian.—Zosim.—Victor.——III. Cassius, an orator, banished into the island of Crete by Augustus, for his illiberal language He was banished 17 years, and died in Seriphos. He is commended as an able orator, yet declaiming with more warmth than prudence. His writings were destroyed by order of the senate. Suet. in Oct.—Quint.——VIII. Sulpitius, an ecclesiastical historian, who died A. D. 420. The best of his works is his Historia Sacra, from the creation of the world to the consulship of Stilicho, of which the style is elegant, and superior to that of the age in which he lived. The best edition is in 2 vols. 4to. Patavii. 1741.——IX. Aquilius, a native of Spain, who wrote an account of his own life in the reign of the emperor Valens.——X. A celebrated architect employed in building Nero's golden palace at Rome, after the burning of that city.

Seuthes, a name common to several of the Thracian princes.

Sextia Licinia Lex, de Magistratibus, by C. Licinius and L. Sextius, the tribunes, A. U. C. 386. It ordained that one of the consuls should be elected from among the plebeians.——Another, de religione, by the same, A. U. C. 385. It enacted that a decemvirate should be chosen from the patricians and plebeians instead of the decemviri sacri faciundis.

Septilius, a governor of Africa, who ordered Marius when he landed there to depart immediately from his province. Marius heard this with some concern, and said to the messenger, Go and tell your master that you have seen the exiled Marius sitting on the ruins of Carthage. Plut. in Mar.

Sextius, I. (Lucius,) was remarkable for his friendship with Brutus; he gained the confidence of Augustus, and was consul. Horace, who was in the number of his friends, dedicated 1 od. 4, to him.——II. The first plebeian consul.——III. One of the sons of Tarquin. Vid. Tarquinius.

Sextus, a prænomen given to the sixth son of a family.——I. A son of Pompey the Great. Vid. Pompeius.——II. A stoic philosopher, born at Chæronæa in Bœotia. Some suppose that he was Plutarch's nephew. He was preceptor to M. Aurelius and L. Verus.——III. A philosopher in the age of Antoninus. He was one of the followers of the doctrines of Pyrrho. Some of his works are still extant. The best edition of the treatise of Sextus Pompeius Festus de verborum significatione, is that of Amst. 4to. 1699.

Sichæus, called also Sicharbas and Acherbas, was a priest of the temple of Hercules in Phœnicia. His father's name was Plisthenes. He married Elisa the daughter of Belus, and sister of king Pygmalion, better known by the name of Dido. He was so rich that his brother-in-law murdered him to obtain his possessions. This murder Pygmalion endeavoured to conceal from his sister Dido; but the shade of Sichæus appeared to Dido, and advised her to fly from Tyre, after she had previously secured some treasures which were concealed in an obscure and unknown place. According to Justin, Acerbas was the uncle of Dido. Virg. Æn. 1. v. 347, &c.—Paterc. 1, c. 6.—Justin. 18, c. 4.

Sicinius Dentātus, (L.) I. a tribune of Rome, celebrated for his valour and the honours he obtained in the field of battle during the period of 40 years in which he was engaged in the Roman armies. He was present in 121 battles; he obtained 14 civic crowns; 3 mural crowns, 8 crowns of gold; 83 golden collars; 60 bracelets; 18 lances; 23 horses with all their ornaments, and all as the reward of his uncommon services. He could show the scars of 45 wounds, which he had received all in his breast, particularly in opposing the Sabines when they took the capitol. The popularity of Sicinius became odious to Appius Claudius, who wished to make himself absolute at Rome, and therefore, to remove him from the capital, he sent him to the army, by which, soon after his arrival, he was attacked and murdered. Of 100 men who were ordered to fall upon him, Sicinius killed 15 and wounded 30. For his uncommon courage Sicinius has been called the Roman Achilles. Val. Max. 3, c. 2.——Dionys. 8.——II. Vellutus, one of the first tribunes in Rome. He raised cabals against Coriolanus, and was one of his accusers. Plut. in Cor. ——III. Sebinus, a Roman general, who defeated the Volsci.

Sicŭli. Vid. Part I.

Sidonius Caius Sollius Apollinaris, a Christian writer, born A. D. 430. He died in the 52d year of his age. There are remaining of his composition some letters, and different poems, consisting chiefly of panegyrics on the great men of his time, of which the best edition is that of Labbæus, Paris, 4to. 1652. Virg. Æn. 1, v. 682.

Silānus, (D.) I. a son of T. Manlius, Torquatus, accused of extortion in the management of the province of Macedonia. The father himself desired to hear the complaints laid against his son, and after he had spent two days in examining the charges of the Macedonians, he pronounced, on the third day, his son guilty of extortion, and unworthy to be called a citizen of Rome. He also banished him from his presence, and so struck was the son at the severity of his father, that he hanged himself on the following night. Liv. 54.—Cic. de Finib.—Val. Max. 5, c. 8.——II. C. Junius, a consul under Tiberius, accused of extortion, and banished to the island of Citherœa. Tacit.——II. A prœtor in Spain, who routed the Carthaginian forces there while Annibal was in Italy.——IV. Turpilius, a lieutenant of Metellus against Jugurtha. He was accused by Marius, though totally innocent, and condemned by the malice of his judges.——V. Lucius, a man betrothed to Octavia, the daughter of Claudius. Nero took Octavia away from him, and on the day of her nuptials Silanus killed himself.

Silius Italĭcus, (C.) I. a Latin poet, who was originally at the bar, where he for some time distinguished himself, till he retired from Rome more particularly to consecrate his time to study. He was consul the year that Nero was murdered. Pliny has observed, that when Trajan was invested with the imperial purple, Silius refused to come to Rome and congratulate him like the rest of his fellow-citizens, a neglect which was never resented by the emperor. Silius was in possession of a house where Cicero had lived, and another in which was the tomb of Virgil. The birth-day of Virgil was yearly celebrated with unusual pomp and solemnity by Silius; and for his partiality, not only to the memory, but to the compositions, of the Mantuan poet, he has been called the ape of Virgil. Silius starved himself while labouring under an imposthume, which his physicians were unable to remove, in the beginning of Trajan's reign, about the 75th year of his age. There remains a poem of Italicus on the second punic war, divided into 17 books, greatly commended by Martial. The moderns have not been so favourable in their opinions concerning its merit. He has every where imitated Virgil, but with little success. Silius was a great collector of antiquities. His son was honoured with the consulship during his life-time. The best editions of Italicus will be found to be Drakenborch's in 4to. Utr. 1717, and that of Cellarius, 8vo. Lips. 1695.—Mart. 11, ep. 49, &c.——II. Caius, a man of consular dignity, greatly loved by Messalina for his comely appearance and elegant address. Messalina obliged him to divorce his wife that she might enjoy his company without intermission. Silius was forced to comply, though with great reluctance, and he was at last put to death for the adulteries which the emperess obliged him to commit. Tacit.—Suet.—Dio.

Simon, a currier of Athens, whom Socrates often visited on account of his great sagacity and genius. He collected all the information he could receive from the conversation of the philosopher, and afterwards published it with his own observations in 33 dialogues. He was the first of the disciples of Socrates who attempted to give an account of the opinions of his master. These dialogues were extant in the age of the biographer Diogenes, who has preserved their title. Diog. 2, c. 14.

Simōnides, a celebrated poet of Cos, who flourished 538 years B. C. His father's name was Leoprepis, or Theoprepis. He wrote elegies, epigrams, and dramatical pieces, esteemed for their elegance and sweetness, and composed also epic poems. Simonides was universally courted by the princes of Greece and Sicily, and, according to one of the fables of Phædrus, he was such a favourite of the gods, that his life was miraculously preserved in an entertainment when the roof of the house fell upon all those who were feasting. He obtained a poetical prize in the 80th year of his age, and he lived to his 90th year. The people of Syracuse, who had hospitably honoured him when alive, erected a magnificent monument to his memory. Simonides, according to some, added the four letters η, ω, ξ, ψ, to the alphabet of the Greeks. Some fragments of his poetry are extant. According to some, the grandson of the elegiac poet of Cos was called Simonides. He flourished a few years before the Peloponnesian war, and was the author of some books of invention, genealogies, &c. Quintil. 10, c. 1.—Phædr. 4, fab. 21 and 24.—Horat. 2, Od. 1, v. 38.—Horat. 5, c. 102.—Cic. de Orat. &c.—Arist.—*Pindar. Simplicius, a Greek commentator on Aristotle, whose works were all edited in the 16th century, and the latter part of the 15th, but without a Latin version.

Sinon, a son of Sisyphus, who accompanied the Greeks to the Trojan war, and there distinguished himself by his cunning and fraud, and his intimacy with Ulysses. When the Greeks had fabricated the famous wooden horse, Sinon went to Troy with his hands bound behind his back, and by the most solemn protestations, assured Priam that the Greeks were gone from Asia, and that they had been ordered to sacrifice one of their soldiers to render the wind favourable to their return, and that because the lot had fallen upon him, at the instigation of Ulysses he had fled away from their camp, not to be cruelly immolated. These false assertions were immediately credited by the Trojans, and Sinon advised Priam to bring into his city the wooden horse which the Greeks had left behind them, and to consecrate it to Minerva. His advice was followed, and Sinon, in the night, to complete his perfidy, opened the sides of the horse, from which issued a number of armed Greeks, who surprised the Trojans and pillaged their city. *Dares Phryg.—Homer. Sisenna, (L.) I. an ancient historian among the Romans, 91 B. C. He was the friend of Macer, and coeval with Antias and Quadrigarius; but he far excelled his contemporaries, as well as predecessors, in the art of historical narrative. He was of the same family as Sylla, the dictator, and was descended from that Sisenna who was prætor in 570. In his youth he practised as an orator, and is characterized by Cicero as a man of learning and wit, but of no great industry or knowledge in business. In more advanced life he was prætor of Achaia, and a friend of Atticus. Vossius says his history commenced after the taking of Rome by the Gauls, and ended with the wars of Marius and Sylla. Now, it is possible that he may have given some sketch of Roman affairs from the burning of the city by the Gauls, but it is evident he had touched slightly on these early portions of the history, for though his work consisted of twenty, or, according to others, of twenty-two books, it appears from a fragment of the second, which is still preserved, that he had there advanced as far in his narrative as the Social War, which broke out in the year 663. The greater part, therefore, I suspect, was devoted to the history of the civil wars of Marius; and indeed Velleius Paterculus calls his work Opus Belli Civilis Sullani. The great defect of his history consisted, it is said, in not being written with sufficient political freedom, at least concerning the character and conduct of Sylla, which is regretted by Sallust in a passage bearing ample testimony to the merits of Sisenna in other particulars. Cicero, while he admits his superiority over his predecessors, adds, that he was far from perfection, and complains that there was something puerile in his Annals, as if he had studied none of the Greek historians but Clitarchus. I have quoted these opinions, since we must now entirely trust to the sentiments of others in the judgment which we form of the merits of Sisenna; for although the fragments which remain of his history are more numerous than those of any other old Latin annalists, being about 150, they are also shorter and more unconnected. Indeed, there are scarcely two sentences any where joined together. Ovid. Trist. 2, v. 443.—Cic. in Brut. 64 and 67.—Paterc. 2, c. 9.——II. Sisigambis, or Sisygambis, the mother of Darius, the last king of Persia. She was taken prisoner by Alexander the Great, at the battle of Issus, with the rest of the royal family. The conqueror treated her with uncommon tenderness and attention; he saluted her as his own mother, and what he had sternly denied to the petitions of his favourites and ministers, he often granted to the intercession of Sisygambis. The regard of the queen for Alexander was uncommon, and, indeed, she no sooner heard that he was dead, than she killed herself, unwilling to survive the loss of so generous an enemy; though she had seen with less concern the fall of her son's kingdom, the ruin of his subjects, and himself murdered by his servants. She had also lost, in one day, her husband and 80 of her brothers, whom Ochus had assassinated to make himself master of the kingdom of Persia. Curt. 4, c. 9, l. 10, c. 5.

Smerdis, a son of Cyrus, put to death by order of his brother Cambyses. As his execution was not public, and as it was only known to one of the officers of the monarch, one of the Magi of Persia, who was himself called Smerdis, and who greatly resembled the deceased prince, declared himself king at the death of Cambyses. After he had reigned for six months with universal approbation, seven noblemen of Persia conspired to dethrone him, and when this had been executed with success, they chose one of their number to reign in the usurper's place, B. C. 521. This was Darius, the son of Hystaspes. Herodot. 3, c. 30.—Justin. 1, c. 9.

Socrates, I. the most celebrated philosopher of all antiquity, was a native of Athens. His father, Sophroniscus, was a statuary, and his mother, Phenarete, was by profession a midwife. For some time he followed the occupation of his father, and some have mentioned the statue of the Graces, admired for their simplicity and elegance, as the work of his own hands. He was called away from this employment by Crito, who admired his genius and courted his friendship. Philosophy soon became the study of Socrates, and under Archelaus and Anaxagoras he laid the foundation of that exemplary virtue which succeeding ages have ever loved and venerated. He appeared, like the rest of his countrymen, in the field of battle; he fought with boldness and intrepidity, and to his courage two of his friends and disciples, Xenophon and Alcibiades, owed the preservation of their life. But the character of Socrates appears more conspicuous as a philosopher and moralist than as that of a warrior. He was fond of labour, he inured himself to suffer hardships, and he acquired that serenity of mind and firmness of countenance which the most alarming dangers could never destroy, or the most sudden calamities alter. If he was poor, it was from choice, and not the effects of vanity or the wish of appearing singular. He bore injuries with patience, and the insults of malice or resentment he not only treated with contempt, but even received with a mind that expressed some concern, and felt compassion for the depravity of human nature. So single and so venerable a character was admired by the most enlightened of the Athenians. Socrates was attended by a number of illustrious pupils, whom he instructed by his exemplary life as well as by his doctrines. He had no particular place where to deliver his lectures, but as the good of his countrymen, and the reformation of their corrupted morals, and not the aggregation of riches, was the object of his study, he was present every where, and drew the attention of his auditors either in the groves of Academus, the Lyceum, or on the banks of the Ilyssus. He spoke with freedom on every subject, religious as well as civil, and had the courage to condemn the violence of his countrymen, and to withstand the torrent of resentment by which the Athenian generals were capitally punished for not burying the dead at the battle of Arginusæ. This independence of spirit, and that visible superiority of mind and genius over the rest of his countrymen, created many enemies to Socrates; but as his character was irreproachable and his doctrines pure, the voice of malevolence was silent. Yet Aristophenes undertook, in his comedy of the Clouds, to ridicule the venerable character of Socrates on the stage; and when once the way was open to calumny and defamation, the fickle and licentious populace paid no reverence to the philosopher whom they had before regarded as a being of a superior order. When this had succeeded, Melitus stood forth to criminate him, together with Anitus and Lycon, and the philosopher was summoned before the tribunal of the five hundred. He was accused of corrupting the Athenian youth, of making innovations in the religion of the Greeks, and of ridiculing the many gods which the Athenians worshipped. Lysias, one of the most celebrated orators of the age, composed an oration in a laboured and pathetic style, which he offered to his friend to be pronounced as his defence in the presence of his judges. Socrates read it, but after he had praised the eloquence and the animation of the whole, he rejected it, as neither manly nor expressive of fortitude. In his apology he spoke with great animation, and confessed that while others boasted that they were acquainted with every thing, he himself knew nothing. The whole discourse was full of simplicity and noble grandeur. He modestly said, that what he possessed was applied for the service of the Athenians; it was his wish to make his fellow-citizens happy, and it was a duty he performed by the special command of the gods, whose authority, said he emphatically to his judges, I regard more than yours. Such language from a man who was accused of a capital crime astonished and irritated the judges. Socrates was condemned, but only by a majority of three voices; and when he was demanded, according to the spirit of the Athenian laws, to pass sentence on himself, and to mention the death he preferred, the philosopher said, For my attempts to teach the Athenian youth justice and moderation, and to render the rest of my countrymen more happy, let me be maintained at the public expense the remaining years of my life in the Prytaneum, an honour, O Athenians, which I deserve more than the victors of the Olympic games. They make their countrymen more happy in appearance, but I have made you so in reality. This exasperated the judges in the highest degree, and he was condemned to drink hemlock. Upon this he addressed the court, and more particularly the judges who had decided in his favour in a pathetic speech. He told them that to die was a pleasure, since he was going to hold converse with the greatest heroes of antiquity; he recommended to their paternal care his defenceless children, and as he returned to the prison, he exclaimed: I go to die, you to live; but which is the best the Divinity alone can know. The solemn celebration of the Delian festivals (Vid. Delia,) prevented his execution for thirty days, and during that time he was confined in the prison and loaded with irons. His friends, and particularly his disciples, were his constant attendants; he discoursed with them upon different subjects with all his usual cheerfulness and serenity. He reproved them for their sorrow, and when one of them was uncommonly grieved because he was to suffer though innocent, the philosopher replied, Would you then have me die guilty? With this composure he spent his last days; he continued to be a preceptor till the moment of his death, and instructed his pupils on questions of the greatest importance; he told them his opinions in support of the immortality of the soul, and reprobated with acrimony the prevalent custom of suicide. He disregarded the intercession of his friends, and when it was in his power to make his escape out of prison, he refused it, and asked with his usual pleasantry, where he could escape death; Where, says he to Crito, who had bribed the gaoler, and made his escape certain, where shall I fly to avoid the irrevocable doom passed on all mankind? When the hour to drink the poison was come, the executioner presented him the cup with tears in his eyes. Socrates received it with composure, and after he had made a libation to the gods, he drank it with an unaltered countenance, and a few moments after he expired. Such was the end of a man whom the uninfluenced answer of the oracle of Delphi had pronounced the wisest of mankind. Socrates died 400 years before Christ, in the 70th year of his age. He was no sooner buried than the Athenians repented of their cruelty, his accusers were universally despised and shunned, one suffered death, some were banished, and others, with their own hands, put an end to their life. The actions, sayings, and opinions of Socrates have been faithfully recorded by two of the most celebrated of his pupils, Xenophon and Plato; and every thing which relates to the life and circumstances of this great philosopher is now minutely known. To his poverty, his innocence, and his example, the Greeks were particularly indebted for their greatness and splendour; and the learning which was universally disseminated by his pupils, gave the whole nation a consciousness of their superiority over the rest of the world, not only in the polite arts, but in the more laborious exercises, which their writings celebrated. The philosophy of Socrates forms an interesting epoch in the history of the human mind. The son of Sophroniscus derided the more abstruse inquiries and metaphysical researches of his predecessors, and by first introducing moral philosophy, he induced mankind to consider themselves, their passions, their opinions, their duties, actions, and faculties. From this it was said that the founder of the Socratic school drew philosophy down from heaven upon the earth. The portrait usually drawn of Socrates, and the historical importance attributed to him appear to be at irreconcilable variance. With him most writers make a new period to begin in the history of Greek philosophy, which manifestly implies that he breathed a new spirit and character into those intellectual exertions of his countrymen, which we comprehend under the name of philosophy; so that they assume a new form under his hands, or at least that he immediately widened their range. But if we inquire how the same writers described Socrates as an individual, we are informed that he did not at all busy himself with the physical investigations which constituted a main part of Greek philosophy, but rather withheld others from them; and that, even with regard to moral inquiries, which were those in which he engaged the deepest, he did not by any means aim at reducing them into a scientific shape, and that he established no fixed principle for this more than for any other branch of human knowledge. The base of his intellectual constitution was rather religious than speculative; his exertions rather those of a good citizen for the improvement of the people, and especially of the young, than those of a philosopher; in short, he is represented as a virtuoso in the exercise of sound common sense, and of that strict integrity and mild philanthropy with which it is always associated in an uncorrupted mind. All this, however, tinged with a slight air of enthusiasm. But these are not qualities which could have produced the conspicuous and permanent effects on the philosophical exertions of a people already far advanced in intellectual culture. The question then is, what must Socrates have been to give Plato an inducement and a right to exhibit him as he has done in his dialogues, and thus lead us to the inference that he must have had a strictly philosophical basis in his composition so far as he is recognized by Plato as the author of his philosophical life, and is therefore to be regarded as the first vital movement of Greek philosophy in its advanced stage, and that he can only be entitled to that place by an element which, though properly philosophical, was foreign to the preceding period. The character which is peculiar to the post Socratic philosophy beginning with Plato, is the co-existence and inter-communion of the three branches of knowledge—dialectics, physics, and ethics. This distinction separates the two periods very definitely. In the earlier period, the idea of science, as such, was not the governing idea, and had even become a distinct subject of consciousness, as it became in the second. Hence the main business every where is to distinguish knowledge from opinion; hence the precision of scientific language; hence the peculiar prominence of dialectics, which have no other object than the idea of science; things not comprehended even by the Eleatics in the same way as by the Socratic schools, since the former still make the idea of Being the starting point rather than that of knowledge. Now this waking of the idea of science and its earliest manifestations must have been, in the first instance, what constituted the philosophical basis in Socrates; and for this reason he is justly regarded as the founder of that later Greek philosophy which, in its whole essential form, together with its several variations, was determined by that idea. The actions of men furnished materials also for his discourse; to instruct them was his aim, and to render them happy was the ultimate object of his daily lessons. From principles like these, which were enforced by the unparalleled example of an affectionate husband, a tendor parent, a warlike soldier, and a patriotic citizen in Socrates, soon after the celebrated sects of the Platonists, the Peripatetics, the Academics, Cyrenaics, Stoics, &c. arose. Socrates never wrote for the public eye, yet many support that the tragedies of his pupil, Euripides, were greatly composed by him. A physiognomist observed, in looking in the face of the philosopher, that his heart was the most depraved, immodest, and corrupted that ever was in the human breast. This nearly cost the satirist his life, but Socrates upbraided his disciples, who wished to punish the physiognomist, and declared that his assertions were true, but that all his vicious propensities had been duly corrected and curbed by means of reason. Socrates made a poetical version of Æsop's fables while in prison. Laert.—Zenoph.—Plato.—Paus. 1, c. 22.—Plut. de op. Phil. &c.—Cic. de Orat. 1, c. 54.—Tusc. 1, c. 41, &c.—*Val. Soæmias, (Julia,) mother of the emperor Heliogabalus, was made president of a senate of women, which she had elected to decide the quarrels, and the affairs of the Roman matrons. She at last provoked the people by her debaucheries, extravagance, and cruelties, and was murdered with her son and family. She was a native of Apamea; her father's name was Julius Avitus, and her mother's Masa. Her sister Julia Mammæa married the emperor Septimius Severus.

Sogdianus, a son of Artaxerxes Longimanus, who murdered his elder brother, king Xerxes, to make himself master of the Persian throne. He was but seven months in possession of the crown. His brother Ochus, who reigned under the name of Darius Nothus, conspired against him, and suffocated him in a tower full of warm ashes.

Solinus, (C. Julius,) a grammarian at the end of the first century, who wrote a book called Polyhistor, which is a collection of historical remarks and geographical annotations on the most celebrated places of every country. He has been called Pliny's ape, because he imitated that well-known naturalist. The last edition of the Polyhistor is that of Norimb. ex editione Salmasii. 1777.

Solon, one of the seven wise men of Greece, was born at Salamis and educated at Athens. His father's name was Euphorion, or Execestides, one of the descendants of king Codrus, and by his mother's side he reckoned among his relations the celebrated Pisistratus. After he had devoted part of his time to philosophical and political studies, Solon travelled over the greatest part of Greece; but at his return home he was distressed with the dissensions which were kindled among his countrymen. All fixed their eyes upon Solon as a deliverer, and he was unanimously elected archon and sovereign legislator. He might have become absolute, but he refused the dangerous office of king of Athens, and in the capacity of lawgiver he began to make a reform in every department. The complaints of the poor citizens found redress, all debts were remitted, and no one was permitted to seize the person of his debtor if unable to make a restoration of his money. After he had made the most salutary regulations in the state, and bound the Athenians by a solemn oath that they would faithfully observe his laws for the space of 100 years, Solon resigned the office of legislator, and removed himself from Athens. He visited Egypt, and in the court of Crœsus, king of Lydia, he convinced the monarch of the instability of fortune, and told him, when he wished to know whether he was not the happiest of mortals, that Tellus, an Athenian, who had always seen his country in a flourishing state, who had seen his children lead a virtuous life, and who had himself fallen in defence of his country, was more entitled to happiness than the possessor of riches and the master of empires. After ten years' absence Solon returned to Athens, but he had the mortification to find the greatest part of his regulations disregarded by the factious spirit of his countrymen and the usurpation of Pisistratus. Not to be longer a spectator of the divisions that reigned in his country, he retired to Cyprus, where he died at the court of king Philocyprus, in the 80th year of his age, 558 years before the Christian era. The salutary consequences of the laws of Solon can be discovered in the length of time they were in force in the republic of Athens. For above 400 years they flourished in full vigour, and Cicero, who was himself a witness of their benign influence, passes the highest encomiums upon the legislator, whose superior wisdom framed such a code of regulations. It was the intention of Solon to protect the poorest citizens, and by dividing the whole body of the Athenians into four classes, three of which were permitted to discharge the most important offices and magistracies of the state, and at last to give their opinion in the assemblies, but not have a share in the distinctions and honours of their superiors, the legislator gave the populace a privilege which, though at first small and inconsiderable, soon rendered them masters of the republic and of all the affairs of government. He made a reformation in the Areopagus, he increased the authority of the members, and permitted them yearly to inquire how every citizen maintained himself, and to punish such as lived in idleness, and were not employed in some honourable and lucrative profession. He also regulated the Prytaneum, and fixed the number of its judges to 400. The sanguinary laws of Draco were all cancelled, except that against murder; and the punishment denounced against every offender was proportioned to his crime. But Solon made no law against parricide or sacrilege. The former of these crimes, he said, was too horrible to human nature for a man to be guilty of it, and the latter could never be committed, because the history of Athens had never furnished a single instance. Such as had died in the service of their country were buried with great pomp, and their family was maintained at the public expense; but such as had squandered away their estates, such as refused to bear arms in defence of their country, or paid no attention to the infirmities and distress of their parents, were branded with infamy. The laws of marriage were newly regulated. To speak with ill language against the dead as well as the living, was made a crime, and the legislator wished that the character of his fellow-citizens should be freed from the aspersions of malevolence and envy. A person who had no children was permitted to dispose of his estates as he pleased, and the females were not allowed to be extravagant in their dress or expenses. To be guilty of adultery was a capital crime. These celebrated laws were engraved on several tables; and that they might be better known and more familiar to the Athenians, they were written in verse. The indignation which Solon expressed on seeing the tragical representations of Thespis is well known; and he sternly observed, that if falsehood and fiction were tolerated on the stage, they would soon find their way among the common occupations of men. According to Plutarch, Solon was reconciled to Pisistratus, but this seems to be false, as the legislator refused to live in a country where the privileges of his fellow-citizens were trampled upon by the usurpation of a tyrant. Sonchis, an Egyptian priest in the age of Solon. It was he who told that celebrated philosopher a number of traditions, particularly about the Atlantic isles, which he represented as more extensive than the continent of Africa and Asia united; one of which disappeared, as it is said, in one day and one night. Plut. in Isid. &c.

Sopater, a philosopher of Apamea, in the age of the emperor Constantine. He was one of the disciples of Iamblicus, and after his death he was at the head of the Platonic philosophers.

Sophocles, I. Colonus, a beautiful village little more than a mile from Athens, gave birth to Sophocles in the second year of the seventy-first Olympiad, B. C. 495. He was consequently thirty years junior to Æschylus and fifteen senior to Euripides. Sophilus, his father, a man of opulence and respectability, bestowed upon his son a careful education in all the literary and personal accomplishments of his age and country. The powers of the future dramatist were developed, strengthened, and refined by a careful instruction in the principles of music and poetry; whilst the graces of a person, eminently handsome, derived fresh elegance and ripened into a noble manhood amidst the exercises of the palæstra. The garlands which he won, attested his attainments in both these departments of Grecian education. A still more striking proof of his personal beauty and early proficiency is recorded in the fact, that when, after the battle of Salamis, the population of Athens stood in solemn assembly round the trophy raised by their valour, Sophocles, at the age of sixteen, was selected to lead with dance and lyre the chorus of youths, who performed the pæan of their country's triumph. The commencement of his dramatic career was marked not more by its success than the singularity of the occasion on which his first tragedy appeared. The bones of Theseus had been solemnly transferred by Cimon from their grave in the isle of Scyros to Athens. An eager contest between the the tragedians of the day ensued. Sophocles, then in his twenty-fifth year, ventured to come forward as one of the candidates; amongst whom was the veteran Æschylus, now for thirty years the undoubted master of the Athenian stage. Party feeling excited such a tumult among the spectators, that the archon, Aphepsion, had not balotted the judges, when Cimon advanced with his nine fellow generals to offer the customary libations to Bacchus. No sooner were these completed, than detaining his colleagues, he directed them to take with him the requisite oath, and then seat themselves as judges of the performance. Before this self-constituted tribunal Sophocles exhibited his maiden drama, and by their decision was proclaimed first victor. This remarkable triumph was an earnest of the splendid career before him. From this event, before Christ 468, to his death, before Christ 405, during a space of three and sixty years, he continued to compose and exhibit. Twenty times did he obtain the first prize, still more frequently the second; and never sank to the third. An accumulation of success, which left the victories of his two great rivals far behind. Æschylus won but thirteen dramatic contests. Euripides was still less fortunate.—Such a continuation of poetic exertion and triumph is the more remarkable from the circumstance, that the powers of Sophocles, so far from becoming dulled and exhausted by these multitudinous efforts, seem to have contracted nothing from labour and age save a mellower tone, a more touching pathos, a sweet and gentle character of thought and expression. The life of Sophocles, however, was not altogether devoted to the service of the muses. In his fifty-seventh year he was one of the ten generals, with Pericles and Thucydides amongst his colleagues; and served in the war against Samos. But his military talents were probably of no high order; and his generalship added no brilliancy to his dramatic fame. At a more advanced age he was appointed priest to Alon, one of the ancient heroes of his country; an office more suited to the peaceful temper of Sophocles. In the civil duties of an Athenian citizen, he doubtless took a part. Nay, in extreme age, we find him one of the committee of ten προβουλοι, appointed in the progress of the revolution brought about by Pisander to investigate the state of affairs and report thereon to the people assembled on the hill of Colonus, his native place; and there, as πρόβουλος, he assented with characteristic easiness of temper to the establishment of oligarchy under the council of four hundred, "as a bad thing, but the least pernicious measure which circumstances allowed." The civil dissensions and external reverses, which marked the concluding years of the Peloponnesian war, must have fallen heavily upon the mind of one whose chief delight was in domestic tranquillity, and who remembered that proud day of Salaminian triumph, in which he bore so conspicuous a part. His sorrows, as a patriotic citizen, were aggravated by the unnatural conduct of his own family. Jealous at the old man's affection for a grandchild by a second wife, an elder son, or sons, endeavoured to deprive him of the management of his property, on the ground of dotage and incapacity. The only refutation which the father produced, was to read before the court his Œdipus at Colonus, a piece which he had just composed; or, according to others, that beautiful chorus only, in which he celebrates the loveliness of his favourite residence. The admiring judges instantly arose, dismissed the cause, and accompanied the aged poet to his house with the utmost honour and respect. Sophocles was spared the misery of witnessing the utter overthrow of his declining country. Early in the year 405 B. C., some months before the defeat of Ægospotami put the finishing stroke to the misfortunes of Athens, death came gently upon the venerable old man, full of years and glory. The accounts of his death are very diverse; all tending to the marvellous. Ister and Neanthes state that he was choked by a grape; Satyrus makes him expire from excessive exertion in reading aloud a long paragraph out of the Antigone; others ascribe his death to extreme joy at being proclaimed the tragic victor. Not content with the singularity of his death, the ancient recorders of his life add prodigy to his funeral also. He died when the Athenians were cooped up within their walls, and the Lacedemonians were in possession of Decelea, the place of his family sepulture. Bacchus twice appeared in a vision to Lysander, the Spartan general, and bid him allow the interment; which accordingly took place with all due solemnity. Ister states, moreover, that the Athenians passed a decree, to appoint an annual sacrifice to so admirable a man. Seven tragedies alone remain out of the great number which Sophocles composed; yet among these seven we probably possess the most splendid productions of his genius. The personal character of Sophocles, without rising into spotless excellence or exalted heroism, was honourable, calm, and amiable. In his younger days he seems to have been addicted to intemperance in love and wine. And a saying of nes.——II. The preceptor of Britannicus, the son of Claudius. Tacit. A. 11, c. 1.

Sŏsicles, a native of Syracuse, composed seventy-three tragedies, and was seven times victor. He lived during the reigns of Philip of Macedon and his son Alexander.

Sŏsicrātes, a noble senator among the Achæans, put to death because he wished his countrymen to make peace with the Romans.

Sŏsigĕnes, I. an Egyptian mathematician, who assisted J. Cæsar in regulating the Roman calendar. Suet.—Diod.—Plin. 18, c. 25.—— II. A commander of the fleet of Eumenes. Polyæn.

Sosii, celebrated booksellers at Rome in the age of Horace, 1, ep. 20, v. 2.

Sosĭlus, a Lacedæmonian, in the age of Annibal. He lived in great intimacy with the Carthaginian, taught him Greek, and wrote the history of his life. C. Nep. in Annib.

SŏsipātER, a grammarian, in the reign of Honorius. He published five books of observations on grammar.

Sŏsistrātus, a tyrant of Syracuse, in the age of Agathocles. He invited Pyrrhus into Sicily, and afterwards revolted from him. He was at last removed by Hermocrates. Polyæn. 1.

Sŏsthĕnes, a general of Macedonia, who flourished B. C. 281. He defeated the Gauls under Brennus, and was killed in the battle. Justin. 24, c. 5.

Sotădes, a Greek poet of Thrace. He wrote verses against Philadelphus Ptolemy, for which he was thrown into the sea in a cage of lead. He was called Cinædus, not only because he was addicted to the abominable crime which the surname indicates, but because he wrote a poem in commendation of it. Some suppose, that, instead of the word Socraticos, in the 2d satire, verse the 10th of Juvenal, the word Sotadicos should be inserted, as the poet Sotades, and not the philosopher Socrates, deserved the appellation of Cinædus. Obscene verses were generally called Sotadea carmina from him. They could be turned and read different ways without losing their measure or sense, such as the following, which can be read backwards:—

Roma tibi subito motibus ibit amor.
Si bene te tua laus taxat, mea laute tenebis.
Sole medere pede, ede, perede melos.

Quintil. 1, c. 8, 1, 9, c. 4.—Plin. 5, ep. 3.—Anson. ep. 17, v. 29.

Soter, a surname of the first Ptolemy.—— It was also common to other monarchs.

Soteria, days appointed for thanksgivings and the offerings of sacrifices for deliverance from danger. One of these was observed at Sicyon, to commemorate the deliverance of that city from the hands of the Macedonians by Aratus.

Soterĭcus, a poet and historian, in the age of Diocletian. He wrote a panegyric on that emperor, as also a life of Apollonius Thyanæus. His works, greatly esteemed, are now lost, except some few fragments preserved by the scholiast of Lycophron.

Sotion, a grammarian of Alexandria, preceptor to Seneca, B. C. 204. Senec. ep. 49 and 58.

Sozŏmen, an ecclesiastical historian, who died 450 A. D. His history extends from the year 324 to 439, and is dedicated to Theodosius the younger, being written in a style of inelegance and mediocrity. The best edition is that of Reading, fol. Cantab. 1720.

Spartăcus, I. a king of Bosphorus, who died B. C. 433. His son and successor of the same name died B. C. 407.——II. A Thracian shepherd, celebrated for his abilities, and the victories he obtained over the Romans. Being one of the gladiators who were kept at Capua in the house of Lentulus, he escaped from the place of his confinement with 30 of his companions, and took up arms against the Romans. He soon found himself with 10,000 men equally resolute with himself, and, though at first obliged to hide himself in the woods and solitary retreats of Campania, he soon laid waste the country; and when his followers were increased by additional numbers, and better disciplined, he attacked the Roman generals in the field of battle. Two consuls and other officers were defeated with much loss; and Spartacus, superior in counsel and abilities, appeared more terrible, though often deserted by his fickle attendants. Crassus was sent against him, but this celebrated general at first despaired of success. A bloody battle was fought, in which, at last, the gladiators were defeated. Spartacus behaved with great valour; when wounded in the leg he fought on his knees, covering himself with his buckler in one hand, and using his sword with the other; and when at last he fell, he fell upon a heap of Romans whom he had sacrificed to his fury, B. C. 71. In this battle no less than 40,000 of the rebels were slain, and the war totally finished. Flor. 3, c. 20.—Liv. 95.—Eutrop. 6, c. 2.—Plut. in Crass.—Paterc. 2, c. 30—Appian.

Spartianus Ælius, a Latin historian, who wrote the lives of all the Roman emperors from J. Cæsar to Diocletian. He dedicated them to Diocletian, to whom, according to some, he was related. Of these compositions, only the life of Adrian, Verus, Didius Julianus, Septimus Severus, Caracalla, and Geta, are extant, published among the Scriptores Historiæ Augustæ. Spartianus is not esteemed as an historian or biographer.

Speusippus, an Athenian philosopher, nephew, as also successor, of Plato. His father's name was Eurymedon, and his mother's, Potone. He presided in Plato's school for eight years, and disgraced himself by his extravagance. Plato attempted to check him, but to no purpose. He died of the lousy sickness, or killed himself according to some accounts, B. C. 339. Plut. in Lys.—Diog. 4.—Val. Max. 4, c. 1.

Spintharus, a Corinthian architect, who built Apollo's temple at Delphi. Paus. 10, c. 5.

Spinther, a Roman consul. He was one of Pompey's friends, and accompanied him at the battle of Pharsalia, where he betrayed his meanness by contending for the possession of Cæsar's offices and gardens before the action. Plut.

Spurĭna, a mathematician and astrologer, who told J. Cæsar to beware of the ides of March. As he went to the senate-house on the morning of the ides, Cæsar said to Spurina, The ides are at last come. Yes, replied Spurina, but not yet past. Cæsar was murdered a few moments after. Suet. in Cæs. 81.—Val. Max. 1 and 8.

Spurius, a prænomen common to many of the Romans.——One of Cæsar's murderers.——Lartius, a Roman, who defended the bridge over the Tiber against Porsenna's army.

Staberius, L. a friend of Pompey, set over Apollonia, which he was obliged to yield to Cæsar because the inhabitants favoured his cause. Cæsar. B. G.

Stasëas, a peripatetic philosopher, engaged to instruct young M. Piso in philosophy. Cic. in Orat. 1, c. 22.

Stasicrătes, a statuary and architect in the wars of Alexander, who offered to make a statue of mount Athos, which was rejected by the conqueror.

Stasilĕus, an Athenian, killed at the battle of Marathon. He was one of the ten prætors.

Statilius, I. a young Roman, celebrated for his courage and constancy. He was an inveterate enemy to Cæsar, and when Cato murdered himself, he attempted to follow his example, but was prevented by his friends. The conspirators against Cæsar wished him to be in the number, but the answer which he gave displeased Brutus. He was at last killed by the army of the triumvirs. Plut.——II. Lucius, one of the friends of Catiline. He joined in his conspiracy, and was put to death. Cic. Cat. 2.——III. A young general in the war which the Latins undertook against the Romans. He was killed with 25,000 of his troops.

Statīra, I. a daughter of Darius, who married Alexander. The conqueror had formerly refused her, but when she had fallen into his hands at Issus, the nuptials were celebrated with uncommon splendour. No less than 9000 persons attended, to each of whom Alexander gave a golden cup to be offered to the gods. Statira had no children by Alexander. She was cruelly put to death by Roxana after the conqueror's death. Justin. 12, c. 12.——II. A sister of Darius, the last king of Persia. She also became his wife, according to the manners of the Persians. She died after an abortion in Alexander's camp, where she was detained as a prisoner. She was buried with great pomp by the conqueror. Plut. in Alex.——III. A wife of Artaxerxes Mnemon, poisoned by her mother-in-law, queen Parysatis. Plut. in Art.

Statius, I. (Cæcilius,) a comic poet in the age of Ennius. He was a native of Gaul, and originally a slave. His latinity was bad, yet he acquired great reputation by his comedies. He died a little after Ennius. Cic. de cen.——II. Annæus, a physician, the friend of the philosopher Seneca. Tacit. A. 15, c. 64.——III. P. Papinius, a poet, born at Naples in the reign of the emperor Domitian. His father's name was Statius, of Epirus, and his mother's, Agelina. Statius has made himself known by two epic poems, the Thebais in 12 books, and the Achilleis in two books, which remained unfinished on account of his premature death. There are, besides, other pieces composed on several subjects, which are extant, and well known under the name of Sylvæ, divided into four books. The two epic poems of Statius are dedicated to Domitian, whom the poet ranks among the gods. They were universally admired in his age at Rome, but the taste of the times was corrupted, though some of the moderns have called them inferior to no Latin compositions except Virgil's. The style of Statius is bombastic and affected; he often forgets the poet to become the declaimer and the historian. In his Sylvæ, which were written generally extempore, are many beautiful expressions and strokes of genius. Statius, as some suppose, was poor, and he was obliged to maintain himself by writing for the stage. None of his dramatic pieces are extant. Martial has satirised him; and what Juvenal has written in his praise some have interpreted as an illiberal reflection upon him. Statius died about the 100th year of the Christian era. The best editions of his works are that of Barthius, 2 vols, 4to. Cyg. 1664, and that of the Variorum, 8vo. L. Bat. 1671; and that of the Thebais, separate, that of Warrington, 2 vols. 12mo. 1778.

Stenocrătes, an Athenian, who conspired to murder the commander of the garrison which Demetrius had placed in the citadel. Polyæn. 5.

Stephănus, a Greek writer of Byzantium, known for his dictionary giving an account of the towns and places of the ancient world, of which the best edition is that of Gronovius, 2 vols. fol. L. Bat. 1694.

Stesichŏrus, a lyric Greek poet of Himera, in Sicily. He was originally called Tisias, and obtained the name of Stesichorus from the alterations he made in music and dancing. His compositions were written in the Doric dialect, and comprised in 26 books, all now lost, except a few fragments. Some say he lost his eyesight for writing invectives against Helen, and that he received it only upon making a recantation of what he had said. He was the first inventor of that fable of the horse and stag, which Horace and some other poets have imitated, and this he wrote to prevent his countrymen from making an alliance with Phalaris. According to some he was the first who wrote an epithalamium. He flourished 556 B. C. and died at Catana in the 85th year of his age. Isocrat. in Hel.—Aristot. rhet.—Strab. 3.—Lucian. in Macr.—Cic. in Verr. 3, c. 35.—Plut. de Mus.—Quintil. 10, c. 1.—Paus. 3, c. 19, l. 10, c. 26.

Sthenĕlus, is coupled by Aristotle with Cleophon, as instances of too low a style. His compositions appear to have been dull and uninteresting; for which fault we find him ridiculed by Aristophanes in a fragment of the Gerytade:—

A. καὶ πῶς ἐγὼ Σθενέλου φάγομ' ἂν ῥήματα;
B. εἰς ἄχος ἐμβαπτόμενος ἢ λευκοὺς ἅλας.

Harpocration likewise informs us that he was attacked by another comic writer as a plagiary. Vid. Part III.

Stilĭcho, a general of the emperor Theodosius the Great. He behaved with much courage, but under the emperor Honorius he showed himself turbulent and disaffected. As being of barbarian extraction, he wished to see the Roman provinces laid desolate by his countrymen, but in this he was disappointed. Honorius discovered his intrigues, and ordered him to be beheaded about the year of Christ 408. His family were involved in his ruin. Claudian has been loud in his praises, and Zosimus, Hist. 5, denies the truth of the charges laid against him.

Stilpo, a celebrated philosopher of Megara, who flourished 336 years before Christ, and was greatly esteemed by Ptolemy Soter. He was naturally addicted to riot and debauchery, but he reformed his manners when he opened a school at Megara. He was universally respected his school was frequented, and Demetrius, when he plundered Megara, ordered the house of the philosopher to be left safe and unmolested. It is said that he intoxicated himself when about to die, to alleviate the terrors of death. He was one of the chiefs of the stoics. Plut. in Dem.—Diog. 2.—Seneca. de Const.

Stobæus, a Greek writer, who flourished A. D. 405. His work is valuable for the relics of ancient literature he has preserved. The best edition is that of Aurel. Allob. fol. 1609.

Stoici, a celebrated sect of philosophers, founded by Zeno of Citium. They received the name from the portico, στοα, where the philosopher delivered his lectures. They preferred virtue to every thing else, and whatever was opposite to it they looked upon as the greatest of evils. They required, as well as the disciples of Epicurus, an absolute command over the passions, and they supported that man alone, in the present state of his existence, could attain perfection and felicity. They encouraged suicide, and believed that the doctrine of future punishments and rewards was unnecessary to excite or intimidate their followers. Vid. Zeno.

Strabo, a name among the Romans, given to those whose eyes were naturally deformed or distorted. Pompey's father was distinguished by that name.——A native of Amasia, on the borders of Cappadocia, who flourished in the age of Augustus and Tiberius. He first studied under Xenarchus, the peripatetic, and afterwards warmly embraced the tenets of the stoics. Of all his compositions nothing remains but his geography, divided into 17 books, a work justly celebrated for its elegance, purity, the erudition and universal knowledge of the author. It contains an account, in Greek, of the most celebrated places of the world, the origin, the manners, religion, prejudices, and government of nations; the foundation of cities, and the accurate history of each separate province. Strabo travelled over great part of the world in quest of information, and to examine with the most critical inquiry not only the situation of the places, but also the manners of the inhabitants, whose history he meant to write. In the two first books the author wishes to show the necessity of geography; in the 3d he gives a description of Spain; in the 4th, of Gaul and the British Isles. The 5th and 6th contain an account of Italy and the neighbouring islands; the 7th, which is mutilated at the end, gives a full description of Germany, and the country of the Getæ, Illyricum, Taurica Chersonesus, and Epirus. The affairs of Greece and the adjacent islands are separately treated in the 8th, 9th, and 10th; and in the four next, Asia within mount Taurus; and in the 15th and 16th, Asia without Taurus, India, Persia, Syria, and Arabia; the last book gives an account of Egypt, Æthiopia, Carthage, and other places of Africa. Among the books of Strabo which have been lost, were historical commentaries. This celebrated geographer died A. D. 25. The best editions of his geography are those of Cassaubon, fol. Paris, 1620; of Amst. 2 vols. fol. 1707.

Strato, or Straton, I. a king of the island Aradus, received into alliance by Alexander. Curt. 4, c. 1.——II. A king of Sidon, dependant upon Darius. Alexander deposed him because he refused to surrender. Curt. ib.——III. A philosopher of Lampsacus, disciple and successor in the school of Theophrastus, about 289 years before the Christian era. He applied himself with uncommon industry to the study of nature, and was surnamed Physicus, and after the most mature investigations, he supported that nature was inanimate, and that there was no God but nature. He was appointed preceptor to Ptolemy Philadelphus, who not only revered his abilities and learning, but also rewarded his labours with unbounded liberality. He wrote different treatises, all now lost. Diog. 5.—Cic. Acad. 1, c. 9, l. 4, c. 38, &c.——IV. A native of Epirus, very intimate with Brutus, the murderer of Cæsar. He killed his friend at his own request——V. A rich Orchomenian, who destroyed himself because he could not obtain in marriage a young woman of Haliartus. Plut.

Stratonice, I. a daughter of Ariarathes, king of Cappadocia, who married Eumenes, king of Pergamus, and became mother of Attalus. Strab. 13.——II. A daughter of Demetrius Poliorcetes, who married Seleucus, king of Syria Antiochus, her husband's son, by a former wife, became enamoured of her, and married her with his father's consent, when the physicians had told him that if he did not comply his son's health would be impaired. Plut. in Dem.—Val. Max. 5, c. 7.——II. The wife of Antigonus, mother of Demetrius Poliorcetes.

Strophius, a son of Crisus, king of Phocis. He married a sister of Agamemnon, called Anaxibia, or Astyochia, or according to others, Cyndragora, by whom he had Pylades, celebrated for his friendship with Orestes. After the murder of Agamemnon by Clytemnestra and Ægysthus, the king of Phocis educated, at his own house, with the greatest care, his nephew, whom Electra had secretly removed from the dagger of his mother and her adulterer. Orestes was enabled by means of Strophius to revenge the death of his father. Paus. 2, c. 29.—Hygin. fab. 1, 17.

Suetonius, I. (C. Paulinus,) the first Roman general who crossed mount Atlas with an army, of which expedition he wrote an account. He presided over Britain, as governor for about 20 years, and was afterwards made consul. He forsook the interest of Otho, and attached himself to Vitellius.——II. C. Tranquillus, a Latin historian, son of a Roman knight of the same name. He was favoured by Adrian, and became his secretary, but he was afterwards banished from court for want of attention and respect to the emperess Sabina. In his retirement Suetonius enjoyed the friendship and correspondence of Pliny the younger, and dedicated his time to study. He wrote a history of the Roman kings, divided into three books; a catalogue of all the illustrious men of Rome; a book on the games and spectacles of the Greeks, &c. which are all now lost. The only one of his compositions extant is the lives of the twelve first Cæsars, and some fragments of his catalogue of celebrated grammarians. Suetonius, in his lives, is praised for his impartiality and correctness. His expressions, however, are often too indelicate; and it has been justly observed, that while he exposed the deformities of the Cæsars, he wrote with all the licentiousness and extravagance with which they lived. The best editions of Suetonius are those of Pitiscus, 4to. 2 vols. Leovard, 1714; that of Oudendorp, 2 vols. 8vo. L. Bat. 1751; and that of Ernesti, 8vo. Lips. 1775. Plin. 1, ep. 18, l. 5, ep. 11, &c.

Suffenus, a Latin poet in the age of Catullus. He was but of moderate abilities, but puffed up with a high idea of his own excellence, and therefore deservedly exposed to the ridicule of his contemporaries. Catull. 22.

Suidas, a Greek writer, who flourished A. D. 1100. The best edition of his excellent Lexicon is that of Kuster, 3 vols. fol. Cantab. 1705.

Sulpitia, I. a daughter of Paterculus, who married Fulvius Flaccus. She was so famous for her chastity, that she consecrated a temple to Venus Verticordia, a goddess who was implored to turn the hearts of the Roman women to virtue. Plin. 7, c. 35.——II. A poetess in the age of Domitian, against whom she wrote a poem because he had banished the philosophers from Rome. This composition is still extant. She had also written a poem on conjugal affection, commended by Martial, ep. 35, now lost. ——III. A daughter of Serv. Sulpitius, mentioned in the fourth book of elegies falsely attributed to Tibullus.

Sulpitia Lex, militaris, by C. Sulpitius, the tribune, A. U. C. 665, invested Marius with the full power of the war against Mithridates, of which Sylla was to be deprived.——Another, de senatu, by Servius Sulpicius, the tribune, A. U. C. 665. It required that no senators should own more than 2000 drachmæ.——Another, de civitate, by P. Sulpicius the tribune, A. U. C. 665. It ordered that the new citizens who composed the eight tribes lately created, should be divided among the 35 old tribes, as a greater honour.——Another, called also Sempronia de religione, by P. Sulpicius Saverrio and P. Sempronius Sophus, consuls, A. U. C. 449. It forbade any person to consecrate a temple or altar without the permission of the senate and the majority of the tribunes.——Another, to empower the Romans to make war against Philip of Macedonia.

Sulpitius, or Sulpicius, an illustrious family of Rome, of whom the most celebrated are—— Peticus, a man chosen dictator against the Gauls. His troops mutinied when first he took the field, but soon after he engaged the enemy and totally defeated them. Liv. 7.——II. Serrio, a consul who gained a victory over the Equi. Id. 9, c. 45.——III. C. Paterculus, a consul sent against the Carthaginians. He conquered Sardinia and Corsica, and obtained a complete victory over the enemy's fleet. He was honoured with a triumph at his return to Rome. Id. 17.——IV. Spurius, one of the three commissioners whom the Romans sent to collect the best laws which could be found in the different cities and republics of Greece. Id. 3, 10.——V. One of the first consuls who received intelligence that a conspiracy was formed in Rome to restore the Tarquins to power, &c.——VI. P. Galba, a Roman consul, who signalized himself greatly during the war which his countrymen waged against the Achæans and the Macedonians.——VII. Publius, one of the associates of Marius, well known for his intrigues and cruelty. He made some laws in favour of the allies of Rome, and he kept about 3000 young men in continual pay, whom he called his anti-senatorial band, and with these he had often the impertinence to attack the consul in the popular assemblies. He became at last so seditious, that he was proscribed by Sylla's adherents, and immediately murdered. His head was fixed on a pole in the rostrum, where he had often made many seditious speeches in the capacity of tribune. Liv. 77.——VIII. Surēna, a powerful officer in the armies of Orodes, king of Parthia. His family had the privilege of crowning the kings of Parthia. He was appointed to conduct the war against the Romans, and to protect the kingdom of Parthia against Crassus, who wished to conquer it. He defeated the Roman triumvir, and after he had drawn him perfidiously to a conference, he ordered his head to be cut off. He afterwards returned to Parthia, mimicking the triumphs of the Romans. Orodes ordered him to be put to death, B. C. 52. Surena has been admired for his valour, his sagacity as a general, and his prudence and firmness in the execution of his plans; but his perfidy, his effeminate manners, and his lasciviousness, have been deservedly censured. Polyæn. 7.—Plut. in Crass.

Sylla, I. (L. Cornelius,) a celebrated Roman of a noble family. The poverty of his early years was relieved by the liberality of Nicopolis, who left him heir to a large fortune; and, with the addition of the immense wealth of his mother-in-law, he soon appeared one of the most opulent of the Romans. He first entered the army under Marius, whom he accompanied in Numidia in the capacity of quæstor. He rendered himself conspicuous in military affairs; and Bocchus, one of the princes of Numidia, delivered Jugurtha into his hands for the Roman consul. The rising fame of Sylla gave umbrage to Marius, who was always jealous of an equal as well as of a superior; but the ill language which he might use rather inflamed than extinguished the ambition of Sylla. He left the conqueror of Jugurtha, and carried arms under Catulus. Some time after he obtained the prætorship, and was appointed by the Roman senate to place Ariobarzanes on the throne of Cappadocia against the views and interest of Mithridates, king of Pontus. This he easily effected; one battle left him victorious, and before he quitted the plains of Asia, the Roman prætor had the satisfaction to receive in his camp the ambassadors of the king of Parthia, who wished to make a treaty of alliance with the Romans. Sylla received them with haughtiness, and behaved with such arrogance, that one of them exclaimed, Surely this man is master of the world, or doomed to be such! At his return to Rome he was commissioned to finish the war with the Marsi, and when this was successfully ended, he was rewarded with the consulship in the 50th year of his age. In this capacity he wished to have the administration of the Mithridatic war; but he found an obstinate adversary in Marius, and he attained the summit of his wishes only when he had entered Rome sword in hand. After he had slaughtered all his enemies, set a price upon the head of Marius, and put to death the tribune Sulpitius, who had continually opposed his views, he marched towards Asia, and disregarded the flames of discord which he left behind him unextinguished. Mithridates was already master of the greatest part of Greece; and Sylla, when he reached the coast of Peloponnesus, was delayed by the siege of Athens and of the Piræus. His operations were carried on with vigour, and when he found his money fail, he made no scruple to take the riches of the temples of the gods to bribe his soldiers and render them devoted to his service. His boldness succeeded, the Piræus surrendered; and the conqueror, as if struck with reverence at the beautiful porticoes where the philosophic followers of Socrates and Plato had often disputed, spared the city of Athens, which he had devoted to destruction, and forgave the living for the sake of the dead. Two celebrated battles, at Chæronæa and Orchomenos, rendered him master of Greece. He crossed the Hellespont, and attacked Mithridates in the very heart of his kingdom. The artful monarch, who well knew the valour and perseverance of his adversary, made proposals of peace; and Sylla, whose interest at home was then decreasing, did not hesitate to put an end to a war which had rendered him master of so much territory, and which enabled him to return to Rome like a conqueror, and to dispute with his rival the sovereignty of the republic with a victorious army. Muræna was left at the head of the Roman forces in Asia, and Sylla hastened to Italy. In the plains of Campania he was met by a few of his adherents, whom the success of his rivals had banished from the capital; and he was soon informed, that if he wished to contend with Marius, he must encounter fifteen generals, followed by 25 well-disciplined legions. In these critical circumstances he had recourse to artifice, and while he proposed terms of accommodation to his adversaries, he secretly strengthened himself, and saw with pleasure his armies daily increase by the revolt of soldiers whom his bribes or promises had corrupted. Pompey embraced his cause, and marched to his camp with three legions. Soon after he appeared in the field with advantage; the confidence of Marius decayed with his power, and Sylla entered Rome like a tyrant and a conqueror. The streets were daily filled with dead bodies, and 7000 citizens, to whom the conqueror had promised pardon, were suddenly massacred in the circus. The senate, at that time assembled in the temple of Bellona, heard the shrieks of their dying countrymen; and when they inquired into the cause of it, Sylla coolly replied, They are only a few rebels whom I have ordered to be chastised. If this had been the last and most dismal scene, Rome might have been called happy; but it was only the beginning of her misfortunes, each succeeding day exhibited a greater number of slaughtered bodies; and when one of the senators had the boldness to ask the tyrant when he meant to stop his cruelties, Sylla, with an air of unconcern, answered, that he had not yet determined, but that he would take it into his consideration. The slaughter was continued, and a list of such as were proscribed daily stuck up in the public streets. No less than 4700 of the most powerful and opulent were slain, and Sylla wished the Romans to forget his cruelties in aspiring to the title of perpetual dictator. In this capacity, he made new laws, abrogated such as were inimical to his views, and changed every regulation where his ambition was obstructed. After he had finished whatever the most absolute sovereign may do, Sylla abdicated the dictatorial power, and retired to a solitary retreat at Puteoli, where he spent the rest of his days, if not in literary ease and tranquillity, yet far from the noise of arms, in the midst of riot and debauchery. The companions of his retirement were the most base and licentious of the populace, and Sylla took pleasure still to wallow in voluptuousness, though on the verge of life and covered with infirmities. His intemperance hastened his end, his blood was corrupted, and an imposthume was bred in his bowels. He at last died in the greatest torments, of the lousy disease, about 78 years before Christ, in the 60th year of his age; and it has been observed, that, like Marius, on his death-bed, he wished to drown the stings of conscience and remorse by continual intoxication. His funeral was very magnificent; his body was attended by the senate and the vestal virgins, and hymns were sung to celebrate his exploits and to honour his memory. A monument was erected in the field of Mars, on which appeared an inscription written by himself, in which he said, the good services he had received from his friends, and the injuries of his enemies, had been returned with unexampled usury. The character of Sylla is that of an ambitious, dissimulating, tyrannical, and resolute commander. Sylla has been commended for the patronage he gave to the arts and sciences. He brought from Asia the extensive library of Apellicon, the peripatetic philosopher, in which were the works of Aristotle and Theophrastus; and he himself composed 22 books of memoirs concerning himself. These memoirs were meant to have been dedicated to Lucullus, on condition that he should arrange and correct them. Sylla was employed on them the evening before his death, and concluded them by relating, that on the preceding night he had seen in a dream one of his children, who had died a short while before, and who, stretching out his hand, showed to him his mother Metella, and exhorted him forthwith to leave the cares of life, and hasten to enjoy repose along with them in the bosom of eternal rest. "Thus" adds the author, who accounted nothing so certain as what was signified to him in dreams, "I finish my days, as was predicted to me by the Chaldeans, who announced that I should surmount envy itself by my glory, and should have the good fortune to fall in the full blossom of my prosperity." These memoirs were sent by Epicadus, the freedman of Sylla, to Lucullus, in order that he might put to them the finishing hand. If preserved, they would have thrown much light on the most important affairs of Roman history, as they proceeded from the person who must, of all others, have been the best informed concerning them. They are quoted by Plutarch as authority for many curious facts, as—that in the great battle by which the Cimbrian invasion was repelled, the chief execution was done in that quarter where Sylla was stationed; the main body, under Marius, having been misled by a cloud of dust, and having in consequence wandered about for a long time without finding the enemy. Plutarch also mentions that, in these Commentaries, the author contradicted the current story of his seeking a refuge during a tumult at the commencement of the civil wars with Marius, in the house of his rival, who, it had been reported, sheltered and dismissed him in safety. Besides their importance for the history of events, the Memoirs of Sylla must have been highly interesting, as developing, in some degree, the most curious character in Roman history, "In the loss of his Memoirs," says Blackwell, in his usual inflated style, "the strongest draught of human passions, in the highest wheels of fortune and sallies of power, for ever vanished. The character of Cæsar, though greater, was less incomprehensible than that of Sylla; and the mind of Augustus, though unfathomable to his contemporaries, has been sounded by the long line of posterity; but it is difficult to analyse the disposition which inspirthe inconsistent conduct of Sylla. Gorged with power, and blood, and vengeance, he seems have retired from what he chiefly coveted, if surfeited; but neither this retreat, nor old age, could mollify his heart; nor could disease, or the approach of death, or the remembrance of his past life, disturb his tranquillity. A part of his existence was more strange than termination; and nothing can be more singular than that he, who, on the day of his decease, caused, in mere wantonness, a provincial magistrate to be strangled in his presence, could, the night before, have enjoyed a dream elevated and tender. It is probable that the memoirs were well written, in point of style, as Sylla loved the arts and sciences, and was even a man of some learning, though Cæsar is reported to have said, on hearing his literary acquirements extolled, that he must have been but an indifferent scholar who had resigned a dictatorship.—Cic. in Verr. &c.—*C. Syphax died in prison, 201 years before Christ, and his possessions were given to Masinissa. According to some, the descendants of Syphax reigned for some time over a part of Numidia, and continued to make opposition to the Romans. Liv. 24, &c.—Plut. in Scip.—Flor. 2, c. 6.—Polyb.—Ital. 16, v. 171 and 118.—*Ovid. Tachos, or Tachus, a king of Egypt, in the reign of Artaxerxes Ochus, against whom he sustained a long war. He was assisted by the Greeks, but his confidence in Agesilaus, king of Lacedæmon, proved fatal to him. Chabrias, the Athenian, had been intrusted with the fleet of the Egyptian monarch, and Agesilaus was left with the command of the mercenary army. The Lacedæmonian disregarded his engagements, and by joining with Nectanebus, who had revolted from Tachus, he ruined the affairs of the monarch, and obliged him to save his life by flight. Some observe that Agesilaus acted with that duplicity to avenge himself upon Tachus, who had insolently ridiculed his short and deformed stature. The expectations of Tachus had been raised by the fame of Agesilaus; but when he saw the lame monarch, he repeated, on the occasion, the fable of the mountain which brought forth a mouse; upon which Agesilaus replied with asperity, though he called him a mouse, yet he soon should find him to be a lion. C. Nep. in Ages.

Tacitus, I. (C. Cornelius,) a celebrated Latin historian, born in the reign of Nero. His father was a Roman knight, who had been appointed governor of Belgic Gaul. The native genius and the rising talents of Tacitus were beheld with rapture by the emperor Vespasian, and, as he wished to protect and patronize merit, he raised the young historian to places of trust and honour. The succeeding emperors were not less partial to Tacitus, and Domitian seemed to forget his cruelties when virtue and innocence claimed his patronage. Tacitus was honoured with the consulship, and he gave proofs of his eloquence at the bar, by supporting the cause of the injured Africans against the proconsul Marius Priscus, and in causing him to be condemned for his avarice and extortion. The friendly intercourse of Pliny and Tacitus has often been admired; and many have observed, that the familiarity of these two great men arose from similar principles, and a perfect conformity of manners and opinions. Yet Tacitus was as much the friend of a republican government as Pliny was an admirer of the imperial power, and of the short-lived virtues of his patron Trajan. Pliny gained the hearts of his adherents by affability, and all the elegant graces which became the courtier and the favourite, while Tacitus conciliated the esteem of the world by his virtuous conduct, which prudence and love of honour ever guided. The friendship of Tacitus and of Pliny almost became proverbial. The time of Tacitus was not employed in trivial pursuits, the orator might have been now forgotten if the historian had not flourished. Tacitus wrote a treatise on the manners of the Germans, a composition admired for the fidelity and exactness with which it is executed, though some have declared that the historian delineated manners and customs with which he was not acquainted, and which never existed. His life of Cn. Julius Agricola, whose daughter he had married, is celebrated for its purity, elegance, and the many excellent instructions and important truths which it relates. His history of the Roman emperors is imperfect; of the 28 years of which it treated, that is, from the 69th to the 96th year of the Christian era, nothing remains but the year 69 and part of the 70th. His Annals were the most extensive and complete of his works. The history of the reign of Tiberius, Caius, Claudius, and Nero, was treated with accuracy and attention; yet we are to lament the loss of the history of the reign of Caius, and the beginning of that of Claudius. Tacitus had reserved for his old age the history of the reign of Nerva and Trajan, and he also proposed to give to the world an account of the interesting administration of Augustus; but these important subjects never employed the pen of the historian; and, as some of the ancients observe, the only compositions of Tacitus were contained in 30 books, of which we have now left only 16 of his annals and five of his history. The style of Tacitus has always been admired for peculiar beauties; the thoughts are great, and every thing is treated with precision and dignity, yet many have called him obscure, because he was fond of expressing his ideas in few words. This was the fruit of experience and judgment; the history appears copious and diffuse, while the annals, which were written in his old age, are less flowing as to style, more concise, and more heavily laboured. His Latin is remarkable for being pure and classical. In his biographical sketches he displays an uncommon knowledge of human nature, he paints every scene with a masterly hand, and gives each object its proper size and becoming colours. Affairs of importance are treated with dignity, the secret causes of events and revolutions are investigated, and the historian every where shows his reader that he was a lover of truth, and an inveterate enemy to oppression. The history of the reign of Tiberius is his master-piece: the deep policy, the dissimulation, and various intrigues of this celebrated prince, are painted with all the fidelity of the historian. It is said that the emperor Tacitus, who boasted in being one of the descendants of the historian, ordered the works of his ancestor to be placed in all public libraries, and directed that ten copies, well ascertained for accuracy and exactness, should be yearly written, that so great and so valuable a work might not be lost. Some ecclesiastical writers have exclaimed against Tacitus for the partial manner in which he speaks of the Jews and Christians; but it should be remembered that he spoke the language of the Romans, and that the peculiarities of the Christians could not but draw upon them the odium and the ridicule of the Pagans, and the imputation of superstition. Among the many excellent editions of Tacitus, these may pass for the best; that of Rome, fol. 1515; that in usum Delphini, 4 vols. 4to. Paris, 1682; that of Lips. 2 vols. 8vo. 1714; of Gronovius, 2 vols. 4to. 1721; that of Brotier, 7 vols. 12mo. Paris, 1776; that of Ernesti, 2 vols. 8vo. Lips, 1777; and Barbou's, 3 vols. 12mo. Paris, 1760.——II. M. Claudius, a Roman, chosen emperor by the senate after the death of Aurelian. He would have refused this important and dangerous office, but the pressing solicitations of the senate prevailed, and in the 70th year of his age he complied with the wishes of his countrymen, and accepted the purple. The time of his administration was very popular, the good of he people was his care, and as a pattern of moderation, economy, temperance, regularity, and impartiality, Tacitus found no equal. He abolished the several brothels which, under the preceding reigns, had filled Rome with licentiousness and obscenity; and by ordering all the public baths to be shut at sunset, he prevented the commission of many irregularities which the darkness of the night had hitherto sanctioned. The senators under Tacitus seemed to have recovered their ancient dignity and long-lost privileges. They were not only the counsellors of the emperor, but they even seemed to be his masters; and when Florianus, the brother-in-law of Tacitus, was refused the consulship, the emperor said that the senate, no doubt, could fix upon a more deserving object. As a warrior, Tacitus is inferior to few of the Romans; and during a short reign of about six months, he not only repelled the barbarians who had invaded the territories of Rome in Asia, but he prepared to make war against the Persians and Scythians. He died in Cilicia, as he was on his expedition, of a violent distemper, or, according to some, he was destroyed by the secret dagger of an assassin, on the 13th of April, in 276th year of the Christian era. Tacitus has been commended for his love of learning; and it has been observed, that he never passed a day without consecrating some part of his time to reading or writing. He has been accused of superstition; and authors have recorded that he never studied on the second day of each month, a day which he deemed inauspicious and unlucky. Tacit. vitâ.—Zozim.

Tanăquil, called also Caia Cæcilia, was the wife of Tarquin, the 5th king of Rome. She was a native of Tarquinia, where she married Lucumon, better known by the name of Tarquin, which he assumed after he had come to Rome at the representation of his wife, whose knowledge of augury promised him something uncommon. Her expectations were not frustrated; her husband was raised to the throne, and she shared with him the honours of royalty. After the murder of Tarquin, Tanaquil raised her son-in-law Servius Tullius to the throne, and insured him the succession. She distinguished herself by her liberality; and the Romans in succeeding ages had such a veneration for her character, that the embroidery she had made, her girdle, as also the robe of her son-in-law, which she had worked with her own hands, were preserved with the greatest sanctity. Juvenal bestows the appellation of Tanaquil on all such women as were imperious and had the command of their husbands. Liv. 1, c. 34, &c. *Dionys. Tarpeia, the daughter of Tarpeius, the governor of the citadel of Rome, promised to open the gates of the city to the Sabines provided they gave her their gold bracelets, or, as she expressed it, what they carried on their left hands. Tatius, the king of the Sabines, consented, and as he entered the gates, to punish her perfidy, he threw not only his bracelet but his shield upon Tarpeia. His followers imitated his example, and Tarpeia was crushed under the weight of the bracelets and shields of the Sabine army. She was buried in the capitol, which from her has been called the Tarpeian rock, and there afterwards many of the Roman malefactors were thrown down a deep precipice. *Plut. in Rom.—Ovid. Tarquinia, I. a daughter of Tarquinius Priscus, who married Servius Tullius. When her husband was murdered by Tarquinius Superbus, she privately conveyed away his body by night, and buried it. This preyed upon her mind, and the following night she died. Some have attributed her death to excess of grief, or suicide; while others, perhaps more justly, have suspected Tullia, the wife of young Tarquin, with the murder.——II. A vestal virgin, who, as some suppose, gave the Roman people a large piece of land, which was afterwards called the Campus Martius.

Tarquinius Priscus, I. the 5th king of Rome, was son of Demaratus, a native of Greece. His first name was Lucumon, but this he changed when, by the advice of his wife Tanaquil, he had come to Rome. He called himself Lucius, and assumed the surname of Tarquinius, because born in the town of Tarquinii, in Etruria. At Rome he distinguished himself so much by his liberality and engaging manners, that Ancus Martius, the reigning monarch, nominated him, at his death, the guardian of his children. This was insufficient to gratify the ambition of Tarquin; the princes were young, and an artful oration delivered to the people, immediately transferred the crown of the deceased monarch to the head of Lucumon. The people had every reason to be satisfied with their choice. Tarquin reigned with moderation and popularity. He increased the number of the senate, and made himself friends by electing 100 new senators from the plebeians, whom he distinguished, by the appellation of Patres minorum gentium, from those of the patrician body, who were called Patres majorum gentium. The glory of the Roman arms, which was supported with so much dignity by the former monarchs, was not neglected in this reign, and Tarquin showed that he possessed vigour and military prudence in the victories which he obtained over the united forces of the Latins and Sabines, and in the conquest of the 12 nations of Etruria. He repaired, in the time of peace, the walls of the capital; the public places were adorned with elegant buildings and useful ornaments; and many centuries after, such as were spectators of the stately mansions and golden palaces of Nero, viewed, with more admiration and greater pleasure, the more simple, though not less magnificent, edifices of Tarquin. He laid the foundations of the capitol, and to the industry and the public spirit of this monarch, the Romans were indebted for their aqueducts and subterraneous sewers, which supplied the city with fresh and wholesome water, and removed all the filth and ordure, which in a great capital too often breed pestilence and diseases. Tarquin was the first who introduced among the Romans, the custom to canvass for offices of trust and honour; he distinguished the monarch, the senators, and other inferior magistrates, with particular robes and ornaments, and ivory chairs at spectacles; and the hatchets carried before the public magistrates were by his order surrounded with bundles of sticks, to strike more terror, and to be viewed with greater reverence. Tarquin was assassinated by the two sons of his predecessor, in the 80th year of his age, 38 of which he had sat on the throne, 578 years before Christ. Dionys. Hal. 3, c. 59.—Val. Max. 1, c. 4, l. 3. c. 2.—Flor. 1, c. 5, &c.—Liv. 1, c. 31.—Virg. Æn. 6, v. 817.——II. The second Tarquin, surnamed Superbus from his pride and insolence, was grandson of Tarquinius Priscus. He ascended the throne of Rome after his father-in-law Servius Tullius, and was the seventh and last king of Rome. He married Tullia the daughter of Tullius, and it was at her instigation that he murdered his father-in-law and seized the kingdom. The crown which he had obtained with violence, he endeavoured to keep by a continuation of tyranny. Unlike his royal predecessors, he paid no regard to the decisions of the senate or the approbation of the public assemblies. The public treasury was soon exhausted by the continual extravagance of Tarquin, and to silence the murmurs of his subjects, he resolved to call their attention to war. He was successful in his military operations; the neighbouring cities submitted; but while the siege of Ardea was continued, the wantonness of the son of Tarquin at Rome for ever stopped the progress of his arms; and the Romans, whom a series of barbarity and oppression had hitherto provoked, no sooner saw the virtuous Lucretia stab herself, not to survive the loss of her honour, (Vid. Lucretia,) than the whole city and camp arose with indignation against the monarch. The gates of Rome were shut against him, and Tarquin was for ever banished from his throne, in the year of Rome 244. Unable to find support from even one of his subjects, Tarquin retired among the Etrurians, who attempted in vain to replace him on his throne. The republican government was established at Rome, and all Italy refused any longer to support the cause of an exiled monarch against a nation, who heard the name of Tarquin, of king, and tyrant, mentioned with equal horror and indignation. Tarquin died in the 90th year of his age, about 14 years after his expulsion from Rome. He had reigned about 25 years. Though Tarquin appeared so odious among the Romans, his reign was not without its share of glory; his conquests were numerous; to beautify the buildings and porticos at Rome was his wish; and with great magnificence and care he finished the capitol which his predecessor of the same name had begun. He also bought the Sibylline books which the Romans consulted with such religious solemnity. Vid. Sibylla. Cic. pro Rab. & Tus. 2, c. 27.—Liv. 1, c. 46, &c.—*Dionys. Collatinus, one of the relations of Tarquin the Proud, who married Lucretia. Vid. Collatinus.——IV. Sextius, the eldest son of Tarquin the Proud, who rendered himself known by a variety of adventures. When his father besieged Gabii, young Tarquin publicly declared that he was at variance with the monarch, and the report was the more easily believed when he came before Gabii with his body all mangled and bloody with stripes. This was an agreement between the father and the son, and Tarquin had no sooner declared that this proceeded from the tyranny and oppression of his father, than the people of Gabii intrusted him with the command of their armies, fully convinced that Rome could never have a more inveterate enemy. When he had thus succeeded, he despatched a private messenger to his father, but the monarch gave no answer to be returned to his son. Sextius inquired more particularly about his father, and when he heard from the messenger that when the message was delivered, Tarquin cut off with a stick the tallest poppies in his garden, the son followed the example by putting to death the most noble and powerful citizens of Gabii. The town soon fell into the hands of the Romans. The violence which some time after Tarquinius offered to Lucretia, was the cause of his father's exile and the total expulsion of his family from Rome. Vid. Lucretia. Sextius was at last killed, bravely fighting in a battle, during the war which the Latins sustained against Rome in the attempt of re-establishing the Tarquins on their throne. Ovid. Fast.—Liv.——V. A Roman senator, who was accessary to Catiline's conspiracy.

Tatian, one of the Greek fathers, A. D. 172. The best edition of his works is that of Worth, 8vo. Oxon. 1700.

Tatienses, a name given to one of the tribes of the Roman people by Romulus, in honour of Tatius, king of the Sabines. The Tatienses, who were partly the ancient subjects of the king of the Sabines, lived on mount Capitolinus and Quirinalis.

Tatius, (Titus,) king of Cures, among the Sabines, made war against the Romans after the rape of the Sabines. The gates of the city were betrayed into his hands by Tarpeia, and the army of the Sabines advanced as far as the Roman forum, where a bloody battle was fought.

The cries of the Sabine virgins at last stopped the fury of the combatants, and an agreement was made between the two nations. Tatius consented to leave his ancient possessions, and with his subjects of Cures to come and live in Rome, which, as stipulated, was still permitted to bear the name of its founder, whilst the inhabitants adopted the name of Quirites, in compliment to the new citizens. After he had for six years shared the royal authority with Romulus, in the greatest union, he was murdered at Lanuvium, B. C. 742, for an act of cruelty to the ambassadors of the Laurentes. This was done by order of his royal colleague, according to some authors. Liv. 1, c. 10, &c.—Plut. in Rom.—Cic. pro Balb.—Ovid. Met. 14, v. 804.—Flor. 1. c. 1.

Taurus, I. (Titus Statilius,) a consul, distinguished by his intimacy with Augustus, as well as by a theatre which he built, and the triumph he obtained after a prosperous campaign in Africa. He was made prefect of Italy by his imperial friend.——II. A proconsul of Africa, accused by Agrippina, who wished him to be condemned that she might become mistress of his gardens. Tacit. Ann. 12, c. 59. Vid. Part III.

Taxilus, or Taxiles, I. a king of Taxila, in the age of Alexander, called also Omphis. He submitted to the conqueror, who rewarded him with great liberality. Diod. 17.—Plut. in Alex.—Ælian. V. H. 5, c. 6.—Curt. 8, c. 14.——II. A general of Mithridates, who assisted Archelaus against the Romans in Greece. He was afterwards conquered by Muræna, the lieutenant of Sylla.

Techmessa, the daughter of a Phrygian prince, called by some Teuthras, and by others Teleutas. When her father was killed in war by Ajax, son of Telamon, the young princess became the property of the conqueror, and by him she had a son called Eurysaces. Sophocles, in one of his tragedies, represents Techmessa as moving her husband to pity by her tears and entreaties when he wished to stab himself. Horat. 2, Od. 1, v. 6.—*Dictys. Tectamus. Vid. Part III.

Tectosages, or Tectosagæ. Vid. Part I.

Tegula, P. Licin. a comic poet, who flourished B. C. 198.

Telamon, a king of the island of Salamis, son of Æacus and Endis. He was a brother to Peleus, and father to Teucer and Ajax, who on that account is often called Telamonius heros. He fled from Megara, his native country, after he had accidentally murdered his brother Phocus, in playing with the quoit, and he sailed to the island of Salamis, where he soon after married Glauce, the daughter of Cychreus, the king of the place. At the death of his father-in-law, who had no male issue, Telamon became king of Salamis. He accompanied Jason in his expedition to Colchis, and was arm-bearer to Hercules, when that hero took Laomedon prisoner and destroyed Troy. Telamon was rewarded by Hercules for his services with the hand of Hesione, whom the conqueror had obtained among the spoils of Troy, and with her he returned to Greece. He also married Peribœa, whom some called Eribœa. Ovid. Met. 13, v. 51.—Sophocl. in Aj.—Pindar. Isthm. 6.—Stat. Theb. 6.—Apollod. 1, 2, &c.—Paus. in Cor.—Hygin. fab. 97, &c.

Telchines, a people of Rhodes, said to have been originally from Crete. They were the inventors of many useful arts, and, according to Diodorus, passed for the sons of the sea. They were the first who raised statues to the gods. They had the power of changing themselves into whatever shape they pleased, and according to Ovid they could poison and fascinate all objects with their eyes, and cause rain and hail to fall at pleasure. The Telchinians insulted Venus, for which the goddess inspired them with a sudden fury, so that they committed the grossest crimes, and offered violence even to their own mothers. Jupiter destroyed them all by a deluge. Diod.—Ovid. Met. 7, v. 365, &c.

Telecles, or Teleclus, I. a Lacedæmonian king, of the family of the Agidæ, who reigned forty years, B. C. 813. Herodot. 7, c. 205.—Paus. 3, c. 2.——II. A philosopher, disciple of Lacidas, B. C. 214.

Teleclides, an Athenian comic poet in the age of Pericles, one of whose plays, called the Amphictyons, is mentioned by ancient authors. Plut. in Nicia.—Athen. 8.

Telegonus, I. a son of Ulysses and Circe, born in the island of Ææa, where he was educated. When arrived to the years of manhood, he went to Ithaca to make himself known to his father, but he was shipwrecked on the coast, and, being destitute of provisions, he plundered some of the inhabitants of the island. Ulysses and Telemachus came to defend the property of their subjects against this unknown invader; a quarrel arose, and Telegonus killed his father without knowing who he was. He afterwards returned to his native country, and, according to Hyginus, he carried thither his father's body, where it was buried. Telemachus and Penelope also accompanied him in his return, and soon after the nuptials of Telegonus and Penelope were celebrated by order of Minerva. Penelope had by Telegonus a son called Italus, who gave his name to Italy. Telegonus founded Tusculum and Tiber or Prænestе, in Italy, and according to some he left one daughter, called Mamilia, from whom the patrician family of the Mamilii at Rome were descended. Horat. 3, od. 29, v. 8.—Ovid. Fast. 3 and 4. Trist. 1, el. 1.—Plut. in Par.—Hygin. fab. 127.—Diod. 7 ——II. A son of Proteus, killed by Hercules. Apollod.——III. A king of Egypt, who married Io after she had been restored to her original form by Jupiter. Id.

Telemachus, a son of Ulysses and Penelope. He was still in the cradle when his father went with the rest of the Greeks to the Trojan war. At the end of this celebrated war, Telemachus, anxious to see his father, went to seek him, and as the place of his residence and the cause of his long absence were then unknown, he visited the court of Menelaus and Nestor to obtain information. He afterwards returned to Ithaca, where the suitors of his mother Penelope had conspired to murder him, but he avoided their snares, and, by means of Minerva, he discovered his father, who had arrived in the island two days before him, and was then in the house of Eumæus. With this faithful servant and Ulysses, Telemachus concerted how to deliver his mother from the importunities of her suitors, and it was effected with success. After the death of his father, Telemachus went to the island of Ææa, where he married Circe, or according to others, Cassiphone, the daughter of Circe, by whom he had a son called Latinus. He some time after had the misfortune to kill his mother-in-law Circe, and fled to Italy, where he founded Clusium. Telemachus was accompanied in his visit to Nestor and Menelaus by the goddess of wisdom under the form of Mentor. It is said that when a child, Telemachus fell into the sea, and that a dolphin brought him safe to shore after he had remained some time under water. From this circumstance Ulysses had the figure of a dolphin engraved on the seal which he wore in his ring. Hygin. fab. 95 and 125.—Ovid. Heroid. 1, v. 98.—Horat. 1 ep. 7, v. 41.—Homer. Od. 2, &c.—Licophr. in Cass.

Tĕlĕphus, (L. Verus,) wrote a book on the rhetoric of Homer, as also a comparison of that poet with Plato, and other treatises, all lost. Vid. Part III.

Telesilla, a lyric poetess of Argos, who bravely defended her country against the Lacedæmonians, and obliged them to raise the siege. A statue was raised to her honour in the temple of Venus. Paus. 2, c. 20.

Telesĭnus, a general of the Samnites, who joined the interest of Marius, and fought against the generals of Sylla. He marched towards Rome, and defeated Sylla with great loss. He was afterwards routed in a bloody battle, and left in the number of the slain, after he had given repeated proofs of valour and courage. Plut. in Mar. &c.

Tellias, a famous soothsayer of Elis, in the age of Xerxes. He was greatly honoured in Phocis, where he had settled, and the inhabitants raised him a statue in the temple of Apollo at Delphi. Paus. 10, v. 1.—Herodot. 8, c. 27.

Tellus, a poor man, whom Solon called happier than Crœsus, the rich and ambitious king of Lydia, Tellus had the happiness to see a strong and healthy family of children, and at last to fall in the defence of his country Herodot. 1, c. 30.

Temĕnus, a son of Aristomachus, was the first of the Heraclidæ who returned to Peloponnesus with his brother Ctesiphontes in the reign of Tisamenes, king of Argos. Temenus made himself master of the throne of Argos, from which he expelled the reigning sovereign. After death he was succeeded by his son-in-law Deiphon, who had married his daughter Hyrnetho, and his succession was in preference to his own son. Apollod. 2, c. 7.—Paus. 2, c. 18 and 19.

Tenes, a son of Cycnus and Proclea. He was exposed on the sea on the coast of Troas, by his father, who credulously believed his wife Philonome, who had fallen in love with Cycnus and accused him of attempts upon her virtue, when he refused to gratify her passion. Tenes arrived safe in Leucophrys, which he called Tenedos, and of which he became the sovereign. Some time after, Cycnus discovered the guilt of his wife Philonome, and as he wished to be reconciled to his son whom he had so grossly injured, he went to Tenedos. But when he had tied his ship to the shore, Tenes cut off the cable with a hatchet, and suffered his father's ship to be tossed about by the sea. From this circumstance the hatchet of Tenes is become proverbial to intimate a resentment that cannot be pacified. Some, however, suppose that the proverb arose from the severity of a law made by a king of Tenedos against adultery, by which the guilty were both put to death by a hatchet. The hatchet of Tenes was carefully preserved at Tenedos, and afterwards deposited by Periclytus, son of Eutymachus, in the temple of Delphi, where it was still seen in the age of Pausanias. Tenes, as some suppose, was killed by Achilles, as he defended his country against the Greeks, and he received divine honours after death. His statue at Tenedos was carried away by Verres. Strab. 13.—Paus. 10, c. 14.

Tennes, a king of Sodon, who, when his country was besieged by the Persians, burnt himself and the city together, B. C. 351.

Terentia, I. the wife of Cicero. She became mother of M. Cicero, and of a daughter called Tulliola. Cicero repudiated her, because she had been faithless to his bed when he was banished in Asia. Terentia married Sallust, Cicero's enemy, and afterwards Messala Corvinus. She lived to her 103d, or, according to Pliny, to her 117th year. Plut. in Cic.—Val. Max. 8, c. 13.—Cic. ad Attic. 11, ep. 16, &c.——II. The wife of Mæcenas, with whom it is said that Augustus carried on an intrigue. This beautiful, but capricious woman was the sister of Proculeius, so eminent for his fraternal love, as also of Licinius Murœna, who conspired against Augustus; and she is supposed by some, though we think erroneously, to be the Licymnia whom Horace celebrates for her personal charms and accomplishments, and for the passion with which she had inspired his patron. The extravagance and bad temper of this fantastical, yet lovely woman, were sources of perpetual chagrin and uneasiness to her husband. Though his existence was embittered by her folly and caprice, he continued during his whole life to be the dupe of the passion which he entertained for her. He could neither live with nor without her; he quarrelled with her, and was reconciled, almost every day, and put her away one moment, and take her back the next, which has led Seneca to remark, that he was married a thousand times, yet never had but one wife. Terentia vied in personal charms with the empress Livia, and is said to have gained the affections of Augustus. She accompanied her husband and the emperor on an expedition to Gaul, in the year 738, which, at the time, was reported to have been undertaken in order that Augustus might enjoy her society without attracting the notice or animadversions of the capital. Mæcenas was not courtier enough to appear blind to the infidelities of Terentia, or to sleep for the accommodation of the emperor, as the senator Galba is said to have slumbered for the minister. The umbrage Mæcenas took at the attentions paid by his master to Terentia, is assigned by Dio Cassius as the chief cause of that decline of imperial favour which Mæcenas experienced about four years previously to his death. Others have supposed, that it was not the intrigue of Augustus with Terentia which diminished his influence, but a discovery made by the emperor, that he had revealed to his wife some circumstances concerning the conspiracy in which her brother Murœna had been engaged.

Terentia Lex, called also Cassia, frumentaria, by M. Terentius Varro Lucullus and C. Cassius, A. U. C. 680. It ordered that the same price should be given for all corn bought in the provinces, to hinder the exactions of the quæstors.——Another, by Terentius the tribune, A. U. C. 291, to elect five persons to define the power of the consuls, lest they should abuse the public confidence by violence or rapine.

TERENTIANUS, I. a Roman, to whom Longinus dedicated his treatise on the sublime.——II. Maurus, a writer who flourished A. D. 240. The last edition of his treatise de literis, Syllabis, & metris Horatii, is by Mycillus, Francof. 8vo. 1584. Martial. 1, ep. 70.
